Alexander had lived a while with Antigonus since the beginning of these wars; among whose followers it was not hard to discover the intent (which he did not carry very secret) of making himself absolute Lord of all. Therefore he was soon entreated to accept so good an offer; and did not stick to enter into that League, whereby he was to become a free Lord, and subject unto no man's controul.

Howbeit, this his honour continued not long, ere he lost both it and his life together, by treason of the Sicyonians; who thinking thereby to have made themselves free, were soon after vanquished in battel by Cratesipolis, Alexander's Wife, a discreet and valiant Lady. She in revenge of her Husband's death, crucified thirty of the Citizens taken in fight; and having by severity taught them obedience, did afterwards continue her Army in good order, and governed those places she held, with the commendation of her Subjects and Neighbours.

SECT. IV.

The Ætolians rise against Cassander in favour of Antigonus, and are beaten. A Fleet and Land-Army of Antigonus utterly defeated by Ptolomy's Lieutenant. In what terms the War stood at this time. Antigonus draws nearer to Greece.

Antigonus when he found, that with so much money he had only bought an enemy, began to raise troubles to Cassander, and his other adversaries in Greece, by stirring up the Ætolians against them: likewise he laboured to win to his party the Islands in the Greek Seas, by whose assistance he might be the better able to deal with Ptolomy, that greatly prevailed by reason of his strong Fleet. But neither of these attempts had the success which he expected. The Ætolians, a factious Nation, and always envying the greatness of their Neighbours, were often in commotion, but so, that commonly their gains equalled not their losses. Cassander wan some of their own Country, fortified the Arcarnanians against them, and compelled Glaucias, King of the Illyrians, whom he vanquished in battel, to forsake their side, and bind himself, to bear no Arms against Cassander's friends.

On the other side, as many petty Islands were drawn to joyn with Antigonus; so the Fleet of the Rhodians under Theodatus, who was Admiral to Antigonus, passing along the Coast of Asia towards Cyprus, with an Army under conduct of Perilaus marching on the shore for mutual assistance, was quite overthrown by Ptolomy's Navy. Polyclytus, who in Ptolomy's behalf had been sent into Peloponnesus against Alexander, finding no need of his service in that Country, because Alexander was come over to their side, returned homewards, and by the way heard of the course which these Antigonians held, whom he very cunningly surprized. He rode with his Fleet behind a Cape, which the enemies were to double; his Land-forces he placed in ambush, whereinto Perilaus falling, was taken prisoner, with many of his men, and many were slain, making little resistance. Theodatus the Admiral perceiving this, made all hasie to help his fellows that were on Land; but whilst he with all his Fleet were intentive only to that business, Polyclytus appeared at their backs; who as soon as he perceived their disorder, hastned about the Cape, and charging them behind, suffered not one of them to escape him. These ill tidings caused Antigonus to deal with Ptolomy about some composition. First, he sent Ambassadors; afterwards they met in person. But Antigonus would not yield to the demands of Ptolomy: so the parley was vain.

Hitherto each part seemed to have indifferently sped in the War, and thereby to have equal cause of hope and fear. This late Victory, with the good success of his affairs in Cyprus, did seem to make amends to Ptolomy for his losses in Syria. Likewise the revolt of Alexander from Antigonus did equal the confederacy made between the Ætolians and him; as also those petty skirmishes that had been in Asia the less, to Antigonus his advantage, were sufficiently recompenced by others of like regard, but adverse to him, and by the troubles brought upon his estates in those parts by the two Cassanders.

Contrariwise, Antigonus valued the loss of his men, men, money and ships, no otherwise than as the pairing of his nails, that were left long enough, and would easily grow again, but the enlargement of his Territory by addition of Syria, he prized at a higher rate; as if thereby he had fed upon a limb of Ptolomy his enemy, and strengthned the body of his own Empire. Concerning other accidents, whereof the good were hitherto sufficient to counterpoize the bad, he meant to proceed as occasion should direct, which commonly is not long wanting to them, that want no money.

That which most molested him, was the attempts of his enemies upon Asia the less; wherein though as yet they had gotten little, yet had he cause to fear, lest the people being tied unto him by no bond of allegiance, might upon small occasion revolt from him, to men of as honourable reputation as he himself. To prevent this, and to be nearer to Greece, he held it expedient for him to be there in person, where his affairs did seem to prosper the worse, by reason of his absence. Therefore he left part of his Army in Syria, under his Son Demetrius, to whom being then but two and twenty years old, he appointed many ancient Captains, as Assistants, or rather as Directors: the rest he carried with him into Phrygia, where he meant to winter.

SECT. V.

How Lysimachus and Cassander vanquished some enemies, raised against them by Antigonus. The good success of Antigonus in Asia and Greece: with the rebellion of many Cities against Cassander.

THe coming of Antigonus into those parts, wrought a great alteration in the process of his business thereabouts. For his enemies had short leisure to think upon molesting him in Asia: they themselves were held over-hardly to their own work on Europe side. Seuthes a King of the Thracians, joyning with some Towns that rebelled against Lysimachus, brought also the bordering Scythians into the quarrel. All these relyed upon Antigonus, who was to help them with money and other aid. The Ætolians likewise took courage, and rose against Cassander, having Æacides, lately restored to the Kingdom of Epirus, their Assistant. But Lysimachus gave unto his Rebels no time to confirm themselves. He suddenly presented himself before two of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by fear to return unto their former duty. He fought a battel with the Scythians and wild Thracians, and drave them out of the Country. Finally, he overcame Seuthes; and following the heat of his Victory slew Pausanias in Battel, whom Antigonus had sent over with an Army; and all his men he did either put to ransome or fill up with them his own Bands. The like' success had Philip, Cassander's Lieutenant, against the Ætolians. For he wasted their Country; fought with the Epirotes, that came to help them: and after the victory, fought again with their forces joyned in one, overthrowing them, and killing Æacides that unfortunate King. Finally, he drave the Ætolians out of most of their Countrey, and forced them to seek their safety among the wild Mountains. Of the Epirotes he sent as Prisoners to Cassander, the principal Authours of the King's restitution, and of the present War.

Yet these actions required some time, and wearied Antigonus his Adversaries with painful travel; after which they remained only savers. Antigonus himself at fair leisure wan all Caria the whilst, and sent Armies into Peloponnesus, and other parts of Greece, bestowing liberty upon all the Cities he took out of Cassander's hands. The whole Country of Peloponnesus (excepting Sicyon and Corinth) with the Isle of Eubœa, and many places of the firm Land, were by those means won to be his in true and vehement affection, ready to do or suffer any thing for him that had made so evident a demonstration of his readiness, to give them the liberty in deed, which others had promised in idle words. Many States desirous of the same benefit, would fain have shewed their good will; but they were kept in by Cassander's Garrisons, who was too wise to trust them loose. Therefore Antigonus made shew as if he would pass over into Macedon: by which terror he forced Cassander to repair thither in all hast, with the best of his strength, leaving many good Towns of Greece so weakly guarded, that well they might take courage to help themselves, if any forreign succour appeared. The aid which they desired was not long wanting. The Lieutenant of Antigonus, taking the advantage of Cassander's departure, entred the Country; drave his Garrisons out of divers Cities; forced the Governour of Athens to enter into league with their Lord; wan the Cittadel of Thebes, and set the people at liberty. This last action was somewhat remarkable. For Thebes had not long before been raised out of her old ruines by the meer power of Cassander; of which act he was accused by Antigonus, as if it had been some hainous crime. Yet now the same Antigonus winneth the City, and the love of the Inhabitants, only by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men readier to thank the Increaser, than the Authour of their good; and rather to look forward upon those hopes, which vainly they extend beyond all measure, than backward upon their miserable nullity, that held them uncapable of being any thing.

SECT. VI.

Victories of Ptolomy by Sea. A great Battel at Gaza, which Ptolomy and Seleucus wan, against Demetrius the Son of Antigonus.

AS the presence or nearness of Antigonus gave life to his affairs in the lower Asia and Greece; so the designs of his enemies, taking advantage at his absence, ruined the very foundations of those great works in the Eastern parts, wherewith in the year preceeding he had over-topped them. The Isle of Cyprus, whose Princes wavered between contrary affections, inclining one while to Antigonus, another while faintly regarding their covenant with Ptolomy, was visited by an Egyptian Fleet, wherewith Ptolomy, in his own person easily reduced them to a more settled order, putting some to death, carrying others away Prisoners, and leaving a Lieutenant of his own appointment, Governour of the wholy Country. With the same Fleet he ran along the Sea-coasts, wasting a great part of Caria, Caria and Cilicia, with the ſpoils of which he enriched his followers, and returned loaden to Cyprus. Demetrius the Son of Antigonus, hearing frequent reports of the miſeries, wherewith his Father's ſubjects were oppreſſed, made all haſt out of Syria to the reſcue, taking only his horſes, and light-armed foot with him, becauſe the buſineſs required expedition. But in vain did he tire himſelf and his followers, in haſty ſeeking of one, that by lanching out into the deep, could in a few minutes delude the labour of ſo many days, if need had ſo required. Anſwerable to the vanity of this expedition was the ſucceſs. For Ptolomy was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilicia. Neither was it certain, whether having lightned his ſhips of their burthen in Cyprus, he would return upon thoſe maritime Countries, or make towards Syria, where his coming was expected. He was indeed gone into Egypt, and there with Seleucus was deſcribing a Royal Army, which he levied with all convenient ſpeed, for the recovery of Syria. This was more than Demetrius knew. Therefore he was fain to chuſe out of uncertainties the moſt likelihood, and return the way that he came, with all his companies, which were fitter for ſervice in the open field, than to be beſtowed in Garriſons among the Cilicians. He had ſcarce refreſhed his men and horſes in Syria, when the news arrived of Ptolomy's coming with a puiſſant Army, to give him battel. Hereupon he called to Council his principal friends, who adviſed him to give way to the time, and expect ſome better opportunity in the future, being a young man, and weakly furniſhed with means to reſiſt ſuch ancient and famous Generals, as Ptolomy and Seleucus. This counſel ſeemed rather to proceed from the cold temper of thoſe aged men that gave it, than from any neceſſity growing out of the preſent buſineſs. For Demetrius conſidering himſelf to be the Son of Antigonus, and now General of his Father's Army, thought his own Title weight enough to be laid in ballance againſt the bare names of thoſe two great Commanders. Neither found he much reaſon that ſhould move him to diſtruſt his forces, as inſufficient. His men were better exerciſed than the enemies, and promiſed as much as could be required. Therefore perſwading himſelf, that ſuch odds of number, and of great fame, would rather ſerve to adorn the victory, than hinder him in obtaining it, he reſolved to put the matter to Trial, without expecting the advantage of more help. So animating his Souldiers with hope of ſpoils and rewards, he abode the coming of the enemies at Gaza, with purpoſe to encounter them, as ſoon as they had finiſhed their weariſome journey over the Deſarts of Arabia.

Ptolomy and Seleucus iſſuing out of ſo rich a Province as Egypt, came ſo well provided of all neceſſaries, that their Army felt not any great grievance of the evil way, when battel was preſented them, which confidently they undertook. In all things elſe they had the odds of Demetrius; of Elephants they were utterly unprovided: But how to deal with thoſe Beaſts they were not ignorant. They had prepared a kind of Paliſado, faſtned ſtrongly together with chains, and ſharpned in ſuch a manner, that the Elephants could not ſeek to break upon it, without receiving much hurt. The reſt of their forces (which (beſides that they had advantage in multitude) were heartned with many fortunate ſervices, by them performed that year, whilſt the enemies had wearied themſelves, either with vain journeys, or long and dulling expectation) they diſpoſed in ſuch order, as beſt anſwered to the form, wherein Demetrius was embattelled. The fight began, and was maintained with equal courage, for a long time, each part ſtriving more to win honour, than to ſatisfie any other paſſion, as having little cauſe of hatred or revenge. But after ſome continuance, the greater number holding better out, the error of Demetrius, who upon no neceſſity would needs fight a battel with diſadvantage, began to appear by his loſſes. He had committed himſelf to Fortune, having more to loſe by her than he could get: but in this fight ſhe was idle, and left all to be decided by ſtrong hands; unleſs it may be ſaid, that the terror brought upon his men, by the loſs of his Elephants was bad luck. Thoſe beaſts were in that kind of War hardly to be reſiſted on plain ground; and therefore at the firſt they made great ſpoil amongſt Ptolomy's men. Afterward ſeeking to break the Paliſado, they were ſorely hurt, and every one of them taken. This diſaſter cauſed the horſemen of Demetrius to faint. They had laboured hard, and prevailed little, till now perceiving that all muſt lie upon their hands, who were ill able to make their own places good, they began to ſhrink, and many of them to provide for their ſafety by timely flight, which example the reſt quickly followed. When Demetrius had ſtriven ſo long in vain to make his men abide, that he himſelf was likely to be loſt; he was fain to give place to the ſtronger, making a violent retreat as far as to Azotus, which was about thirty miles from the place of Battel. A great part of his carriages was in Gaza, whither ſome of his company turned aſide, hoping to ſave ſuch goods, as in haſte they could pack up. This fooliſh covetouſneſs was their deſtruction, and the loſs of the Town. For, whilſt they, forgetful of the danger, had filled the ſtreets with ſumpter-horſes, and cloyed up the gates, thronging, ſome to get in and fetch; others to carry out what they had already loaden, Ptolomy's Army brake in without reſiſtance, taking them with their goods, and the City altogether.

This Victory reſtored unto Ptolomy the beſt part of Syria, a Province more eaſie in thoſe times to get, than to keep; and opened the way unto all the greatneſs of Seleucus. For between Gaza and Phœnicia no place offered reſiſtance. In Cœloſyria and Phœnicia, ſome Towns held out a while, but were ſoon taken in by Ptolomy. Among theſe were the great Cities of Tyrus and Sydon; of which Sydon was given up by the Inhabitants; Tyrus by the Garriſon, falling to mutiny againſt their Captain, who truſting to the ſtrength of it, had made great vaunts, but was pardoned by Ptolomy, and honourably entertained in reſpect of his fidelity.

SECT.

SECT. VII.

How Seleucus recovered Babylon, and made himself Lord of many Countries in the highest Asia. The Æra of the Kingdom of the Greeks, which began with the Dominion of Seleucus.

WHile Ptolomy followed his business with such prosperity, Seleucus took leave of him, and went up to Babylon to try his own fortune; which he found so favourable, that recovering first his own Province, he became at length master of the better part of Alexander's purchases.

This expedition of Seleucus was very strange, and full of unlikelihoods. His train consisted of no more than eighteen hundred foot, and two hundred horse, a number too small to have been placed as Garrison in some one of those main great Cities, against which he carried it into the highest Asia. But little force is needful, to make way into strong places, for him that already stands possessed of their hearts which dwell within the walls. The name of Seleucus was enough; whom the Babylonians had found so good a Governour, that none of them would find courage to resist him; but left that work to Antigonus his own men, wishing them ill to speed. Some of the Macedonians that were in those Countries, had the like affection; others made a Countenance of War, which by easie compulsion they left off, and followed new Ensigns. This added courage to the people, who came in apace, and submitted themselves joyfully to Seleucus. In a defection so general, it was not a safe course for the Antigonians, to thrust themselves into the Towns of most importance: for every man of them should have been troubled with daily enemies in his own lodging. It remained that they should issue forth into the field, and try the matter by fight. But the treason of one principal man, who revolted to the enemy, with more than a thousand Souldiers following him, so dismayed the rest, that they did no more than seek to make good one strong place, wherein were kept the Hostages and Prisoners, that Antigonus held for his security in those quarters. This Castle, belike, they had not fortified in times of leisure, against dangers, that were not then apparent. Seleucus quickly took it; and so got the entire possession of Mesopotamia and Babylon.

Antigonus had bestowed in Media and Persia, forces convenient for defence of those Provinces, that were the utmost of his Dominion. In the Countries about Euphrates he had not done the like: for his own great Army lay between them and all enemies. Therefore when the Victory at Gaza had opened unto Seleucus the way into those parts; he found little impediment in the rest of his business. Having now gotten what he sought, it behoved him to seek how he might keep his gettings: for his forces were too small, and his friends were ill able to lend him any more. That which his friends could not do for him, his enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Army in Media, joyning unto himself, out of Persia and other Countries, all needful help, came, with ten thousand foot, and seven thousand Horse, either to save all from being lost, or to drive Seleucus out of that which he had won.

Against this power, Seleucus had only four hundred Horse, and somewhat above three thousand Foot, wherewith to oppose himself: his large Conquest of unwarlike Nations having yielded him many loving Subjects, but few Souldiers. Therefore when his enemies were near to the River of Tigris, he withdrew himself from the place where his resistance was expected, into certain marishes not far off; where he lay secretly waiting for some advantage. Nicanor thought that he had been fled, and was the less careful in fortifying his Camp. In recompence of this vain security, his Camp was taken by surprize, the first night of his arrival; the Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Persia, together with sundry of the Captains, were slain; he himself was driven to flee for his life into the Desarts, and the whole Army yielded unto Seleucus: whose gentle demeanor, after the Victory, drew all Media, Susiana, and the Neighbour Provinces, to acknowledge him their Lord without any further stroke stricken.

This Victory of Seleucus gave beginning unto the new stile of, The Kingdom of the Greeks, an accompt much used by the Greeks, Chaldeans, Syrians, and other Nations in those parts. I will not make any long disputation about the first year of this Æra. The authority of that great Astrologer Ptolomy, from which there is no appeal, makes it plain, that the five hundred and nineteenth year of Nabonassar, was the fourscore and second year of this accompt. Other inference hereupon is needless, than that note of the learned Gauricus, That the first of these years was reckoned compleat, at Babylon, together with the end of four hundred thirty and eight years after Nabonassar. With the observation of the Saturn, recorded by Ptolomy agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Bunting; finding the same Planet to have been so placed in the sign of Virgo, as the Chaldeans had observed it, in the same year; which was from Nabonassar the five hundred and nineteenth; from Seleucus the fourscore and second year; and the last of the hundred thirty and seventh Olympiad. These observations of the celestial bodies, are the surest marks of time: from which he that wilfully varies, is inexcusable. As for such occurrences in History, and the years of succeeding Princes (that are not seldom ambiguous, by reason of unremembred fractions) if they seem to be here-against, it is not greatly material. Yet thus much is worthy of note; that these years of the Greeks were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainly appears in the difference of one year, that is found between actions, related by the several Authors of the two Books of the Maccabees, who follow divers accompts. He that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolomy, may apply the other supputations thereunto, as being no farther from it, than a years distance.

SECT. VIII.

How Ptolomy loſt all he won in Syria. What the cauſes were of the quiet obedience, performed unto the Macedonians, by thoſe that had been ſubject unto the Perſian Empire. Of divers petty enterprizes, taken in hand by Antigonus and Demetrius with ill ſucceſs.

IN a happy hour did Seleucus adventure to go up to Babylon, with ſo few men as his friend could then well ſpare: for had he ſtayed longer upon hope of getting more Souldiers, Ptolomy could have ſpared him none at all. Demetrius the ſon of Antigonus, having loſt the battel at Gaza, received from Ptolomy all his own goods, his Pages and Servants, in free gift, and therewithal a courteous meſſage, to this effect: That no perſonal hatred was the ground of this War, which he and his confederates held with Antigonus; but only terms of honour, wherein they would ſeek to right themſelves after ſuch manner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrel, ſhould not be forgotten.

This noble dealing of Ptolomy, did kindle in Demetrius an earneſt deſire of requiting him, with ſome as brave liberality. Which to effect, he gathered together the remainder of his broken troops; drew as many as could be ſpared, out of the Garriſons in Cilicia, or other Provinces thereabouts, and advertiſing his Father of his misfortune, beſought him to ſend a new ſupply, wherewith he might redeem his honour loſt. Antigonus upon the firſt news of this overthrow, had ſaid, That the victory which Ptolomy wan upon a beardleſs Boy, ſhould be taken from him by bearded men: yet upon deſire that his ſon, whom he tenderly loved, ſhould amend his own reputation, he was content to make a ſtand in Phrygia. Ptolomy hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did nevertheleſs follow his own buſineſs in Cœloſyria; thinking it enough to ſpend part of his Army under Cilles his Lieutenant, againſt the remnant of thoſe, that had been already vanquiſhed, when Cilles too much under-valued the power of ſuch an Enemy. He thought that this young Gallant, having lately ſaved his life by flight, would now be more careful of having a fair way at his back, than adventurous in ſetting further forward, than urgent reaſon ſhould provoke him. In this confidence he paſſed on without all fear; as one that was already Maſter of the field, and ſhould meet with none, that would iſſue out of their places of ſtrength to make reſiſtance. When Demetrius was informed of this careleſs march; he took the lighteſt of his Army, and made his journey with ſuch diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, he came upon Cilles unexpected, and was on the ſudden, without any battel, Maſter of his Camp: taking him alive, with his Souldiers, and their carriages all at once.

This exploit ſerved not only to repair the credit of Demetrius, which his loſs at Gaza had almoſt ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompence the bounty of Ptolomy, with equal favour, in reſtoring to him Cilles, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich preſents. But neither was Ptolomy ſo weakned by this loſs, nor Demetrius ſo emboldned by his Victory, that any matter of conſequence thereupon iſſued. For Demetrius feared the coming of Ptolomy; and therefore he fortified himſelf in places of advantage: Ptolomy on the other ſide was loth to engage himſelf in an enterprize, wherein he might perceive that if the coming of Antigonus found him entangled, he ſhould either be driven to make a ſhameful retreat, or a dangerous adventure of his whole eſtate, in hope of not much more than already he poſſeſſed.

Antigonus, indeed, was nothing ſlow in his way towards Syria; whither he made all haſt, not ſo much to relieve his ſon as to embrace him. For he rejoyced exceedingly, that the young man had ſo well acquitted himſelf, and being left to his own advice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to encreaſe the reputation of this late victory, he brought ſuch forces, as might ſerve to re-conquer all Syria: meaning that the honour of all ſhould be referred unto the good foundation laid by his ſon; whom from this time forwards, he employed in matters of greateſt importance.

Ptolomy had now leſs reaſon to encounter with Antigonus, than before his coming to have aſſailed the Camp of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of conſultation; as if he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captains adviſed him to retire into Egypt, alledging many good arguments to that purpoſe: which they might well perceive to be agreeable to his own intent, by his propounding that courſe; not without remembrance of the good ſucceſs againſt Perdiccas, in the like defenſive War. So he departed out of Syria, preſerving his honour; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any ſudden paſſion of fear: and he departed at fair leiſure, not only carrying his treaſures along with him, but ſtaying to diſmantle ſome principal Cities, that he thought moſt likely to trouble him in the future. All the Country that he left at his back, fell preſently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pieces: ſo eaſie was it in thoſe times, for the Captain of a ſtrong Army, to make himſelf Lord of a great Province.

We may juſtly wonder, that theſe Kingdoms of Syria, Media, Babylon, and many other Nations (which the victory of Alexander had over-run with ſo haſty a courſe, as gave him not leiſure to take any good view of them) were ſo eaſily held not only by himſelf, but by the Captains of his Army after him. The hot contentions for ſuperiority between the King of Iſrael, and thoſe of Damaſcus; between Egypt and Babylon; Babylon and Ninive; the Perſians and many Countries: argue a more manly temper, to have once been in thoſe people; which are now ſo patient of a foreign yoke, that like Sheep or Oxen, they ſuffer themſelves to be diſtributed, fought for, won, loſt, and again recovered by contentious Maſters: as if they had no title to their own heads, but were born to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appear the more ſtrange, if we ſhall conſider, how the ſeveral States of Greece (many of which had never poſſeſſed ſo large a Dominion, as might cauſe their ſpirits to ſwell beyond their ability) did greedily embrace all occaſions of liberty: and how theſe proud Conquerours were glad to offer it, deſiring to have them rather friends than ſervants, for fear of further inconvenience.

It muſt therefore be noted that moſt of theſe Countries had always been ſubject unto the

That which his friends could not do for him, his enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Army in Media, joyning unto himself, out of Persia and other Countries, all needful help, came, with ten thousand foot, and seven thousand Horse, either to save all from being lost, or to drive Seleucus out of that which he had won.

Against this power, Seleucus had only four hundred Horse, and somewhat above three thousand Foot, wherewith to oppose himself: his large Conquest of unwarlike Nations having yielded him many loving Subjects, but few Souldiers. Therefore when his enemies were near to the River of Tigris, he withdrew himself from the place where his resistance was expected, into certain marishes not far off; where he lay secretly waiting for some advantage. Nicanor thought that he had been fled, and was the less careful in fortifying his Camp. In recompence of this vain security, his Camp was taken by surprize, the first night of his arrival; the Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Persia, together with sundry of the Captains, were slain; he himself was driven to flee for his life into the Desarts, and the whole Army yielded unto Seleucus: whose gentle demeanor, after the Victory, drew all Media, Susiana, and the Neighbour Provinces, to acknowledge him their Lord without any further stroke stricken.

This Victory of Seleucus gave beginning unto the new stile of, The Kingdom of the Greeks, an accompt much used by the Greeks, Chaldeans, Syrians, and other Nations in those parts. I will not make any long disputation about the first year of this Æra. The authority of that great Astrologer Ptolomy, from which there is no appeal, makes it plain, that the five hundred and nineteenth year of Nabonassar, was the fourscore and second year of this accompt. Other inference hereupon is needless, than that note of the learned Gauricus, That the first of these years was reckoned compleat, at Babylon, together with the end of four hundred thirty and eight years after Nabonassar. With the observation of the Saturn, recorded by Ptolomy agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Bunting; finding the same Planet to have been so placed in the sign of Virgo, as the Chaldeans had observed it, in the same year; which was from Nabonassar the five hundred and nineteenth; from Seleucus the fourscore and second year; and the last of the hundred thirty and seventh Olympiad. These observations of the celestial bodies, are the surest marks of time: from which he that wilfully varies, is inexcusable. As for such occurrences in History, and the years of succeeding Princes (that are not seldom ambiguous, by reason of unremembred fractions) if they seem to be here-against, it is not greatly material. Yet thus much is worthy of note; that these years of the Greeks were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainly appears in the difference of one year, that is found between actions, related by the several Authors of the two Books of the Maccabees, who follow divers accompts. He that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolomy, may apply the other supputations thereunto, as being no farther from it, than a years distance.

SECT. VIII.

How Ptolomy loſt all he won in Syria. What the cauſes were of the quiet obedience performed unto the Macedonians, by thoſe that had been ſubject unto the Perſian Empire. Of divers petty enterprizes, taken in hand by Antigonus and Demetrius with ill ſucceſs.

IN a happy hour did Seleucus adventure to go up to Babylon, with ſo few men as his friend could then well ſpare: for had he ſtayed longer upon hope of getting more Souldiers, Ptolomy could have ſpared him none at all. Demetrius the ſon of Antigonus, having loſt the battel at Gaza, received from Ptolomy all his own goods, his Pages and Servants, in free gift, and therewithal a courteous meſſage, to this effect: That no perſonal hatred was the ground of this War, which he and his confederates held with Antigonus; but only terms of honour, wherein they would ſeek to right themſelves after ſuch manner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrel, ſhould not be forgotten.

This noble dealing of Ptolomy, did kindle in Demetrius an earneſt deſire of requiting him, with ſome as brave liberality. Which to effect, he gathered together the remainder of his broken troops; drew as many as could be ſpared, out of the Garriſons in Cilicia, or other Provinces thereabouts, and advertiſing his Father of his misfortune, beſought him to ſend a new ſupply, wherewith he might redeem his honour loſt. Antigonus upon the firſt news of this overthrow, had ſaid, That the victory which Ptolomy wan upon a beardleſs Boy, ſhould be taken from him by bearded men: yet upon deſire that his ſon, whom he tenderly loved, ſhould amend his own reputation, he was content to make a ſtand in Phrygia. Ptolomy hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did nevertheleſs follow his own buſineſs in Cœloſyria; thinking it enough to ſpend part of his Army under Cilles his Lieutenant, againſt the remnant of thoſe, that had been already vanquiſhed, when Cilles too much under-valued the power of ſuch an Enemy. He thought that this young Gallant, having lately ſaved his life by flight, would now be more careful of having a fair way at his back, than adventurous in ſetting further forward, than urgent reaſon ſhould provoke him. In this confidence he paſſed on without all fear; as one that was already Maſter of the field, and ſhould meet with none, that would iſſue out of their places of ſtrength to make reſiſtance. When Demetrius was informed of this careleſs march; he took the lighteſt of his Army, and made his journey with ſuch diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, he came upon Cilles unexpected, and was on the ſudden, without any battel, Maſter of his Camp: taking him alive, with his Souldiers, and their carriages all at once.

This exploit ſerved not only to repair the credit of Demetrius, which his loſs at Gaza had almoſt ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompence the bounty of Ptolomy, with equal favour, in reſtoring to him Cilles, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich preſents. But neither was Ptolomy ſo weakned by this loſs, nor Demetrius ſo emboldned by his Victory, that any matter of conſequence thereupon iſſued. For Demetrius feared the coming of Ptolomy; and therefore he fortified himſelf in places of advantage: Ptolomy on the other ſide was loth to engage himſelf in an enterprize, wherein he might perceive that if the coming of Antigonus found him entangled, he ſhould either be driven to make a ſhameful retreat, or a dangerous adventure of his whole eſtate, in hope of not much more than already he poſſeſſed.

Antigonus, indeed, was nothing ſlow in his way towards Syria; whither he made all haſt, not ſo much to relieve his ſon as to embrace him. For he rejoyced exceedingly, that the young man had ſo well acquitted himſelf, and being left to his own advice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to encreaſe the reputation of this late victory, he brought ſuch forces, as might ſerve to re-conquer all Syria: meaning that the honour of all ſhould be referred unto the good foundation laid by his ſon; whom from this time forwards, he employed in matters of greateſt importance.

Ptolomy had now leſs reaſon to encounter with Antigonus, than before his coming to have aſſailed the Camp of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of conſultation; as if he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captains adviſed him to retire into Egypt, alledging many good arguments to that purpoſe: which they might well perceive to be agreeable to his own intent, by his propounding that courſe; not without remembrance of the good ſucceſs againſt Perdiccas, in the like defenſive War. So he departed out of Syria, preſerving his honour; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any ſudden paſſion of fear: and he departed at fair leiſure, not only carrying his treaſures along with him, but ſtaying to diſmantle ſome principal Cities, that he thought moſt likely to trouble him in the future. All the Country that he left at his back, fell preſently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pieces: ſo eaſie was it in thoſe times, for the Captain of a ſtrong Army, to make himſelf Lord of a great Province.

We may juſtly wonder, that theſe Kingdoms of Syria, Media, Babylon, and many other Nations (which the victory of Alexander had over-run with ſo haſty a courſe, as gave him not leiſure to take any good view of them) were ſo eaſily held not only by himſelf, but by the Captains of his Army after him. The hot contentions for ſuperiority between the King of Iſrael, and thoſe of Damaſcus; between Egypt and Babylon; Babylon and Ninive; the Perſians and many Countries: argue a more manly temper, to have once been in thoſe people; which are now ſo patient of a foreign yoke, that like Sheep or Oxen, they ſuffer themſelves to be diſtributed, fought for, won, loſt, and again recovered by contentious Maſters: as if they had no title to their own heads, but were born to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appear the more ſtrange, if we ſhall conſider, how the ſeveral States of Greece (many of which had never poſſeſſed ſo large a Dominion, as might cauſe their ſpirits to ſwell beyond their ability) did greedily embrace all occaſions of liberty: and how theſe proud Conquerours were glad to offer it, deſiring to have them rather friends than ſervants, for fear of further inconvenience.

It muſt therefore be noted that moſt of theſe Countries had always been ſubject unto the rule of Kings, or petty Lords, whom the Babylonians and Persians long since had rooted out, and held them in such bondage, that few of them knew any other Law, than the command of forein Masters. This had utterly taken from them all remembrance of home-born Princes, and incorporated them into the great body of the Persian Empire: so that wanting within themselves all soveraign power, or high authority, the life and spirit of every Estate; they lay as dead, and were bereaved of motion, when that Kingdom fell, whereof they lately had been members.

Why the Persian Satrapæ, or Princes of that Empire, did not when Darius was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captains after the death of Alexander, strive to lay hold upon those Provinces, which had many ages been subject unto them, and scarce four years in quiet possession of their enemies; or why at least they contended not (when the terrible name of that great Conquerour did cease to affright them) to get their shares among his followers, if not wholly to dispossess them of their new purchases: it is a question, wherein who is not satisfied, may find no less reason to suspect the History, than authority to confirm it. For we seldom read, that any small Kingdom, prevailing against a far greater, hath made so entire a conquest in the compass of ten years, as left unto the vanquished no hope of recovery, nor means to rebel: especially when such disorders, or rather utter confusion hath ensued, by the fury of civil War among the Victors.

The cause why the Macedonians held so quietly the Persian Empire, is well set down by Machiavel: and concerns all other Kingdoms, that are subject unto the like form of Government: the sum whereof is this: Whersoever the Prince doth hold all his Subjects under the condition of slaves, there is the conquest easie, and soon assured: Where ancient Nobility is had in due regard, there is it hard to win all, and harder to keep that which is won. Examples of this are the Turkish Empire, and the Kingdom of France. If any Invader should prevail so far upon Turky, that the great Sultan and his Children (for Brethren he useth not to suffer alive) were taken or slain: the whole Empire would quickly be won, and easily kept, without any danger of Rebellion. For the Bassaes, how great soever they may seem, are meer slaves; neither is there in all that large Dominion, any one man, whose personal regard could get the people to follow him in such an attempt, wherein hope of private gain should not countervail, all apparent matter of fear. Contrariwise, in France, it were not enough for him that would make a Conquest, to get into his hands the King and his Children; though he further got the better part of the Country, and were by far the strongest in the field. For, besides the Princes of the Royal blood, there are in that Kingdom store of great men; who are mighty in their several Countries, and having certain Royalties and Principalities of their own, are able to raise War in all quarters of the Realm; whereunto the remembrance of their own ancient Families, and long continued Nobility, will always stir up and inflame them: so that until every one's piece were won, and every one (an endless work) of the chief Nobility brought under or destroyed, the victory were not compleat, nor well assured. It is true, that such power of the Nobility, doth often times make way for an Invader; to whom the discontentments of a few can easily make a fair entrance. But such assistants are not so easily kept, as they are gotten; for they look to be satisfied at full, in all their demands; and having what they would, they soon return to their old allegiance, upon condition to keep what they have, unless they be daily hired with new rewards: wherein it is hard to please one man, without offending another as good as himself. The Turk on the other side, needs not to fear any peril, that might arise from the discontented spirits of his principal men. The greatest mischief that any of them could work against him, were the betraying of some frontier Town, or the wilful loss of a battel: which done, the Traitor hath spent his sting, and must either flee to the enemy, whereby he loseth all that he formerly did hold; or else in hope of doing some further harm, he must adventure to excuse himself unto his Master, who seldom forgives the Captain, that hath not strived by desperate valour against misfortune. As for making head, or arming their followers against the great Sultan, and so joyning themselves unto any Invader; it is a matter not to be doubted: for none of them have any followers or dependents at all, other than such as are subject unto them, by vertue of their Offices and Commissions. Now as this base condition of the principal men, doth leave unto them no means, whereby to oppose themselves, against the flourishing estate of their Prince; so would it weaken both their power and their courage in giving him assistance, if adversity should make him stand in need of them. For there is not scarce any one among the Turk's Bassaes, or Provincial Governors, that knows either from whence he was brought, or from whom descended, nor any one among them that by the loss and utter ruine of the Turkish Empire, can lose any foot of his proper inheritance; and it is the proper inheritance of the subject, which is also a Kingdom unto him, which makes him fight with an armed heart against the Conquerour, who hath no other device painted on his Ensign, than the picture of slavery.

As is the Turkish Empire, so was the Persian, void of liberty in the Subjects, and utterly destitute of other Nobility, than such as depended upon meer favour of the Prince. Some indeed there were of the Royal blood, and others, descended from the Princes that joyned with Darius, the son of Hystaspes, in oppressing the Magi: these were men of reputation in Persia, but their reputation consisted only in their Pedigree, and their safety in not medling with affairs of State, which made them little esteemed. In what small account these Persian Princes were held, it may appear by this, that the King's Uncles, Cousin Germans, and Brethren, were called by the Kings, Their Slaves, and so did stile themselves, in speaking unto these great Monarchs. That upon every light occasion of displeasure they were handled as Slaves, it is easie to be discerned, in that example of cruelty, practised by Xerxes upon his own Brother Masistes; which hath been formerly noted, in place more convenient. As for the Satrapæ, or Governours of the Provinces, it is needless to cite examples, proving them to have been meer slaves: it may suffice, that their heads were taken from them at the King's will; that is, at the will of those Women and Eunuchs, by whom the King was governed.

To this want of Nobility in Persia, may be added the general want of liberty convenient among the people, a matter no less avoidable, in making easie and sure the conquest of a Nation, than

is the cauſe aſſigned by Machiavel. For as Æſop his Aſs did not care to run from the enemies, becauſe it was not poſſible, that they ſhould load him with heavier burthens, than his Maſter cauſed him daily to bear: ſo the Nations, that endure the worſt under their own Princes, are not greatly fearful of a forein yoke; Nor will be haſty to ſhake it off, if by experience they find it more light, than was that, whereunto they had been long accuſtomed. This was it that made the Gaſcoigns bear ſuch faithful affection to the Kings of England; for that they governed more mildly than the French. This enlarged the Venetian juriſdiction, in Lombardy; for the Towns that they wan, they wan out of the hands of Tyrannous oppreſſors: and this did cauſe the Macedonians, with other Nations, that had been ſubject unto the poſterity of Alexander's followers, to ſerve the Romans patiently, if not willingly; for that by them they were eaſed of many burthens, which had been impoſed upon them by their own Kings.

So that of this tameneſs, which we find in thoſe that had been Subjects of the Perſian Kings, the reaſons are apparent. Yet ſome of theſe there were, that could not ſo eaſily be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeed been abſolutely conquered by the Perſian. Such were the Sogdians, Bactrians, and other Nations about the Caſpian Sea. Such alſo were the Arabians bordering upon Syria: againſt whom Antigonus ſent part of his Army; thinking therewith to bring them under, or rather to get a rich booty. The Captains that he ſent, fell upon the Nabatheans, at ſuch time as they were buſied in a great Mart; wherein they traded with the more remote Arabians for Mirrh, Frankincenſe, or other ſuch commodities. All or moſt of theſe rich wares, together with five hundred Talents of ſilver, and many priſoners, the Macedonians laid hold upon: for their coming was ſudden and unexpected. But e're they could recover Syria, the Nabatheans overtook them, and finding them weary with long marches, made ſuch a ſlaughter, that of four thouſand foot, and ſix hundred horſe, only fifty horſe eſcaped. To reveng this loſs, Demetrius was ſet out with a great power: yet all in vain; for he was not reſiſted by any Army, but by the natural defence of a vaſt Wilderneſs, lack of water, and of all things neceſſary. Therefore he was glad to make peace with them; wherein he loſt not much honour: for they craved it, and gave him preſents. Returning from the Nabatheans, he viewed the Lake Aſphaltites, whence he conceived hope of great profit that might be raiſed, by gathering the Sulphur. With this good Husbandry of his Son, Antigonus was well pleaſed, and appointed men to the work: but they were ſlain by the Arabians, and ſo that hope vaniſhed.

Theſe petty enterpriſes, with the ill ſucceſs accompanying them, had much impaired the good advantage againſt Ptolomy: when the news of Seleucus his victories in the high Countries, marred all together. For neither was the loſs of thoſe great and wealthy Provinces, a matter to be neglected, neither was it ſafe to tranſport the War into the parts beyond Euphrates, whereby Syria, and the lower Aſia ſhould have been expoſed to the danger of ill-affected Neighbours. A middle courſe was thought the beſt; and Demetrius with fifteen thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe, was ſent againſt Seleucus. Theſe forces being ſent away, Antigonus did nothing, and his Son did leſs. For Seleucus was then in Media; his Lieutenants about Babylon withdrew themſelves from neceſſity of fight; ſome places they fortified and kept: Demetrius could hold nothing that he got, without ſetting in Garriſon more men than he could ſpare, neither did he get much: and therefore was fain to ſet out the bravery of his Expedition, by burning and ſpoiling the Country: which he did thereby the more alienate, and, as it were acknowledge to belong unto his enemy, who thenceforth held it as his own aſſured.

Antigonus had laid upon his Son a peremptory commandment, to return unto him at a time prefixed: reaſonably thinking (as may ſeem) that in ſuch an unſettled ſtate of things, either the War might be ended, by the fury of the firſt brunt; or elſe it would be vain to ſtrive againſt all difficulties likely to ariſe, where want of neceſſaries ſhould fruſtrate the valour, that by ſtrength of time was like to become leſs terrible to the enemy. Demetrius therefore leaving behind him five thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, rather to make ſhew of continuing the War, than to effect much, where himſelf with greater forces could do little more than nothing, forſook the enterprize and went back to his Father.

SECT. IX.

A general Peace made and broken. How all the houſe of Alexander was deſtroyed.

THeſe ambitious heads, having thus wearied themſelves with uneffectual travel, in ſeeking to get more than any one of them could hold; were contented at length to come to an agreement: wherein it was concluded, that each of them ſhould hold quietly, that which at the preſent he had in poſſeſſion. As no private hatred, but meer deſire of Empire, had moved them to enter into the War; ſo was it no friendly reconciliation, but only a dulneſs growing upon the ſlow advancement of their ſeveral hopes, that made them willing to breath a while, till occaſion might better ſerve to fight again.

Beſides that main point, Of retaining the Provinces which every man held, there were two Articles of the peace, that gave a fair, but a falſe colour to the buſineſs; That the Son of Alexander by Roxane, ſhould be made King when he came to full age; and, That all the Eſtates of Greece ſhould be ſet at liberty. The advancement of young Alexander to his Father's Kingdom, ſeems to have been a matter forcibly extorted from Antigonus; in whom was diſcovered a purpoſe, to have made himſelf Lord of all. But this indeed, more nearly touched Caſſander. For in his cuſtody was the young Prince and his Mother: neither did he keep them in a ſort anſwerable to their degree; but as cloſe priſoners taken in that War, wherein they had ſeen the old Queen Olympias taken and murthered, that ſought to put them in poſſeſſion of the Empire. The mutual hatred and fear between them, rooted in theſe grounds, of injuries done, and revenge expected; upon this concluſion of peace, grew up faſter than any time before, in the heart of Caſſander: who ſaw the Macedonians turn their favourable expectation, towards the Son of their late renowned King.

All this either little concerned Antigonus; or tended greatly to his good. The young Prince muſt first have poſſeſſion of Macedon: whereby Caſſander ſhall be reduced to his poor office, of Captain over a thouſand men, if not left in worſe caſe. As for them that held Provinces abroad, they might either do as they had done under Arideus; or better, as being acquainted with their own ſtrength. He, in the mean time, by his readineſs to acknowledge the true Heir, had freed himſelf from that ill-favoured imputation, of ſeeking to make himſelf Lord of all that Alexander had gotten.

The like advantage had he in that Article, Of reſtoring the Greeks to their liberty. This liberty had hitherto been the ſubject of much idle diſcourſe: but never took effect. Antigonus held ſcarce any Town of theirs, Caſſander occupied moſt of the Country: which if he ſhould ſet free, he muſt be a poor Prince; if not, there was matter enough of quarrel againſt him, as againſt a Diſturber of the common Peace.

In the mean ſeaſon, the Countries lying between Euphrates and the Greek Seas, together with a great Army, and money enough to entertain a greater, might ſerve to hold up the credit of Antigonus, and to raiſe his hopes as high as ever they had been.

With much diſadvantage do many men contend againſt one that is equal to them all in puiſſance. Caſſander's friends had left him in an ill caſe; but he could not do withall: for, where every man's help is neceſſary to the War, there may any one make his own peace; but no one can ſtand out alone, when all the reſt are weary. The beſt was, that he knew all their affections: which tended to no ſuch end as the becoming Subjects unto any man, much leſs to the Son of an Aſiatique woman, of whom they had long ſince refuſed to hear mention. Therefore he took a ſhort courſe, and cauſed both the Child and his Mother to be ſlain: freeing thereby himſelf in a trice, from the dangerous neceſſity of yielding up his Government, which he muſt have done when the Child had come to Age. Roxane was a Lady of ſingular beauty, which was perhaps the cauſe, why Perdiccas deſired to have her Son, being as yet unborn, proclaimed Heir to the great Alexander. Immediately upon the death of Alexander, ſhe had uſed the favour (if it were not love) of Perdiccas, to the ſatisfying of her own bloody malice, upon Statira the Daughter of King Darius, whom Alexander had likewiſe married, according to the cuſtom of thoſe Countries, wherein plurality of Wives is held no crime. For having by a counterfeit Letter, in Alexander's name, gotten this poor Lady into her hands, ſhe did, by aſſiſtance of Perdiccas, murther her and her Siſter, and threw their bodies into a Well, cauſing it to be filled up with earth. But now, by God's juſt vengeance, were ſhe and her Son made away, in the like ſecret faſhion; even at ſuch time as the near approaching hope of a great Empire had made her life, after a wearieſome impriſonment grow dearer unto her than it was before.

The fact of Caſſander was not ſo much deteſted in outward ſhew; as inwardly it was pleaſing unto all the reſt of the Princes. For now they held themſelves free Lords of all that they had under them; fearing none other change of their eſtates, than ſuch as might ariſe by chance of War; wherein every one perſwaded himſelf of ſucceſs, rather better than worſe. Hereupon all of them (except Lyſimachus and Seleucus, that had work enough at home) began to rouze themſelves: as if now the time were come, for each man to improve his own ſtock. Antigonus his Lieutenants were in Peloponneſus, and about Helleſpont: while their Maſter was careful in following other, and ſome greater matters that were more ſecretly to be handled. He pretended the liberty of Greece: yet did the ſame argument miniſter unto Ptolomy matter of quarrel, againſt both him and Caſſander; Ptolomy complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to heart) that Antigonus had put Garriſons into ſome Towns, which ought, in fair dealing, to be ſet at liberty. Under colour of redreſſing this enormity, he ſent an Army into Cilicia, where he won four Towns, and ſoon after loſt them, without much labour of his own or his enemies.

After this, putting to Sea, with a ſtrong Fleet, he ran along the Coaſt of Aſia, winning many places: and in that Voyage allured unto him a Nephew of Antigonus (a good Commander, but diſcontented with the ill requital of his ſervices) whom finding ſhortly, as falſe to himſelf as he had been to his own Uncle, he was fain to put to death. But in doing theſe things, his deſire to ſet the Greeks at liberty, appeared not ſo plain, as he wiſhed that it ſhould: for their caſe was no way bettered by his moleſting Antigonus in Aſia. Therefore to get the love of that valiant Nation, he made at the laſt an Expedition into Greece it ſelf: where having ſet free ſome little Iſlands, and landed in Peloponneſus, he raiſed ſo great an expectation of finiſhing the long-deſired work, that Crateſipolis, the Widow of Alexander, Polyſperchon's Son, gave up into his hands the Towns of Sycion and Corinth.

Ptolomy had conceived a vain belief, that the Greeks, emboldened by his countenance and aſſiſtance, would all of them take heart and riſe up in Arms; whereby with little labour their liberty might be gotten; and he be acknowledged as Authour of this immortal benefit. But long ſervitude had well-near extinguiſhed the ancient valour of that Nation: and their ill fortune, in many likely attempts to recover freedom, had ſo tired their ſpirits, that they would no more ſtir in purſuit thereof; but ſate idly ſtill, as wiſhing it to fall into their mouths.

The Lacedemonians, about theſe times, began to fortifie their Town with walls; truſting no longer in their virtue (for both it, and the Diſcipline that upheld it, were too much impaired) that had been a wall to their Town and Territory.

The Athenians were become as humble ſervants, as they had been inſolent Maſters: erecting as many ſtatues in honour of Demetrius Phalereus, as there were days in the year. This Demetrius was now their Governor; and he governed them with much moderation: but, in ſpight of their hearts, as being ſet over them by Caſſander. By this baſe temper of the principal Cities, it is eaſie to gather how the reſt of the Country ſtood affected. Ptolomy could not get them to ſet their helping hands to their own good, and to furniſh him with the promiſed ſupplies of money and victuals. Credible it is, that he had a true meaning to deliver them from thraldom; as judging the commodity that would ariſe by annexing them to his party, a matter of more weight than the loſs that Caſſander ſhould receive thereby, who could hardly retain them, if once Antigonus took the work in hand. But when he found ſuch difficulty in the buſineſs he changed his purpoſe; and renewing his former friendſhip with Caſſander, he retained Sycion and Corinth in his own poſſeſſion.

Before the coming of Ptolomy into Greece, Caſſander

ſander had been held occupied with very much work. For (beſides his pains taken in Wars among barbarous Princes) he found means to allure unto himſelf the Lieutenants of Antigonus, that were in Peloponneſus, and about Helleſpont: making his own advantage of their diſcontentments. By the like skilful practice he freed himſelf from a greater danger, and made theſe murthers which he had committed ſeem the leſs odious, by teaching his enemies to do the like. Old Polyſperchon, that had made ſo great a ſtir in the reign of Arideus, did after the death of Roxane and her child, enter again upon the Stage: leading in his hand another Son of the great Alexander, and meaning to place him in his Father's Throne.

The name of this young Prince was Hercules: he was begotten on Barſine the daughter of Artabazus a Perſian; but had been leſs eſteemed than the ſon of Roxane, either for that his Mother was held no better than a Concubine, or elſe perhaps, in regard of the favour which Perdiccas, and after him Olympias, did bear unto Roxane. At this time the death of his Brother had moved ſuch compaſſion, and the regard of his being Alexander's only living child, had procured unto him ſuch good will, that the demand which Polyſperchon made in his behalf, was deemed very juſt and honourable. There were indeed more hearts than hands, that joyned with this young Prince: yet wanted he not ſufficient ſtrength of hands, if the heart of him that leaſt ought, had not been moſt falſe. Caſſander had raiſed an Army to withſtand his entry into Macedon: but little truſt could he repoſe in that Army, whoſe wiſhes he perceived to be with Hercules. Therefore he aſſailed Polyſperchon himſelf with gifts and promiſes; wherewith at length he prevailed ſo far, that the Old Villain was contented to murther his Pupil; chuſing rather with many curſes and foul diſhonour, to take the offered Lordſhip of Peloponneſus, and Commander of an Army; than to purchaſe a noble fame with dangerous travel, in maintaining his faith, unto both his dead and living Soveraigns.

Antigonus had not all this while been aſleep; though his loſſes were hitherto the chief witneſſes of his having been a ſtirrer in theſe commotions. He thought it enough for him at the preſent to retain his own: And therefore took order for the recovery of thoſe places which Ptolomy had taken pains to win. As for the reſt, it no way grieved him to ſee Caſſander incur the general hatred of men, by committing thoſe murthers of which the profit was like to redound unto him that was the moſt powerful, or to ſee Polyſperchon and Ptolomy ſweat in a buſie War againſt Caſſander. If they would have continued their quarrels, he could well have afforded them leiſure, and have thought the time well ſpent in beholding their contentions. For he was throughly perſwaded, that when the reſt had wearied themſelves in vain with long ſtriſe, his Armies and Treaſures, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all under. According to theſe haughty conceits he demeaned himſelf among his followers; looking big upon them, and like a King before his time. This was it that cauſed ſo many of them to revolt from him: but it was no great loſs to be forſaken by thoſe that looked with envious eyes upon that fortune whereon their own ſhould have depended. Againſt this envy of his men, and malice of others, Antigonus buſily ſought a remedy, ſuch as was like to give him a goodly title to the whole Empire.

Cleopatra Siſter unto the great Alexander, lay for the moſt part in Sardis: whom he had a great deſire to take to wife. This his deſire was not without good hope: for howſoever ſhe diſcovered much unwillingneſs thereunto, yet was ſhe in his power, and might therefore be entreated, were it only for fear of being enforced. But it was not his purpoſe to get her by compulſive means: either becauſe his fancy, being an old man, was not over-violent; or rather becauſe his ambition, whereunto all his affections had reference, could have made ſmall uſe of her, by doing ſuch apparent wrong. She had been married unto Alexander King of Epirus, after whoſe death ſhe came to her Brother in Aſia; hoping belike to find a new Huſband in his Camp. But neither any of thoſe brave Captains, that were, in times following ſo hot in love with her, durſt then aſpire unto her marriage: nor did her Brother, full of other cares, trouble himſelf with providing her of an Husband. She therefore, being a luſty Widow, ſuffered her blood ſo far to prevail againſt her honour, that ſhe ſupplied the want of an Husband by entertainment of Paramours. Alexander hearing of this, turned it to a Jeſt: ſaying, That ſhe was his Siſter, and muſt be allowed this liberty, as her portion of the Empire. When by his death the Empire lay in a manner void, and the portion due to her therein grew, in mens opinion, greater than it had been: then did many ſeek to obtain her, while ſhe her ſelf deſired only a proper man, with whom ſhe might lead a merry life. To this purpoſe did ſhe invite Leonatus unto her; who made great haſte, but was cut off by death ere he came to her preſence. Now at the laſt, after long tarrying, ſhe had her choice of all the great Commanders, Antigonus, Ptolomy, Lyſimachus and Caſſander, being all her earneſt Wooers. All theſe (Antigonus excepted) had Wives already; Ptolomy had many Wives, and many Concubines whom he reſpected as much as his Wives, being noted of too much dotage in that kind. This hindred not his ſuit: peradventure it advanced it, by giving to Cleopatra ſome hope of mutual toleration. To him therefore ſhe bequeathed her ſelf, and was taking her journey from Sardis towards him; when Antigonus his Deputy in that City, made her to ſtay, until his Maſter's further pleaſure ſhould be known. Antigonus had now a Wolf by the ears: he neither could well hold her, nor durſt let her go. She would not be his Wife; he had no honeſt pretence to force her; and to keep her priſoner, had been the way, by which he might have incurred a general hatred, laſting perhaps beyond her life; as the courſe taken by Caſſander againſt Roxane (a Lady leſs reſpected than Alexander's own Siſter) did well teſtifie. Therefore he thought it the wiſeſt way to procure her death: for to let any other enjoy the commodity of ſo fair a Title to the Kingdom, it was no part of his meaning. To this purpoſe he ſent inſtructions to the Governour of Sardis, willing him in any caſe to do it ſecretly. So the fact was committed, and certain women about her put in truſt with the murther: which women afterwards were put to death, as miſchievous conſpirers againſt the life of that good Lady. So was Antigonus freed from blame, at the leaſt in his own opinion: but the world was leſs fooliſh, than to be ſo deluded. How the murther was detected, we need not ask: for ſeldom is that bloody crime unrevealed, and never ſo ill ſmothered, as when great perſons are the Authors.

Thus

Thus was the whole race of Philip and Alexander the great extinguiſhed, and it was extinguiſhed by the hands of ſuch as thought upon nothing leſs than the execution of God's Juſtice, due unto the cruelty of theſe powerful, but mercileſs Princes. Wherefore the ambitious frames, erected by theſe Tyrants, upon ſo wicked foundations of innocent blood, were ſoon after caſt down, overwhelming themſelves or their children, with the ruines, as the ſequel will declare.

SECT. X.

How Demetrius, the ſon of Antigonus, gave liberty to Athens, expelling the Garriſons of Caſſander out of thoſe parts. The immoderate honour decreed by the Athenians to Antigonus and Demetrius.

NOne being left alive that had any title to the Kingdom; it ſtood with good reaſon, that they which were Lords of the Provinces, acknowledging no Superiour, ſhould freely profeſs themſelves Kings in name, as they were already in ſubſtance. Yet had this name ill-beſeemed the weaker, while the ſtrongeſt of all did forbear it: neither ſeemed it convenient in the judgement of Antigonus, to crown his laſt action with ſuch a title, as if he had attained unto greatneſs by that foul murther, the infamy whereof he was careful how to diſcharge from his own head. He purpoſed therefore to undertake a plauſible enterprize, even the liberty of Greece: whereby it was apparent, that he might get ſuch honour as would not only drown all bad reports, but make him be thought equal to any name of Royalty, whereof in ſeeming modeſty, he was not covetous. To this purpoſe he delivered a ſtrong Army, with a Navy of two hundred and fifty ſail, and fifty thouſand talents of Silver, unto Demetrius his ſon: willing him to begin at Athens, and thence to proceed, in ſetting the Country free.

Demetrius came to Athens before he was expected: ſo that without reſiſtance he entred the Haven; it being thought that a Fleet of Ptolomy, Caſſander's good friend, had been arrived. But when it was known, both who he was, and what was the cauſe of his coming; the joy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations: Demetrius Phalereus forſook the Town, and withdrew himſelf to Thebes under ſafe conduct; only the Garriſon in Munychia ſtrove to make good that piece, which after a while was won upon them by force. During the ſiege of Munychia, Demetrius went to Megara; whence he expelled the Garriſon of Caſſander, and ſo reſtored the City to liberty.

I think it not impertinent, ſometimes to relate ſuch accidents, as may ſeem no better than meer trifles: for even by trifles are the qualities of great perſons as well diſcloſed, as by their great actions; becauſe in matters of importance, they commonly ſtrain themſelves, to the obſervance of general commended rules; in the leſſer things they follow the current of their own Natures. The Lady Crateſipolis lay in Patras, and had a great deſire to ſee Demetrius; hoping, belike, that ſhe might by his means better her eſtate, and recover her Towns of Sycion and Corinth, detained by Ptolomy; to whoſe Lieutenant in thoſe places, Demetrius before his departure out of Greece, offered money for the ſurrender of them. Yet the only buſineſs pretended was love. He being advertiſed hereof, left his forces in the Country of Megara, and taking a company of his lighteſt armed, for guard of his perſon, made a long journey to meet with her. This troop alſo he cauſed to lodge a great way from his Tent, that none might ſee her when ſhe came. As cloſely as the buſineſs was carried, ſome of his enemies had gotten knowledge of it; whereby they conceived good hope, that the diligence of a very few men might overthrow all the great preparations of Antigonus; and bring him to any terms of reaſon, by taking his dear ſon priſoner. Their project fell but a little ſhort of the effect. For they came ſo ſuddenly upon him, that he had no better ſhift, than to muffle himſelf in an old cloak, and creep away diſguiſed; leaving them to ranſack his Tent. There was in this Prince a ſtrange medly of conditions; eſpecially an extreme diſſoluteneſs in wanton pleaſures, and a painful induſtry in matters of War. He was of a moſt amiable countenance, a gentle nature, and a good wit; excellent in deviſing Engines of War, and curious in working them with his own hands. He knew better how to reform his bad fortune, than how to rule his good. For adverſity made his valour more active: proſperity puffed him with over-weening, wherein he thought that he might do what he liſted. His fortune was changeable, as were his qualities: turning often round, like the picture of her Wheel, till ſhe had wound up the thred of his life, in ſuch manner as followeth to be ſhewed.

Returning to his Camp, and finiſhing his buſineſs at Megara; he reſolved no longer to attend the iſſue of a ſiege, to aſſail Munychia by force, that ſo he might accompliſh the liberty of Athens: which, until it was fully wrought out, he refuſed to enter into the City. Munychia was ſtrongly fortified: yet by continuance of the aſſult, the multitude without, through help of their Engines that ſcoured the walls, prevailed upon the reſolution of thoſe that lay within it, and wan the place in two days. The walls, and all the defences of that piece againſt the City, were levelled with the ground, and ſo was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom withal was given their liberty, with promiſe to aid them in maintaining it.

The fame of this action was lowder, than of any other victory gotten by Demetrius with greater skill and induſtry. For the Athenians, having forgotten how to employ their hands, laboured to make up that defect with their tongues: converting to baſe flattery, that eloquence of theirs which the virtues of their Anceſtors had ſuited unto more manly arguments.

They decreed unto Antigonus and Demetrius the name of Kings; they conſecrated the place in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when he entred their City, and built there an Altar, calling it of Demetrius, The alighter; they called them by the names of the gods their ſaviours, ordaining that every year, there ſhould be choſen a Prieſt of theſe gods; and further, that ſuch as were employed by their State, in dealing with either of theſe two Princes, ſhould not be called Ambaſſadours, but Theori, or conſulters with the gods; like as they were, whom they ſent unto the Oracle of Jupiter, or Apollo.

It

It were a frivolous diligence to rehearse all their flatteries, these being so gross. Hereby they not only corrupted the young Prince; but made that acclamation, which best would have pleased the old man, to be of no use. For he could not handsomely take upon him the name of King, as imposed by the Athenians, unless he would seem to approve their vanity, in loading them with more than humane honours. Yet was he so tickled with this their fine handling him, that when their Theori or Consulters came shortly after, desiring him to relieve them with Corn and Timber to build ships; he gave them almost a hundred thousand quarters of wheat, and matter sufficient to make a hundred Gallies. So gracious was his first Oracle: or rather so weak is great power in resisting the assaults of flattery.

SECT. XI.

The great victory of Demetrius against Ptolomy in Cyprus. How Antigonus and Demetrius took upon them the stile of Kings; wherein others followed their example.

FRom this glorious work, Antigonus called away Demetrius, unto a business of greater difficulty; meaning to employ his service against Ptolomy in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willed to establish a General Council, that should treat of matters concerning the common good of the Country. About the same time Antigonus withdrew his own Garrison out of Imbros, committing their liberty entire, into the peoples hands; whereby it might appear, that as he would not permit any other to oppress the Greeks, so would he be far from doing it himself. This was enough to hold his reputation high, among these new purchased Friends: it followed, that he should convert his forces, to the winning of ground upon his Enemies.

A pitiful Tragedy had lately hapned in Cyprus, through the indiscretion of Menelaus, Ptolomie's brother, and his Lieutenant in that Isle. Nicocles, King of Paphos, was entred into some practice with Antigonus: yet not so far that he thought himself past excuse; by which confidence, he was perhaps the more easily detected. To cut off this negotiation, and the false-hearted King of Paphos at one blow, Menelaus was sent thither: who surrounded Nicocles his house with Souldiers, required, in Ptolomie's name, to have him yielded to the death. Nicocles offered to clear himself; but Menelaus told him, that dye he must, and bad him come forth quietly. This desperate necessity caused the unhappy King to rid himself of life: and his death struck such an impression into his wife, that she not only slew her self, but perswaded the wives of her husband's brethren to do the like. Also those brethren of Nicocles, unto whom Ptolomy had intended no ill, being amazed with the suddenness of this calamity, did shut the Palace, and setting it on fire, consumed it, with all that was in it, and themselves together.

Whatsoever the crime objected was; Nicocles perished as a man innocent, because he was not suffered to make his answer. Of this sad accident, though Menelaus deserved the blame, for his rigorous proceeding; yet it is to be thought, that much dislike fell also upon Ptolomy: as men that are grieved, cast an ill affection even upon those that gave the furthest removed occasion.

Not long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a power sufficient, against any opposition that Ptolomy was like to make. The Cypriots did little or nothing against him, either because they had small strength, or for that they held it a matter indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being sure that they should not have the rule of their own Country. Menelaus therefore, out of his Garrisons, drew forth an Army, and fought with Demetrius. But he was beaten, and driven to save himself within the walls of Salamis, where he was so hardly besieged, that without strong succour, he had no likehood to make good the place, much less to retain possession of the whole Island. His greatest help at the present was the fidelity of his Souldiers; whom no rewards could win from him, nor good usage (when any of them were taken prisoners, and inrolled in the enemies bands) keep from returning to him, with the first opportunity. Most of them were Mercenaries: but all their goods were in Egypt, which was enough to keep them faithful. Yet could not this their resolution have stood long against the odds of number, which Demetrius had of men as resolute, and against his terrible Engines of battery, if Ptolomy had not hasted to the rescue.

Ptolomy brought with him a hundred and forty Gallies, besides two hundred Ships of burthen, for transporting his Army and Carriages. This Fleet made a terrible shew, when it was described afar; though more than half of it was unfit for service in fight at Sea. Wherefore to make the opinion of his forces the more dreadful, Ptolomy sent unto Demetrius a threatning message: willing him to be gone, unless he would be over-whelmed with multitudes, and trampled to death in a throng. But this young gallant repaid him with words of as much bravery, promising to let him escape upon condition, that he should withdraw his Garrisons out of Sycion and Corinth.

Demetrius had no more than one hundred and eighteen Gallies; but they were, for the most part, greater than those of Ptolomy; better stored with weapons fit for that service; and very well furnished in the prows, to beat upon the enemy. Nevertheless he stood in great doubt of threescore Gallies that lay in the Haven of Salamis, lest Menelaus with them should set upon his back: in which case, it was very likely that all would go very ill with him. Against this mischief, he bestowed ten of his own Gallies in the mouth of that Haven, to keep Menelaus from issuing forth, and setting his horsemen on the shore, to give what assistance they could, he with the rest of the Fleet, puts to Sea against Ptolomy.

The fight began early in the morning, and continued long, with doubtful success. The generals were not ranged opposite one to the other; but held each of them the left wing of his own Fleet. Each of them prevailed against the squadron wherewith he encountred; but the success of Demetrius was to better purpose. For his victory in one part was such, as caused others to fall out of order, and finally drave all to betake themselves unto speedy flight. As for Ptolomy, he was fain to leave his advantage upon the enemy in one part of the fight, that he might relieve and animate thoſe of his own which needed him in another: wherein he found his loſs over-great to be repaired, by contending any longer againſt the fortune of that day; and therefore he laboured only to ſave himſelf, in hope of better event, that might follow ſome other time.

There fell out in this battel no unuſual accident; yet was the victory greater than could have been expected. The occaſions whereof were, partly the skill in Sea-ſervices, which the Greeks and Phenicians that were with Demetrius, had above thoſe which followed Ptolomy: partly, the good furniture of the Ships, wherein conſiſted no leſs, than in the quality of thoſe with whom they were manned. Further, we may reaſonably judge, that the two hundred ſhips of burthen, carrying the ſtrength of Ptolomie's Army, did not more encourage his men, and terrifie his enemies the day before the fight, than breed in each part the contrary affections, when in the beginning of the fight they fell off, and ſtood aloof. For though it were fitting that they ſhould ſo do; yet a multitude, prepoſſeſſed with vain conceits, will commonly apprehend very ſlight occaſions to think themſelves abandoned. Beſides all this, the expectation that Menelaus, iſſuing with his Fleet out of Salamis ſhould charge the enemy in the ſtern, was utterly fruſtrate. He was kept in perforce, by the ten Ships appointed to bar up the mouth of the Haven: which they manly performed, as great neceſſity required.

Such diſappointment of expectation doth much abate the courage of men in fight: eſpecially of the aſſailants: whereas on the contrary, they finding that ſome part of their fears are vain, do eaſily gather hopeful ſpirits, and conceive an opinion of their own ability, to do more than they thought upon, out of their not ſuffering the harm that they had imagined.

Whatſoever the cauſes of this victory were, the fruit was very great. For Ptolomy had no more than eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flight: all the reſt of his Feet was either taken or ſunk. Neither did Menelaus any longer ſtrive againſt the violence of fortune; but yielded up all that he held in Cyprus, together with his Army, conſiſting of twelve thouſand foot, and a thouſand and two hundred horſe, and thoſe Gallies in the Haven of Salamis. The ſame dejection of ſpirit was found in the common Souldiers, as well that was taken at Sea, as that had ſerved the Egyptian by Land; none of them repoſing any more confidence in Ptolomy, but willingly becoming followers of a new Lord, whoſe Army they now increaſed.

It was generally believed, that much more depended on the event of this fight, than the Iſle of Cyprus, for which they contended. Wherefore the common expectation was great; eſpecially Antigonus, whom it moſt concerned, was deeply perplexed with cares, thinking every day a year, till he was advertiſed of the iſſue. In this mood Ariſtodemus found him, a noble flatterer, whom Demetrius had honoured with the Meſſage of theſe good news. Ariſtodemus had bethought himſelf of a trick, whereby to double the welcome of his joyful errand: He cauſed his Ships to ride at Anchor, a good diſtance from the ſhore; he himſelf landed in a Cock-boat, which he ſent immediately back to the Ship; and ſo all alone went forward, looking very ſadly, that no part of his tidings might appear in his countenance. Report of his arrival (for it was known where he had been) came preſently to Antigonus, who ſent Meſſenger after Meſſenger to meet him on the way, and bring ſpeedy word how all went. But neither any anſwer, nor ſo much of a look, as might intimate the purport of his errand, could be won from this demure Gentleman. Thus marched he fair and ſoftly forward with a great throng at his heels (that ſerved well to ſet out his Pageant) until he came in ſight of Antigonus, who could not contain himſelf, but went down to meet him at the Gate, and hear the news. Then did Ariſtodemus, upon the ſudden, with a high voyce ſalute Antigonus by the name of King; uttering the greatneſs of the victory (with as much pomp, as before he had covered it, with ſilence) in the hearing of all the people; who with loud acclamations, gave that name of King, both to Antigonus and his ſon Demetrius. Antigonus, in requital of his long ſuſpence, wherein Ariſtodemus had held him, ſaid, That it ſhould alſo be long ere he received his reward. But the Title of King, together with the Diadem, which his friends did ſet on his head, he could not wiſh a fairer occaſion to aſſume: wherefore he readily accepted them, and ſent the like to his ſon.

When it was once noiſed abroad, that Antigonus and Demetrius called themſelves Kings; it was not long ere their fellows were ready to follow the good example. Ptolomy his friends would by no means endure, that their Lord ſhould be thought a man dejected for the loſs of a Fleet; therefore they ſalute him alſo King. Lyſimachus in Thrace had boldneſs enough to put a Diadem about his own head. Seleucus had, before this time, among the barbarous people, taken upon him as King: but now he uſed the ſtile indifferently, as well among the Greeks and Macedonians, as in dealing with others. Only Caſſander held himſelf contented with his own name: whereby, howſoever he might ſhadow his pride, he no way leſſened the fame of his cruelty againſt his Maſter's houſe. But the name which he forbore, his ſons after him were bold to uſurp, though with ill ſucceſs, as will appear when they ſhall enter upon the Stage, whereon theſe old Tragedians, under new habits, as no longer now the ſame perſons, begin to play their parts, with bigger looks, and more boiſterous actions, not with greater grace and judgement, than in the Scenes already paſt.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Wars between the Kings of Egypt, Aſia, Macedon, Thrace, and others; until all Alexander's Princes were conſumed.

SECT. I.

The Expedition of Antigonus againſt Egypt, with ill ſucceſs.

ALl the reſt of theſe Kings had taken that name upon them, in imitation of Antigonus himſelf, as beſeeming his greatneſs: which was ſuch as gave him hope to ſwallow them up, together with their new Titles. Being not ignorant of his own ſtrength, he reſolved to ſingle out Ptolomy, and make him an example to others: who ſhould hardly be able to ſtand, when the greateſt of them was fallen. To this purpoſe he prepared an Army of eighteen thouſand foot, and eight thouſand Horſe, with fourſcore and three Elephants: as likewiſe a Fleet of an hundred and fifty Gallies, and a hundred ſhips of burthen. The Land forces he commanded in perſon: of the Navy Demetrius was Admiral.

When all was ready for the journey, the Seamen adviſed him to ſtay yet eight days longer, and expect the ſetting of the Pleiades. But his haſty deſire to prevent all preparations for reſiſtance that Ptolomy ſhould make, rejected this counſel; imputing it rather to their fear than skill: wherefore he departed from Antigonia (a Town which he had built in Syria, and called after his own name, that was ſoon changed into Seleucia, by his mortal enemy) and came to Gaza, where he met with his Fleet. The nearer that he drew to Egypt, the more haſt he made: thinking by celerity to prevail more than by his great power. He cauſed his Souldiers to carry ten days proviſion of victuals; and had many Camels loaden with all neceſſaries for paſſing over the Deſarts, over which he marched with no ſmall toil, though he met with no reſiſtance. At Mount Gaſſius, which is near adjoyning to Nilus, he ſaw his Fleet riding at Anchor, not far from the ſhore, in ill caſe, and many Ships wanting. It had been ſorely beaten with foul weather, wherein ſome were loſt, others driven back to Gaza, or ſcattered elſewhere into ſuch creeks as they could recover: Demetrius himſelf, with the beſt and ſtrongeſt Veſſels, did ſo long bear it up againſt the Wind, that all his freſh water was ſpent; in which extremity, he and all his muſt have periſhed, had not the tempeſt ceaſed when it did, and Antigonus appeared in ſight, from whom thoſe over-wearied, thirſty and Sea-beaten Souldiers received relief. After theſe painful travels, there followed a War no leſs painful than to little purpoſe; for Ptolomy had ſo fortified all the paſſages upon the River of Nilus, as he aſſured himſelf either to end the war there, or if his guards ſhould happen to be forced, yet could it not be done but ſo much to the weakning of the Aſſailants, as he ſhould afterward, with a ſecond Army (which he held entire) entertain the Invader upon advantage enough. All that Antigonus ſought, was to come to blows ſpeedily: Ptolomy on the contrary, to beat Antigonus by the belly. It is true that Nilus gave him water enough, but wood he had none to warm it: and while Antigonus aſſaulted the Rampiers, raiſed upon the River, in vain, Ptolomy aſſayed the faith of his Souldiers, with good ſucceſs; for, with great gifts, and greater promiſes, he ſerried them over ſo faſt, as had not Antigonus thruſt ſome aſſured Regiments upon the paſſages next the enemy, and in the mean while taken a reſolution to return, Ptolomy had turned him out of Egypt ill attended.

Some of them indeed he laid hands on, in the way of their eſcape, and thoſe he put to death with extreme torments; but in all likelihood with the ſame ill ſucceſs that Perdiccas had formerly done, when he invaded Egypt, had he not readily removed his Army further off, from the noiſe of their entertainment, that had already been won from him. To prevent therefore as well the preſent danger of his ſtay, as the ſhame following a forc'd retreat, he ſecretly practiſed the advice of his Council, upon whom the burthen muſt be laid of his entrance, and leaving Egypt.

It is indeed leſs prejudicial in ſuch like caſes, that errours, diſhonours and loſſes, be laid on Counſellours and Captains, than on Kings; on the Directed, than on the Directors: for the honour and reputation of a Prince is far more precious than that of a Vaſſal. Charles the fifth, as many other Princes have done, laid the loſs and diſhonour he received in the invaſion of France, by the way of Provence to Antony de Leva, whether juſtly or no, I know not; but howſoever, all the Hiſtorians of that time agree, that the ſorrow thereof coſt that brave Captain his life. Certainly to give any violent advice in doubtful enterpriſes, is rather a teſtimony of love, than of wiſdom, in the giver; for the ill ſucceſs is always caſt upon the Counſel, the good never wants a Father, though a falſe one, to acknowledge it. Yet I have ſometime known it, that great Commanders, who are for the preſent in place of Kings, have not only been diſſwaded, but held, in a kind, by ſtrong hand, from hazarding their own perſons, and yet have thoſe kind of Mutiners never been called to a Marſhal's Court.

SECT. II.

How the City of Rhodes was beſieged by Demetrius.

THis departure of Antigonus, left behind it many dead Carcaſes, and a great deal of joy in Egypt. Ptolomy held a ſolemn Feaſt, and ſent Meſſengers abroad, loaden with glad news to Seleucus, Lyſimachus, and Caſſander, his Confederates: ſtrongly encouraging all that ſide, with the report of this his late felicity, though it appeared but in a defenſive War. Antigonus on the contrary, flattered himſelf with another interpretation, calling the joys of his enemies for witneſſes of his own greatneſs, ſeeing they aroſe but from ſo little things: his enemies being but bare ſavers by the laſt bargain, and himſelf, as he ſuppoſed, having loſt but a little time, and no part of his honour in the late retreat. Howſoever it were, yet he meant to follow his affairs henceforth in another faſhion; for that which he could not cleave aſunder by great blows, he purpoſed by little and little to pare off, by cutting off the branches firſt, to fell the Tree it ſelf with the more facility. To effect which, he reſolved (leaving the great ones to grow a while) to root up the Dependents of his enemies: Dependents, whom the fore-named Confederates ſhould be forc't either to relieve, or to loſe; and hereby he doubted not to draw them into the field, where the advantage of power, and of all other warlike proviſion promiſed him victory.

At this time the City of Rhodes was very mighty being well governed, and having long held it ſelf in good Neutrality; it drew the better part of all the Trade of thoſe parts, and therein a great deal of riches to it ſelf; to maintain which, and to encreaſe it, it furniſhed and kept on the Seas a Fleet of well armed Ships, by which it not only beat off all Pyrates and petty Thieves, but the reputation of their ſtrength was thereby ſo much increaſed, as all the Neighbour Princes ſought their alliance and confederacy.

In this ſo dangerous a time (in which they muſt either refuſe all that ſought them, and ſo ſtand friendleſs and apart; or joyn themſelves to ſome one, and thereby forego the peace, by which their greatneſs had grown) their affections carried them to the Egyptian: both becauſe the greateſt part of their trade lay that way, as alſo for that Antigonus his diſpoſition, greatneſs, and neighbourhood was fearful unto them. This affection of theirs, with ſome other paſſages more apparent, gave argument of quarrel to Antigonus, who began to declare himſelf againſt them by petty injuries, taking ſome of their ſhips, with ſuch other grievances, while he made a more weighty preparation, to purſue the War againſt them openly and ſtrongly. All things ſoon after ordered according to the greatneſs of the enterpriſe, he employed his Son Demetrius againſt them in their own Iſland, who brought ſuch terrour upon the Citizens, that laying aſide all reſpect of friendſhip and honour, they offered him their aſſiſtance and ſervice againſt whomſoever. Demetrius, who knew from whence this change came, and that the alteration was perſwaded by fear, and not by love; raiſed his demands to an intolerable height, requiring a hundred Hoſtages to be delivered him, and liberty to lodge in their Port as many ſhips of War as himſelf pleaſed. Theſe conditions, more properly to be impoſed upon a State already conquered, than on thoſe who as yet had heard of nothing but a conſtrained aſſiſtance, reſtored unto the Rhodians their loſt courage, and made them reſolve to defend their liberty to the laſt man: this taught them to infranchiſe all their able bondmen, and wiſely rather to make them their fellow-Citizens, than to make themſelves fellow-ſlaves with them.

Demetrius having refuſed the fair conditions offered (as the Rhodians, the fearful ones propounded unto them) make preparation for a long ſiege, and finding no appearance to carry the place in fury, he ſet in hand with his engines of battery; in the invention and uſe of which, he did never ſhew himſelf a greater Artiſan, than in this War. But in concluſion, after the Citizens had ſuſtained all the aſſaults given them for a whole year, after many brave ſallies out of the Town, and the famine which they endured within the Town, which had proved far more extream, if Ptolomy had not with many hazards relieved them, Demetrius by mediation of the Grecian Ambaſſadours, gave over the ſiege; a hundred hoſtages they gave him for performance of the Peace made, but with exception of all the Magiſtrates and Officers of the City

Hereunto Demetrius was brought by the uſual policy of War, and State: for while with the flower of all his Father's forces he lay before Rhodes, Caſſander recovered many of thoſe places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from him; neither did Caſſander make the War as in former times, by practice and ſurpriſe, but by a ſtrong and well compounded Army, which he himſelf lead as far as into Attica, and therewith greatly diſtreſſed and endangered Athens it ſelf. On the other ſide (though with leſs ſucceſs) did Polyſperchon invade Peloponneſus. Theſe dangerous undertakings upon Greece, adviſed the Athenians and Ætolians to diſpatch their Ambaſſadours towards Demetrius, and adviſed Demetrius rather to abandon the enterpriſe of Rhodes, than to abandon the great honour which he had formerly gotten by ſetting all Greece at liberty.

Demetrius was no ſooner out of the Iſland, than that the Rhodians erected Statues in honour of Lyſimachus and Caſſander; but for Ptolomy, whom they moſt affected, and from whom they received their moſt relief, they conſulted with the Oracle of Jupiter, whether it were not lawful to call him a god. The Prieſts which attended in the Temple of Hammon, gave the ſame fair anſwer for Ptolomy, which they had formerly done for Alexander his Maſter; for as Alexander conſulted the Oracle with an Army at his heels, ſo was Ptolomy at this time Lord of the ſoil: and yet was this a far more cleanly creation than that done by the Athenians, who deified Antigonus and Demetrius by decree of the people. A mad age it was, when ſo many of Alexander's Captains, could not content themſelves with the ſtile of Kings, but that they would needs be called gods.

SECT.

SECT. III.

How Demetrius prevailed in Greece. Caſſander deſires peace of Antigonus, and cannot obtain it. Great preparations of War againſt Antigonus.

Demetrius, coming with a ſtrong Fleet and Army into Greece, quickly drave Caſſander out of Attica, and purſuing his fortune, chaſed him beyond the Straits of Thermopylæ. Herein his reputation did much avail him; which was ſo great, that ſix thouſand of his enemies Souldiers revolted unto him. So, partly by the greatneſs of his name, partly by force, he recovered in ſhort ſpace all that Caſſander held in thoſe Straits, and giving liberty unto the people, he beſtowed upon the Athenians thoſe pieces, which had been fortified againſt them, to block them up. Then went he into Peloponneſus, where he found the like or more eaſie ſucceſs: for he ſuddenly took Argos, Corinth, Sycion, and the moſt of the Country, beſtowing liberty upon ſuch as needed it. The Town of Sycion he tranſlated by conſent of the Citizens, from the old ſeat into another place, and called it after his own name, Demetrius. This done, he betook himſelf to his pleaſure. At the Iſthman games he cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed Captain General of Greece, as Philip and Alexander had been in former times: whereupon (as if he were now become as great as Alexander) he deſpiſed all others, making it a matter of jeſt, that any, ſave himſelf or his Father, ſhould uſurp the Name of King. But in his behaviour he was ſo far unlike to a King, that in all the time of his leiſure, he deſerved none other name than of a drunken Palliard. Yet were the Athenians as ready as ever to deviſe new honours for him: among which they made one Decree, That whatſoever King Demetrius ſhould command, ought to be held ſacred with the gods, and juſt with men.

All Greece being now at the diſpoſition of Antigonus, Caſſander ſtood in great fear, leſt the War ſhould fall heavily upon him in Macedon: which to avoid, he knew no better way than to make peace with his enemies betimes. And to that purpoſe he ſent Ambaſſadours; but had no better anſwer from Antigonus, than that he ſhould ſubmit his whole eſtate to his diſcretion. This proud demand made him look about him, and labour hard in ſoliciting his friends, both to aſſiſt him, and take heed to themſelves; neither found he them ſlow in apprehending the common danger: for Lyſimachus knew that if once Caſſander had loſt Macedon, Demetrius would ſoon be Maſter of Thrace. Neither were Ptolomy and Seleucus ignorant of that which was like to befall them, if Antigonus were ſuffered to put himſelf in quiet poſſeſſion of thoſe Provinces in Europe. Wherefore it was agreed, that with joynt-forces they ſhould all together ſet upon the common enemy.

Hereof Antigonus had notice: but ſcorned all their preparations, ſaying, That he would as eaſily ſcatter them, as a flock of birds are driven away with a Stone. With theſe conceits he pleaſed himſelf, and no way hindred the proceedings of his Enemy. He lay at that time in the Town of Antigonia (a name that it muſt ſhortly loſe) where he was carefully providing to ſet out ſome ſtately games and Pageants, in oſtentation of his glory. But thither was brought unto him the tumultuous news of Lyſimachus his victories about Helleſpont. For Caſſander had committed unto Lyſimachus part of his forces, wherewith to paſs over into Aſia, while he himſelf with the reſt, ſhould oppoſe Demetrius on Europe ſide. So Lyſimachus paſſing the Helleſpont, began to make hot war upon the Subjects of Antigonus; getting ſome of the Cities in thoſe parts, to joyn with him by fair means, winning others by force, and waſting the Countrey round about.

To repreſs this unexpected boldneſs, Antigonus made haſty journeys, and came ſoon enough to recover his loſſes, but not ſtrong enough to drive Lyſimachus home, or compel him to come to battel. Lyſimachus waited for the coming of Seleucus; keeping himſelf the whilſt from neceſſity of fighting. But Babylon was far off; and Seleucus his preparations were too great to be ſoon in a readineſs. The Winter alſo did hinder his Journey: which inforced them on both ſides to reſt in ſome quiet, without performing any matter of importance. This delay of debating the quarrel in open field, held all thoſe Nations in a great ſuſpence, and bred much expectation. Yet might all have come to nothing, had not Antigonus been ſo froward, that he refuſed to yield upon any peaceable conditions. At length Seleucus drew near with a mighty Army of his own (for he had gathered ſtrength in that long time of leiſure, which Antigonus had given him) and with great aid from Ptolomy, that was joyned with his forces.

To help in this needful caſe, Demetrius was called over into Aſia by his Father's letters: which he readily obeyed. Before his departure out of Greece, he made peace with Caſſander, upon reaſonable terms: to the end he might not be driven to leave any part of his Army for defence of the Country; and that his journey might be without any ſuch blemiſh of reputation, as if he had abandoned his Dependents: for one Article of the peace was, that all the Cities of Greece ſhould be at liberty. Caſſander was glad to be ſo rid of an enemy that was too ſtrong for him. Yet would this league have done him little good, if things had fallen out contrariwiſe than they did in Aſia; ſeeing the ratification thereof was referred unto Antigonus. It ſufficed, that for the preſent, every one found means to clear himſelf of all incumbrances elſewhere, to the end that each of them might freely apply himſelf to the trial of the main controverſie in Aſia,

SECT. IV.

How Antigonus was ſlain in a great battel at Ipſus, near unto Epheſus; wherein his whole eſtate was loſt.

Seleucus, with his Son Antiochus, joyning with Lyſimachus, compounded a great Army, which was (all conſidered) not inferiour to that of the Enemy. In greatneſs of name (that helpeth much in all Wars, but eſpecially in the Civil) they were rather unanſwerable than unequal to their Adverſaries: for Antigonus had of a long time kept them under with a maſtering ſpirit, and had been reputed a King indeed, when the reſt were held but Uſurpers of the Title. Likewiſe Demetrius was generally acknowledged a brave Commander, having given proof of his worth in many great ſervices of all kinds, and enriched the art of War with many inventions, which even his enemies, and particularly Lyſimachus, did much admire. Seleucus, who had ſometimes flattered Antigonus, and fearfully ſtoll'n away from him to ſave his life, with young Antiochus, a Prince not heard of before this journey: and Lyſimachus, that had lived long in a corner, hardly keeping his own from the wild Thracians; wanted much in reputation of that which was yielded to their oppoſites: yet ſo, that as ancient Captains under Philip and Alexander, two of them were held worthy enough to receive any benefit that Fortune might give, and the third a Prince of great hope, whereof he now came to make experience.

The Souldiers, on both ſides, were for the moſt part hardy and well exerciſed: many of them having ſerved under Alexander; though of thoſe old Companies, the long ſpace of two and twenty years had conſumed the greateſt number. But concerning their affections, the followers of Seleucus were eaſily perſwaded, that in this battel they muſt either get the upper hand, or put in extreme danger all that belonged unto the Confederate Princes; whereas Antigonus his men could diſcern no other neceſſity of fighting, than the obſtinate quality of their Lord, that needs would be Maſter of all. Antigonus had about threeſcore and ten thouſand foot, ten thouſand horſe, and threeſcore and fifteen Elephants. His enemies were ſix thouſand ſhort of him in number of their foot; in horſe they had the odds of five hundred; of Elephants they had four hundred, and an hundred and twenty armed Chariots of War: which helps, though they little had availed the Perſians, yet were they not to be deſpiſed, in the hands of a good Captain.

Antigonus himſelf, either troubled with the unexpected greatneſs of his enemies forces, or preſaging little good like to enſue, grew very penſive, communing much in private with his Son whom he commended to the Army as his Succeſſor: whereas in former times he had never been ſo jocund, as towards the hour of battel, nor had been accuſtomed to make his Son, or any other private to his counſel, before it required execution. Other tokens of bad luck, either foregoing the fight, or afterwards deviſed, I hold it needleſs to recount. Diana of Epheſus dwelt near to the place of battel, a buſie goddeſs in many great fights: and therefore likely to have been thruſt into the fable, if any matter nearly reſembling a miracle, had chanced.

It is eaſie to believe, that theſe two ſo gallant Armies, containing well near all the ſtrength of Alexander's whole Empire, performed a notable fight, being led by ſuch worthy Commanders, and whom the iſſue thereof did highly concern. Yet are few of the particulars recorded: an eaſie loſs in regard of the much variety, wherewith every ſtory aboundeth in this kind. The moſt memorable things in the battel, were theſe: Demetrius with his beſt force of Horſe, charged valiantly upon young Antiochus; whom when he had broken, and put to flight, he was ſo tranſported with the heat of his good ſucceſs, that he never gave over his purſuit, but left his Father naked, and loſt thereby both him, and the victory. For when Seleucus perceived this advantage, he interpoſed his Elephants, between Demetrius and the Phalanx of Antigonus; and with many troops of horſe offering to break upon the enemies battel, whereſoever it lay moſt open, he did ſo terrifie the Antigonians, that a great part of them rather choſe to revolt from their Lord, whilſt they were fairly invited, than to ſuſtain the fury of ſo dangerous an impreſſion. This cowardize, or rather Treaſon of ſome, diſcouraged others; and finally, caſt them all into flight; expoſing their General to the laſt end of his deſtinies. Antigonus was then fourſcore years old, very fat, and unweildy, ſo that he was unapt for flight, if his high ſpirit could have entertained any thought thereof. He had about him ſome of his moſt truſty followers, and as many others as he could hold together. When one that perceived a great troop making towards his perſon, told him, Sir King, yonder company means to charge you: He anſwered, Well may they; for who defends me? but anon Demetrius will relieve us. Thus expecting to the very laſt, that his Son ſhould come to the reſcue, he received ſo many Darts into his body, as took away his lately ambitious, but then fearful hopes, together with his troubleſome life.

His great ability in matter of Arms, together with his unſatiable deſire of Empire, have ſufficiently appeared in the whole Volume of his Actions. He was more feared by his enemies, than loved by his friends; as one that could not moderate his Fortune, but uſed inſolence toward all alike, as if it had been ſome virtue neareſt repreſenting a Kingly Majeſty. This was the cauſe that ſo many of his followers revolted to his enemies; and finally, that a great part of his Army forſook him in his laſt neceſſity. For thoſe Kings and Princes that call all the careful endeavours of their Vaſſals, only duty and debt; and are more apt to puniſh the leaſt offences, than to reward the greateſt ſervices: ſhall find themſelves upon the firſt change of fortune (ſeeing it is love only that ſtays by adverſity) not only the moſt friendleſs, but even the moſt contemptible, and deſpiſed of all other. This Antigonus found true in part, while he lived; in part he left it to be verified upon his Son.

SECT. V.

How Demetrius, forſaken by the Athenians after his overthrow, was reconciled to Seleucus and Ptolomy, beginning a new fortune, and ſhortly entring into quarrels.

FOr Demetrius, at his return from the idle purſuit of young Antiochus, finding all quite loſt, he was glad to ſave himſelf, with four thouſand horſe, and five thouſand foot, by a ſpeedy retreat unto Epheſus, whence he made great haſt unto Athens, as to the place, that for his ſake would ſuffer any extremity. But whilſt he was in the midſt of his courſe thither, the Athenian Ambaſſadours met him with a decree of the people, which was, that none of the Kings ſhould be admitted into their City. Theſe were Ambaſſadours, not Theori, or Conſulters with the Oracle. It was a ſhameleſs ingratitude in the Athenians, to reward their Benefactor, in his miſery, with ſuch a decree: neither did any part of his calamity more afflict the unfortunate Prince, than to ſee his adverſity deſpiſed by thoſe whom he had thought his ſu-reſt Friends. Yet was he fain to give good words. For he had left many of his Ships in their Haven, of which he now ſtood in great need; and therefore was fain to ſpeak them fair, that ſometimes had groſly flattered him. But he ſhall live to teach them their old language, and ſpeak unto them in another tune. When he had gotten his Ships, he ſailed to the Iſthmus, where he found nothing but matter of diſcomfort. His Garriſons were every where broken up; the Souldiers having betaken themſelves to his enemies pay. So that he was King only of a ſmall Army and Fleet, without money or means wherewith to ſuſtain him and his followers any long time. All the reſt, or the greateſt part of his Father's Dominion, was now in dividing among the Conquerors, and thoſe few places which as yet held for him (having not perchance heard the worſt of what had happened) he no way knew how to relieve: for to put himſelf into the field on that ſide of the Sea, he had no power; and to incloſe himſelf in any of them, how ſtrong ſoever, were but to impriſon his fortune, and his hopes, or therein indeed to bury himſelf and his eſtate: He therefore creeping thorow thoſe buſhes that had feweſt bryers, fell upon a corner of Lyſimachus his Kingdom, whereof he gave all the ſpoil that was gotten, to his Souldiers, his own loſſes having been too great to be repayed again by ſmall prizes.

In the mean while the Confederate Princes had wherewithal to buſie themſelves, in the partition of thoſe Provinces, of which their late victory had made them Lords: wherein Seleucus had a notable advantage by being preſent, and Maſter of the field; for neither Ptolomy nor Caſſander were at the overthrow given, having only ſent certain troops to re-inforce the Army which Seleucus led, who took hold of a part of Aſia the leſs, and all Syria, being no otherwiſe divided from his own Territory, than by the River of Euphrates. For there had not any order been taken by the Confederates, for the diviſion of all thoſe Lands: becauſe they did not expect ſo proſperous an iſſue of that War, which they made only in their common defence. It was therefore lawful for Seleucus, to make the beſt benefit that he could of the Victory, at which nevertheleſs others did repine; and though they neither could nor durſt accuſe him of ill dealing for the preſent, yet ſeeing the overgreatneſs of Seleucus brought no leſs danger to the reſt of the new Kings, than that of Antigonus had done, they conſulted upon the ſame reaſon of State as before, how to oppoſe it in time. Neither was Seleucus ignorant of what they had determined; for he read it in the Law univerſal of Kingdoms and States, needing no other intelligence. Hereupon they forget friendſhips on all ſides, and cure themſelves of all unprofitable paſſion: the hatred of each to other, and their loves being laid on the on ſide, againſt their profits on the other, were found ſo far too light, as Seleucus, who had to day ſlain Antigonus the Father, and driven Demetrius the Son out of Aſia, ſought to morrow how to match himſelf with Stratonica, Demetrius his Daughter; and ſo by Demetrius to ſerve his turn againſt Lyſimachus.

The ſtory of this Stratonica, with whom young Antiochus, the Son of Seleucus fell ſo paſſionately in love, and ſo diſtempered, as Seleucus his Father, to ſave his Son's life, gave her (though ſhe were his Wife) unto him; and how his paſſion was diſcovered by his pulſe, is generally noted by all Writers. But neither did this alliance between Seleucus and Demetrius; between Ptolomy and Lyſimachus; between Demetrius and Caſſander; between Demetrius and Ptolomy, though for the preſent it brought him again into the rank of Kings; otherwiſe tye any of them to each other, than the marriages between Chriſtian Kings have done in latter times, namely between the Auſtrians, the Arragonians, the French, and other Princes; neither have the Leagues of thoſe elder times been found more faithful, than thoſe of the ſame latter times have been, as in the ſtories of Charles the Eighth of France, and of Charles the Emperour, of Francis the Firſt, and of the Kings of Naples, Dukes of Millan, and others, the Reader may obſerve: between whom from the year of our Lord, One thouſand four hundred ninety and five, when Charles the Eighth undertook the Conqueſt of Naples, to the year One thouſand five hundred fifty and eight, when Henry the Second died; the Hiſtories of thoſe times tell us, that all the bonds, either by the Bed, or by the Book, either by Weddings or Sacrametal Oaths had neither faithful purpoſe nor performance. Yet did Demetrius reap this profit by giving his Daughter to his enemy Seleucus, that he recovered Cilicia from Pliſtarchus, the Brother of Caſſander, who had gotten it as his ſhare in the diviſion of Antigonus his poſſeſſions: for the Intruder was not ſtrong enough to hold it by his proper forces, from him that entred upon it as a lawful heir; neither would Seleucus lend him any help, as by the Rule of Confederacy he ſhould have done againſt the common enemy. So Pliſtarchus with very angry complaints, as well againſt Seleucus as Demetrius, went unto Caſſander; whither Phila, their Siſter, followed him ſhortly, to pacifie them both, and kept all quiet; being ſent for that purpoſe by Demetrius her Husband, that was not ſtrong enough to deal with Caſſander; and therefore glad to make uſe of that bond of alliance betwixt them, whereof in his own proſperity, he never took notice to the others good. About the ſame time he took to Wife a Daughter of Ptolomy (plurality of Wives being familiar with theſe Macedonians, that had learned it in their Eaſtern Conqueſts) and ſo was by two marriages rather freed from two enemies, than ſtrengthened with two friends; for neither of them wiſhed him any good, otherwiſe than might ſeem to advance their own ambitious deſires.

Seleucus and Ptolomy could both of them have been contented better, that Demetrius, with help of their countenance, ſhould ſeek his fortune ſomewhat farther off, than ſettle his Eſtate under their noſes. Particularly, Seleucus thought that Cilicia lay very fitly for himſelf: and Ptolomy had a great appetite (which yet he concealed a while) to the Iſle of Cyprus. Now whether it were ſo, that Seleucus would fain have ſet his new Father-in-law upon the neck of Lyſimachus; or whether he were indeed greedy of the bargain; he offered to buy of Demetrius for ready money, his late purchaſe of Cilicia. Hereunto Demetrius would not hearken, but meant to keep as much Land as he could, having already found in Cilicia twelve thouſand Talents of his Father's Treaſure, that would ſerve him to make ſport a while. This refuſal ſo diſpleaſed Seleucus, that in angry terms he demanded the Cities of Tyre and Sidon, to be ſurrendred unto him; which were the only places in Syria, that had not followed the fortune of the late great battel. Inſtead of giving them up, Demetrius took preſent order to have them better manned; and ſpake it ſtoutly, That were he overcome come a thouſand times, yet would he not hire Seleucus to become his Son-in-law. In this quarrel Seleucus was generally reprehended, as one of a malignant diſpoſition, that would break friendſhip with his Father-in-law for two Towns, from whom he had already taken more than well he knew how to govern. But the fire conſumed it ſelf in words, which had it faſtned upon arms, like it is that the weaker ſhould have found friends out of envy to the ſtronger.

SECT. VI.

How Demetrius wan the City of Athens, and prevailed in Greece, but loſt in Aſia. Of troubles in Macedon following the death of Caſſander.

IN the mean while, the Athenians not knowing how to uſe the liberty which Demetrius had beſtowed on them, were fallen by ſedition, under the Tyranny of Lachares. Through which alteration their diſtempered City was ſo weakned, that it ſeemed ill able to keep off the puniſhment due to their late ingratitude. This advantage haſtened him, whom they had once called their God and Saviour, to preſent himſelf unto them, in the habit of a revenging fury. He brought againſt them all the force that he could well ſpare from other employments, which were at that time perhaps the more, becauſe his doubtful Eaſtern friends, were unwilling to give impediment to any buſineſs, that might entangle him in Greece. His firſt enterpriſe in Athens had ill ſucceſs; a great part of his Fleet periſhing in a Tempeſt. But he ſoon repaired the loſs; and (after ſome Victories in Peloponneſus, where he wan divers Towns that had fallen from him) returning to the enterpriſe, waſted the Country of Attica, and cut off all relief from the City, both by Land and Sea.

Athens was not able to feed the great multitude within it, any long time: for it ſtood in a barren ſoil, and wanted now the command of thoſe Iſlands, and places abroad, from whence it was wont to be ſtored with victuals; being alſo deſtitute of means to keep ſuch a Navy as might bring in ſupply, or dare to do any thing at Sea, againſt that of Demetrius. Yet was there ſome hope of ſuccour from Ptolomy, who (truſting thereby to win the love of Greece) had loaden an hundred and fifty ſhips with Corn, and ſent them to relieve the hungry City. But theſe hundred and fifty were unable to deal with three hundred good fighting-ſhips, which Demetrius had; rather they feared to become a prey to him, and therefore haſted them away betimes, as having done enough, in adventuring to come ſo near that they might be deſcryed. This brake the heart of the people, among whom the famine was ſo extreme, that a Father and his Son did fight for a dead Mouſe, which dropped down between them from the houſe top. Wherefore they ſent Ambaſſadours to yield up the Town, and crave pardon, having ſo far offended, that out of deſperation, they made it a capital offence to propoſe any motion of peace. Yet were they fain to aboliſh this Decree, rather becauſe they knew not what elſe to do, than becauſe they hoped to be forgiven.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the Victory, did not only forbear to take away the lives of theſe unthankful men, which they had ſubmitted unto his mercy; but out of his liberality gave them food, and placed in Office amongſt them ſuch as were moſt acceptable to the people. Nevertheleſs he was grown wiſer than to truſt them ſo far as he had done in times paſt. And therefore, when (among other flattering acclamations) they bad him take their Havens, and diſpoſe of them at his pleaſure; he was ready to lay hold upon the word, and leave a ſure Garriſon within their Walls, to keep them honeſt perforce. After this he went into Peloponneſus, vanquiſhed the Lacedemonians in two Battels, and was in very fair poſſibility to take their City: when the dangerous news of Lyſimachus and Ptolomy, that prevailed faſter upon him elſewhere, than himſelf did upon his enemies in Greece, called him in all haſte. Lyſimachus had won many Towns in Aſia; Ptolomy had gotten all the Iſle of Cyprus, except the City of Salamis wherein Demetrius had left his Children and Mother, that were ſtraitly beſieged. Whilſt he was bethinking himſelf which way to turn his face, a notable piece of buſineſs offered it ſelf, which thruſt all other cares out of his head.

Caſſander was lately dead in Macedon, and ſoon after him, Philip his eldeſt Son, whoſe two young Brethren, Antipater and Alexander, ſought for the Kingdom. In this quarrel Theſſalonica the Daughter of King Philip, whom Caſſander had married, ſeemed better affected to Alexander, than to her eldeſt Son: who thereupon grew ſo enraged, that moſt barbarouſly he ſlew his own Mother. The odiouſneſs of this fact gave a fair luſtre to Alexander's cauſe: drawing the generality of the Macedons to take his part, as in revenge of the Queens death, upon that wicked parricide Antipater. But Antipater was ſo ſtrongly backed by Lyſimachus, whoſe Daughter he had married; that Alexander could not hope to make his party good without ſome forreign aid. For which cauſe he called in both Phyrrhus and Demetrius; who how they dealt with him, it will ſoon appear in the following Tragedy, of him and his Brother. Their Father Caſſander had been one that ſhifted well for himſelf, at ſuch time as every man ſought to get ſomewhat, in the ill-ordered diviſion of the Empire. He was cunning in practice, and a good Souldier: one of more open dealing than were his Companions, but withal more impudent, rudely killing thoſe, whom others would more wiſely have made away. He deeply hated the memory of Alexander, that had knocked his head againſt a wall, upon ſome opinion of contempt. With Olympias he had an hereditary quarrel, derived from his Father, whom ſhe could not abide. Her feminine malice did ſo exaſperate him, by cruelty that ſhe uſed againſt his friends, both alive and dead; as it made him adventure upon ſhedding the Royal Blood: wherewith, when once he had ſtained his hands, he did not care how far he proceded in that courſe of murder. His carefulneſs to deſtroy thoſe women and children, whoſe lives hindred his purpoſe, argues him to have been rather skilful in matters of Arms, than a valiant man: ſuch cruelty being a true mark of cowardize, which fears a far off the dangers, that may quietly paſs away: and ſeeks to avoid them by baſe and wicked means, as never thinking it ſelf ſafe enough, untill there be nothing left, that carries likelihood of danger. Of Olympias and Roxane it may be ſaid, that they had well deſerved the bloody end which which over-took them; yet ill-beseemed it Cassander to do the Office of a Hang-man. But Alexander's children had by no Law of men deserved to dye for the tyranny of their Father. Wherefore, though Cassander died in his bed, yet the Divine Justice brought swords upon his wife and children, that well revenged the cruelty of this bloody man, by destroying his whole house as he had done his Master's.

SECT. VII.

Of Pyrrhus and his doings in Macedon. The death of Cassander's Children. Demetrius gets the Kingdom of Macedon; prevails in War against the Greeks; loseth reputation in his War against Pyrrhus, and in his Civil Government, and prepares to win Asia. How all conspire against Demetrius. Pyrrhus and Lysimachus invade him, his Army yields to Pyrrhus, who shares the Kingdom of Macedon with Lysimachus.

Pyrrhus, the Son of that unfortunate Prince Æacides, which perished in War against Cassander, who hardly preserved, being a suckling Infant, from the fury of his Father's enemies. When his Fosterers had conveyed him to Glaucias King of Illyria; the deadly hatred of Cassander would have bought his life with the price of two hundred Talents. But no man can kill him that shall be his heir. Glaucias was so far from betraying Pyrrhus, that he restored him by force to his Father's Kingdom, when he was but twelve years of age. Within the compass of six years, either the indiscretions of his youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subjects, drave him out of his Kingdom, and left him to try the world anew. Then went he to Demetrius (who married his Sister) became his Page, followed him a while in his Wars, was with him in the great Battel of Ipsus, whence he fled with him to Ephesus; and was content to be hostage for him, in his reconciliation with Ptolomy. In Egypt he so behaved himself, that he got the favour of Berenice, Ptolomie's principal Wife; so that he married her Daughter, and was thereupon sent home, with money and men, into Epirus; more beholding now to Ptolomy, than to Demetrius. When he had fully recovered the Kingdom of Epirus, and was settled in it, then fell out that business between the Children of Cassander, which drew both him and Demetrius into Macedon.

Antipater, the elder of Cassander's Sons, was so far too weak for Pyrrhus, that he had no desire to attend the coming of Demetrius, but made an hasty agreement, and divided the Kingdom with his younger Brother Alexander; who likewise felt the aid of Pyrrhus, so troublesome, that he was more willing to send him away, than to call in such a nother helper. For Pyrrhus had the audacity to request, or take as granted, by strong hand, Ambracia, Acarnania, and much more of the Country, as the reward of his pains: leaving the two Brethren to agree as well as they could about the rest. Necessity enforced the Brethren to composition: but their composition would not satisfie Demetrius, who took the matter hainously, that he was sent for, and made a fool to come so far with an Army, and find no work for it. This was a frivolous complaint; whereby it appeared, that Demetrius had a purpose to do as Pyrrhus had done; and so much more, by how much he was stronger. Hereupon it seemed to Alexander a wise course, to remove this over-diligent friend, by murdering him upon some advantage. Thus Demetrius reported the story, and it might be true; though the greatest part, and perhaps the wisest, believed it not. But the issue was, that Alexander himself was feasted and slain by Demetrius; who took his part of the Kingdom, as a reward of the murder; excusing the fact so well, by telling his own danger, and what a naughty man Cassander had been, that all the Macedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their King. It fell out happily, that about the same time Lysimachus was buried in War with a King of the wild Thracians: for thereby he was compelled to seek peace with Demetrius, which to obtain, he caused the remainder of Macedon to be given up; that is, the part belonging to Antipater his Son-in-law. At this ill bargain Antipater grievously stormed, though he knew not how to amend it: yet still he stormed; until his Father-in-law, to save the labour of making many excuses, took away his troublesome life. Thus in haste, with a kind of neglect, and as it were to avoid molestation, were slain the Children of Cassander: Of Cassander that had slain his own Master's Children, in a wise course of policy, with careful meditation (so much the more wicked as the more long) studying how to erect his own house, that fell down upon his grave, ere the earth on it was throughly settled.

It might be thought, that such an access of Dominion, added much to the greatness of Demetrius. But indeed it shewed his infirmity; and thereby made him neglected by many, and at length hated by all. For he had no Art of Civil Government: but thought (or shewed by his actions that he thought) the use and fruit of a Kingdom, to be none other, than to do what a King listed. He gave himself over to Women and Wine, laughing openly at those which offered to trouble him with supplications, and the tedious discourse of doing Justice. He had more skill in getting a Kingdom, than in ruling it: War being his recreation, and Luxury his nature. By long rest (as six years reign is long to him, that knows not how to reign one year) he discovered so much of his worst conditions, as made the people both weary of his idleness; and the Souldiers of his vanity. He was freed from care of matters in Asia, by hearing that all was lost: though more especially, by hearing that Ptolomy had with great honour, entertained and dismissed his Mother and Children. This afforded him the better leisure of making War in Greece: where he vanquished the Thebans, and won their City twice in short space, but used his victory with mercy. Against Lysimachus he would fain have done somewhat (the peace between them notwithstanding) at such time as he was taken by the Thracians; but Lysimachus was freely dismissed, and in good case to make resistance ere Demetrius came; so as this Journey purchased nothing but enmity. Another expedition he took in hand against Pyrrhus, with no better, or rather with worse event. Pyrrhus held somewhat belonging to Macedon, which he had indeed as honestly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdom; he had also made excursions excurſions into Theſſaly. But there needed not any handſome pretence of quarrel, ſeeing Demetrius thought himſelf ſtrong enough to over-run his Eenemies Country, with two great Armies. It is a common fault in men, to deſpiſe the virtue of thoſe, whom they have known raw Novices in that faculty, wherein themſelves are noted as extraordinary. Pyrrhus was a Captain, whom latter Ages, and particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the rank of Generals, than either Demetrius, or any of Alexander's followers. At this time, he miſſed that part of the Army, which Demetrius led, and fell upon the other half: which he overthrew, not with more commendations of his good conduct, than of his private valour, ſhewed in ſingle combat againſt Pantauchus, Demetrius his Lieutenant; who being a ſtrong man of body, challenged this young Prince to fight hand to hand, and was utterly beaten. The loſs of this Battel did not ſo much offend the Macedonians, as the gallant behaviour of Pyrrhus delighted them. For in him they ſeemed to beñold the lively figure of Alexander in his beſt quality. Other Kings did imitate, in a counterfeit manner, ſome of Alexander's graces, and had good skill in wearing Princely veſtures: but (ſaid they) none, ſave Pyrrhus, is like him in deed, in performing the Office of a Captain.

Theſe Rumours were not more nouriſhed by the virtue of the Epirot, than by diſlike of their own King; whom they began to diſeſteem, not ſo much in regard of his unprofitable Journey into Epirus (for he had waſted much of the Country, and brought home his Army in good caſe) as of his Inſolence, that grew daily more and more intolerable. His apparel ſeemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not only too ſumptuous and new-fangled, but very unmanly; and ſerving chiefly to be a daily witneſs, how much he contemned them and their good opinions. Of his Souldiers lives he was retchleſs: and ſuffered unwiſely this unprincely ſentence to eſcape out of his mouth; That the more of them died, the fewer he was to pay. He made a mockery of Juſtice; and (as it were, to publiſh unto all his Subjects, how little he eſteemed it or them) having by a ſhew of popularity invited Petitioners, and with a gracious countenance entertained their Supplications, he led the poor Suters after him in great hope, till coming to a Bridge, he threw all their Writings into a River; pleaſing himſelf, in that he could ſo eaſily and ſo boldly delude the cares of other men. By theſe courſes he grew ſo odious, that Pyrrhus gathered audacity, and invading Macedon, had almoſt won it all with little reſiſtance. Demetrius lay then ſick in his bed: who recovering health, and taking the field, had ſuch great odds of ſtrength, as made Pyrrhus glad to forſake his winnings and be gone.

At length he began to have ſome feeling of the general hate; which to redreſs, he did not (for he could not) alter his own conditions; but purpoſed to alter their idle diſcourſes of him, by ſetting them on work in ſuch an action, wherein his beſt qualities might appear; that is, in a great War. His intent was to invade Aſia with a Royal Army: wherein the fortune of one Battel might give him as much, as the fortune of another had taken from him. To this end, he firſt made peace with Pyrrhus; that ſo he might leave all ſafe and quiet at home. Then did he compoſe a mighty Army, of almoſt a hundred thouſand foot, and twelve thouſand horſes, with a Navy of five hundred ſail, wherein were many ſhips, far exceeding the greatneſs of any that had been ſeen before; yet ſo ſwift and uſeful withal, that the greatneſs was leaſt part of their commendations.

The terrible fame of theſe preparations, made Seleucus and Ptolomy ſuſpect their own forces, and labour hard with Lyſimachus and Pyrrhus, to joyn againſt this ambitious Son of Antigonus, that was like to prove more dangerous to them all, than ever was his Father. It was eaſily diſcerned, that if Demetrius once prevailed in Aſia, there could be no ſecurity for his friends in Europe, what league ſoever were of old concluded. Therefore they reſolved to begin with him betimes, and each to invade that quarter of Macedon, that lay next his own Kingdom. Lyſimachus came firſt, and againſt him went Demetrius with a great part of his Army: but whilſt he was yet on the way, news were brought into his Camp, that Pyrrhus had won Berrhæa. The matter was not over-great: were it not that minds prepared with long diſcontent, are ready to lay hold upon ſmall occaſions of diſlike. All the Camp was in uproar: ſome wept, others raged, few or none did forbear to utter ſeditious words, and many deſired leave of Demetrius, to go to their own houſes, meaning indeed to have gone to Lyſimachus.

When Demetrius perceived the bad affection of his Army, he thought it the wiſeſt way, to lead the Macedonians further off from Lyſimachus their own Country-man, againſt Pyrrhus that was a ſtranger: hoping by victory againſt the Epirot, to recover the love of his followers, in ſuch ſort that he might afterwards at leiſure deal with the other. But herein his wiſdom beguiled him. For the Souldiers were as haſty as he, to meet with Pyrrhus; not intending to hurt him, but longing to ſee that noble Prince, of whom they daily heard the honourable fame. Some ſpake of his valour; ſome enquired, others anſwered, of his perſon, his armour, and other tokens whereby he might be known; as particularly, by a pair of Goats-horns, that he wore on his creſt. It was not likely, that theſe men ſhould hurt him. Divers of them ſtole away, and ran over into Pyrrhus his Camp: where the news that they brought, were better welcome than their perſons. For they ſaid, and it was true, that if the Macedonians might once get ſight of Pyrrhus, they would all ſalute him King. To try this, Pyrrhus rode forth, and preſented himſelf bare-headed in view of all the Camp, whether ſome were ſent before to prepare his welcome. The news of his arrival found a general applauſe, and every one began to look out, with deſire to ſet eye on him. His face was not ſo well known as his Helmet; therefore he was admoniſhed to put it on: which done, all came about him, and proffered their ſervice; neither were there any, that ſpake for Demetrius; only ſome (and they the moſt moderate of tongue) bad him be gone betimes, and ſhift for himſelf. So Demetrius threw aſide his Masker's habit, and attiring himſelf poorly, did fearfully ſteal away out of his own Camp, deſerving well this calamity: whether it were ſo, that he would not hearken to the good counſel of his friends; or whether his behaviour deprived him of ſuch friends, as would dare to let him hear the unpleaſant ſound of neceſſary truth.

Whilſt Pyrrhus was making this triumphant entry into the Kingdom of Macedon; Lyſimachus came upon him very unſeaſonably, and would needs have half: ſaying, That he had done as much as Pyrrhus in the War; and therefore had reaſon to challenge his part of the gain. The bargain was quickly made, and the division agreed upon: each of them being rather desirous to take his part quietly, than to fight for the whole; as hoping each of them to work his fellow quite out of all, upon better opportunity.

SECT. VIII.

How Demetrius gathering Forces, enterprised many things with ill success, in Greece and Asia. How he was driven upon Seleucus, and compelled to yield himself. His imprisonment and death.

THe Athenians were as unthankful to Demetrius in this his adversity, as they had been in former times. For they presently forsook his friendship, and called Pyrrhus out of Macedon to be their Patron. Demetrius when he went against Lysimachus, had left a great part of his forces in Greece, under his Son Antigonus. Therefore it is like, that he had soon gotten an Army, though Phila his Wife (who is highly commended for a wife and virtuous Lady) did poyson her self, upon desperate grief for his misfortune. The first, upon whom he attempted to shew his anger, were the Athenians that had well deserved it. He began to lay siege to their Town: but was pacified by Crates the Philosopher, whom they had made their spokes-man; and taking fair words instead of satisfaction, passed over into Asia, with eleven thousand Souldiers, meaning to try his fortune against Lysimachus, for the Provinces of Lydia and Caria.

At his first coming into those parts, fortune seemed to smile upon him. For many good Towns willingly, or by compulsion, yielded to his obedience. There were also some Captains that fell from Lysimachus to him, with their companies and treasures. But it was not long e're Agathocles the Son of Lysimachus, came upon him with an Army so strong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazard his last stock against it. Wherefore he resolved to pass through Phrygia and Armenia, into Media, and the Provinces of the higher Asia; trusting to find a Kingdom somewhere in those remote quarters. The execution of this counsel was grievously impeached by Agathocles: who pursued him close, and cut off all his provisions, driving him to take which ways he could, without following his intended course. In many skirmishes Demetrius vanquished this troublesome enemy: nevertheless he could not be shaken off, but continued afflicting the poor titulary King, with extreme famine. At length, in passing the river Lycus, so many of Demetrius his men were lost, that the rest could no longer make resistance: but were driven to travel with such speed as might well be called a plain flight. So that with famine, pestilent diseases following famine, and other accidents of War, eight thousand of them were consumed: the rest with their Captain, escaped into Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten possession of Cilicia, whilst Demetrius was occupied in Greece: yet was it no part of Demetrius his errand, to lay claim to the Country; but with vehement and humble Letters he besought his Son-in-law to call to mind their alliance, and to pity him in his great misery. These Letters at the first wrought well with Seleucus, and he condescended to the request: yet considering further how Demetrius had carried himself, when he recovered strength after the battel at Ipsus, he changed his purpose and went against him with an Army.

Many treaties were held between them; of which none took effect, through the jealousie of Seleucus. Therefore meer desperation enforced Demetrius to fight like a mad man, and his furies got him some victories, though of small importance. At length sickness took and held him forty days, in which time, a great number of his few men ran to the enemy. This notwithstanding he still held out, and once had like to have taken Seleucus in his bed, had not his coming been discovered by Fugitives, that gave alarm. Finally, when all his Army had forsaken him, and left him with a few of his friends to shift for himself, he was compelled by the last of those adherents (for even some of those few forsook him) to yield unto Seleucus.

Seleucus hearing this, was exceeding glad, and sent him very comfortable messages. But the approbation of his own humanity by his followers, was such, as renewed his jealous thoughts; and hindred him from admitting Demetrius to his presence, though otherwise he used him with as much favour, as any prisoner could wish. He was kept under sure guard in a demy-Island, wherein were goodly Walks, Orchards, and Parks for hunting. He had all that he asked royally, and friends allowed to visit him, at his, and their pleasure. Only his liberty was reserved unto the coming of young Antiochus and Stratonica, out of the high Countries. In this sort he spent three years, now merrily all the while (as one that living enjoyed the happiness, which with so much travel and blood shed he had sought in vain) and then died, leaving to his Son Antigonus, the same which his Father had left unto himself; that is, friends and hope. His ashes were honourably buried in Corinth; his qualities have appeared in his actions, and the fortune of his house, will shew it self hereafter, in times and places convenient.

SECT. IX.

The death of Ptolomy, of Lysimachus, and of Seleucus, that was the last of Alexander's Captains: with other occurrences.

ABout the same time that Demetrius died, died also Ptolomy King of Egypt, a vertuous Prince, war-like, bountiful, and (which in those times was a rare commendation) regardful of his word. He had by many Wives and Concubines, many Children, out of whom he selected Ptolomy Philadelphus, and caused him to reign together with himself, two or three years before he died, that so he might confirm him in the Inheritance of the Kingdom. At this, Ptolomy Ceraunus (for all of that house assumed the name of Ptolomy) was grievously incensed. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gave him loving entertainment. There were now only two of Alexander's Captains left, Seleucus and Lysimachus. These two needs would fight for it, who should be the longest liver of that brave Company. The true ground of their quarrel, was their near equality or ſtrength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was the murders which Lyſimachus had committed upon many of his Nobles, together with his poiſoning Agathocles his eldeſt Son: whoſe wife and children fled unto Seleucus for aid.

The Macedons, after ſeven months pauſe, having ſpent their firſt heat of admiration, began to hearken ſo well to Lyſimachus, their natural Countreyman, that they forſook Pyrrhus, upon none other ground than becauſe he was an Alien. This they had known well enough before: but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, that they lightly gave him. Lyſimachus had reigned about five years alone, when the City of Lyſimachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earth-quake, appeared by events, to have fore-ſhewed the fall of his houſe. His own jealouſie, and the inſtigation of a mother-in-law, cauſed him to poiſon his ſon Agathocles; which drew upon him that War, wherein (after the loſs of all his fifteen Children that were taken away by divers accidents) he periſhed himſelf.

Seleucus was encountred by Lyſimachus on Aſia ſide, where one battel concluded the War, with Lyſimachus his death. It pleaſed Seleucus more than the Victory, that he was the laſt of all the great Heroes that followed Alexander. For now he ſeemed to himſelf as Lord and Heir of all the conquered World. So he paſſed over into Macedon, to take poſſeſſion of Europe, where there was none to withſtand him. But there he ended his days, and within ſeven months followed Lyſimachus, and others of his fellows, by a bloody death, being treacherouſly ſlain by Ptolomy Ceraunus, whoſe friend and Patron he had been. Seventy and ſeven year old he was, when he fought with Lyſimachus, and Lyſimachus was ſeventy and four. With them ended the generation of old Captains, that had ſeen the days as it were of another World under the Perſian: yet was there left one equal to any of them in the Art of War: even Pyrrhus the Epirot, of whom we ſpake before; that is now ready to enter into War with the Romans, a more Warlike people, than Alexander himſelf did ever encounter. Of which War, and of which people, it is needful that we here make mention, as of a ſtory more important, than any likely to enſue in Greece, or in the great Kingdoms that were held by Alexander's Succeſſors, with leſs (and ſtill decreaſing) vertue, than was that, by which they were firſt purchaſed.

CHAP. VII.

The growth of Rome, and ſettling of the Eaſtern Kingdoms.

SECT. I.

How the Romans enlarged their Dominions in Italy, from the death of Tullus Hoſtilius unto ſuch time as they were aſſailed by Pyrrhus.

HOw Rome was founded by Romulus; ſetled in good order by Numa Pompilius; and by many (though ſmall) Victories, gathered ſtrength, unto ſuch time as it became the Head of Latium, by the conqueſt of Alba, in the Reign of Tullus Hoſtilius, it hath been already noted in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatneſs beginneth to encounter the power of Greece; and extending it ſelf out of Italy, to overwhelm the Dominions of other States, and Princes: I hold it convenient (as in like caſes I have done) briefly to ſet down the growth of this mighty City, in a compendious relation of thoſe many Actions, which could not have been delivered in the Ages, wherein they were ſeverally performed, without much interruption of the Hiſtory, that was then occupied in matter more important.

After the death of Tullus Hoſtilius (who when he had reigned two and thirty years, was burnt together with his houſe by lightning) Ancus Martius, Grand-child to Numa Pompilius by his Daughter, and not much unlike him in diſpoſition, ſucceeded in the Kingdom of Rome. He walled the City about; enlarged it with the Hill Aventine, which he encloſed; built a Bridge over Tybris, and the City of Oſtia upon the Sea, ſixteen miles diſtant from Rome. Finally, having reigned four and twenty years, he died, and by his laſt Will he left his Children in charge with one Lucumon, the ſon of Damaratus a Corinthian, who avoiding Cypſelus King of Corinth his tyranny, had fled into Hetruria, and dwelt in Tarquinii, by the name of which Town he was afterward called Tarquinius. From that City in Hetruria coming to Rome, and encouraged by ſome ominous occurrents, together with his Wife Tanaquils prophecy, he grew a favourite of Ancus Martius; by his Grecian wit humouring the factions of the Roman Court, inſomuch, that after his deceaſe he became not only Protector to the children, but Governour to the City. He doubled the number of Senators, and enlarged the Centurions of Horſemen: neither was he leſs eminent in War, than in Peace: for he prevailed often againſt the Tuſcans, and from his Victories, the chiefeſt ornaments of triumph took their original. When this Lucius Tarquinius had reigned eight and thirty years, he was ſlain by the ſons of Ancus Martius, to whom he had been left Guardian. But Tanaquil his wife, perceiving what was done, informed the people, from out of an high Turret, that her Husband was wounded, and ſick, but not dangerouſly. And withal ſignified unto them, that in the interim of his ſickneſs, one Servius Tullius, whom from his birth ſhe always propheſied to be born to great hopes (the Son of P. Corniculanus, and and Ocrisia a well descended, but captive woman) brought up in her house, and husband unto her daughter, should supply her husbands place, in governing the State, until his recovery; which government, being thus at first obtained by cunning, he afterwards usurped as his right. He first ordained Ratements, Subsidies and Valuations of the peoples wealth; among whom, at that time, fourscore thousand were mustered, of which number consisted their whole Corporation; and by distinction of Dignities, Ages, Trades, and Offices, he managed the Kingdom in as good sort, as if it had been a private household. At length, having two daughters of different natures, the one mild and gentle, the other fierce and outragious: and finding also that the two sons of Tarquinius Priscus, Sextus and Aruns, which had been committed unto his tuition, were of different dispositions proportionably answering to his daughters; he (willing to add water, not oyl, to fire) gave the mild daughter to Sextus the hot-headed son, and the violent, to Aruns the gentle in marriage. But whether by intended courses, or by accident, it hapned; the two mild ones being made away, the furious natures were readily joyned in marriage: who soon concurring, and calling the Senate together, began to lay claim to the Kingdom. Upon this tumult, Servius Tullus hastning to the Senate, (where he thought by Authority to have bridled Insolency) was thrown down the stairs, and going home sore bruised, was slain by the way, when he had reigned forty four years. Then Tullia his daughter, first proclaiming her Husband Tarquinius Superbus King; returning home, enforced her Coachman to drive his Chariot over her Father's corps: whereupon the street had the denomination of Wicked-street. This Tarquine, exercising cruelty without justice, and Tyranny without mercy, upon the people and Senators; having tired himself and them at home, used the same rage of treachery upon his borders. He took Oriculum, Suessa, Pometia, and the Gabii. The issue of besieging Ardea, a Town eighteen mile distant from Rome, was of bad success. In the heat of which War, his Son Sextus Tarquinius violently ravished that chast Lady Lucretia, his kinsman Collatine's wife: who in way of expiation for so unchast a deed, thought good to wash out those spots of infamy with her own blood; so (having first bequeathed the revenge unto her Father Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, her Husband Collatine and Junius Brutus) she killed her self: whereupon (chiefly by Junius Brutus his resolution) Tarquinius Superbus, with his Wife and Children, was deposed and banished; and fled to Porsenna King of Hetruria for succour, in the five and twentieth year of his reign, and the two hundred forty and fourth from the building of their City: in which space Rome had scarce gotten possession of fifteen miles round about her.

Junius Brutus by the help of Collatine, having expelled Tarquine, and freed his Country from that heavy yoke of bondage, inforced the people by solemn oath, never to admit any government by Kings amongst them: whereupon they ransacked their Kings goods, consecrated their fields to Mars, and conferred the government of the State upon Brutus and Collatine. But because the name of King was odious in their ears, they changed the manner of their government, from perpetual to annual, and from a single Government to a double; lest perpetual or sole dominion might be some motive to usurpation; and instead of Kings they called them Consuls, signifying, as it may be interpreted, Providers: that their Titles might remember them of their place, which was to be always mindful of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it so hard settling of troubled waters, that the people, after this innovation of State, scarce daring to assure themselves of their own security, enforced Tarquinius Collatine to resign up his authority, fearing that Tyranny would be hereditary; and supposing that the very name and affinity with the house of Tarquine, savoured already of their condition. In his room was substitute Valerius Publicola, who that he might (as his name importeth) be gracious in the peoples eyes, gave liberty, in matters of controversie to appeal from the Consuls to the people, and that he might as well in goods as in person, avoid occasion of suspicion, caused his own house to be pulled down, because it was built in a place defensible, as if it had been a Cittadel. Neither was Brutus any ways deficient in matter of greater moment; which concerned as well the peoples safety, as their favour: for having got intelligence, that some greener wits, and in the first rank his own Sons, were itching after innovations, hoping to restore the banished Kings; he caused them, publickly in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to be brought all unpartially to the block.

Hitherto the Romans, having by the unblemished integrity of Brutus, well appeased all inbred quarrels at home, now hereafter imployed their military designments against Foraigners: first, for their liberty; secondly, for enlarging of their possessions; and lastly, for defending their confederate Provinces, and extending their Empire. For Rome, situated as it were in the mid-way between Latinum and the Tuscans, having as yet but narrow bounds, being in her minority, could not but give occasion of offence to her neighbours; until by main opposition, having prevailed against her borderers, she used them as instruments whereby to obtain the rest.

Their first war, in the first year of Consuls, was against Porsenna King of Hetruria: who being over-perswaded by Tarquin's lamentation came to Rome, together with the banished King, and with great forces, to seat him again in his Kingdom.

In the first conflict, Horatius Cocles, having long time born the main brunt of his enemies on the Bridge over Tibris, at length, feeling himself too faint to stand against so many, caused the bridge behind him to be broken down, and with his armour leaping into the River, like a hunted Stagg, refreshed his hot spirits, and returned safe to his fellows, with the like resolution to sustain a new charge. Porsenna, although by this he had well-nigh won the hill Janiculus, which is the very entrance into the City, and found the Victory, in a manner assuredly his own: yet admiring their valour and terrified by the constant resolution of Mutius Scevola (who having by errour slain Porsenna his Secretary, instead of the King himself, did in scorn of torments threatned, burn off his own hand) he thought it not any whit prejudicial either to his safety, or credit, to enter league with them at the worst hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius his spleen was not quite abated, though Aruns his Son, and Brutus his enemy, in single combat had slain each other. And here the Romans, although they lost Brutus, got the field; and their Ladies, whose Champion he was, for their chastity, not for beauty, mourned the loss of him one whole year. Into this place, for the residue of his year was subrogated Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, father to Lucretia: and in his room (deceasing naturally before the year expired) Horatius Pulvillus.

Tarquin, upon his overthrow, feeling the fates disastrous, thought it no boot to strive against the stream, but spent the residue of his time, which was about fourteen years, privately at Tusculum. Yet his Son-in-law Mamilius Tusculanus, stomaching a-fresh at those old repulses, because Porsenna had made peace with the Romans, and denyed further succour unto the Tarquines, mustered up his Latins, and gave battel to the Romans, at the Lake Regillum; where the conflict was fierce, and the issue uncertain, until Aulus Postumus, the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magistracy greater than Consuls, purposely for this war, when first it was expected) to exasperate his Souldiers courage, threw their own Ensigns amidst the Enemies; and Cossus, or Spurius Cassius, (Master of the Horse men, an assistant Officer to the Dictator) commanded to take off their bridles, that they might run with free violence, to recover again their Ensigns. This fight was so well performed, that a report went of Castor and Pollux, two gods, who came on milk-white Steeds to be eye-witnesses of their valour, and fellow-helpers of their Victory; for the General consecrated a Temple to them, as a stipend for their pains. After this the Romans fierce spirits, having no object of valour abroad, reflected upon themselves at home; and the sixteenth year after the King's expulsion, upon instigation of some desperate bankrouts, thinking themselves wrongfully oppressed by the Senate and Consuls, they made an uproar in the holy Mount; until by Menenius Agrippa, his discreet allusion, of the inconvenience in the Head and Belly's discord, to that present occasion, they were reconciled to the Senate: with condition, that they might have some new Magistrates created, to whom they might appeal in cases of variance, and make them Solicitors in all their controversies, the Consuls authority notwithstanding. This was enacted, and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this attonement among themselves, they had continual War with the Latins, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other neighbouring States. Among these, the Volsci and Æqui held them longest; who made War of themselves upon the Romans: whereby they lost the best City in their whole jurisdiction, Corioli.

In this Conquest, T. Martius got the firname of Coriolanus: a name honourable then, as drawn from a great Victory; although, by reason of the poverty of the Town, a Roman General, in after times, would have been ashamed of that Title. But yet these graces had been no occasion of disparagement, had he not afterwards in a great time of dearth, advised to sell Corn, which they procured from Sicil, at too high a rate, to the people, whereupon Decius Mus, their Tribune, in their behalf, accused him, and after judgement banished him. Coriolanus flying to the Volsci, whom lately before he had vanquished, incensed them to renew their forces again; which being committed unto him, and to Attius Tullus, he prevailed in field, so far forth, that he was come within four or five miles of the City. Incamping there, he made so sharp war, and was at such defiance with his Country, that he would not relent by any supplication of Ambassadors, until his Mother Veturia, and Volumnia his Wife, with a pitiful tune of deprecation, shewing themselves better Subjects to their Country than friends to their Son and Husband, were more available to Rome than was any force of Arms. Hereupon Corolianus dismissing his Army, was after put to death among the Volsci, as a Traitor, for neglecting such opportunity: or (as others surmise) living with them until old age, he died naturally.

Not long after this the Veii in Hetruria, provoked the Romans; against whom the Fabii, three hundred and six in number, all of one Family, intreated and obtained, that they only might be imployed, as it had been in a private quarrel. These Fabii, after some good services, lying incamped at Cremera, were circumvented and all slain: one only of that whole house had been left, by reason of infancy, at home; from whom afterward sprang Fabius Maximus, who vanquished Hannibal.

In process of time, the Romans were also troubled at the Volsci, at the hill of Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minutius their Consul, with his whole Army, had been discomfited, had not L. Quintius Cincinatus chosen Dictator, and taken from the Plow to the highest honour in Rome, with success answerable to his expedition, dispersed his enemies, and freed his Country in the space of sixteen days. In the continuance of this Volscian War, it was that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two years before chosen Governours of the State, and Enactors of Solon's Laws amongst them, procured from Athens (abrogating in the mean while the Consuls, and all other Magistrates) would have ravished Virginia, the daughter of T. Virginius, Captain of a company, and lying then in a Camp at Algidum. Hereupon the people in an uproar took the Hill Aventine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men to resign up their Authority again to new Consuls.

After this, either new quarrels, or desire to revenge old losses, drew the Romans into a new War against the Veientes and their adherents, upon whom, having tried their forces with diversity of Captains, and variety of event, they vanquished the Falisci, and the Fidenates, and utterly subdued the Veientes. In conquering the Falisci, Furius Camillus shewed no less integrity than fortitude. For when a Schoolmaster, by training forth into the Roman Camp, many children of the principal Citizens, thought to betray the Town, yielding them all up as hostages: Camillus delivered this Traitor bound unto his Souldiers, willing them to whip him back into the City; which forthwith yielded unto him in reverence of his Justice. The siege of Veii was ten years, and so troublesome, that the Romans were there first inforced to winter abroad under beasts skins (to which they were the more easily induced, because then first they received pay) and to make vows never to return without Victory.

At length winning the City by a Mine, they got so large spoils, that they consecrated their tenths to Apollo Pythius: and the whole people in general were called to the ransacking of the City. But yet they were no less unthankful to Camillus for his service, than before they had been to Coriolanus; for they banished him the City, upon some occasion of inequality in dividing the spoils: yet he requited their unkindness with a new piece of service against the fury of the Gauls; who being a populous Countrey, and very healthful, the fathers (as sometimes now) lived so long, that the sons, destitute of means, were enforced to rove abroad broad, seeking some place to set up their rest: and withal being a Nation vast in body, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, wandred as Rovers over many Countries. Some of them lighting on Italy, set upon Clusium a Town in Hetruria: whereof Rome having information (and being careful of her Confederate Towns) sent Ambassadours, warning them to desist from such injurious enterprises. But the barbarous people, not regarding the message, upon some injury offered by the Roman Ambassadours, converted their forces from Clusium towards Rome; and giving a great overthrow unto the Romans, by the River Allia, upon the sixteenth day before the Calends of August (which day was after branded for unlucky, and called Alliensis in the Roman Calendar) they hastned towards the City. Then was Rome the true map of misery and desolation. For some leaving the City; some creeping into holes; Priests hiding their reliques; and, every one shifting for himself e're the enemy came, Rome was abandoned as indefensible. The Vestal Virgins, in this tumult, were safely conveyed away; the Ancients of the City, gathering boldness out of desperate fear, did put on their Robes, and taking their leave of the World, did set themselves in Thrones, in their several houses, hourly expecting the messengers of death, and meaning to die, as they had lived, in State. The younger sort, with M. Manlius their Captain, took upon them to make good the Capitol.

By this the Gauls were entred the City, who seeing all quiet, at first suspected some ambush; afterward finding all secure, they fell to the spoil, committing all to the fire and sword. As for the old Senators, they sate in their Majesty with a grave resolution; having first reverenced them as gods, anon they tryed whether they would die like men. When the City was throughly rifled, they attempted the Capitol: which held them work for the space of seven months. Once they were like to have surprised it by night, but being descried by the gaggling of Geese, M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a composition was agreed upon: the Gauls being weary, and the Romans hungry. The bargain was, that the Gauls should take a thousand pound weight in gold. Whilst the gold was in weighing, the Gauls, with open insolency, made their weights too heavy: Brennus their Captain, casting his Sword into the ballance, and with a proud exprobation, saying, that the vanquished must be patient perforce. But in the midst of this cavilling came Furius Camillus with an Army from Ardea, (where he had lived in his banishment) and fell upon the Gauls with such violence, that he dispersed their troops, quenched the fire of the City with their blood, forcing them to restore the spoils with advantage, and forbear the gold, in accepting which they had lately been so nice. Further, having rid the City of them, he so hotly pursued them thorow a great part of Italy, that the remainder of their Army which escaped from him, was very small. Other Armies of the Gauls, which followed this first, had the like ill success. They were often beaten by the Romans; especially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Corvinus (each of which in single fight slew a several Champion of the Gauls) abated their presumption, and restored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable service, was afterwards accounted a second Romulus.

The people, after this destruction of their City, were earnestly bent to go to the Veii to inhabit; but Camillus disswaded them.

About the same time, somewhat before the siege of Veii they changed their government from Consuls to military Tribunes. The government of these also, after some years, was by civil dissention interrupted: so that one while Consuls ruled, another while there was an Anarchy. Then the Tribunes were restored and ruled again, till, after many years expired, the Consular Authority was established, it being enacted, that one of the Consuls should always be a Plebeian. This was after the building of the City 365. years. And now Rome, by suppression of her neighbour Countries, creeping well forward out of her Minority, dares set forth against the warlike Samnites, who dwelt almost one hundred and thirty miles off: situated between Campania and Apulia. These did so strongly invade the Campanians their neighbours, that they forced them to yield themselves subjects to Rome, and undergo any conditions of Tribute, or whatsoever else to obtain protection: which the Romans, although both Countries had been their confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fish, should devour the less, easily allowed of; aiming themselves at the good situation of Campania, the abundance of Corn and Wine, pleasant Cities and Towns, but especially Capua it self, the fairest City then in all Italy.

The families of the Papyrii and Fabii were most imployed in the managing of this War, which endured the space of fifty years. And in this season were the Romans oftentimes dangerously encountred by the Samnites, as when T. Veturius and Sp. Posthumius were Consuls, and discomfited by Pontius at Caudium, with no small ignominy: and when Q. Fabius Gurges lost the field with three thousand men. But for those losses, many great Victories made large amends: The greatest whereof were gotten by L. Papyrius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Samnites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrel. But the force of the Samnites was well broken, e're the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but less warlike Nation) began to stir. So the one and the other of these Countries, became at length, tributary to Rome. In the continuance of this long War it was, (though in time of truce between the Romans and Samnites) that the Latins began to challenge equal freedom in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing office, so that they required to have one of the Consuls yearly chosen out of them.

This demand of the Latins was not unreasonable. For the Romans themselves were a Latin Colony; besides all which, they made offer to change their name, and to be all called Romans. But the Romans were too proud to admit any such capitulation. So a great battel was fought between them: wherein the fortune of Rome prevailed, by the vertue of the Consuls.

Manlius Torquatus and the elder Decius were then Consuls, whom the Soothsayers advertised, that the side should be victorious which lost the General in fight. Hereupon Decius the Consul exposed his life to the enemy, and purchased victory (as was believed) by his death. In which kind of devoting himself for his Army, the son of this Decius being after Consul, did imitate his Father in the Hetrurian War. But (as Tully well notes) it was rather the desperate resolution of these Decii, that purchased victory, by rushing into the midst of the enemies, wherein their Souldiers followed them, than than any great commendation of ſuch a Religion, as required the lives of ſo worthy Citizens, to be ſacrificed for their Country. The diſcipline of Manlius was no leſs reſolute, than the valour of Decius. He forbade any one to forſake his place, and fight ſingle with an enemy. For breach of which order, he cauſed his own ſon to be put to death, who had ſlain a Captain of the Latins, being challenged in ſingle fight.

When the Latins, the Æqui, Volſci, Hernici, Campani, Samnites, and Hetrurians, with ſome other people, were brought under obedience; it was a vain labour for any people of Italy to contend againſt the Romans.

Yet the Sabines adventured to try their fortune, and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus, the Roman Conſul, waſting all their Country with fire and ſword, from the River Nar and Velia, to the Adriatick Sea, brought them into quiet ſubjection.

The laſt of the Italians, that made trial of the Roman arms, were the Tarentines and their adherents. Theſe had interpoſed themſelve as mediators between the Romans and Samnites; with a peremptory denunciation of War, unto that party which ſhould dare to refuſe peace by them tendred. Theſe threats which diſcovered their bad affection unto Rome, ended in words; but when the Samnites were utterly ſubdued, matter enough of quarrel was found to examine their ability of performance.

The Romans complained that certain ſhips of theirs were robbed, and ſent Ambaſſadors unto Tarentum, to require amends. Upon ſome wrong done to theſe Ambaſſadours, was laid the foundation of that War, wherein the Lucans, Meſſapians, Brutians, and Apulians, joyning with the Tarentines, procured the Samnites, and other Subjects of Rome to rebel and take their part. But ſome experience of the Roman ſtrength, taught all theſe people to know their own weakneſs. Wherefore they agreed to ſend for Pyrrhus, by whoſe aid (being a Grecian, as the Tarentines alſo were) great hope was conceived, that the Dominion of Rome ſhould be confined unto more narrow bounds than all Italy, which already in a manner it did overſpread.

SECT. II.

How Pyrrhus warred upon the Romans, and vanquiſhed them in two battels.

Pyrrhus forſaken by the Macedonians, and unable to deal with Lyſimachus, was compelled a while to live in reſt: which he abhorred no leſs than a wiſer Prince would have deſired. He had a ſtrong Army, and a good Fleet, which in that unſettled eſtate of things, was enough to purchaſe a Kingdom: but the fall of Demetrius had ſo increaſed the power of Lyſimachus, that it was no point of wiſdom to make an offenſive War upon him, without far greater forces: Antigonus, the ſon of Demetrius held Corinth at the ſame time, and ſome other Towns, with the remainder of his Father's Army and treaſures, left in his hand. Upon him it is like that Pyrrhus might have won; but it was better to let him alone, that he might ſerve to give ſome hindrance to Lyſimachus.

In this want of employment, and covetous deſire of finding it, the Tarentine Ambaſſadours came very fitly to Pyrrhus: and they came with brave offers, as needing no other aid than his good conduct, which to obtain, they would caſt themſelves under his protection. They had in their company ſome of the Samnites, Lucanians, Meſſapians, and others; which promiſed in behalf of their ſeveral Nations, as much as could be deſired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conqueſts; that he might enlarge his Empire to the Weſt, as far as Alexander had gotten Eaſtward; and ſtill by one victory open the gate unto another. To which effect it is ſaid, that once he anſwered Cyneas his chief Counſellour, asking what he meant to do after every of the victories which he hoped to get: that having won Rome, he would ſoon be Maſter of all Italy; that, after Italy he would quickly get the Iſle of Sicil; that out of Sicil, he would paſs over into Affrick, and win Carthage, with all the reſt of the Countrey; and being ſtrengthned with the force of all theſe Provinces, he would be too hard for any of thoſe that were now ſo proud and troubleſome. But Cyneas enquired yet further, what they ſhould do, when they were Lords of all. Whereunto Pyrrhus (finding his drift) anſwered pleaſantly, that they would live merrily; a thing (as Cyneas then told him) that they preſently might do, without any trouble, if he could be contented with his own.

Nevertheleſs, this Italian Expedition ſeemed unto Pyrrhus a matter of ſuch conſequence, as was not to be omitted, in regard of any ſcholaſtical diſputation. Wherefore he prepared his Army, of almoſt thirty thouſand men, well ſorted, and well trained ſouldiers: part of which he ſent over before him under Cyneas, with the reſt he followed in perſon. At his coming, he found the Tarentines very prompt of tongue, but in matter of execution, utterly careleſs to provide for the War. Wherefore he was fain to ſhut up their Theatre, and other places of pleaſure and reſort, enforcing them to take Arms, and making ſuch a ſtrict muſter, as was to them very unpleaſing, though greatly behooving to their eſtate.

Whilſt he was occupied with theſe cares, Levinus the Roman Conſul drew near, and began to waſte Lucania, a Province confederate with the Tarentines in this War.

The Lucanians were not ready to defend their own Country; the Samnites were careleſs of the harm, that fell not (as yet) upon themſelves; the Tarentines were better prepared than they would have been, but their valour was little: all of theſe had been accuſtomed to ſhrink for fear of the Roman fortitude: and therefore it fell out happily, that Pyrrhus relied more upon his own forces, than the iſſue of their vaunting promiſes. He was now driven either to ſet forward with thoſe that himſelf had brought into Italy, and the aſſiſtance of the Tarentines, wherein little was to be repoſed; or elſe to weaken the reputation of his own ſufficiency, which by all means he was careful to uphold. In good time a great part of his forces, that had been ſcattered by foul weather at Sea, were ſafely come to him: with which he reſolved to aſſay the valour of the Romans, againſt whom he proudly marched.

Levinus the Conſul was not affrighted with the terrible name of a great King; but came on confidently to meet him, and give him battel e're all his adherents ſhould be ready to joyn with him. This boldneſs of the Roman, and the ſlackneſs of the Meſſa-

Messapians, Lucanians, Samnites, and others, whom the danger most concerned, caused Pyrrhus to offer a Treaty of peace: requiring to have the quarrel between the Romans and his Italian friends, referred to his arbitrement. Whether he did this to win time, that the Samnites and their fellows might arrive at his Camp; or whether, considering better at near distance, the weight of the business which he had taken in hand, he were desirous to quit it with his honour; the short answer that was returned to his proposition, gave him no means of either the one or the other: for the Romans sent him this word, that they had neither chosen him their Judge, nor feared him their enemy.

Hereupon both Armies hastned their march unto the River of Siris; Levinus intending to fight before the arrival of the Samnites; Pyrrhus, to hinder him from passing that River, until his own Army were full. Upon the first view of the Roman Camp, it was readily conceived by Pyrrhus, that he had not now to do with barbarous people, but with men well trained in a brave discipline of War: which caused him to set a strong Corps de garde upon the passage of the River, that he might not be compelled to fight, until he saw his best advantage. But he quickly found, that this new enemy was not only skilful in the Art of War, but courageous in execution. For the Roman Army entred the Foord, in face of his Corps de garde; and their horse, at the same time began to pass the River in sundry places: which caused the Greeks to forsake the defence of their bank, and speedily retire unto their Camp.

This audacity forced Pyrrhus to battel; wherewith he thought it best to present them, e're the whole Army had recovered firm footing, and were in order. So directing his Captains how to marshal his battels; himself with the horse charged upon the Romans: who stoutly received him as men well exercised in sustaining furious impressions. In this fight, neither did his courage transport him beyond the duty of a careful General; nor his providence in directing others, hinder the manifestation of his personal valour. It behoved him indeed to do his best; for he never met with better opposers. Once, and shortly after the fight began, his horse was slain under him: afterwards he changed armour with a friend; but that friend paid his life for the use of his King's armour, which was torn from his back. This accident had almost lost him the battel; but he perceiving it, discovered his face, and thereby restored courage to his men, and took from the Romans their vain joy. The fight was obstinate, and with the greater loss (at least of more eminent men) on Pyrrhus his side, as long as only spear and sword were used. But when the Elephants were brought into the wings, whose unusual form and terrible aspect, the horses of the Romans (unaccustomed to the like) were not able to sustain; then was the victory quickly gotten. For the Roman battels, perceiving their horse put to the rout, and driven out of the field; finding also themselves both charged in flank, and overborn, by the force and huge bulk of those strange beasts; gave way to necessity, and saved themselves, as well as they could, by hasty flight: in which consternation, they were so forgetful of their Discipline, that they tarried not to defend their Camp, but ran quite beyond it, leaving both it, and the honour of the day entirely to Pyrrhus.

The fame of this Victory was soon spread over Italy; and the reputation was no less than the fame. For it was a matter very rare to be heard, that a Roman Consul, with a select Army, should lose in plain battel, not only the Field, but the Camp it self, being so notably fortified as they always were. And this honour was the more bravely won by Pyrrhus, for that he had with him none of his Italian friends, save the unwarlike Tarentines. Neither could he well dissemble his content that he took, in having the glory of this action peculiarly his own, at such time as he blamed the Lucans and Samnites, for coming (as we say) a day after the Fair. Nevertheless he wisely considered the strength of the Romans, which was such, as would better endure many such losses, than he could many such victories. Therefore he thought it good to compound with them whilst with his honour he might; and to that purpose he sent unto them Cyneas his Ambassadour, demanding only to have the Tarentines permitted to live at rest, and himself accepted as their especial friend. This did Cyneas, with all his cunning, and with liberal gifts labour to effect: but neither man nor woman could be found in Rome, that would take any bribe of him; neither did their desire of recovering their Captives, or their danger, by the rising of many States in Italy against them, so incline them to peace, as the vehement exhortation of Appius Claudius, an old and blind Senator, did stir them up to make good their honour by War. So they returned answer, that whilst Pyrrhus abode in Italy, they would come to no agreement with him.

Such was the report that Cyneas made at his return, of the Roman puissance and vertue, as kindled in Pyrrhus a great desire of confederacy with that gallant City. Hereupon many kind Offices passed between them: but still when he urged his motion of peace, the answer was; He must first depart out of Italy, and then treat of peace.

In the mean season, each part made provision for War; the Romans levying a more mighty Army than the former; and Pyrrhus being strengthned with access unto his forces of all the East parts of Italy. So they came to the trial of a second battel, wherein (though after long and cruel fight) the boisterous violence of the Elephants gave to Pyrrhus a second victory. But this was not altogether so joyful as the former had been: rather it gave him cause to say, that such another Victory would be his utter undoing. For he had lost the flower of his Army in this battel: and though he drave the Romans into their Camp, yet he could not force them out of it, nor saw any likelihood in prevailing against them, that were like to be relieved with daily supplies, whilst he should be driven to spend upon his old stock. Neither could he expect that his Elephants should always stand him in stead. A little knowledge of their manner in fight would soon teach the Romans, that were apt Scholars in such learning, how to make them unserviceable. Wherefore he desired nothing more, than how to carry his honour safe out of Italy: which to do (seeing the Romans would not help him, by offering or accepting any fair conditions of peace, or of truce) he took a slight occasion, presented by fortune, that followeth to be related.

SECT. III.

The great troubles in Macedon and Sicil. How Pyrrhus, being invited into Sicil, forsook Italy, wan the most of the Isle, and lost it in short space. Pyrrhus returns into Italy, where he is beaten by the Romans, and so goes back to his own Kingdom.

WHen Ptolomy Ceraunus had traiterously murthered his Benefactor and Patron Seleucus, he presently seized upon all the Dominions of Lysimachus in Europe, as if they had been the due reward unto him, that had slain the Conquerour. The houses of Cassander and Lysimachus were then fallen to the ground: neither was there in Macedon any man of strength and reputation enough to advance himself against Ceraunus. The friends of Lysimachus were rather pleased to have him their King, that had (as he professed) revenged their Lord's death; than any way offended with the odiousness of his fact, by which they were freed from subjection, to one, against whom they had stood in opposition. Many there were, that upon remembrance of his Father's great virtue gathered hope of finding the like in Ceraunus: perswading themselves that his reign might prove good, though his entrance had been wicked. These affections of the Macedonians did serve to defeat Antigonus the son of Demetrius, that made an attempt upon the Kingdom. As for Antiochus the son of Seleucus, he was far off, and might be questioned about some part of Asia, e're he should be able to bring an Army near unto Europe. Yet he made great shew of meaning to revenge his Father's death: but being stronger in money than in Arms, he was content, after a while, to take fair words, and make peace with the murtherer. While these three strove about the Kingdom, Pyrrhus who thought his claim as good as any of theirs, made use of their dissention: threatning War, or promising his assistance to every one of them. By these means he strengthned himself, and greatly advantaged his Italian Voyage, which he had then in hand: requesting money of Antiochus, ships of Antigonus, and Souldiers of Ptolomy, who gave him his daughter in marriage, and lent him a strong power of Macedonian Souldiers, and of Elephants (covenanting to have them restored at two years end) more for fear than for love: that so he might free himself from trouble, and quietly enjoy his Kingdom.

Thus Ptolomy grew mighty on the sudden; and the power that by wicked means he had gotten, by means as wicked he encreased.

All Macedon and Thrace being his, the strong City of Cassandria was held by Arsinoe his sister, the Widow of Lysimachus, who lay therein with her young children. Her he circumvented by making love to her, and (according to the fashion of those times, wherein Princes regarded no degree of consanguinity) taking her to Wife, with promise to adopt her children: a promise that he meant not to perform; for it was not long, e're he slew them, and drave her into exile.

In the pride of this good success, which his villany found, vengeance came upon him from a far, by the fury of a Nation that he never heard of. Belgius a Captain of the Gauls having forced his passage through many Countries, unto the confines of Macedon, sent a proud message to Ceraunus, commanding him to buy peace with money, or otherwise, to look for all the miseries of War. These Gauls were the race of those, that issued out of their Countrey, to seek new seats in that great expedition, wherein Brennus took and burnt the City of Rome. They had divided themselves, at their setting forth, into two companies; of which the one fell upon Italy; the other, passing through the Countries that lie on the Northern side of the Adriatick Sea, made long abode in Pannonia, and the Regions adjoyning, where they forced all the Neighbour Princes to redeem peace with tribute, as now they would have compelled Ceraunus to do: unto whose borders they came about an hundred and eight years after such time as their fellows had taken Rome.

When their Ambassadours came to Ptolomy, asking what he would give: his answer was, that he would be contented to give them peace, but it must be with condition, that they should put into his hands their Princes as Hostages, and yield up their arms; otherwise he would neither pardon their boldness, nor give any credit to their words. At this answer, when it was returned, the Gauls did laugh; saying, That they would soon confute with deeds, the vanity of such proud words. It may seem strange, that he, who had given away part of his Army unto Pyrrhus, for very fear; should be so confident in undertaking more mighty enemies. The King of the Dardanians offered to lend him twenty thousand men against the Gauls: but he scorned the offer; saying, That he had the children of those, which under the conduct of Alexander had subdued all the East. Thus he issued forth against all the barbarous people with his famous Macedonians, as if the Victory must needs have followed the reputation of a great Name. But he soon found his great errour when it was too late. For the enemies were not only equal in strength of body, and fiercenes of courage, but so far superiour to the Macedonians in number, that few or none escaped their fury. Ptolomy himself grievously wounded, fell into their hands, whilst the battel continued; and they presently strook off his head, which they shewed to his men on the top of a Lance, to their utter astonishment.

The report of this great overthrow filled all Macedon with such desperation, that the people fled into walled Towns, and abandoned the whole Countrey as lost. Only Sosthenes a valiant Captain, animating as many as he could, gathered a small Army, with which he many times got the upper hand, and hindred Belgius from using the Victory at his whole pleasure. In regard of this his virtue, the Souldiers would have made him King; which title he refused, and was contented with the name of a General. But (as mischiefs do seldom come alone) the good success of Belgius drew into Macedon, Brennus another Captain of the Gauls, with an hundred and fifty thousand foot, and fifteen thousand horse; against which mighty Army, when Sosthenes with his weak troops made opposition, he was easily beaten, and the Macedonians again compelled to hide themselves within their walls, leaving all their Countrey to the spoil of the Barbarians.

Thus were the Macedonians destitute of a King, and trodden down by a Nation that they had not heard of, in less than fifty years after the death of Alexander, who sought to discover and subdue unknown Countries, as if all Greece, and the Empire of Persia had been too little for a King of Macedon.

Very

Very ſeaſonably had theſe news been carried to Pyrrhus in Italy, who ſought a fair pretext of relinquiſhing his War with the Romans; had not other tydings out of Sicil diſtracted him, and carried him away in purſuit of nearer hopes. For after the death of Agathocles, who reigned over the whole Iſland, the Carthaginians ſent an Army to conquer Sicil, out of which, by him, they had, been expelled. This Army did ſo faſt prevail, that the Sicilians had no other hope to avoid ſlavery, than in ſubmitting themſelves to the rule of Pyrrhus; whom, being a Grecian, and a noble Prince, they thought it more for their good to obey, than to live under the well known heavy yoke of Carthage. To him therefore the Syracuſans, Leontines, and Agragentines, principal Eſtates of the Iſle, ſent Ambaſſadours, earneſtly deſiring him to take them into his protection.

It grieved Pyrrhus exceedingly, that two ſuch notable occaſions of enlarging his Dominions ſhould fall out ſo unluckily, both at one time. Yet whether he thought the buſineſs of Sicil more important, or more full of likelihood; or whether perhaps he believed (as came after to paſs) that his advantage upon Macedon would not ſo haſtily paſs away, but that he might find ſome occaſion to lay hold on it at better leiſure; over into Sicil he tranſported his Army, leaving the Tarentines to ſhift for themſelves; yet not leaving them free as he found them, but with a Garriſon in their Town to hold them in ſubjection.

As his departure out of Italy was rather grounded on head-long paſſion, than mature advice; ſo were his actions following, until his return into Epirus, rather many and tumultuous, than well-ordered, or note-worthy. The Army which he carried into that Iſle, conſiſted of thirty thouſand foot, and two thouſand five hundred horſe: with which, ſoon after his deſcent into Sicil, he forc't the Carthaginians out of all, in effect, that they had therein. He alſo won the ſtrong City of Eryx, and having beaten the Mamertines in battel, he began to change condition, and turn Tyrant. For he drave Soſtratus (to whom this cruelty was ſuſpected) out of the Iſland, and put Thenon of Syracuſe to death, being jealous of his greatneſs; which two perſons had faithfully ſerved him, and delivered the great and rich City of Syracuſe into his hands. After this, his fortunes declined ſo faſt, as he ſerved himſelf, and ſalved the diſ-reputation of his leaving Sicil, by an Embaſſage ſent him from the Tarentines and Samnites, imploring his preſent help againſt the Romans, who ſince his leaving Italy, had well-near diſpoſſeſt them of all that they had.

Taking this fair occaſion, he embarked for Italy; but was firſt beaten by the Carthaginian Gallies in his paſſage, and ſecondly aſſailed in Italy it ſelf, by eighteen hundred Mamertines, that attended him in the ſtraits of the Country. Laſtly, after he had recovered Tarentum, he fought a third battel with the Romans, led by M. Curius, who was victorious over him, and forc't him out of Italy into his own Epirus.

A Prince he was far more valiant than conſtant; and had he been but a General of an Army for ſome other great King or State, and had been directed to have conquered any one Country or Kingdom, it is to be thought, that he would have purchaſed no leſs honour than any man of War, either preceding or ſucceeding him; for a greater Captain, or a valianter man, hath been no where found. But he never ſtayed upon any enterpriſe; which was indeed, the diſeaſe he had, whereof not long after he died in Argos.

SECT. IV.

How Antigonus, the Son of Demetrius, delivered Macedon from the Gauls. How Pyrrhus won the Kingdom of Macedon from Antigonus.

THE vertue of Soſthenes, being too weak to defend the Kingdom of Macedon; and the fortune which had accompanied him againſt Belgius, failing him in his attempts againſt Brennus: the Macedonians were no leſs glad to ſubmit themſelves unto the government of Antigonus, than they had been formerly deſirous to free themſelves from the impotent rule of his Father Demetrius. His coming into the Country with an Army, Navy, and Treaſure beſeeming a King, did rather breed good hope in the people, than fill them with much confidence: for he was driven to uſe againſt the Barbarians, only thoſe forces which he brought with him, having none other than good wiſhes of the Macedons to take his part. Brennus with the main ſtrength of his Army, was gone to ſpoil the Temple of Apollo at Delphos, having left no more behind him, than he thought neceſſary to guard the borders of Macedon and Pannonia; which were about fifteen thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe. Theſe could not be idle, but thought to get ſomewhat for themſelves, in the abſence of their fellows: and therefore ſent unto Antigonus, offering to ſell him peace, if he would pay well for it; which by the example of Ceraunus he had learnt (as they thought) not to refuſe. Antigonus was unwilling to weaken his reputation by condeſcending to their proud demands: yet he judged it unfit to exaſperate their furious choler, by uncourteous words or uſage, as Ceraunus had overfondly done. Wherefore he entertained their Ambaſſadours in very loving and ſumptuous manner, with a royal feaſt: wherein he expoſed to their view ſuch abundance of maſſie gold and ſilver, that they were not ſo much delighted with the meat, as with ſight of the veſſels, wherein it was ſerved. He thought hereby to make them underſtand how great a Prince he was, and how able if need required, to wage a mighty Army.

To which end, he likewiſe did ſhew unto them his Camp and Navy, but eſpecially his Elephants. But all this bravery ſerved only to kindle their greedy appetites; who ſeeing his ſhips heavy loaden, his Camp full of wealth, and ill fortified, himſelf (as it ſeemed) ſecure, and his men; both in ſtrength and courage, inferiour unto the Gauls, thought all time loſt wherein they ſuffered the preſent poſſeſſors to ſpend the riches which they accounted aſſuredly their own. They returned therefore to their companions with none other news in their mouths, than of ſpoil and purchaſe: which tale carried the Gauls head-long to Antigonus his Camp, where they expected a greater booty, than the victory over Ceraunus had given to Belgius. Their coming was terrible and ſudden; yet not ſo ſudden but that Antigonus had notice of it, who diſtruſting the courage of his own men, diſlodged ſomewhat before their arrival, and conveyed himſelf with his whole Army and Carriage, into certain woods adjoyning, where he lay cloſe.

The Gauls, finding his Camp forsaken, were not hasty to pursue him, but fell to ransacking the empty Cabbins of the Souldiers; in hope of finding all that was either lost or hidden. At length, when they had searched every place in vain, angry at their lost labour, they marched with all speed towards the Sea-side; that they might fall upon him, whilst he was busie in getting his men and Carriages a ship-board. But the success was no way answerable to their expectation. For being proud of the terrour which they had brought upon Antigonus, they were so careless of the Seamen, that without all order, they fell to the spoil of what they found on the shore, and in such ships as lay on ground.

Part of the Army had left Antigonus where he lay in covert; and had saved it self by getting aboard the Fleet: in which number were some well-experienced men of War: who discovering the much advantage offered unto them, by the desperate presumption of their enemies, took courage, and encouraged others to lay manly hold upon the opportunity. So the whole number, both of Souldiers and Mariners, landing together, with great resolution, gave so brave a charge upon the disordered Gauls, that their contemptuous boldness was thereby changed into sudden fear, and they, after a great slaughter, driven to cast themselves into the service of Antigonus.

The fame of this Victory caused all the barbarous Nations in those quarters, to re-entertain their ancient belief of the Macedonian valour: by which the terrible and resistless oppressors of so many Countries were overthrown.

To speak more of the Gauls in this place, and to shew how about these times, three Tribes of them passed over into Asia the less, with their Wars and Conquests there; I hold it needless: the victorious Armies of the Romans taming them hereafter in the Countries which now they wan, shall give better occasion to rehearse these matters briefly.

Howsoever the success of Antigonus got him reputation among the barbarous people; yet his own Souldiers, that without his leading had won this Victory, could not thereupon be perswaded to think him a good man of War: knowing that he had no interest in the honour of the service, wherein his conduct was no better than creeping into a Wood.

This (as presently will appear) was greatly helpful unto Pyrrhus: though as yet he knew not so much. For Pyrrhus, when his affairs in Italy stood upon hard terms, had sent unto Antigonus for help: not without threats in case it were denyed. So was he sure to get either a supply, wherewith to continue his War against the Romans; or some seeming honourable pretence, to forsake Italy under colour of making his word good, in seeking revenge. The threats which he had used in bravery, meer necessity forced him at his return into Epirus to put in practice.

He brought home with him eight thousand foot, and five hundred horse: an Army too little to be employed by his restless nature, in any action of importance; yet greater than he had means to keep in pay. Therefore he fell upon Macedon; intending to take what spoil he could get, and make Antigonus compound with him, to be freed from trouble. At his first entrance into this business, two thousand of Antigonus his Souldiers revolted unto Pyrrhus; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, received him. Such fair beginnings easily perswaded the courage of this daring Prince to set upon Antigonus himself, and to hazard his fortune in trial of a battel, for the whole Kingdom of Macedon.

It appears, that Antigonus had no desire to fight with this hot Warriour; but thought it the wisest way, by protracting of time, to weary him out of the Countrey. For Pyrrhus overtook him in a strait passage, and charged him in the rear; wherein were the Gauls and the Elephants, which were thought the best of his strength; a manifest proof that he was in retreat. The Gauls very bravely sustained Pyrrhus his impression; yet were broken at length (when most of them were slain) after a sharp fight: wherein it seems that Antigonus keeping his Macedonian Phalanx within the strait, and not advancing to their succour, took away their courage, by deceiving their expectation. The Captains of the Elephants were taken soon after; who finding themselves exposed to the same violence that had consumed so many of the Gauls, yielded themselves and the beasts. All this was done in full view of Antigonus and his Macedonians, to their great discomfort; which emboldned Pyrrhus to charge them where they lay in their strength. Where the Phalanx could be charged only in a front, it was matter of extreme difficulty (if not impossible) to force it. But the Macedonians had seen so much, that they had no desire to fight against Pyrrhus; who discovered so well their affections, that he adventured to draw near in person, and exhort them to yield. Neither the common Souldiers, nor any Leader refused to become his followers. All forsook Antigonus, a few horsemen excepted, that fled along with him to Thessalonica; where he had some small forces left; and money enough to entertain a greater power, had he known where to levy it. But whilst he was thinking how to allure a sufficient number of the Gauls into his service; whereby he might repair his loss: Ptolomy, the Son of Pyrrhus, came upon him, and easily defeating his weak forces, drave him to flee from the parts about Macedon, to those Towns afar off in Peloponnesus, in which he had formerly lurked, before such time as he looked abroad into the World, and made himself a King.

This good success revived the spirits of the Epirot, and caused him to forget all sorrow of his late misfortunes in the Roman War: so that he sent for his Son Helenus (whom he had left with a Garrison, in the Castle of Tarentum) willing him to come over into Greece, where was more matter of conquest, and let the Italians shift for themselves.

SECT. V.

How Pyrrhus assailed Sparta without success. His enterprise upon Argos, and his death.

Pyrrhus had now conceived a great hope that nothing should be able to withstand him; seeing that in open fight he had vanquished the Gauls, and beaten Antigonus, and won the Kingdom of Macedon. There was not in all Greece, nor indeed, in all the Lands that Alexander had won, any Leader of such name and worth, as deserved to be set up against him: which filled him with the opinion that he might do what he pleased

sed. He raised therefore an Army, consisting of five and twenty thousand foot, two thousand horse, and four and twenty Elephants; pretending War against Antigonus, and the giving liberty to those Towns in Peloponnesus, which the same Antigonus held in subjection; though it was easily discovered, that such great preparations were made, for accomplishment of some design more important than War against a Prince already vanquished, and almost utterly dejected. Especially the Lacedemonians feared this expedition, as made against their State. For Cleonymus, one of their Kings being expelled out of his Country, had betaken himself to Pyrrhus: who readily entertained him, and promised to restore him to his Kingdom. This promise was made in secret; neither would Pyrrhus make shew of any displeasure that he bare unto Sparta; but contrariwise professed, that it was his intent, to have two of his own younger Sons trained up in that City, as in a place of noble discipline. With such colours he deluded men, even till he entred upon Laconia; where presently he demeaned himself as an open enemy; excusing himself and his former dissembling words with a jest; That he followed herein the Lacedemonian custom, of concealing what was truly purposed. It had been, indeed, the manner of the Lacedemonians, to deal in like sort with others, whom in the time of their greatness, they sought to oppress: but now they complained of that, as falshood in Pyrrhus, which they always practised in wisdom, till it made them distrusted, forsaken, and almost contemptible. Nevertheless, they were not wanting to themselves in this dangerous extremity. For the old Men and Women laboured in fortifying the Town; causing such as could bear arms to reserve themselves fresh against the assault: which Pyrrhus had unwisely deferred, upon assurance of prevailing.

Sparta, was never fortified before this time, otherwise than with armed Citizens: soon after this (it being built upon uneven ground, and, for the most part, hard to approach) the lower and more accessible places, were fenced with Walls, at the present only trenches were cast, and barricadoes made with Carts, where the entrance seemed most easie. Three days together it was assailed by Pyrrhus exceeding fiercely; and no less stoutly defended. The desperate courage of the Citizens preserved the Town the first day; whereinto the violence of Pyrrhus had forced entrance the second day, but that his wounded horse threw him to the ground, which made his Souldiers more mindful of saving the person of their King, than of breaking into the City, though already they had torn in sunder the Barricadoes. Presently after this, one of Antigonus his Captains got into Sparta, with a good strength of men; and Areus the King returned out of Crete (where he had been helping his friends in War) with two thousand men, little knowing the danger, in which his own Country stood, until he was almost at home. These succours did not more animate the Spartans, than kindle in Pyrrhus a desire to prevail against all impediments. But the third days work shewed how great his errour had been, in forbearing to assault the Town at his first coming. For he was so manfully repelled, that he saw no likelihood of getting the place, otherwise than by a long siege: in which tedious course he had no desire to spend his time.

Antigonus had now raised an Army; though not strong enough to meet the Enemy in plain field, yet able to hinder all his purposes. This made Pyrrhus doubtful what way to take; being diversly affected, by the difficulty of his enterprise in hand, and the shame of taking a repulse in his first attempt. Whilst he was thus perplexed, letters came from Argos, inviting him thither; with promise to deliver that City into his hands.

Civil Dissention raging then lately in Argos, caused the heads of several Factions to call in Pyrrhus and Antigonus; but the coming of these two Princes taught the Citizens wit, and made them desirous to rid their hands of such powerful assistants, as each of the two Kings pretended himself to be. Antigonus told the Argives, that he came to save them from the tyranny of Pyrrhus: and that he would be gone, if they needed not his help. On the other side, Pyrrhus would needs perswade them, that he had none other errand, than to make them safe from Antigonus; offering in like manner, to depart, if they so desired.

The Argives took small pleasure in hearing the Fox and Kite at strife, which of them should keep the Chickens from his enemy: and therefore prayed them both to divert their power some other way. Hereunto Antigonus readily condescended, and gave Hostages to assure his word: for he was the weaker, and stood in need of good will. But Pyrrhus thought it enough to promise: Hostages he would give none to his inferiours, especially meaning deceit. This made them suspect his purpose to be, such as indeed it was. Yet he less regarded their opinions, than to hold them worthy of assurance, by giving such a bond as he intended to break e're the next morning.

It was concluded, that a Gate of the City should be opened by night unto Pyrrhus, by his Complices within Argos: which was accordingly performed. So his Army without any tumult entred the City: till the Elephants with Towers on their backs, cloyed the way, being too high to pass the Gate. The taking off, and setting on again of those Towers, with the trouble thereto belonging, did both give alarm to the City, and some leisure to take order for defence, before so many were entred as could fully master it. Argos was full of ditches, which greatly hindred the Gauls (that had the Vant guard) being ignorant of the ways in the dark night. The Citizens, on the other side, had much advantage, by their knowledge of every by passage: and setting upon the enemies on all sides, did put them to great loss and more trouble.

Pyrrhus therefore understanding by the confused noise, and unequal shoutings of his own men, that they were in distress, entred the City in person, to take order for their relief, and assurance of the place. But the darkness, the throng and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, until break of day. Then began he to make his passage by force, and so far prevailed, that he got into the Market-place. It is said, that seeing in that place the Image of a Wolf and a Bull, in such posture as if they had been combatant, he called to mind an Oracle, which threatned him with death, when he should behold a Bull fighting with a Wolf: and that hereupon he made retreat.

Indeed, the coming of Antigonus to the rescue, the disorder and confusion of his own men, with divers ill accidents, gave him reasonable cause to have retired out of the City, though the Wolf and Bull had been away. The tumult was such, that no directions could be heard; but as some gave back, so did others thrust forward, and the Ar- gives preſſing hard upon him, forced Pyrrhus to make good his retreat with his own ſword. The tops of the houſes were covered with Women, that ſtood looking on the fight. Among theſe was one, that ſaw her own Son in dangerous caſe fighting with Pyrrhus. Wherefore ſhe took a tile-ſtone, or ſlate, and threw it ſo violently down on the head of Pyrrhus, that he fell to the ground aſtoniſhed with the blow; and lying in that caſe, had his head cut off.

Thus ended the reſtleſs ambition of Pyrrhus, together with his life: and thus returned the Kingdom of Macedon to Antigonus; who forthwith poſſeſſed the Army, the body, and the children of his Enemy. The body of Pyrrhus had honourable burial, and was given by Antigonus unto Helenus his Son; which young Prince he graciouſly ſent home into his Father's Kingdom of Epirus. From this time forwards, the race of Antigonus held the Kingdom of Macedon; the poſterity of Seleucus, reigned over Aſia and Syria; and the houſe of Ptolomy had quiet poſſeſſion of Egypt: until ſuch time as the City of Rome, ſwallowing all up, digeſted theſe, among other Countries, into the body of her own Empire.

FIRST PART OF THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD.

Intreating of the Times from the ſettled Rule of Alexanders Succeſſors in the Eaſt, until the Romans, prevailing over all, made Conqueſt of Aſia and Macedon.

THE FIFTH BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of the firſt Punick War.

SECT. I.

A diſcuſſion of that Probleme of Livie; Whether the Romans could have reſiſted the Great Alexander. That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman Souldier, was of equal valour to the Engliſh.

HAT Queſtion handled by Livie, Whether the Great Alexander could have prevailed againſt the Romans, if after his Eaſtern Conqueſt, he had bent all his Forces againſt them, hath been, and is the ſubject of much diſpute; which (as it ſeems to me) the arguments on both ſides do not ſo well explain, as doth the experience that Pyrrhus hath given of the Roman power in his dayes. For if he, a Commander (in Hannibal's judgment) inferiour to Alexander, though to none elſe, could with a ſmall ſtrength of men and little ſtore of money, or of other needful helps in War, vanquiſh them in two Battels, and endanger their Eſtate, when it was well ſettled, and held the beſt part of Italy under a confirmed obedience: what would Alexander have done, that was abundantly provided of all which is needful to a Conquerour, wanting only matter of employment, coming upon them before their Dominion was half ſo well ſettled? It is eaſie to ſay, that Alexander had no more then thirty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe (as indeed, at his firſt paſſage into Aſia, he carried over not many more) and that the reſt of his followers were no better than baſe effeminate Aſiatiques. But he that conſiders the Armies of Perdiccas, Antipater, Craterus, Eumenes, Ptolomy, Antigonus and Lyſimachus, with the actions by them performed, every one of which (to omit others) commanded only ſome fragment of this dead Emperours power, ſhall eaſily find that ſuch a reckoning is far ſhort of the truth.

It were needleſs to ſpeak of Treaſure, Horſes, Elephants, Engines of Battery, and the like: of all which the Macedonian had abundance; the Roman having nought, ſave men and arms. As for Sea-forces; he that ſhall conſider after what ſort the Romans, in their firſt Punick War, were trained in the rudiments of Navigation; ſitting upon the ſhoar, and beating the ſand with poles, to practiſe the ſtroak of the Oar, as not daring to lanch their ill-built veſſels into the Sea; will eaſily conceive how far too weak they would have proved in ſuch ſervices.

Now for helpers in War; I do not ſee why all Greece and Macedon, being abſolutely commanded by Alexander, might not well deſerve to be laid in ballance againſt thoſe parts of Italy, which the Romans held in ill-aſſured ſubjection. To omit therefore all benefit that the Eaſtern World, more wealthy, indeed, than valiant, could have afforded unto the Macedonian: Let us only conjecture, how the States of Sicil and Carthage, neareſt neighbours to ſuch a quarrel (had it hapned) would have ſtood affected. The Sicilians were for the moſt part Grecians; neither is it to be doubted, that they would readily have ſubmitted themſelves unto him that ruled all Greece beſides them. In what terms they commonly ſtood, and how ill they were able to defend themſelves, it ſhall appear anon. Sure it is, that Alexanders coming into thoſe parts, would have brought exceſſive joy to them that were fain to get the help of Pyrrhus, by offering to become his ſubjects. As for the Carthaginians, if Agathocles the Tyrant of Syracuſe, hated of his people, and ill able to defend his own beſieged City, could by adventuring to ſail into Africk, put their Dominion, yea, and Carthage it ſelf, in extream hazard; ſhall we think that they would have been able to withſtand Alexander? But why do I queſtion their ability, ſeeing that they ſent Embaſſadours, with their ſubmiſſion, as far as Babylon, ere the War drew near them? Wherefore it is manifeſt, that the Romans muſt, without other ſuccour, than perhaps of ſome other few Italian friends (of which yet there were none that forſook them not, at ſome time, both before and after this) have oppoſed their valour and good military diſcipline, againſt the power of all Countreys to them known, if they would have made reſiſtance. How they could have ſped well, in undertaking ſuch a match; it is uneaſie to find in diſcourſe of humane reaſon. It is true, that vertue and fortune works wonders; but it is againſt cowardly fools, and the unfortunate: for whoſoever contends with one too mighty for him, either muſt excel in theſe, as much as his enemy goes beyond him in power; or elſe muſt look both to be overcome, and to be caſt down ſo much the lower, by how much the opinion of his fortune and vertue renders him ſuſpected, as likely to make head another time againſt the vanquiſher. Whether the Roman or the Macedonian were in thoſe dayes the better Souldier, I will not take upon me to determine: though I might without partiality, deliver mine own opinion, and prefer that Army, which followed not only Philip and Alexander, but alſo Alexanders Princes after him, in the greateſt dangers of all ſorts of War, before any, that Rome either had, or in long time after did ſend forth. Concerning fortune, who can give a rule that ſhall alwayes hold? Alexander was victorious in every Battel that he fought: and the Romans in the iſſue of every War. But foraſmuch as Livie hath judged this a matter worthy of conſideration; I think it a great part of Romes good fortune, that Alexander came not into Italy: where in three years after his death, the two Roman Conſuls, together with all the powers of that State, were ſurprized by the Samnites, and enforced to yield up their arms. We may therefore permit Livie to admire his own Romans, and to compare with Alexander thoſe Captains of theirs, which were honoured ſufficiently, in being thought equal to his followers: that the ſame conceit ſhould blind our judgment, we cannot permit without much vanity.

Now in deciding ſuch a controverſie, me-thinks it were not amiſs, for an Engliſh-man, to give ſuch a ſentence between the Macedonians and Romans, as the Romans once did (being choſen Arbitrators) between the Ardeates and Aricini; that ſtrove about a peice of Land; ſaying, that it belonged unto neither of them, but unto the Romans themſelves.

If therefore it be demanded, whether the Macedonian, or the Roman were the beſt Warriour? I will anſwer, The Engliſh-man. For it will ſoon appear to any that ſhall examine the noble acts of our Nations in War, that they were performed by no advantage of weapon; againſt no ſavage or unmanly people; the enemy being far ſuperiour unto us in number, and all needful proviſions, yea, as well trained as we, or commonly better, in the exerciſe of War.

In what ſort Philip wan his Dominion in Greece; what manner of men the Perſians and Indians were, whom Alexander vanquiſhed; as likewiſe of what force the Macedonian Phalanx was, and how well appointed, againſt ſuch arms as it commonly encountred: any man, that hath taken pains to read the foregoing ſtory of them, doth ſufficiently underſtand. Yet was this Phalanx never, or very ſeldom, able to ſtand againſt the Roman Armies; which were embattelled in ſo excellent a form, as I know not whether any Nation beſides them have uſed, either before or ſince. The Roman weapons likewiſe, both offenſive and defenſive, were of greater uſe than thoſe with which any other Nation hath ſerved, before the fiery inſtruments of Gunpowder were known. As for the enemies with which Rome had to do, we find, that they which did over-match him in numbers, were as far overmatched by her in weapons; and that they, of whom ſhe had little advantage in arms, had as little advantage of her in multitude. This alſo (as Plutarch well obſerveth) was a part of her happineſs; that ſhe was never over-laid with two great Wars at once.

Hereby it came to paſs, that having at firſt increaſed her ſtrength by acceſſion of the Sabines; having won the State of Alba, againſt which ſhe adventured her own ſelf, as it were in wager, upon the heads of three Champions: and having thereby made her ſelf Princeſs of Latium, ſhe did afterwards by long War, in many ages, extend her Dominion over all Italy. The Carthaginians had well-near oppreſſed her: but her Souldiers were Mercenary; ſo that for want of proper ſtrength, they were eaſily beaten at their own doors. The Ætolians, and, with them, all, or the moſt of Greece, aſſiſted her againſt Philip the Macedonian: he being beaten, did lend her his help to beat the ſame Ætolians. The Wars againſt Antiochus, and other Aſiatiques, were ſuch as gave to Rome ſmall cauſe of boaſt, though much of joy: for thoſe oppoſites were as baſe of courage, as the lands which they held were abundant of riches. Sicil, Spain, and all Greece, fell into her hands, by uſing her aid to protect them againſt the Carthaginians and Macedonians.

I ſhall not need to ſpeak of her other conqueſts: it was eaſie to get more when ſhe had gotten all this. It is not my purpoſe to diſgrace the Roman valour (which was very noble) or to blemiſh the reputation of ſo many famous victories: I am not ſo idle. This I ſay; That among all their Wars, I find not any, wherein their valour hath appeared comparable to the Engliſh. If my judgment ſeem over-partial, our Wars in France may help to make it good.

Firſt therefore it is well known, that Rome (or perhaps all the world beſides) had never any ſo brave a Commander in War as Julius Cæſar: and that no Roman Army was comparable unto that which ſerved under the ſame Cæſar. Likewiſe, it is apparent, that this gallant Army, which had given fair proof of the Roman courage, in good performance of the Helvetian War, when it firſt entred into Gaule; was nevertheleſs utterly diſheartned, when Cæſar led it againſt the Germans. So that we may juſtly impute all that was extraordinary in the valour of Cæſars men, to their long exerciſe, under ſo good a Leader, in ſo great a War. Now let us in general compare with the deeds done by theſe beſt of Roman Souldiers, in their principal ſervice; the things performed in the ſame Country, by our common Engliſh Souldiers, levied in haſte, from following the Cart, or ſitting on the ſhop-ſtall: ſo so shall we see the difference. Herein will we deal fairly, and believing Cæsar in relating the acts of the Romans: But will call the French Historians to witness, what actions were performed by the English. In Cæsars time France was inhabited by the Gaules, a stout people, but inferiour to the French, by whom they were subdued; even when the Romans gave them assistance. The Country of Gaule was rent in sunder (as Cæsar witnesseth) into many Lordships: Some of which were governed by petty Kings, others by the multitude, none ordered in such sort as might make it appliable to the neareſt Neighbour. The factions were many, and violent: Not only in general through the whole Country, but between the petty States, yea in every City, and almost in every house. What greater advantage could a Conqueroure desire? Yet there was a greater. Arioviſtus, with his Germans, had over-run the Country, and held much part of it in subjection, little different from meer slavery: Yea, so often had the Germans prevailed in War upon the Gaules, that the Gaules (who had sometimes been the better Souldiers) did hold themselves no way equal to those daily Invaders. Had France been so prepared unto our English Kings, Rome it self by this time, and long ere this time, would have been ours. But when King Edward the third began his War upon France, he found the whole Country setled in obedience to one mighty King; a King whose reputation abroad, was no less than his puissance at home; under whose enſign, the King of Bohemia did serve in person; at whose call the Genowayes, and other Neighbour States, were ready to take arms; finally, a King unto whom one (a) Prince gave away his Dominion, for love; (b) another sold away a goodly City and Territory for money. The Country lying so open to the Romans and being so well fenced against the English; it is note-worthy, not who prevailed most therein (for it were vanity to match the English purchases with the Roman conquest) but whether of the two gave the greater proof of military vertue. Cæsar himself doth witness, that the Gaules complained of their own ignorance in the Art of War, and that their own hardiness was overmastred by the skill of their enemies. Poor men, they admired the Roman Towers, and Engines of Battery, raised and planted against their Walls, as more than humane works. What greater wonder is it, that such a people was beaten by the Romans, than that the Caribes, a naked people, but valiant, as any under the Sky, are commonly put to the worse by small numbers of Spaniards? Besides all this, we are to have regard of the great difficulty that was found, in drawing all the Gaules, or any great part of them, to one head, that with joynt forces they might oppose their assailants: As also the much more difficulty of holding them long together. For hereby it came to pass, that they were never able to make use of opportunity: But sometimes compelled to stay for their fellows; and sometimes driven to give or take Battel upon extream disadvantages, for fear least their Companies should fall asunder: As indeed, upon any little disaster, they were ready to break, and return every one to the defence of his own. All this, and (which was little less than all this) great odds in weapon gave to the Romans the honour of many gallant Victories. What such help? Or what other worldly help, than the golden mettle of their Souldiers, had our English Kings against the French? Were not the French as well experienced in feats of War? Yea, did they not think themselves therein our superiors? Were they not in Arms, in Horse, and in all Provisions, exceedingly beyond us? Let us hear what a French writer saith of the inequality that was between the French and English, when their King John was ready to give the on-set upon the Black Prince, at the Battel of Poitiers. John had all advantages over Edward, both of number, force, shew, Country, and concert: the which is commonly a consideration of no small importance in worldly affairs; and withal, the choice of all his horsmen (esteemed then the best in Europe) with the greatest and wisest Captains of his whole Realm. And what could he more?

John de Serres. JEAN avoit tout l'avantage par dessus EDOWARD, le nombre, la force, le lustre, le pay, le prejuge (qui n'est pas communement une consideration de plu'd importance aux affaires du monde) & avec joy l'élite de sa Cavallerie, lors estimée la meillure de tout son Royaume.

I think it would trouble a Roman Antiquary to find the like example in their Histories; the example I say, of a King, brought prisoner to Rome, by an Army of Eight Thousand, which he had surrounded with Forty Thousand, better appointed, and no less expert Warriours. This I am sure of, that neither Syphax the Numidian, followed by a rabble of half Scullions, as Livie rightly terms them, nor their cowardly Kings, Perseus and Gentius, are worthy patterns. All that have read of Cressi and Agincourt, will bear me witness, that I do not alledge the Battel of Poitiers, for lack of other, as good examples of the English Vertue: The proof whereof hath left many a hundred better marks in all quarters of France, than ever did the valour of the Romans. If any man impute these Victories of ours to the long bow, as carrying farther, piercing more strongly, and quicker of discharge than the French Cross-bow: My answer is ready; that in all these respects, it is also (being drawn with a strong Arm) superiour to the Musket; yet is the Musket a weapon of more use. The Gun and the Cross-bow are of like force, when discharged by a Boy, or Woman, as when by a strong man: Weakness or sickness, or a sore finger makes the long Bow unserviceable. More particularly, I say, that it was the custome of our Ancestors, to shoot, for the most part, point blank: And so shall he perceive, that will note the circumstances of almost any one Battel. This takes away all objection: For when two Armies are within the distance of a Butts length, one flight of Arrows, or two at the most, can be delivered before they close. Neither is it in general true, that the long Bow reacheth farther, or that it pierceth more strongly than the Cross-bow: But this is the rare effect of an extraordinary arm; whereupon can be grounded no common rule. If any man shall ask, how then came it to pass, that the English won so many great Battels, having no advantage to help him? I may, with best commendation of modesty, refer him to the French Historian; who relating the victory of our men at Crevant; where they passed a Bridge in face of the Enemy, useth these words: The English comes with a conquering bravery, as he that was accustomed to gain every-where without any stay: He forceth our guard placed upon the Bridge to keep the passage. Or I may cite another piece of the same Author, where he tells how the Britons, being invaded by Charles the Eighth, King of France, thought it good policy to apparel a Thousand and five Hundred of their own men in English Cassocks, hoping that the very sight of the English Red Cross, would be enough to terrifie the French. But I will not stand to borrow of the French Historians (all which, which, excepting De Serres, and Paulus Æmilius, report wonders of our Nation:) the propoſition which firſt I undertook to maintain; That the military vertue of the Engliſh, prevailing againſt all manner of difficulties, ought to be preferred before that of the Romans, which was aſſiſted with all advantages that could be deſired. If it be demanded, why then did not our Kings finiſh the Conqueſt, as Cæſar had done? My anſwer may be (I hope without offence) that our Kings were like to the Race of Æacida, of whom the old Poet Ennius gave this note; Bellipotentes ſunt magis quam ſapientipotentes: They were more Warlike then politick. Whoſo notes their proceedings, may find, that none of them went to work like a Conquerour, ſave only King Henry the fifth; the courſe of whoſe Victories it pleaſed God to interrupt by his death. But this queſtion is the more eaſily anſwered, if another be firſt made. Why did not the Romans attempt the Conqueſt of Gaule before the time of Cæſar? Why not after the Macedonian War? Why not after the third Punick, or after the Numantian? At all theſe times they had good leiſure: And then eſpecially had they both leiſure and fit opportunity, when under the conduct of Martus, they had newly vanquiſhed the Cimbri, and Teutones, by whom the Country of Gaule had been pitiouſly waſted. Surely, the words of Tully were true: that with other Nations the Romans fought for Dominion, with the Gauls for preſervation of their own ſafety.

Therefore they attempted not the Conqueſt of Gaule, until they were Lords of all other Countreys, to them known. We on the other ſide, held only the one half of our own Iſland; the other half being inhabited by a Nation (unleſs perhaps in wealth and numbers of men ſomewhat inferiour) every way equal to our ſelves; a Nation anciently and ſtrongly allied to our enemies the French, and in that regard enemy to us. So that our danger lay both before and behind us: And the great danger at our backs; where commonly we felt, alwayes we feared, a ſtronger Invaſion by Land, than we could make upon France, tranſporting our Forces over Sea.

It is uſual with men, that have pleaſed themſelves in admiring the matters which they find in ancient Hiſtories: To hold it a great injury done their judgment, if any take upon him, by way of compariſon, to extol the things of latter ages. But I am well perſwaded, that as the divided vertue of this our Iſland, hath given more noble proof of it ſelf, than under ſo worthy a Leader, that Roman Army could do, which afterwards could win Rome, and all her Empire, making Cæſar a Monarch; ſo hereafter, by Gods bleſſing, who hath converted our greateſt hindrance, into our greateſt help, the enemy that ſhall dare to try our forces, will find cauſe to wiſh, that avoiding us, he had rather encountred as great a puiſſance as was that of the Roman Empire. But it is now high time, that laying aſide compariſons, we return to the rehearſal of deeds done; wherein we ſhall find, how Rome began, after Pyrrhus had left Italy, to ſtrive with Carthage for Dominion, in the firſt Punick War.

SECT. II.

The eſtate of Carthage before it entred into War with Rome.

THE City of Carthage had ſtood above ſix Hundred years, when firſt it began to contend with Rome for the maſtery of Sicil. It forewent Rome one Hundred and fifty years in antiquity of foundation: But in the honour of great atchievements, it excelled far beyond this advantage of time. For Carthage had extended her Dominion in Africa it ſelf, from the Weſt of Cyrene, to the ſtreights of Hercules, about one Thouſand and five Hundred miles in length, wherein ſtood three Hundred Cities. It had ſubjected all Spain, even to the Pyrenæan Mountains, together with all the Iſlands in the Mediterranean Sea, to the Weſt of Sicil; and of Sicil the better part. It flouriſhed about ſeven Hundred and thirty years, before the deſtruction thereof by Scipio: Who, beſides other ſpoils, and all that the Souldiers reſerved, carried thence four Hundred and ſeventy Thouſand weight of Silver, which make of our money (if our pounds differ not) fourteen Hundred and ten Thouſand pound ſterling. So as this glorious City ran the ſame fortune, which many other great ones have done, both before and ſince. The ruine of the goodlieſt pieces of the World fore-ſhews the diſſolution of the whole.

About one Hundred years after ſuch time as it was caſt down, the Senate of Rome cauſed it to be re-built: And by Gracchus it was called Junonia: It was again and again abandoned and re-peopled, taken and retaken; by Genſericus the Vandal, by Belliſarius under Juſtinian, by the Perſians, by the Egyptians, and by the Mahometans. It is now nothing. The ſeat thereof was exceeding ſtrong: And while the Carthaginians commanded the Sea, invincible. For the Sea compaſſed it about, ſaving that it was tyed to the Main by a neck of Land; which paſſage had two miles and more of breadth (Appian ſaith, three miles and one furlong) by which we may be induced to believe the common report, that the City it ſelf was above twenty miles in compaſs; if not that of Strabo, affirming the circuit to have been twice as great.

It had three Walls without the Wall of the City; and between each of thoſe, three or four Streets, with Vaults under ground, of thirty foot deep, in which they had place for three Hundred Elephants, and all their food: Over theſe they had Stables for four Thouſand Horſe, and Granaries for their provender. They had alſo lodgings in the Streets, between theſe out-walls, for four Thouſand Horſe-men, and twenty Thouſand Foot-men, which (according to the diſcipline uſed by thoſe of China) never peſtered the City. It had towards the South part, the Caſtle of Byrſa; to which Servius gives two and twenty furlongs in compaſs, that make two miles and a half. This was the ſame piece of ground which Dido obtained of the Lybians, when ſhe got leave to buy only ſo much Land of them, as ſhe could compaſs with an Ox hide. On the Weſt-ſide it had alſo the Salt-Sea, but in the nature of a ſtanding pool; for a certain arm of Land, faſtned to the ground, on which the City ſtood, ſtretched it ſelf towards the Weſt-continent, nent, and left but seventy foot open for the Sea to enter. Over this standing-Sea was built a most sumptuous Arsenal, having their Ships and Gallies riding under it.

The form of their Common-weal resembled that of Sparta; for they had titulary Kings, and the Aristocratical Power of Senators. But (as Regius well observeth) the people in latter times usurped too great authority in their Councils. This confusion in Government, together with the trust that they reposed in hired Souldiers, were helping causes of their destruction in the end. Two other more forcible causes of their ruine, were their avarice and their cruelty. (a) Their avarice was shewed both in exacting from their Vassals (besides ordinary Tributes) the one (b) half of the fruits of the Earth; and in conferring of great Offices, not upon gentle and merciful persons, but upon those who would best tyrannize over the people, to augment their treasures. Their cruelty appeared, in putting them to death without mercy, that had offended through ignorance: the one of these rendered them odious to their Vassals, whom it made ready upon all occasions, to revolt from them: the other did break the Spirits of their Generals, by presenting in the heat of their actions abroad, the fear of a cruel death at home. Hereby it came to pass, that many good Commanders of the Carthaginian Forces, after some great loss received, have desperately cast themselves, with all that remained under their charge, into the throat of destruction; holding it necessary, either to repair their losses quickly, or to ruin all together: and few of them have dared to manage their own best projects, after that good form, wherein they first conceived them, for fear lest the manner of their proceeding should be mis-interpreted: It being the Carthaginian Rule, to crucifie, not only the unhappy Captain, but even him, whose bad counsel had prosperous event. The faults, wherewith, in general, they of Carthage are taxed, by Roman Historians, I find to be these; lust, cruelty, avarice, craft, unfaithfulness, and perjury. Whether the Romans themselves were free from the same crimes, let the tryal be referred unto their actions. The first league between Carthage and Rome, was very ancient: having been made the year following the expulsion of Tarquin. In that league the Carthaginians had the superiority, as imposing upon the Romans the more strict conditions. For it was agreed, that the Romans should not so much as have trade in some part of Africk, nor suffer any Ship of theirs to pass beyond the headland, or cape, then called the fair promontory, unless it were by force of tempest: whereas on the other side, no Haven in Italy, was forbidden to the Carthaginians. A second league was made long after, which (howsoever it hath peased * Livy to say, that the Romans granted it, at the Carthaginians intreaty) was more strict than the former: prohibiting the Romans to have trade in any part of Africk, or in the Island of Sardinia.

By these two Treaties it may appear, that the Carthaginians had an intent not only to keep the Romans (as perhaps they did other People) from getting any knowledge of the State of Africk; but to countenance and uphold them, in their troubling all Italy, whereby they themselves might have the better means to occupy all Sicil, whilst that Island should be destitute of Italian succours. Hereupon we find good cause of the joy that was in Carthage, and of the Crown of Gold, weighing twenty and five pound, sent from thence to Rome, when the Samnites were overthrown. But the little State of Rome prevailed faster in Italy, than the great power of Carthage did in Sicil. For that mighty Army of three hundred thousand men, which Hannibal conducted out of Africk in Sicil, wan only two Cities therein: many great Fleets were devoured by tempests; and howsoever the Carthaginians prevailed at one time, the Sicilians, either by their own valour, or by the assistance of their good friends out of Greece, did at some other time repair their own losses, and take revenge upon those Invaders. But never were the People of Carthage in better hope of getting all Sicil, than when the death of Agathocles the Tyrant, had left the whole Island in combustion; the estate of Greece being such, at the same time, that it seemed impossible for any succour to be sent from thence. But whilst the Carthaginians were busie in making their advantage of this good opportunity; Pyrrhus, invited by the Tarentines and their fellows, came into Italy, where he made sharp War upon the Romans. These news were unpleasing to the Carthaginians, who, being a subtile Nation, easily foresaw, that the same busie disposition which had brought this Prince out of Greece into Italy, would as easily transport him over into Sicil, as soon as he could finish his Roman War. To prevent this danger, they sent Mago Embassadour to Rome; who declared in their name, that they were sorry to hear what misadventure had befallen the Romans their good friends in this War with Pyrrhus; and that the People of Carthage were very willing to assist the State of Rome, by sending an Army into Italy; if their help were thought needful, against the Epirots.

Xen. Grac. Hist. l. 1.

It was indeed the main desire of the Carthaginians, to hold Pyrrhus so hardly to his work in Italy, that they might at good leisure, pursue their business in Sicil: which caused them to make so goodly an offer. But the Romans were too high-minded: and refused to accept any such aid of their friend, lest it should blemish their reputation, and make them seem unable to stand by their own strength. Yet the message was taken lovingly, as it ought; and the former league between Rome and Carthage renewed; with covenants added, concerning the present business; that if either of the two Cities made peace with Pyrrhus, it should be with reservation of liberty, to assist the other, in case that Pyrrhus should invade either of their Dominions. All this notwithstanding, and notwithstanding that the same Mago went and treated with Pyrrhus, using all means to sound his intentions (a matter very difficult, where one upon every new occasion, changeth his own purposes) yet Pyrrhus found leisure to make a step into Sicil: whether though in fine he was neither getter nor saver, yet he clean defeated the purposes of Carthage, leaving them, at his departure from thence, as far from any end, as when they first began.

So many disasters in an enterprise, that from the first

(b) The Turks at this day, do also take the one half of the poor mans corn, that labours the earth: yea, they take Tribute both of the bodies, and of the Souls of the Christians their Vassals, by bereaving them of their ablest children, and bringing them up in the Mahometan Religion. The Irish take the fourth sheaf: and were wont to eat up with their Horse-men, foot-men, and Dogs, what they pleased, of the other three parts remaining. The Husbandman and the Yeoman of England, are the freest of all the World: And reason good: for of them have the bodies of our victorious Armies been compounded. And it is the Free-man, and not the Slave, that hath courage, and the sense of shame deserved by cowardise. How free the English Yeomen have been in times, not long since past, Fortescue hath shewed in his praise of our Countreys Laws. But I may say, that they are more free now than ever: and our Nobility and Gentry more servile. For since the excessive bravery and vain expence of our Grandees hath taught them to raise their Rents, since by Inclosures, and dismembring of Mannors, the Court Baron, and the Court Leet, the Principalities of the Gentry of England, have been dissolved, the Tenants having payed unto their Lords their rack Rent, owe them now no service at all, and (perchance) as little love. * Liv. Dec. 1. l. 7.

first undertaking had been so strongly pursued, through the length of many generations, might well have induced the Carthaginians to beleive, that an higher providence resisted their intendment. But their desire of winning that fruitful Island, was so inveterate, that with unwearied patience, they still continued in hope of so much the greater an Harvest, by how much their cost and pain therein buried had been the more. Wherefore they re-continued their former courses; and by force or practice, recovered in few years all their old possessions: making peace with Syracuse, the chief City of the Island, that so they might the better enable themselves to deal with the rest.

Somewhat before this time, a Troop of Campanian Souldiers, that had served under Agathocles, being entertained within Messana as friends, and finding themselves too strong for the Citizens, took advantage of the power that they had to wrong; and with perfidious cruelty, slew those that had trusted them; which done, they occupied the City, Lands, Goods, and Wives of those whom they had murdered. These Mercenaries called themselves Mamertines. Good Souldiers they were: and like enough it is, that meer desperation of finding any that would approve their barbarous treachery, added rage unto their stoutness. Having therefore not any other colour of their proceedings, than the law of the stronger, they over-ran all the Country round about them.

In this course, at first, they sped so well, that they did not only defend Messana against the Cities of Sicil Confederate, to wit, against the Syracusians, and others, but they rather wan upon them; yea, and upon the Carthaginians, exacting Tribute from many Neighbour places. But it was not long ere fortune turned her back to these Mamertines, the Syracusians wan fast upon them; and finally, confining them within the walls of Messana, they also with a powerful Army besieged the City. It happned ill, that about the same time a contention began between the Syracusian Souldiers, then lying at Magara, and the Citizens of Syracuse, and Governours of the Common wealth; which proceeded so far, that the Army elected two Governours among themselves, to wit, Artemidorus and Hieron, that was afterward King. Hieron, being for his years excellently adorned with many vertues, although it was contrary to the policy of that State, to approve any election made by the Souldiers; yet for the great clemency used at his first entrance, he was by general consent established and made Governour. This Office he rather used as a Scale, thereby to climb to some higher degree, than rested content with his present preferment.

In brief, there was somewhat wanting, whereby to strengthen himself within the City; and somewhat without it, that gave impediment to his obtaining, and safe keeping of the place he sought, to wit, a powerful party within the Town, and certain mutinous Troops of Souldiers without, often and easily moved to sedition and tumult. For the first, whereby to strengthen himself, he took to Wife the daughter of Leptines, a man of the greatest estimation and Authority among the Syracusians. For the second, leading out the Army to besiege Messana, he quartered all those companies, which he held suspected, on the one side of the City, and leading the rest of his Horse and Foot unto the other side, as if he would have assaulted it in two several parts, he marched away under the covert of the Town walls, and left the Mutiners to be cut in pieces by the assieged: So returning home, and levying an Army of his own Citizens, well trained and obedient, he hasted again towards Messana, and was by the Mamertines (grown proud by their former victory over the Mutiners) incountred in the Plains of Mylæum, where he obtained a most signal victory; and leading with him their commander captive in Syracuse, himself by common consent was elected and saluted King. Hereupon the Mamertines, finding themselves utterly enfeebled, some of them resolved to give themselves to the Carthaginians, others to crave assistance of the Romans: to each of whom the several faction dispatched Embassadors for the very same purpose.

The Carthaginians were soon ready to lay hold upon the good offer: so that a Captain of theirs got into the Castle of Messana, whereof they that had sent for him gave him possession. But within a little while, they that were more inclinable to the Romans, had brought their Companions to so good agreement, that this Captain, either by force, or by cunning, was turned out of doors, and the Town reserved for other Masters.

These news did much offend the people of Carthage; who crucified their Captain, as both a Traitor and Coward; and sent a Fleet and Army to besiege Messana, as a Town that rebelled, having once been theirs. Hieron the new-made King of Syracuse, (to gratifie his people incensed with the smart of injuries lately received) added his forces to the Carthaginians, with whom he entred into a league, for exterminating the Mamertines out of Sicil. So the Mamertines on all sides were closed up within Messana: the Carthaginians lying with a Navy at Sea, and with an Army on the one side of the Town, whilest Hieron with his Syracusians lay before it on the other side.

In this their great danger came Appius Claudius the Roman Consul, with an Army to the Streights of Sicil: which passing by night with notable audacity, he put himself into the Town; and sending Messengers to the Carthaginians, and to Hieron, required them to depart; signifying unto them that the Mamertines were now become confederate with the people of Rome, and that therefore he was come to give them protection, even by force of War, if reason would not prevail.

This message was utterly neglected; And so began the War between Rome and Carthage; wherein it will then be time to shew on which part was the Justice of the quarrel, when some actions of the Romans lately foregoing this, have been first considered.

SECT III.

The beginning of the first Punick War. That it was unjustly undertaken by the Romans.

WHen Pyrrhus began his War in Italy, the City of Rhegium being well affected to Rome, and not only fearing to be taken by the Epirot, but much more distrusting the Carthaginians, as likely to seize upon it in that busie time, sought aid from the Romans, and obtained from them a Legion, consisting of four thousand Souldiers, under the conduct of Decius Campanus, a Roman Prefect; by whom they were defended and assured for the present. But after a while, this Roman Garrison, considering considering at good leisure, the fact of the Mamertines committed in Messana (a City in Sicil, situate almost opposite to Rhegium, and no otherwise divided than by a narrow Sea, which severeth it from Italy) and rather weighing the greatness of the booty, than the odiousness of the villany, by which it was gotten; resolved finally, to make the like purchase, by taking the like wicked course. Confederating therefore themselves with the Mamertines, they entertained their Hosts of Rhegium, after the same manner; dividing the spoil, and all which that State had, among themselves.

When complaint was made to the Senate and people of Rome, of this outrage; they finding their honour thereby greatly stained (for no Nation in the World made a more severe profession of justice, than they did during all the time of their growing greatness) resolved, after a while, to take revenge upon the offenders. And this they performed shortly after, when they had quenched the fires, kindled in Italy by Pyrrhus. For, notwithstanding that those Romans in Rhegium (as men for the foulness of their fact, hopeless of pardon) defended themselves with an obstinate resolution: yet in the end, the assailants forced them; and those which escaped the present fury, were brought bound to Rome, where, after the usual torments by whipping inflicted, according to the custome of the Countrey, they had their heads stricken from their shoulders, and the people of Rhegium were again restored to their former liberty and estates.

This execution of Justice being newly performed, and the fame thereof sounding honourably through all quarters of Italy: messengers came to Rome from Messana, desiring help against the Carthaginians, and Syracusians, that were in a readiness to inflict the like punishment upon the Mamertines, for the like offence. A very impudent request it was, which they made: who having both given example of that villany to the Roman Souldiers, and holpen them with joint forces to make it good, do intreat the Judges to give them that assistance, which they were wont to receive from their fellow-thieves.

The Romans could not suddenly resolve, whether the way of honesty or of profit were to be followed; they ever more pretended the one, but they many times walked in the other. They considered, how contrary the course of succouring the Mamertines was to their former counsels and actions: seeing for the same offences they had lately put to torment, and to the Sword, their own Souldiers, and restored the oppressed to their liberty. Yet when they beheld the description of the Carthaginian Dominion, and that they were already Lords of the best part of Africk, of the Mediterranean Islands, of great part of Spain, and some part of Sicil it self; whilest also they feared, that Syracuse therein seated (a City in beauty and riches, little at that time inferiour to Carthage, and far superiour to Rome it self) might become theirs; the safety of their own estate spake for these Mamertines: who, if they (driven to despair by the Romans) should deliver up Messana, with those other holds that they had, into the hands of the Carthaginians, then would nothing stand between Carthage, and the Lordship of Sicil: for Syracuse it self could not, for want of succour, any long time subsist, if once the the Carthaginians that were Masters of the Sea, did fasten upon that passage from the main Land. It was further considered; that the opportunity of Messana was such, as would not only debar all succours out of the Continent, from arrival in Sicil; but would serve as a Bridge, whereby the Carthaginians might have entrance into Italy, at their own pleasure.

These considerations of profit at hand, and of preventing danger, that threatned from afar, did so prevail above all regard of honesty, that the Mamertines were admitted into Confederacy with the Romans, and Ap. Claudius the Consul, presently dispatcht away for Messana: into which he entred, and undertook the protection of it, as is shewed before. The besiegers were little troubled with his arrival; and less moved with his requiring them to desist from their attempt. For they did far exceed him in number of men; the whole Island was ready to relieve them in their wants; and they were strong enough at Sea, to hinder any supply from getting into the Town. All this Appius himself well understood: and against all this he thought the stiff mettal of his Roman Souldiers a sufficient remedy. Therefore he resolved to issue out into the field, and to let the enemies know, that his coming was to send them away from the Town; not to be besieged by them within it.

In executing this determination, it was very beneficial to him, that the enemy lay encamped in such forts as one quarter was not well able to relieve another in distress. Hieron was now exposed to the same danger, whereinto he had wilfully cast his own mutinous followers not long before: only he was strong enough (or thought so) to make good his own quarter, without help of others. Against him Ap. Claudius issued forth, and (not attempting, by unexpected sally, to surprise his trenches) arranged his men in order of Battle, wherewith he presented him. The Syracusian wanted not courage to fight; but surely he wanted good advice: else would he not have hazzarded all his power against an enemy of whom he had made no trial; when it had been easie, and as much as was requisite, to defend his own Camp. It may be, that he thought to get honour, wherewith to adorn the beginning of his Reign. But he was well beaten, and driven to save himself within his trenches: by which loss, he learned a point of wisdom, that stood him and his Kingdom in good stead all the days of his life. It was a foolish desire of revenge, that had made the Syracusians so busie, in helping those of Carthage, against the Mamertines.

Had Messana been taken by the Carthaginians, Syracuse it self must have sought help from Rome, against those friends which it now so diligently assisted. Hieron had (in respect of those two mighty Cities) but a small stock, which it behooveth him to govern well: such another loss would have made him almost Bankrupt. Therefore he quietly brake up his Camp: and retired home: intending to let them stand to their adventures, that had hope to be gainers by the bargain. The next day, Claudius perceiving the Sicilian Army gone, did with much alacrity of his Souldiers, give charge upon the Carthaginians: wherein he sped so well, that the enemy forsook both Field and Camp, leaving all the Countrey open to the Romans; who having spoiled all round, without resistance, intended to lay siege unto the great City of Syracuse.

These prosperous beginnings, howsoever they animated the Romans, and filled them with hopes of attaining to greater matters, than at the first they had expected: Yet did they not imprint any form of terrour in the City of Carthage, that had well enough repaired greater losses than this; in which no more was lost than what had been prepared against the the Mamertines alone, without any ſuſpicion of War from Rome.

Now in this place I hold it ſeaſonable, to conſider of thoſe grounds, whereupon the Romans entred into this War; not how profitable they were, nor how agreeable to rules of honeſty (for queſtionleſs the enterpriſe was much to their benefit, though as much to their ſhame) but how allowable in ſtrict terms of lawfulneſs; whereupon they built all their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Mamertines did yield themſelves, and all that they had, into the Romans hands (as the Campanes, diſtreſſed by the Samnites, had done) I cannot find: neither can I find how the Meſſengers of thoſe folk, whereof one part had already admitted the Carthaginians, could be enabled to make ſuch ſurrendry in the publick Name of all.

If therefore the Mamertines, by no lawful ſurrendry of themſelves and their poſſeſſions, were become ſubject unto Rome, by what better title could the Romans aſſiſt the Mamertines, againſt their moſt ancient friends the Carthaginians, than they might have aided the Campanes againſt the Samnites, without the ſame condition? Which was (as they themſelves confeſſed) by none at all. But let it be ſuppoſed, that ſome point ſerving to clear this doubt, is loſt in all Hiſtories. Doubtleſs it is, that no company of Pyrates, Thieves, Out-laws, Murderers, or ſuch other Malefactors, can by any good ſucceſs of their villany, obtain the priviledge of civil Societies, to make League or Truce; yea, or to require fair War: but are by all means, as moſt pernicious Vermine, to be rooted out of the World. I will not take upon me to maintain that opinion of ſome Civilians, that a Prince is not bound to hold his faith with one of theſe; it were a Poſition of ill conſequence: This I hold; that no one Prince or State can give protection to ſuch as theſe, as long as any other is uſing the Sword of vengeance againſt them, without becoming acceſſary to their crimes. Wherefore we muſt eſteem this action of the Romans ſo far from being, juſtifiable, by any pretence of confederacy made with them; as that contrariwiſe, by admitting this neſt of Murderers and Thieves into their protection, they juſtly deſerved to be Warred upon themſelves, by the people of Sicil; yea, although Meſſana had been taken, and the Mamertines all ſlain, e're any news of the Confederacy had been brought unto the beſiegers. The great Alexander was ſo far perſwaded herein; that he did put to Sword all the Branchiadæ (a people in Sogdiana) and razed their City, notwithſtanding that they joyfully entertained him as their Lord and King; becauſe they were deſcended from a company of Mileſians, who to gratifie King Xerxes, had robbed a Temple, and were by him rewarded with the Town and Countrey, which theſe of their poſterity enjoyed. Nevertheleſs in courſe of humane juſtice, long and peaceable poſſeſſion gives jus acquiſitum, a kind of right by preſcription unto that which was firſt obtained by wicked means: and doth free the deſcendants from the crime of their Anceſtors, whoſe villanies they do not exerciſe. But that the ſame generation of Thieves, which by a deteſtable fact hath purchaſed a rich Town, ſhould be acknowledged a lawful company of Citizens, there is no ſhew of right. For even the Conqueror that by open War obtaineth a Kindgom, doth not confirm his title, by thoſe victories which gave him firſt poſſeſſion: but length of time is requiſite to eſtabliſh him, unleſs by ſome alliance with the ancient Inheritors, he can better the violence of his claim, as did our King Henry the firſt, by his Marriage with Maude, that was Daughter of Malcolme King of the Scots, by Margaret, the Neece of Edmund Ironſide. Wherefore I conclude, that the Romans had no better ground (if they had ſo good) of juſtice, in this quarrel, than had the Gothes, Hunnes, Vandols, and other Nations, of the Wars that they made upon the Roman Empire, wherein Rome her ſelf, in the time of viſitation, was burnt to the ground.

SECT. IV.

Of the Iſland of Sicil.

†. I.

The quality of the Iſland: and the firſt Inhabitants thereof.

THe defence of the Mamertines, or the poſſeſſion of Meſſana, being now no longer ſince the firſt victories of Appius Claudius, the objects of the Roman hopes; but the Dominion of all Sicil being the prize, for which Rome and Carthage are about to contend: it will be agreeable unto the other, which in the like caſes we have obſerved, to make a brief collection of things concerning that noble Iſland, which hath been the ſtage of many great acts, performed as well before and after, as in this preſent War.

That Sicil was ſometimes a Peninſula, or Demy-Iſle, adjoyning to Italy, as a part of Brutium in Calabria, near unto Rhegium, and afterward by violence of tempeſt ſevered from the ſame: it is a general opinion of all antiquity. But at what certain time this diviſion happened, there is no memorial remaining in any ancient writer. Strabo, Pliny, and Dionyſius affirm, that it was cauſed by an Earthquake; Silius and Caſſidorus do think it to have beep done by the rage and violence of the Tide, and ſurges of the Sea. Either of theſe opinions may be true; for ſo was Eubœa ſevered from Bœotia; Atalante and Marcis from Eubœa; Sillie here in England, from the cape of Cornwal, and Brittain it ſelf (as may ſeem by Verſtigans arguments) from the oppoſite continent of Gaule. But for Sicil, as they which lend their ears to fables, do attribute the cauſe of it to Neptune (as Euſtathius witneſſeth) who with his three-forked Mace, in favour of Jocaſtus, the Son of Æolus, divided it from the main Land, and ſo made it an Iſland, which before was but a Demy-Iſle; that by that means he might the more ſafely inhabit, and poſſeſs the ſame. Diodorus Siculus, moved by the authority of Heſiodus, aſcribeth the labour of ſundring it from Italy, to Orion: who that he might be compared to Hercules (cutting through the Rocks and Mountains) firſt opened the Sicilian ſtreights, as Hercules did thoſe of Gibralter.

Orcont l. 4. c. 14. Diod. l. 6. Ovid de Faſt. 4.

They which value the Iſlands of the midland Sea, according to their quantity and content, do make this the greateſt, as Euſtathius and Strabo, who affirm this, not only to excel the reſt for bigneſs, but alſo for goodneſs of Soil. As concerning the form of this Iſland, Pomponius Mela ſaith, it is like that Capital letter of the Greek, which they call Delta, namely, that it hath the figure of a triangle; which is generally known to be true. That the whole whole Iſland was conſecrated to Ceres and Proſerpina, all old writers with one conſent affirm. To Ceres it was dedicated, becauſe it firſt taught the rules of ſetting, and ſowing of Corn: to Proſerpina, not ſo much for that ſhe was from hence violently taken by Pluto, as becauſe (which Plutarch and Diodorus do report for truth) that Pluto, as ſoon as ſhe, uncovering her ſelf, firſt ſhewed her ſelf to be ſeen of him, gave her the Dominion thereof.

Of the fertility and riches of this Country, there is a famous teſtimony written by Cicero, in the ſecond Oration againſt Verres, where he ſaith, that Marcus Cato did call it the Granary and Store-houſe of the Common-wealth, and the Nurſe of the vulgar ſort. The ſame Cicero doth add in that place; that it was not only the Store-houſe of the people of Rome: but alſo that it was a well-furniſhed treaſure. For without any coſt or charge of ours (ſaith he) it hath uſually clothed, maintained, and furniſhed our greateſt Army with Leather, Apparel and Corn. Strabo reporteth almoſt the ſame thing of it. Whatſoever Sicilie doth yeild (ſaith Solinus) whether by the Sun, and temperature of the Air, or by the induſtry and labour of man, it is accounted next unto thoſe things that are of beſt eſtimation: were it not that ſuch things as the Earth firſt putteth forth, are extreamly over-grown with ſaffron. Diodorus Siculus ſaith, that in the fields near unto Leontium, and in divers other places of this Iſland, wheat doth grow of it ſelf without any labour or looking to of the Husbandman. Martianus ſheweth, that there were in it ſix Colonies, and ſixty Cities: there are that reckon more, whereof the names are found ſcatteringly in many good Authors. Strabo. l. 6.

Now beſides many famous acts, done by the people of this Iſland, as well in Peace as War, there be many other things which have made it moſt renowned, as the birth of Ceres; the raviſhing of Proſerpina; the Giant Enceladus; the mount Ætna; Scylla and Charybdis, with other Antiquities and rareties; beſides thoſe learned men, the noble Mathematician, Archimedes; the famous Geomatrician, Euclides; the painful Hiſtorian Diodorus; and Empedocles, the deep Philoſopher.

That Sicil was at firſt poſſeſſed and inhabited by Giants, Læſtrigones and Cyclopes, barbarous people, and uncivil; all Hiſtories and Fables do jointly with one conſent averr. Yet Thucydides, ſaith, that theſe ſavage people dwelt only in one part of the Iſland. Afterward the Sicani, a people of Spain, poſſeſſed it. That theſe Sicani were not bred in the Iſle (although ſome ſo think) Thucydides and Diodorus do very conſtantly avouch.

Of theſe it was named Sicania. Theſe Sicani were invaded by the Siculi; who, inhabiting that part of Latium, whereon Rome was afterward built; were driven by the Pelaſgi from their own ſeats, and finding no place upon the Continent, which they were able to maſter and inhabit, paſſed over into this Iſland, three Hundred years before the Greeks ſent any Colonies thither: and (ſaith Philiſtus) eighty years before the fall of Troy. Theſe Siculi gave the name of Sicilia, to the Iſland; and making War upon the Sicani, drave them from the Eaſt and Northern parts thereof, into the Weſt and South. At their landing, they firſt built the City Zancle, afterward called Meſſana; and after that, Catana, Leontine, and Syracuſe it ſelf, beating from thence the Ætolians, who long before had ſet up a Town in that place. As for the name of Syracuſe it was not known, till ſuch time as Archias of Corinth (long after) won that part of the Iſland from the Siculi; neither did the Siculi at their firſt arrival diſpoſſeſs the Ætolians thereof, but ſome Hundred years after their deſcent, and after ſuch time as they had founded the Cities before named with Nea, Hybla, Trimarica, and divers others.

After theſe Siculi came another Nation out of Italy, called Morgetes; who were thence driven by the Oenotorians. Theſe ſat down in that part of Sicil, where they afterward raiſed the Cities of Morgantum, and Leontium. For at this time the Siculi were divided, and by a Civil War greatly infeebled. Among theſe ancient ſtories, we find the laſt voyage, and the death of Minos, King of Crete. Thucyaides, an Hiſtorian of unqueſtionable ſincerity, reports of Minos, that he made conqueſt of many Iſlands: and ſome ſuch buſineſs, perhaps, drew him into Sicil. But the common report is, that he came thither in purſuit of Dædalus. The tale goes thus: Dædalus fleeing the revenge of Minos, came into Sicil, to Cocalus, King of the Sicani, and, during his abode there, he built a place of great ſtrength, near unto Megara, for Cocalus to lay up his treaſure in; together with many notable works, for which he was greatly admired and honoured.

Among the reſt, he caſt a Ram in Gold, that was ſet up in the Temple of Venus Erycina; which he did with ſo great Art, as thoſe that beheld it thought it rather to be living, than counterfeit.

Now Minos, hearing that Cocalus had entertained Dædalus, prepares to invade the Territory of Cocalus; but when he was arrived, Cocalus doubting his own ſtrength, promiſed to deliver Dædalus. This he performs not, but in the mean while, kills Minos by Treaſon, and perſwades the Cretans, Minos his followers, to inhabit a part of Sicil; the better (as it ſeems) to ſtrengthen himſelf againſt the Siculi. Hereupon the Cretans (their King being dead) gave their conſent, and builded for themſelves the City of Minoa after the name of the King Minos. After, they likewiſe built the Town of Engium, now called Gange: and theſe were the firſt Cities, built by the Greeks in Sicil, about two ages before the War of Troy; for the Grandchildren of Minos ſerved with the Greeks at the ſiege thereof.

But after ſuch time as the Cretans underſtood, that their King had by Treaſon been made away; they gathered together a great Army, to invade Cocalus: and landing near unto Camicus, they beſieged the ſame five years, but in vain. In the end (being forced to return, without any revenge taken) they were wrackt on the Coaſt of Italy, and having no means to repair their Ships, nor the honour they had loſt, they made good the place whereon they fell, and built Hyria, or Hyrium, between the two famous Ports of Brunduſium and Tarentum. Of theſe Cretans came thoſe Nations, afterward called Lapyges and Meſſapii.

After the taking of Troy, Egeſtus and Elymus, brought with them certain Troops into Sicil, and ſeated themſelves among the Sicani; when they built the Cities of Egeſta and Elyma.

It is ſaid, that Æneas viſited theſe places in his paſſage into Italy: and that ſome of the Trojans, his followers, were left behind him in theſe Towns of Sicil: whereof there want not good Authors, that make Æneas himſelf the founder.

About the ſame time, the Phœnicians ſeized upon the Promontories of Pachinus, and Lilybæ- um, and upon certain ſmall Iſles adjoyning to the main Iſland: which they fortified, to ſecure the Trades that they had with the Silicians; like as the Portugals have done in the Eaſt-India, at Goa, Ormus, Moſambique, and other places. But the Phœnicians ſtayed not there; for after they had once aſſured their deſcents, they built the goodly City of Panormus, now called Palerma.

Theſe we find were the Nations that inhabited the Iſle of Sicil, before the War of Troy, and ere the Greeks in any numbers began to ſtraggle in thoſe parts.

It may perchance ſeem ſtrange to the Reader, that in ancient ſtories, he finds one and the ſame beginning of Nations, after the flood; and that the firſt planters in all parts of the World are ſaid to be mighty and Giant-like men; and that, as Phœnicia, Ægypt, Lybia and Greece, had Hercules, Oreſtes, Antæus, Typhon, and the like; as Denmark had Starchaterus, remembered by Saxo Grammaticus; as Scythia, Britanie, and other Regions had Giants for their firſt Inhabitants: ſo this iſle of Sicil had her Leſtrigones and Cyclopes. This diſcourſe I could alſo reject for fained and fabulous, did not Moſes make us know, that the Zamzummims, Emims, Anakims, and Og of Baſan, with others, which ſometimes inhabited the Mountains and Deſarts of Moab, Ammon, and Mount Seir, were men of exceeding ſtrength and ſtature, and of the races of Giants: and were it not that Tertullian, St. Auguſtine, Nicephorus, Procopius, Iſidore, Pliny, Diodore, Herodotus, Solinus, Plutarch, and many other Authors, have confirmed the opinion: Yea, Veſpuſius, in his ſecond Navigation into America, had reported that himſelf had ſeen the like men in thoſe parts. Again, whereas the ſelf-ſame is written of all Nations, that is written of any one; as touching their ſimplicity of life, their mean fare, their feeding on Acorns and Roots, their poor Cottages, the covering of their Bodies with the Skins of Beaſts, their Hunting, their Arms, and Weapons, and their Warfare, their firſt paſſages over great Rivers and Arms of the Sea, upon Rafts of Trees tied together; and afterwards their making Boats firſt of Twigs and Leather, then of wood; firſt with Oars, and then with Sails; that they eſteemed as Gods, the firſt finders out of Arts; as of Husbandry, of Laws, and of Policy: It is a matter, that makes me neither to wonder at, nor to doubt of it. For they all lived in the ſame newneſs of time, which we call Old time, and had all the ſame want of his inſtruction, which (after the Creator of all things) hath by degrees taught all Mankind. For other teaching had they none, that were removed far off from the Hebrews, (who inherited the knowledge of the firſt Patriarchs) than that from variable effects they began, by time and degrees to find out the cauſes: from whence came Philoſophy Natural; as the Moral did from diſorder and confuſion; and the Law from cruelty and oppreſſion.

Saxo G. in præfat. hiſt.

Tertul. de Reſurr. Auguſt. de civit. Dei lib. 15. Et queſt. in Gen. Nicep. lib. 2. c. 37. Procop. l. 2. de Bello Goth. Plin. l. 7. cap. 2.

But it is certain, that the Age of Time hath brought forth ſtranger and more incredible things, than the Infancy. For we have now greater Giants for vice and injuſtice, than the World had in thoſe dayes, for bodily ſtrength; for Cottages, and Houſes of Clay and Timber, we have raiſed Palaces of Stones; we carve them, we paint them, and adorn them with Gold, inſomuch that men are rather known by their Houſes, than their Houſes by them; we are fallen from two diſhes to two hundred; from water, to wine and drunkenneſs; from the covering of our Bodies with the Skins of Beaſts, not only to Silk and Gold, but to the Skins of men. But to conclude this digreſſion, Time will alſo take revenge of the exceſs, which it hath brought forth; Quam longa dies peperit, longiorque auxit, longiſſima ſubruet: Long time brought forth, longer time increaſed it, and a time longer then the reſt, ſhall overthrow it.

SECT. II.

The Plantation of the Greeks in Sicil.

WHen the firſt Inhabitants had contended long enough about the Dominion of all Sicil: It hapned, that one Theocles a Greek, being driven upon that Coaſt by an Eaſterly wind, and finding true the commendations thereof, which had been thought fabulous, being delivered only by Poets, gave information to the Athenians of this his diſcovery, and propoſed unto them the benefit of this eaſie Conqueſt, offering to become their guide. But Theocles was as little regarded by the Athenians, as Columbus, in our Grand-fathers times, was by the Engliſh. Wherefore he took the ſame courſe that Columbus afterwards did. He over-laboured not himſelf in perſwading the noble Athenians (who thought themſelves to be well enough already) to their own profit; but went to the Calcidians, that were needy and induſtrious, by whom his project was gladly entertained. By theſe was built the City of Naxus, and a Colony planted of Eubœans.

But the reſt of the Greeks were wiſer than our Weſtern Princes of Europe: For they had no Pope, that ſhould forbid them to occupie the void places of the World. Archias of Corinth followed the Eubœans, and landed in Sicil, (near unto that City, called afterward * Syracuſe: of which, that part only was then compaſſed with a wall, which the Æolians called Homothermon; the Greeks, Naſos; the Latines, Inſula. He with his Corinthians having overcome the Siculi, drave them up into the Country; and after a few years, their multitude increaſing, they added unto the City of the Iſland, that of Acradina, Tyca, and Neopolis. So as well by the commodity of the double Port, capable of as many Ships, as any Haven of that part of Europe, as by the fertility of the Soil, Syracuſe grew up in great haſte, to be one of the goodlieſt Towns of the World. In ſhort time the Greeks did poſſeſs the better part of all the Sea-coaſt; forcing the Sicilians to withdraw themſelves into the faſts and mountainous parts of the Iſland, making their Royal reſidence in Trinacria.

* Syracuſe, as Cicero relates, was the greateſt, and moſt goodly City of all that the Greeks poſſeſt; for the ſituation is both ſtrong, and of an excellent proſpect from every entrance, by Land, or Sea. The Port (was for the moſt part) environed with beautiful buildings: and that part which was without the City, was on both ſides bankt up, and ſuſtained with beautiful walls of Marble. The City of it ſelf was one of the greateſt of the World: for it had in compaſs (as Strabo reporteth) without the treble wall thereof, a hundred and eighty furlongs, which make of our miles about eighteen. It was compounded of four Cities (Strabo ſaith of five) to wit, Inſula, Acradina, Tycha, and Neapolis: of which greatneſs the ruines and foundations of the walls do yet witneſs. After ſuch times as the Dores of Peloponeſus had driven out the Sicilians, this goodly City for a long time became the ſeat of Tyrants. The firſt whereof was Gela: The ſecond, Hiero the elder: The third, Thraſybulus: The fourth and fifth, Dionyſius the elder, and younger: The ſixth, Dion: The ſeventh, Agathocles: The eighth, Pyrrhus: The ninth, Hiero the younger: The tenth and laſt, Hieronymus; who being ſlain at Leontium, at length the Romans conquered it under the conduct of Marcellus.

Some ſeven years after the arrival of Archias, the Calcidians, encouraged by the ſucceſs of the Corin- Corinthians, did assail, and obtain the City of Leontium, built and possest by the Siculi. In brief, the Greeks win from the Siculi, and their Associates, the Cities of Catana and Hybla, which in honour of the Megarians that forc't it, they called Megara.

About five and forty years after Archias had taken Syracuse; Antiphemus, and Entimus, the one from Rhodes, the other from Crete, brought an Army into Sicil, and built Gela; whose Citizens, one Hundred and eight years after, did erect that magnificent and renowned City of Agrigentum, governed according to the Laws of the Dorians.

The Syracusians also, in the seventieth year after their Plantation, did set up the City of Acra, in the Mountains; and in the nineteenth year of Casmena, in the Plains adjoyning; and again in the Hundred and thirtieth year of their dwelling in Syracuse, they built Camerina: and soon after that, Enna, in the very Centre of the Island. So did the Cumani about the same time, recover from the Siculi the City of Zancle, which they had founded in the Straight between Sicil and Italy. They of Zancle, had been the founders of Himera.

Not long after this, Dorieus the Lacedæmonian built Hereclia; which the Phœnicians, and Carthaginians, fearing the neighbourhood of the Spartans, soon after invaded and ruined, though the same were again ere long re-edified.

Solinus also was built by a Colony of Megara: and Zancle was taken by the Messenians; who having lost their own Country, gave the name thereof unto this their new purchase. Such were the beginnings of the greatest Cities in this Island.

†. III.

Of the Government and Affairs of Sicil before Dionysius his Tyranny.

THE most parts of the Cities in Sicil, were governed by the rule of the people, till such time as Phalaris began to usurp the state of Agrigentum, and to exercise all manner of Tyranny therein.

This was that Phalaris, to whom Perillus, the cunning Artificer of a detestable Engine, gave an hollow Bull of Brass, wherein to inclose men, and scorch them to death: Prasing his device with this commendation; that the noise of one tormented therein, should be like unto the bellowing of a Bull. The Tyrant gave a due reward to the Inventer; by causing the first tryal to be made upon himself. He reigned one and thirty years, saith Eusebius; others give him but sixteen: Howsoever it were, one Telemachus in the end, fell upon him with the whole multitude of Agrigentum, and stoned him to death; being thereto animated by Zeno, even whilst the Tyrant was tormenting the same Zeno, to make him confess some matter of conspiracy.

After the death of Phalaris, the Citizens recovered their liberty, and enjoyed it long, till Thero usurped the Government of the Common-weal: At which time also Panetius made himself Lord of Leontium; and Cleander of Gela: But Cleander having ruled seven years, was slain by one of the Citizens. Cleander being dead, his Brother Hippocrates succeeded in his room, and greatly afflicted the people of Naxos, of Zancle, of Messena, and of Leontium; whom with diverse others of the ancient Inhabitants, he forced to acknowledge him their Lord. He also made War with the Syracusians, and, in the end, got from them by composition, the City of Camerina. But when he had reigned seven years, he was slain in a Battel against the Siculi, before Hybla.

At this time did the Syracusians change their form of Government, from Popular to Aristocratical; a preparation towards a Principality, whereinto it was soon after changed. After the death of Hippocrates, Gelon (descendendep from the Rhodians, which together with the Cretans, had long before, among other of the Greeks, seated themselves in Sicil) that had commanded the forces of Hyppocrates, in the former War, with notable success, became Lord of Gela. He, after his Masters death, breaking the trust committed unto him by Hyppocrates over his Children, and being in possession of Gela, took the occasion and advantage of a contention in Syracuse, between the Magistrates and the People. For coming with a strong Army to the succour of the Governours, driven out by the multitude, they elected him their Prince, being the first, (and indeed) the most famous, that ever governed the Syracusians. This change hapned in the second year of the threescore and twelfth Olympiad; wherein the better to establish himself, he took to wife the Daughter of Thero, who had also usurped the State of Agrigentum. Pau. l. 6.

Now this Gelon, the Son of Dinomenes, had three Brethren; Hiero, Polyzelus, and Thrasybulus: to the first of which he gave up the City of Gela, when he had obtained the Principality of Syracuse. For, after that time, all his thoughts travelled in the strengthening, beautifying, and amplifying of Syracuse. He defaced Camerina, that a little before was fallen from the obedience of the Syracusians who built it, and brought the Citizens to Syracuse. The Megarians that had moved a War against him, he overcame; the richer sort he brought unto Syracuse; and the people he sold for slaves. In like manner dealt he with other places upon the like occasion. Not long after this, Thero, a Prince of the Agrigentines, having dispossest Terillus of his City Himera; the Carthaginians were drawn into the quarrel by Anaxilus, Lord of Messena, Father-in-law to Terillus; and Gelon was also solicited by his Father-in-law, Thero. Geron was content, and in fine, after diverse conflicts, the Carthaginians and other Africans, led by Amilcar, were overthrown by Gelon: And an Hundred and fifty Thousand of them left their Bodies in Sicil. Herod. & Dio.

This Gelon it was, to whom the Athenians and Lacedæmonians sent for succour, when Xerxes with his huge Army past the Hellespont. He, for their relief having armed thirty Thousand Souldiers, and two Hundred Ships, refused nevertheless to send them into Greece, because they refused him the command of one of their Armies, either by Sea, or Land. So he used to their Embassadours only this Saying, That their Spring was withered; accounting the Army, by him prepared, to be the very flower of the Greek Nation.

The Carthaginians, after this great loss received, fearing the invasion of their own Country, sent to Gelon by their Embassadours, to desire peace, who grants it them on these conditions: That from thenceforth they should not sacrifice their Children to Saturn; that they should pay him two Thousand Talents of Silver, and present him with two armed Ships, in sign of amity. These conditions the Carthaginians, not only willingly accepted, but with the two Thouſand Talents, and the Ships for War, they ſent unto Demarata, Gelons Wife, a Crown, valued at an Hundred Talents of Gold, with other preſents. Whereby we ſee, that ſome Nations, and ſome Natures, are much the better for being well beaten. The Wars ended, and Sicil in peace, Gelon beautified the Temples of the Gods, and erected others in honour of them. So being exceedingly beloved and honoured of his Subjects, he left the world, and left for his ſucceſſor his Brother Hiero. Philiſtus and Pliny report, That when his Body was burnt, according to the cuſtome of that Age, a Dog of his, which alwayes waited on him, ran into the fire, and ſuffered himſelf to be burnt with him.

To Gelon, Hiero his Brother ſucceeded; a man Rude, Cruel, Covetous, and ſo Suſpicious of his Brethren Polyzelus, and Thraſybulus, as he ſought all means to deſtroy them. Notwithſtanding all this, by the converſation he had with Simonides, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the ſtudy of good Arts. Diverſe quarrels he had, as well with Theron of Agrigentum, as with other Cities: all which he ſhortly after compounded, and gave a notable overthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Xerxes had incited to invade Sicil, fearing the ſuccours which Gelon had prepared, to aid the Grecians againſt him. He alſo overthrew in battel Thraſydæus, the Son of Theron, and thereby reſtored the Agrigentines to their former liberty. But in the end, he loſt the love of the Syracuſians; and after he had reigned eleven years, he left the Kingdom to his Brother Thraſybulus, who became a moſt unjuſt and bloody Tyrant. Thraſybulus injoyed his Principality no longer than ten months. For, notwithſtanding the force of mercenary Souldiers; which he entertained for his Guards, he was beaten out of Syracuſe by the Citizens; to whom, being beſieged in Acradina, he reſtored the Government, and was baniſhed the Iſland. From whence he ſailed into Greece, where he died a private man, among the Locrians.

And now had the Syracuſians recovered again their former liberty, as all the reſt of the Cities did; after which they had never ſought, had the Succeſſors of Gelon inherited his vertue, as they did the Principality of Syracuſe. For in all changes of Eſtates, the preſervation ought to anſwer the acquiſition. When a liberal, valiant, and adviſed Prince, hath obtained any new Signiory, and added it to that of his own, or exalted himſelf from being a private man to the dignity of a Prince, it behoveth the Succeſſour to maintain it by the ſame way and art, by which it was gotten.

To conclude, Syracuſe (though not without blows, ere that ſhe could cleanſe her ſelf of the Creatures and Lovers of Gelon) was now again become Miſtreſs of her ſelf, and held her ſelf free, well-near threeſcore years, to the time of Dionyſius, though ſhe were in the mean while greatly endangered by a Citizen of her own, called Tindario.

Now, to prevent the greatneſs of any one among them, for the future, they deviſed a kind of baniſhment of ſuch among them, as were ſuſpected; taking pattern from the Athenian Oſtraciſme. They called this their new deviſed judgment of exile, Petaliſmus, wherein every one wrote upon an Olive-leaf (as at Athens they wrote upon ſhells) the name of him, whom he would have expelled the City. He that had moſt ſuffrages againſt him, was baniſhed for five years. Hereby in a ſhort time, it came to paſs that thoſe of judgment, and beſt able to govern the Common-weal, were, by the worſt able, either ſuppreſt, or thruſt out of the City. Yea, ſuch as feared this Law, though they had not yet felt it, withdrew themſelves as ſecretly as they could, ſeeking ſome place of more ſecurity, wherein to maintain themſelves. And good reaſon they had ſo to do; ſeeing that there is nothing ſo terrible in any State, as a powerful and authorized ignorance. But this Law laſted not very long: For their neceſſity taught them to aboliſh it, and reſtore again the wiſer ſort unto the Government; from which, the Nobility having practiced to baniſh one another, the State became altogether Popular. But after a while, being invaded by Ducetius, King of the Sicilians, that inhabited the inner part of the Iſland (who had already taken Enna, and ſome other of the Grecian Cities, and overthrown the Army of the Agragentines) the Syracuſians ſent Forces againſt him, commanded by an unworthy Citizen of theirs, called Bolcon. This their Captain made nothing ſo much haſte to find out Ducetius, againſt whom he was imployed, as he did to flee from the Army he led, as ſoon as Ducetius preſented him battel. So for want of conduct, the greateſt number of the Syracuſians periſhed.

But making better choice among thoſe whom they had baniſhed, they levy other Troops: by whom, in concluſion, Ducetius being beaten, ſubmitteth himſelf, and is conſtrained to leave the Iſland for a time. Yet it was not long ere he returned again, and built the City Collatina on the Sea-ſide.

Ducetius being dead, all the Greek Cities did in a ſort acknowledg Syracuſe, Trinacria excepted; which alſo by force of Arms, in the fourſcore and fifth Olympiad, they brought to reaſon.

But they do not long enjoy this their Superintendency. For the Citizens of Leontium, being oppreſt by them, ſeek aid from the Athenians, about the ſixth year of the Peloponneſian War. In this ſuit they prevailed by the Eloquence of Gorgias their Orator; and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to ſuccour them, under the leading of Laches, and Charœodes. To this Fleet, the Leontines, and their Partners, added one Hundred more; with which forces, and with ſome ſupplies brought by Sophocles, Pythodorus, Eurymedon, and other Athenian Captains, they invaded the Territories of the Syracuſians, and their Partiſans; wan and loſt diverſe places; took Meſſana; and, in the ſeventh year of the Peloponneſian War, loſt it again. They alſo at the ſame time attempted Hymera, but in vain. The fire of this quarrel took hold upon many Cities which did invade each others Territory with great violence. But when they had wearied themſelves on all hands, and yet could ſee none iſſue of the War, the Leontines, without the adviſe of the Athenians, came to an accord with the Syracuſians, and were admitted into their ſociety, with equal freedom. So the Athenians, who hoped to have greatned themſelves in Sicil, by the diviſion and civil War, were diſappointed of their expectation, by the good agreement of the Sicilians, and fain to be gone with the broken remainder of their Fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the cuſtome of popular Eſtates) by taking revenge upon their own Commanders. So they baniſhed Pythodorus, and Sophocles, and laid an heavy fine upon Eurymedon. Shortly after this, followed the moſt memorable War, that ever was made by the Greeks in Sicil: Which was that of the Athenians, againſt the Selinuntines and Syracuſians, in favour of the Cities of Egeſta, Leontium, and Catana. They of Selinus had oppreſt the Egeſtans; and and they of Syracuſe the Leontines, and the Catanians: Which was the ground of the War. For the Athenians undertook the protection of their old friends: And, in hatred of the Athenians, aid from Lacedæmon was ſent to the Syracuſians. The Lacedæmonians dealt plainly, having none other end, than that which they pretended, namely, to help a people of their own Tribe, that craved their ſuccour, being in diſtreſs. The Athenians ſcarce knew what to pretend: For their preparations were ſo great, as diſcovered their intent to be none other, than the Conqueſt of the whole Iſland. Yet they which had called them in, were ſo blinded with their own paſſions, that they would not believe their own eyes; which preſented unto them a Fleet and Army, far greater than the terrible report of fame had made it.

In this expedition, the City of Athens had engaged all her power; as regarding not only the greatneſs of the enterpriſe, but the neceſſity of finiſhing it in a ſhort ſpace of time. For the Lacedæmonians (as hath already been ſhewed in due place) ſtood at that time in ſuch broken terms of peace with Athens, as differed not much with open War. Wherefore it was thought neceſſary, either to ſpare coſt in this great Expedition, or altogether to forbear it: Which was like to be hindred by Wars at home, if their proceedings were ſlack abroad. And ſurely, had not the deſire of the Athenians been over-paſſionate, the arguments of Nicias had cauſed them to abſtain from ſo chargeable a buſineſs, and to reſerve their forces for a more needful uſe. But young Counſels prevailed againſt the Authority of Ancient men, that were more regardful of ſafety than of honour.

Of this buſineſs, mention hath been already made, in that which we have written of the Peloponneſian War. But what was there delivered in general terms, as not concerning the affairs of Greece, otherwiſe than by conſequence, doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter, wherein the whole State of Sicil was like to have felt a great converſion.

Though Alcibiades had prevailed againſt Nicias, in exhorting the people to this great voyage; yet Nicias, together with Alcibiades and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chief Commanders therein.

Theſe had commiſſion and direction, as well to ſuccour the Segeſtans, and to reeſtabliſh the Leontines, caſt out of their places by the Syracuſians, as alſo by force of Arms, to ſubject the Syracuſians, and all their adherents in Sicil, and compel them by tribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their ſupream Lords. To effect which, the fore-named Captains were ſent off, with an Hundred and thirty Gallies, and five Thouſand one Hundred Souldiers, beſides the thirty Ships of burden, which tranſported their Victuals, Engines, and other munitions for the War: And theſe were Athenians, Mantineans, Rhodians and Candians: There were, beſides theſe, ſix Thouſand Megarians light-armed, with thirty Horſemen.

With theſe Troops and Fleets they arrive at Rhegium, where the Rhegians refuſe to give them entry; but ſell them victuals for their Money. From thence they ſent to the Egeſtans, to know what treaſure they would contribute towards the War, ſeeing for their ſakes they had entered thereinto. But they found by their anſwers, that theſe Egeſtans were poor, and that they had abuſed the Athenian Embaſſadours with falſe ſhews of Gold, having in all but thirty Talents. The Athenians further were diſcouraged, when they found that the Rhegians their ancient friends, and allied unto the Leontines, refuſed to truſt them within their Walls. Hereupon Nicias adviſeth to depart towards the Selinuntines, and to force them, or perſwade them to an agreement with the Egeſtans; as likewiſe to ſee what diſburſements the Egeſtans could make; and ſo return again into Greece, and not to waſte Athens in a needleſs War. Alcibiades, on the other ſide, would ſollicite the Cities of Sicil to confederacy againſt the Syracuſians and Silinuntines, whereby to force them unto reſtitution of all that they had taken from the Leontines. Lamachus he perſwades them to aſſail Syracuſe it ſelf, before it were prepared againſt them. But in the end (being excluded out of divers Cities) they ſurprize Catana: and there they take new counſel how to proceed. Thence they imployed Nicias to thoſe of Egeſta, who received from them thirty Talents towards his charges; and one hundred and twenty Talents more there were of the ſpoils they had gotten in the Iſland. Thus the Summer being ſpent in idle conſultations, and vain attempts, the Athenians prepare to aſſail Syracuſe. But Alcibiades having been accuſed at home, in his abſence, was ſent for back by the Athenians to make his anſwer: and the Army was left to the conduct of Nicias and Lamachus. Theſe Commanders obtain a Landing place very near unto Syracuſe, by this device.

They imploy to Syracuſe an inhabitant of Catana, whom they truſt; and inſtruct him, to promiſe unto the Syracuſians, that he would deliver into their hands all the Athenians within Catana. Hereupon the Syracuſians draw thitherward with their beſt forces. But in the mean while, the Athenians, ſetting ſail from Catana, arrive at Syracuſe, where they land at fair eaſe, and fortifie themſelves againſt the Town. Shortly after this, they fight, and the Syracuſians had the loſs: but the Athenians, wanting Horſe, could not purſue their victory to any great effect. They then retire themſelves, with a reſolution to refreſh their Army at Catana, for the Winter-ſeaſon. From thence they made an attempt upon Meſſana, hoping to have taken it by an intelligence, but in vain. For Alcibiades had diſcovered ſuch as were Traitors within the City to the Meſſenians. This he now did, in deſpight of his own Citizens, the Athenians, becauſe they had recalled him from his command, with a purpoſe either to have put him to death, or to have baniſhed him: whereof being aſſured by his friends, he took his way towards the Lacedæmonians, and to them he gave miſchievous counſel againſt his Country. While this Winter yet laſted, the Syracuſians ſent Embaſſadors to Lacedæmon, and Corinth, for aid: as likewiſe the Athenian Captains in Sicil, ſend to Athens for ſupplies. Which both the one and the other obtained.

In the Spring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth year of the Peloponneſian War) the Athenians in Sicil ſail from the Port of Catana to Megara, forſaken of the Inhabitants; from whence, forraging the Country, they obtain ſome ſmall victories over the ſtragling Syracuſians: and at their return to Catana, they receive a ſupply of two hundred men at Arms, but without Horſe, which they hoped to furniſh in the Iſland from the Segeſtans, and other their adherents: They were alſo ſtrengthened with a company of Archers, and with three hundred Talents in Mony.

Hereupon they take courage, and incamp near Syracuſe, upon the banks of the great Port, repelling the Syracuſians, that ſallied to impeach their intrenchments.

intrenchments. They also received from their Confederates four hundred other Horse-men, with two hundred other Horse, to mount their men at Arms. Syracuse was now in effect blockt up, so as hardly any succours could enter, but such as were able to force their passage: yet the Athenians receive divers losses: among which it was not the least, that Lamachus, one of their best Commanders, was slain.

In the mean while, Gylippus and Python, with the Lacedæmonian and Corinthian forces, arrive, and take land at Hymera. The Citizens of Hymera, and of Gela, together with the Selinuntines, joyn with them; so that with these and his own Troops, Gylippus adventured to march over-land toward Syracuse. The Syracusians send a part of their forces to meet him, and conduct him. The Athenians prepare to encounter them, expecting his arrival near unto the City upon a place of advantage. At the first encounter they had the better of their enemies, by reason that the Syracusian Horse-men could not come to fight in those streights: but soon after, Gylippus charging them again, brake them, and constrained Nicias to fortifie himself within his Camp. Whereupon Nicias made the state of his affairs known, by his Letters to the Athenians; shewing, that without great supplies by Sea and Land, the enterprise would be lost, together with the small Army remaining. These Letters received, the Athenians appoint two other Generals, Eurymedon and Demosthenes, to joyn with Nicias: the one they dispatch presently with some supplies; the other they send after him in the Spring following.

In the mean while, Gylippus at Syracuse, fights with the Athenians both by Sea and Land, sometimes with ill, and at other times with good success: but in conclusion, he took from their Fort, near unto Syracuse, the Promontory called Plymmyrium; wherein the Athenians lost their treasure, and a great part of all their provisions. Notwithstanding which loss, and that the Athenians themselves, in Greece, were (in effect) besieged within Athens, by the Lacedæmonians; yet were they most obstinate in prosecuting the War in Sicil, and dispatch away Demosthenes with new succours. Demosthenes, in his way towards Sicil, encountred with Polyanthes the Corinthian, with his Fleet: both the Captains being bound for Sicil, the one to succour Nicias, the other Gylippus. The loss between them was in effect equal; and neither so broken, but that each of them prosecuted the enterprise they had in hand. But before the succours arrived to either, Gylippus and Ariston had assailed the Athenians in the great Port of Syracuse, and in a Sea fight put them to the worst, to the great discouragement of the Athenians. On the neck of this, Demosthenes arrived with threescore and thirteen Gallies, charged with Foot-men; and (blaming the sloath of Nicias) he invaded the Syracusians the same day that he arrived. But he made more haste than he had good speed, being shamefully beaten, and repulsed with great loss. Hereupon Demosthenes and Eurymedon determine to rise up from before Syracuse, and return to the succour of Athens: but Nicias disputed to the contrary, pretending that he had good intelligence within Syracuse, whereby he learned, that the Town could not long hold out.

Whatsoever Nicias his intelligence was; upon the arrival of a new supply into the Town, the Athenians had all consented to depart, and to lodge at Catana: had not an Eclipse of the Moon, boding (as was thought) ill success, caused them to defer their departure. But this superstition cost them dear. For the Syracusians, Lacedæmonians, and Corinthians, with threescore and seventeen sail of Gallies, entred the great Port of Syracuse, wherein the Athenians kept their Fleet, and whereon they had fortified themselves. The Athenians in the same Port encountred them with fourscore and six Gallies, commanded by Eurymedon: in which the Athenian Fleet was beaten, by the lesser number, and Eurymedon slain. Now, though it were so, that the Syracusians received the more loss by Land (for the fight was general) yet when the Athenians were beaten by Sea, in which kind they thought themselves invincible, they were wonderfully cast down. For it was well said of Gylippus, to the Syracusians; When any People do find themselves vanquished in that manner of fight, and with those weapons, in which they perswade themselves that they exceed all others, they not only lose their reputation, but their courage. The Athenians, besides the Gallies sunk and wrackt, had seventeen taken, and possest by the Enemy: and with great labour and loss they defended the rest from being fired, having drawn them within a Palisado, in one corner of the Port, unadvisedly: for it is as contrary to a Sea-War, to thrust Ships into a streight room and corner, as it is to scatter Foot in a plain field against Horse; the one subsisting by being at large, the other by close imbattailing.

The Syracusians, having now weakned the Athenian Fleet, resolve to imprison them within the Port. And to that purpose they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Haven, being about a Mile over, and there they came to Anchor; filling the out-let with all manner of Vessels; which they man most strongly, because the Athenians, being now made desperate, should not with double ranks of Gallies break through the Syracusian Fleet; which lay but single, because they were forc't to range themselves over all the Out-let of the Port. They therefore not only mored themselves strongly by their Anchors, but chained the sides of their Gallies together, and lay behind them again certain Ships, which served in the former War for Victuallers: to the end, that if any of their Gallies were sunk; or the chain, which joyned them to their fellows, broken; the Athenians might yet find themselves a second time, intangled and arrested. To disorder also those Athenian Gallies, which came on in form of a wedge, to break through, and force a passage, the Syracusians had left within these Gallies and Ships, inchained together, a certain number of loose ones, to stop their course and fury. For where the way of any Vessel, using Oar or Sails, is broken, and their speed foreslowed, they cannot force with any weight and violence the resistance opposing.

On the other side, the Athenians knew that they were utterly lost, except with an invincible resolution they could make their way, and break down this great Bridge of Boats; or (at least) force a passage through them in some part or other: which they resolve to hazard, with all their Shipping (to the number of one Hundred and Ten of all sorts) and with all the strength of their Land-Army, in them imbarqued. But the Gallies, which were within the Bridge of Boats, did so disorder the Athenian Fleet; ere they came to force the Bridge, as albeit some few of them had broken through the the chains, yet being stopt with the Ships without, and assailed by other loose Gallies of the Syracusians, sians, which where purposely left at large in the Sea, they were either taken or sunk. Three great disadvantages, the Athenians had: the first, that fighting within a Haven, and (as it were) in a Streight, they had no room to turn themselves, nor to free themselves one from another, being intangled; the second, that having overpestered their Gallies with Souldiers, who used offensive Arms of Darts and Slings, they had not place upon the Decks to stretch their Arms; the third was, the discomfortable end for which they fought, namely, to force a passage, by which they might save themselves by running away. To be short, the fight was no less terrible then the confusion: the slaughter great on all sides; and the noise, and the cries, so lowd and lamentable, as that no direction could be heard. But in the end, the Athenians, as many as survived, were beaten back to the Land, with loss of Threescore of their Gallies, broken, and sunk, or abandoned. The Syracusians did also lose Twenty of theirs, with Python, Commander of the Corinthians. The rest of the Athenian Gallies, running themselves into the bottom of the Port, saved themselves by the help and countenance of the Land-Army there fortified. In this desperate estate, the Athenian Commanders go to Counsel. Demosthenes perswades them to furnish with fresh Souldiers those few Gallies which remained; and while the Syracusians were triumphing, and made secure by their present victory, to set upon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to return to Athens. This was no ill counsel. For, as we have heard of many great Captains (yea, the greatest number of all that have been victorious) that have neglected the speedy prosecution of a beaten Enemy; so might we produce many examples of those, who having slept securely in the bosome of good success, have been suddenly awaked, by the re-allied Companies of a broken Army, and have thereby lost again all the honour and advantage formerly gotten. But Nicias opposeth the advice of Demosthenes: Others say, that the Seamen were against it. Whereupon abandoning their Gallies, they all resolve to march over Land to the Cities of their Confederates, till some more favourable fortune should call them thence. On the other side, Gylippus, and other the Lacedæmonian and Corinthian Captains, with Hermocrates, exhort the Syracusians to put themselves presently into the Field, and to stop all the passages, leading to those Cities of their Enemies, to which the Athenians might make retrait. But many were weary; and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had done enough for the present. Which humour in some of our Commanders at Cadez, lost us both the Indian Fleet, and the spoils of many other neighbour places. Hermocrates, the Syracusians, finding it a lost labour, perswade his Countrymen to any hasty prosecution, devised this good stratagem, whereby to gain time; not doubting, but that after a day or two, he should draw them willingly out. He sent two or three Horse-men out of Syracuse by night, willing them to find Nicias, and after they had assured him, that they were of the Athenians faction) to give him advice not to march away over-hastily from the place, wherein he was fortified; alledging that the Syracusians had lodged their Army, which could not long stay there, upon the passages and places of advantage, leading towards the Cities of their Allies. These tidings Nicias easily believed, and put off his journey to the third day. For men newly beaten, are (for the most part) more fearful then wise; and to them, every Thistle in the Field appears, by night, a man at Arms.

The third day (leaving all their Gallies, and all their baggage) they remove; being pierced and pursued with the lamentable out-cries of those that were sick and hurt: whom they abandon to the cure of their Enemies Swords. The rest march away, to the number of Forty Thousand; and make their first passage by force, over the River of Anapus, notwithstanding the opposition of their Enemies. But being every day charged in their marches, and by the Syracusian Horse-men, beaten in from forraging and provision of food, they grow weak and heartless. The Syracusians also possess the Mountain Lepas, by which they were to pass towards Camerina, and thereby force them to fall back again towards the Sea-coast, and to take what way they could: being unable to proceed in their journey intended. Many hard shifts they made, in difficult passages, and blind marches by Night; which they were fain to endure, as having none other means to escape from the Enemy that pursued them and held them waking with continual skirmishing. To keep all in order, Nicias undertook the leading of the Vaunt-guard; and Demosthenes conducted the Rear. At the River Erineus, Nicias takes the start of a whole nights march; leaving Demosthenes to make the retreat: who being incompassed, and overpress with numbers, in the end renders himself. The conditions he obtained, were far better than he could have hoped for; and the faith of his enemies far worse than he suspected. For he was afterward, with Nicias murdered in prison. The Army of Demosthenes being dissolved, they pursued Nicias with the greater courage: who being utterly broken upon the passage of the River Assinarus, rendered himself to Gylippus, upon honest conditions. Gylippus fought to preserve him, and to have had the honour to have brought these two to Sparta; Nicias, as a noble Enemy to the Lacedæmonians, and who, at the overthrow which they received at Pylus by the Athenians, had saved the lives of the vanquished; Demosthenes, as one that had done to Lacedæmon the greatest hurt. Hermocrates also, the Commander of the Syracusian Army dissawded the rest, by all the art he had, from using any barbarous violence, after so noble a victory. But the cruel and cowardly sort, (cowardise and cruelty being inseparable passions) prevailed, and caused these brave Captains to be miserably murdered; one part of their Souldiers to be starved in loathsome Prisons; and the rest, sold for Slaves. This was the success of the Sicilian War: which took end at the River Assinarus, the Four and Twentieth Day of May, in the Fourscore and Eleventh Olympiad.

The Athenian being beaten out of Sicil; the Egestans (for whose defence against the Selinuntines, this late War had been taken in hand) fearing the victorious Syracusians, sought help from the Carthaginians; to whom they offered themselves, and their City, as their Vassals. The Carthaginians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Dominion in Sicil, yet considering the prosperity of the Syracusians, and their late victories over the Athenians, they stayed a while to dispute of the matter, whether they should refuse or accept the offer made unto them: for the Selinuntines were straightly allied to the Syracusians, as may appear by what is past. In the end the Senators of Carthage resolve upon the enterprise; and (by a trick of their Punick wit) to separate the Syracuſians from the Selinuntines they ſend Embaſſadours to Syracuſe: praying that City, as in the behalf of the Egeſtans, to compel the Selinuntines to take reaſon, and to reſt content with ſo much of the Lands in queſtion, as they of Syracuſe ſhould think meet to allow them. The Syracuſians approved the motion; for it tended to their own honour. But the Selinuntines would make no ſuch appointment: rather they took it ill, that the Syracuſians, with whom they had run one courſe of fortune, in the Athenian War, ſhould offer to trouble them, by interpoſing as Arbitrators, in a buſineſs that themſelves could end by force. This was right as the Carthaginians would have it. For now could they of Selinus with an ill grace crave aid of Syracuſe; and the Syracuſians as ill grant it unto thoſe, that had refuſed to ſtand to the Arbitrament, which the Carthaginians would have put into their hands. Hereupon, an Army of three Hundred Thouſand men is ſet out from Carthage, under the Conduct of Hannibal, Nephew to that Amilcar, who (as you have heard before) was overthrown with the great Carthaginian Army at Himera by Gelon. Hannibal was exceeding greedy of this imployment, that he might take revenge as well of his Uncles, as of his Fathers death; the one of them having been ſlain by the Himerans, the other by thoſe of Selinus. Both the Cities, Hannibal, in this War, won by force of Arms, ſackt them, and burnt them; and having taken Three Thouſand of the Himerans Priſoners, he cauſed them to be led unto the place, where Amilcar was ſlain, and buried them there.

Syra-

After this followed ſome trouble at Syracuſe occaſioned by the baniſhment of Hermocrates, who had lately been General of the Syracuſian Forces, againſt the Athenians. The malice of his Enemies had ſo far prevailed with the ungrateful Multitude, that he was condemned to exile for his meer vertue, at ſuch a time as he was aiding the Lacedæmonians, in their War againſt Athens: wherein he did great ſervice. All the honeſter ſort within Syracuſe were ſorry for their injury done unto him, and ſought to have him repealed. Hermocrates himſelf, returned into Sicil, gathered an Army of Six Thouſand; with which he began to repair Selinus; and by many noble actions laboured to win the love of his Citizens. But the faction that oppoſed him was the ſtronger. Wherefore he was adviſed to ſeize upon a Gate of Syracuſe, with ſome ſtrength of men; whereby his friends within the Town, might have the better means to riſe againſt the adverſe party. This he did: but preſently the Multitude fell to Arms, and ſet upon him; in which conflict he was ſlain. But his Son-in-law, Dionyſius, ſhall make them wiſh Hermocrates alive again.

†. IV.

Of Dionyſius the Tyrant: and others, following him, in Syracuſe.

THE Syracuſians had enjoyed their liberty about Threeſcore Years, from the death of Thraſybulus, to the death of Hermocrates: At which time Dionyſius was raiſed up by God, to take revenge, as well of their cruelty toward Strangers, as of their ingratitude towards their own beſt Citizens. For before the time of Dionyſius, they had made it their paſtime, to reward the vertue of their worthieſt Commanders with death, or diſgrace: Which cuſtom they muſt now be taught to amend.

Dionyſius obtained the principality of Syracuſe, by the ſame degrees, that many others, before him, had made themſelves Maſters of other Cities, and of Syracuſe it ſelf. For, being made Prætor, and commanding their Armies againſt the Carthaginians, and other their enemies, he behaved himſelf ſo well, that he got a general love among the People, and men of War. Then began he to follow the example of Piſiſtratus, that made himſelf Lord of Athens; obtaining a Band of Six Hundred men, to defend his Perſon: Under pretence, that his private Enemies, being traiterouſly affected to the State of Syracuſe, had laid plots how to Murder him, becauſe of his good ſervices. He doubled the pay of his Souldiers; alledging, that it would incourage them to fight manfully: But intending thereby to aſſure them to himſelf. He perſwaded the Citizens, to call home, out of exile, thoſe that had been baniſhed, which were the beſt men of Syracuſe; and theſe were afterwards at his devotion, as obliged unto him by ſo great a benefit. His firſt favour, among the Syracuſians, grew from his accuſation of the principal men. It is the delight of baſe People to reign over their betters: Wherefore, gladly did he help them to break down, as Fetters impriſoning their liberty, the Bars that held it under ſafe cuſtody. Long it was not, ere the chief Citizens had found whereat he aimed. But what they ſaw, the People would not ſee: And ſome that were needy, and knew not how to get Offices without his help, were willing to help him, though they knew his purpoſes to be ſuch, as would make all the City to ſmart. He began early to hunt after the Tyranny; being but Five and Twenty Years of age when he obtained it: Belike it was his deſire to reign long. His firſt work, of making himſelf abſolute Lord in Syracuſe, was, the poſſeſſion of the Citadel, wherein was much good Proviſion, and under it the Gallies were mored. This he obtained by allowance of the People; and having obtained this, he cared for no more, but declared himſelf without all ſhame or fear. The Army the chief Citizens reſtored by him from baniſhment; all the needy ſort within Syracuſe, that could not thrive by honeſt courſes; and ſome Neighbour-Towns, bound unto him, either for his help in War, or for eſtabliſhing the faction, reigning at that preſent; were wholly affected to his aſſiſtance. Having therefore gotten the Citadel into his hands, he needed no more, ſave to aſſure what he had already. He ſtrengthened himſelf by divers Marragies; taking firſt to Wife the Daughter of Hermocrates; and after her, two at once; the one a Locrian, Doris, by whom he had Dionyſius, his Succeſſor; the other, Ariſtomache, the Daughter of Hipparinus, and Siſter to Dion, honourable men in Syracuſe; which bare unto him many Children, that ſerved to fortifie him with new alliances.

Yet it was not long, ere ſome of the Syracuſians (envying his proſperity) incited the Multitude, and took Arms againſt him, even in the novelty of his Rule. But their enterpriſe was more paſſionately, than wiſely governed. He had ſhamefully been beaten by the Carthaginians at Gela: which, as it vexed the Sicilian men at Arms, making them ſuſpect that it was his purpoſe to let the Carthaginians waſte all, that he might afterwards take take poſſeſſion of the deſolate places; ſo it inflamed them with a deſire to free themſelves from his tyranny. They departed therefore from him, and marched haſtily to Syracuſe, where they found friends to help them: There they forced his Pallace, ranſaked his treaſures, and ſo ſhamefully abuſed his Wife, that for the grief thereof ſhe poiſoned her ſelf. But he followed their heels apace; and firing a Gate of the City by Night, entered ſoon enough to take revenge, by making a ſpeedy riddance of them. For he ſpared none of his known, no nor of his ſuſpected Enemies. After that, he grew ſo doubtful of his life, as he never durſt truſt Barber to trim him, nor any Perſon, no ſo much as his Brother, to enter into his Chamber, unſtript and ſearched. He was the greateſt Robber of the People that ever reigned in any State, and withall the moſt unreſpectively cruel.

After this, he ſeperated with Fortification that part of the City, called the Iſland, from the reſt; like as the Spaniard did the Citadel of Antwerp: Therein he lodged his Treaſures, and his Guards.

He then began to make War upon the free Cities of Sicil: But while he lay before Herbeſſe, an in-land Town, the Syracuſians rebelled againſt him; ſo, as with great difficulty he recovered his Citadel: From whence, having allured the old Souldiers of the Companions, who forced their paſſage through the City, with One Thouſand and Two Hundred Horſe, he again recovered the Maſtery over the Syracuſians. And when a Multitude of them were buſied in gathering in their Harveſt, he diſarmed all the Towns-men remaining, and new ſtrengthened the Fort of the Iſland with a double Wall. He incloſed that part alſo, called Epipoles; which, with Threeſcore Thouſand Labourers, he finiſhed within Three Weeks, being two Leagues incompaſs. He then built Two Hundred new Gallies; and repaired one Hundred and Ten of the old; forged One Hundred and Forty Thouſand Targets, with as many Swords, and Head-pieces, with Fourteen Thouſand Corſlets, and all other ſutable Arms. Which done, he ſent word to the Carthaginians (greatly infeebled by the Plague) That except they would abandon the Greek Towns, which they held in Sicil, he would make War upon them: And, not ſtaying for anſwer, he took the ſpoil of all the Phœnician Ships, and Merchandize, within his Ports; as King Philip the Second did of our Engliſh, before the War in our late Queens time. He then goes to the Field with Fourſcore Thouſand Foot, and Three Thouſand Horſe, and ſends his Brother Leptines to Sea, with Two Hundred Gallies, and Five Hundred Ships of burden. Moſt of the Towns which held for Carthage yielded unto him; ſaving Panormus, Segeſta or Egeſta, Ancyra, Motya, and Eutella. Of theſe, he firſt wan Motya by aſſault, and put all therein to the Sword; but before Egeſta he loſt a great part of his Army, by a ſally of the Citizens. In the mean while Himilco arrives; but, ere he took Land, he loſt in a Fight at Sea, with Leptines, Fifty Ships of War, and Five Thouſand Souldiers, beſides many Ships of burthen. This notwithſtanding, he recovered again Motya upon his firſt deſcent. From thence marching towards Meſſana, he took Lypara, and (ſoon after) Meſſana, and razed it to the ground. Now began Dionyſius greatly to doubt his eſtate. He therefore fortified all the places he could, in the Territory of the Leontines, by which he ſuppoſed that Himilco would paſs toward Syracuſe; and he himſelf took the Field again, with Four and Thirty Thouſand Foot; and One Thouſand Horſe. Now, hearing that Himilco had divided his Army into two parts, marching with the one half over-land, and ſending Mago with the other by Sea: He ſent Leptines, his Brother, to encounter Mago. But Leptines was utterly beaten by the Carthaginians; Twenty Thouſand of his men were ſlain, and an Hundred of his Gallies loſt. It is very ſtrange, and hardly credible, which yet good Authors tell us; that one City ſhould be able to furniſh Five Hundred Sail of Ships, and two Hundred Gallies: (for, ſo many did Syracuſe Arm in this War) and more ſtrange it is, that in a Battail at Sea, without any great Artillery, or Muſquet-ſhot, Twenty Thouſand ſhould be ſlain in one Fight. In all our Fights againſt the Turks, of which that at Lepanto was the moſt notable, we hear of no ſuch number loſt; nor in any other Fight by Sea, that ever happened in our age, nor before us. When Charles the Fifth went to Beſiege Algeir, he had in all his Fleet, Tranſporters and others, but Two Hundred and Fifty Sail of Ships, and Threeſcore and Five Gallies: For the furniſhing of which Fleet, he ſought help from all the Cities and Ports of Spain, Naples, and the reſt of Italy. But in old times it was the manner to carry into the Field, upon extremity, as many as were needful, of all that could bear Arms, giving them little wages, or other allowance: In our dayes it is not ſo; neither indeed, is it often requiſite. Upon this overthrow, Dionyſius poſts away to Syracuſe, to ſtrengthen it: Himilco follows him, and Beſiegeth the Town by Land and Sea. But the Tyrant, having received aid from the Lacedæmonians, under the conduct of Pharacidas, puts himſelf to Sea, to make Proviſion for his Citizens, who, in his abſence, take Twenty of the Carthaginian Gallies, and ſink Four. Hereupon, finding their own ſucceſs proſperous, and that of the Tyrant exceeding ill, having alſo at the preſent Weapons in their hands, they conſult how to recover their liberty. And this they had done, had not Pharacidas the Lacedæmonian reſiſted them. It alſo fell out to his exceeding advantage, that the Plague was ſo increaſed, and ſo violent among the Carthaginians, as it is ſaid, that above an Hundred Thouſand of them died thereof. He therefore, with the power that he could gather together, ſets upon them both by Sea and Land; and having ſlain great numbers of them, forceth Himilco to deſire Peace. This Peace Dionyſius ſold him for ſo great Sum of Money; on condition, that he ſhould ſteal away with his Carthaginians only: which he baſely accepted, betraying the reſt of the Africans and Spaniards. Yet no faith was kept with him: For he was purſued, and left many of his Carthaginians behind him. The reſt of the Africans fell under the Swords of their Enemies; only the Spaniards, after they had a while bravely defended themſelves, were (after their ſubmiſſion) entertained, and ſerved the Conquerour.

May ſuch examples of perfidious dealing I have noted in other places, and can hardly forbear to deliver unto memory the like practices, when they meet with their matches: That which hapned unto Monſieur de Piles, was very ſutable to this treachery, wherewith Dionyſius purſued Himilco, I was preſent when De Piles related the injury done unto him. He had rendered St. John d' Angelie to the French King Charles the Ninth, who beſieged him therein. He rendered it, upon promiſe made by the faith of a King, that he ſhould be ſuffered to depart in safety, with all his followers. Yet in presence of the King himself, of the Duke of Anjou his Brother, General of his Army, of the Queen Mother, and of divers Dukes and Marshals of France, he was set upon and broken in his March; spoiled of all that he had, and forced to save his life by flight; leaving the most of his Souldiers dead upon the place; the Kings hand and faith warranting him to march away with Ensigns displayd and with-all his Goods and Provisions, no whit availing him. It needs not therefore seem strange, that an Heathen Tyrant should thus break his faith, since Kings, professing Christianity, are bold to do the like, or command their Captains to do it for them.

Dionysius after this great victory, took care to re-edifie Messana. Mago who stayed in Sicil, to hold up the Carthaginians therein, is again beaten by Dionysius; who is also beaten by the Tauromenians. A new supply of Fourscore Thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to Mago, but these take Eggs for their Money, and make Peace with Dionysius, leaving the Sicilians in Tauromenium, to shift for themselves: Whom Dionysius, after a long Siege, overcame, and gave their City to the Mercenary Souldiers.

He then past into Italy, obtained divers Victories there, brought the Rhegians on their Knees, forced them to pay him one Hundred and Fourscore Thousand Crowns, to furnish him with Threescore Gallies, and put in an Hundred Pledges, for assurance of their future observance of Covenants. This he did, not with any purpose to perform unto them the Peace that they had so dearly bought; but that having taken from them their Gallies, he might Besiege them, and ruine them utterly, with the more ease. Now to the end he might not, without some colour, falsifie the faith that he had given to them; he pretended to want Victual for his Army, at such time as he seemed ready to depart out of Italy, and sent to them to furnish him therewith, promising to return them the like quantity at his coming home to Syracuse.

His resolution was, that if they refused to furnish him, he would then make their refusal the cause of his quarrel; If they yielded to aid him with the proportion which he desired, that then they should not be able, for want of Food, to endure a Siege any long time against him. For, to ruine them he had fully determined, at what price so ever. And great reason he had to take revenge of them, if he had done it fairly, and without breach of faith. For when in the beginning of his Reign, he desired them to bestow a Daughter of some of their Nobility upon him for a Wife; they answered that they had not any one fit for him, save the Hangmans Daughter. Princes do rather pardon ill deeds, than villanous words. Alexander the Great forgave many sharp Swords, but never any sharp Tongues; no, though they told him but truly of his errours. And certainly, it belongs to those that have warrant from God, to reprehend Princes; and to none else, especially in publick.

It is said, that Henry the Fourth of France, had his heart more inflamed against the Duke of Biron, for his over-bold and biting taunts, that he used against him before Amiens, than for his conspiracy with the Spaniard or Savoyan: for he had pardoned 10000 of such as had gone farther, and drawn their Swords against him. The contemptuous words that Sir John Parrot used of our late Queen Elizabeth, were his ruine; and not the counterfeit letter of the Romish Priest produced against him. So fared it with some other, greater than he, that thereby ran the same, and a worse fortune, soon after.

To be short, he made them know new Bread from old. He assaulted their Town on all sides, which he continued to do Eleven Months, till he won it by force. He used his Victory without mercy, specially against Phyton, who had commanded within it.

Some other Wars he made with the Carthaginians, after the taking and razing of this City; and those with variable success. For, as in one encounter he slew Mago, with Ten Thousand Africans: So the Son of Mago beat him, and slew his Brother Leptines, with Fourteen Thousand of his Souldiers. After which he bought his Peace of the Carthaginians, as they had formerly done of him; following therein the advice of Prosperity and Adversity, as all Kings and States do.

When he had Reigned Eight and Thirty Years, he died: Some say in his Bed, peaceably, which is the most likely, though others report it otherwise. A cruel man he was, and a faithless; a great Poet, but a foolish one. He entertained Plato a while, but afterward, for speaking against his Tyranny, he gave order to have him slain, or sold for a Slave. For he could endure no man that flattered him not beyond measure. His Parasites therefore stiled his cruelty, The hate of evil men; and his lawless slaughters, The ornaments and effects of his justice. True it is, that flatterers are a kind of Vermine, which poison all the Princes of the World; and yet they prosper better than the worthiest and valiantest men do: And I wonder not at it, for it is a World: And as our Saviour Christ hath told us, The World will love her own.

To this Dionysius, his Son of the same name succeeded, and inherited both his Kingdom and his Vices. To win the love of the People, he pardoned, and released out of Prison, a great number of Persons, by his Father lockt up and condemned. Withall, he remitted unto his Citizens divers payments, by his Father imposed upon them. Which done, and thereby hoping that he had fastned unto himself the Peoples affections; he cast off the Sheeps skin, and put on that of the Wolf. For being jealous of his own Brethren, as men of more vertue than himself, he caused them all to be slain; and all the kindred that they had by their Mothers side. For Dionysius his Father (as hath been said) had two Wives; Doris of Locris, and Aristomache a Syracusian, the Sister of Dion, which Brother-in-law of his he greatly enriched.

By Doris he had this Dionysius, who succeeded unto him: and by Aristomache he had two Sons and two Daughters, of which the elder, called Sophrosayne, he gave in Marriage to his eldest Son, and her half-Brother Dionysius; the younger, called Areta, he bestowed on his Brother Theorides: after whose death Dion took her to Wife, being his Neece.

This Dion, a just and valiant man, finding that Dionysius had abandoned all exercise of vertue, and that he was wholly given over to sensuality, prevailed so much with Plato, whose Disciple he had been, as he drew him into Sicil, to instruct the young King. And having perswaded the King to entertain him, he wrought so well with him, as

Dionysius

Dionyſius began to change condition; to change Tyranny into Monarchy: And to hold the Principality that he had, rather by the love of his People, and his National Laws, than by the violence of his Guards and Garisons. But this goodneſs of his laſted not long. For Philiſtus the Hiſtorian, and other his Paraſites; that hated Dions ſeverity, wrought him out of the Tyrants favour, and cauſed him ſoon after to be baniſhed out of Sicil, to the great grief of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had made offer to the King, either to compound the quarrels between him and the Carthaginians, of whom Dionyſius ſtood in great fear; or (at leaſt) if they refuſed it, to furniſh him with Fifty Gallies at his own charge, during the War againſt them: His enemies found means, by ſiniſter interpretation, to convert his good will into matter of Treaſon. They told Dionyſius, that all the great commendations, given of Plato, had tended to none other end; than to ſoften his mind, and to make him neglect his own affairs, by the ſtudy of Philoſophy; whilſt Dion in the mean time having furniſhed Fifty Gallies under colour of the Kings ſervice, had it in his own power either to deliver to the Syracuſians their former liberty, or to make himſelf Lord and Soveraign of their State.

It is likely, that the honeſt and liberal offer which he made, to ſerve the King with ſo great a preparation, at his own charge, begot him many Enemies. For they that had ſerved the King for none other end than to raiſe and enrich themſelves, and had already been raiſed and enriched, thought themſelves bound to make the ſame offer that Dion had made, if the King had had the grace to conceive it aright. But the covetous and ignorant cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring that Dion had, were bold to ſtile his Love and Liberality, Pride and Preſumption; and heartned the young King in his oppreſſing, and eating up his own People, of whoſe ſpoils they themſelves ſhared no ſmall portion. I have heard it, That when Charles the Fifth had the repulſe at Algier, in Africa, Ferdinando Corteſe, one of the braveſt men that ever Spain brought forth, offered unto the Emperour, to continue the Siege at his own charge. But he had never good day after it. For they that envied his Victories, and his Conqueſt of Mexico in the Weſt-Indies, perſwaded the Emperour, that Corteſe ſought to value himſelf above him; and to have it ſaid, that what the Emperour could not, Corteſe had effected, and therefore was more worthy of the Empire, than he that had it.

When Dion was newly baniſhed, the Tyrant was contented at firſt to ſend him the Revenues of his Lands, and permit him to diſpoſe of his moveables at his own pleaſure: Not without giving hope to recal him in ſhort time. Had he continued in this good mood, like enough it is, that Dion would have been well pleaſed to live well, as he did, at Athens. But after ſome time, Dionyſius made Port-ſale of this Noble-mans goods, and thereby urged him to take another courſe, even to ſeek the reſtitution of his Country to liberty. The vertues of Dion, eſpecially his great Liberality, had purchaſed much Love in Greece. This Love made him ſuſpected and hated of the Tyrant: But it ſtood him in good ſtead, when he ſought to raiſe men, with whoſe help he might return into Sicil. Yet he got not above Eight Hundred (for he carried the matter cloſely) to follow him in his adventure. But many of them were men of quality, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did he doubt of finding in Syracuſe, as many as ſhould be needful, that would readily aſſiſt him. Therefore he landed boldly in Sicil, marched to Syracuſe, entered the City without reſiſtance, Armed the Multitude, and won all, ſave the Citadel.

Dionyſius was then abſent in Italy, but he quickly had advertiſement of his dangerous accident. Wherefore he returned haſtily to Syracuſe: Whence, after many vain Treaties of Peace, and ſome forceable attempts to recover the Town, he was fain to depart; leaving yet a Caſtle to the Cuſtody of Apollocrates his eldeſt Son. Yet ere he went, his Minion Philiſtus, coming with a ſtrength of men to aſſiſt him, was beaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recovery of his Countries liberty, had the ſame reward that all worthy men have had from popular Eſtates. He was diſgraced, aſſaulted and forced to abandon the City. He retired himſelf to the Leontines, who received him with great joy. Soon after his departure from Syracuſe, new Troops enter the Caſtle: They ſally out, aſſail, ſpoil, and burn a great part of the City. Dion is ſent for, with humble requeſt: Yet, ere he could arrive, Dionyſius his Souldiers were retired; and the Towns-men thinking themſelves ſecure, ſhut the Gates againſt Dion. But the next Night they of the Caſtle ſally out again, with greater fury than ever; they kill Man, Woman, and Child, and ſet fire in all parts of the Town. In this their extremity Dion comes the ſecond time to their ſuccour; the love of his Countrey ſurmounting all the injuries that he had received. He ſets upon the Garriſon of the Caſtle, with the one part of his Army; and quencheth the fire every where kindled, with the other part. In concluſion, after he had Conquered both the Fire and the Sword, that had well near burnt to aſhes, and depopulated Syracuſe, he recovered the Caſtle, with the munition and furniture thereof, and ſent Apollocrates after Dionyſius his Father into Italy. But their malice, of whom he had beſt deſerved, and whom he had loved moſt, gave an untimely end to his dayes. For he was ſoon after his Victory, murdered by Gylippus; who after he had with ill ſucceſs, awhile governed Syracuſe, was ſlain with the ſame Dagger, with which he had murdered Dion.

Ten Years after the death of Dion, Dionyſius, with the aſſiſtance of his friends in Italy, recovers his Eſtate; and returns to Syracuſe, driving Nyſæus thence, whom he found Governour therein. The better ſort of the Citizens, fearing more then ever, his cruelty, flee to Icetes, a Syracuſian born, and then ruling the Leontines. Icetes enters into confederacy with the Carthaginians, hoping by their aſſiſtance, not only to prevail againſt Dionyſius; but by the hatred of the Syracuſians towards Dionyſius, to make him alſo Lord of their City. The Syracuſians, being deſervedly afflicted on all ſides, ſend to the Corinthians for ſuccour. Icetes alſo ſends thither, and diſſwades the Corinthians, as well as he can, from intermedling in the buſineſs. He tells them, by his Meſſengers, That he had entred into a League with the Carthaginians, who were ſo ſtrong by Sea, that it was not in the power of Corinth, to land an Army in Sicil. But the Corinthians, being by this Treaſon of Icetes, more inraged than diſſwaded, ſent Timoleon with Nineteen Gallies, to deliver Syracuſe from Tyranny. In the mean while, Icetes had entered Syracuſe, and with the help of the Carthaginians, driven Dionyſius into the Caſtle, where he beſieged him.

Icetes, being himſelf a Tyrant in Leontium, rather ſought how to enlarge his power, than how to deliver his Countrey. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arrived at Rhegium, he ſent to perſwade him, to return his Fleet; for that all things were (in effect) eſtabliſhed in Sicil. The Carthaginian Gallies were alſo in the ſame Port of Rhegium, whoſe Captains adviſed Timoleon to get him gone in peace. They had far more Gallies there than he had, and were like to compel him, if he would not be perſwaded. Timoleon, finding himſelf over-maſtered, makes requeſt to the Carthaginian Captains, that they would be pleaſed to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open aſſembly of the People, to deliver unto him thoſe arguments for his return, which they had uſed to him in private; that he might, by publick teſtimony, diſcharge himſelf to the Senate of Corinth.

The Carthaginians, perſwading themſelves, that a Victory obtained by a few fair words, was without loſs, and far more eaſie, than that of many blows, and wounds, yielded to Timoleons deſire. But while the Orations were delivering, Timoleon, favoured by the Rhegians, ſtole out of the preaſe; and having ſet Sail, before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recovered the Port of Tauromenium, where he was joyfully received by Andromachus the Governour. From thence he marched toward Adranum, where ſurpriſing Icetes his Army, he ſlew a part thereof, and put the reſt to run. It is the Nature of Victory to beget friends. The Adranitans joyned with him, and ſo did Mamercus, the Tyrant of Catana. Dionyſius alſo ſent to Timoleon, offering to ſurrender the Caſtle of Syracuſe into his hands, as thinking it better to yield up himſelf, and the places which he could not defend, unto the Corinthians, than either to Icetes, whom he diſdained, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timoleon, who, within Fifty Dayes after his arrival, had recovered the Caſtle of Syracuſe, and ſent Dionyſius to Corinth, to live there a private man, was ſtill invaded by the Armies, and moleſted by the practices of Icetes. For he Beſieged the Corinthians within the Caſtle of Syracuſe, and attempted (but in vain) the Murder of Timoleon.

The Corinthians ſend unto Timoleon a ſupply of Two Thouſand Foot, and Two Hundred Horſe, which are ſtayed in Italy by foul weather. Icetes is ſtrengthened with Threeſcore Thouſand Africans, brought unto him by Mago (all which he lodgeth within Syracuſe) and with an Hundred and Fifty Gallies, to keep the Port. This was the firſt time that ever the Carthaginians had Dominion within the Walls of that City. With this great Army Icetes aſſaileth the Caſtle: Timoleon ſends them Victuals, and ſuccour, in ſmall Boats, by Night, from Catana. Mago and Icetes do therefore reſolve to Beſiege Catana; but they were no ſooner on their way towards it, with part of their Forces, than Leon, Captain of the Corinthians, ſallied out of the Caſtle, and took that part of Syracuſe, called Acradina, which he fortified.

In the mean while, the Two Thouſand Corinthians arrive: with whom, and two Thouſand other Souldiers, Timoleon marched toward Syracuſe. Mago abandoneth Icetes, being frighted out of Sicil (which he might eaſily have conquered) with an idle rumour of Treaſon. This made him return to Carthage; where the general exclamation againſt his cowardiſe, did ſo much affright him, that for fear of further puniſhment he hanged himſelf. Timoleon enters the City, and beats down the Caſtle (which he called The Neſt of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the City, when the ſtrangers were fled, in effect deſolate; ſo as their Horſes did feed on the Graſs growing in the Market-place. Therefore he writes to Corinth for People to reinhabit it. Ten Thouſand are ſent out of Greece, many come from Italy; others from other parts of the Iſland.

But a new ſtorm ariſeth. Aſdrubal and Amilcar, Carthaginians, arrive about Lilibæum, with Threeſcore and Ten Thouſand Souldiers, tranſported (with all their proviſions) in a Thouſand Ships of burden, and Two Hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and chargeth this great Army upon the paſſage of a River.

A Tempeſt of Rain, Hail, and Lightning, with boyſterous Winds, beating upon the faces of the Carthaginians, they are utterly broken, Ten Thouſand ſlain, Five Thouſand taken, with all their Carragies and Proviſions: Among which there were found a Thouſand Croſſets Guilt and Graven. After this, Timoleon gave an overthrow to Icetes, and following his Victory, took him, with his Son Eupolemus, and the General of his Horſe, Priſoners; whom he cauſed all to be ſlain: And afterwards (which was imputed to him for great cruelty) he ſuffered Icetes his Wives and Daughters to be put to death. But this was the revenge of God upon Icetes, who (after the Murder of Dion) had cauſed Arete, Dions Wife, and a young Child of his, with Ariſtomache his Siſter, to be caſt into the Sea.

He again prevailed againſt Mamercus Tyrant of Catana, and won Catana it ſelf. Mamercus fled to Hippon Tyrant of Meſſena: But Timoleon, purſued him, won the Town; delivering Hippon to his Citizens, who tormented him to death. The ſame end had Mamercus, and all other the Tyrants in Sicil.

Finally, he made Peace with the Carthaginians, on condition that they ſhould not paſs the River of Lycus. After this, he lived in great honour among the Syracuſians, till his death; and was ſolemnly buried by them in the Market-place of their City: The Day of his Funerals being for ever ordained to be kept holy among them.

After ſuch time as Timoleon had delivered Syracuſe from the Tyranny of Dionyſius, and brought Peace to the whole Iſland; the Inhabitants injoyed their liberty in Peace, about Twenty years. The Cities and Temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Marchant Sailed in ſafety; and the Labouring man injoyed the fruits of the Earth in quiet. But it was impoſſible that a Nation which neither knew how to govern, nor how to obey; which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthy to be Kings, to govern them; ſhould any long time ſubſiſt.

Twenty Years after the death of Timoleon, there ſtarted up one Agathocles among them, a man of baſe Birth, and of baſer condition: Who from a Begger, to a common Souldier; from a common Souldier to a Captain; and ſo from degree to degree, riſing to be a Prætor: Finally, became Lord and Soveraign of the Syracuſians. Many fortunes he ran, and under-went as many dangers, ere he obtained the Principality. For he had more than once attempted attempted it, and was therein both beaten and baniſht. A paſſing valiant man he was, and did notable ſervice, as well for thoſe by whom he was imployed, as alſo for the Syracuſians, and againſt them. For in thoſe Wars againſt thoſe of Enna, and the Campanes, he did them memorable ſervice; and on the contrary, as memorable ſervice for the Murgantines againſt the Syracuſians. For being entertained by the people of Murgantia, and made General of their Forces, he ſackt Leontium; and beſieged Syracuſe ſo ſtraightly, that the Citizens were driven to crave aid, even from their antient and natural enemies, the Carthaginians. Amilcar was ſent by the Carthaginians to relieve Syracuſe. With him Agathocles wrought ſo well, that he got him to make peace between himſelf and the Syracuſians; binding himſelf by Promiſe and Oath to remain a Friend and Servant to the State of Carthage, for ever after. Amilcar entertained the buſineſs, and compounded the quarrels between Agathocles and the Syracuſians. Agathocles is choſen Prætor; he entertains five Thouſand Africans, and diverſe old Souldiers of the Murgantines, under colour of a purpoſe to beſiege Herbita. With theſe, and with the aſſiſtance of the poor and diſcontented Syracuſians (the City alſo being divided into many factions) he aſſails the Senators, kills all his enemies and oppoſites; divides the ſpoil of the rich among the poor; and gives liberty to his Souldiers, to Rob, to Raviſh, and to Murder, for two whole dayes and nights, without controulment: the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous appetites, and ſtrewed the ſtreets with ten Thouſand dead Carkaſſes, beſides thoſe that had broken their necks over the walls; their fury had no further ſubject to work on.

Agathocles, in an aſſembly of the people (being an eloquent Knave) perſwaded them, that, for the violent ſickneſs, by which the Common-wealth was utterly conſumed, he found no better than the violent remedies which he had adminiſtred: and that he affected no other thing than the reducing of the State from an Oligarchy, or the rule of a few tyrannous Magiſtrates, to the ancient and indifferent Democraty, by which it had been governed, from the firſt inſtitution, with ſo great glory and proſperity. This he did, to have the Crown clapt on his head (as it were) perforce. For, as he knew that he had left none living, within the City, fit or able to exerciſe the office of a Magiſtrate: ſo knew he right well, that all they which had aſſiſted in the murder and ſpoil of their fellow-Citizens, had no other hope of defence, than the ſupport of a lawleſs Lord, who had been partaker with them in their villanies and cruelties committed. So as this rable, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King: again and again ſaluting and adoring him, by that name, as if it had been given to him by ſome lawful election. Hence had our King Richard the third a piece of his pattern; but the one was of baſe, the other of Kingly Parents: the one took liberty from a Common-weal, the other ſought only to ſucceed in a Monarchy; the one continued his cruelty to the end, the other, after he had obtained the Crown, ſought, by making good Laws, to recover the love of his people.

The life of this Tyrant is briefly written by Juſtine; more largely and particularly by Diodorus Siculus: the ſumm whereof is this. The ſame Amilcar that had brought him into Syracuſe, and that had lent him five Thouſand men to help in the Maſſacre of the Citizens, was alſo content to wink at many wrongs that he did unto the confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpoſe of Amilcar, to ſettle Agathocles in his tyranny, and to let him vex and waſte the whole Iſland; becauſe it was thereby like to come to paſs, that he ſhould reduce all Sicil into ſuch terms as would make it become an eaſie prey to Carthage. But when the Cities, confederate with the Carthaginians, ſent their Embaſſadours, with complaint of this ill dealing, to Carthage; the Punick faith (ſo much taunted by the Romans, as no better then meer falſhood) ſhewed it ſelf very honourable in taking order for the redreſs. Embaſſadours were ſent to comfort the Sicilians, and to put Agathocles in mind of his Covenants; Amilcar was recalled home into Africk, and a new Captain appointed to ſucceed in his charge, with ſuch forces, as might compel Agathocles to reaſon, if otherwiſe he would not hearken to it. All this tended to ſave their Confederates, from ſuffering ſuch injuries in the future. For that which was paſt (ſince it could not be recalled) they took order to have it ſeverely puniſhed. Amilcar was accuſed ſecretly, and by way of ſcrutiny: the ſuffrages being given, but not calculated; and ſo reſerved until he ſhould return. This was not ſo cloſely handled, but that Amilcar had ſoon notice of it. In managing his buſineſs with Agathocles, it is likely that he had an eye to his own profit, as well as to the publick benefit of his Country. For he had made ſuch a compoſition with the Syracuſian, as gave him not only means to weaken others, but to ſtrengthen himſelf, both in Power and Authority, even againſt the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the cuſtome of thoſe, that hope to work their own ends by cunning practices, thinking to deal ſubtlely and finely, they ſpin their threads ſo ſmall, that they are broken with the very wind. Amilcar ſaw, that the Carthaginians had a purpoſe to deal ſubſtantially; and that therefore it would be hard for him, to make them follow his crooked devices: which if he could not do, it was to be expected, that their anger would break out into ſo much the greater extremity, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore he followed the example, which ſome of his fore-goers had taught him; and, for fear of ſuch a death as the Judges might award him, he ended his own life in what ſort he thought beſt. This deſperation of Amilcar ſerved to inform Agathocles of the Carthaginians intent. He ſaw they would not be deluded with words, and therefore reſolved to get the ſtart of them in action. He diſſembled no longer; but, inſtead of Spoil and Robery, made open War upon all their Adherents. He had made the better part of Sicil his own, ere the Carthaginian Forces arrived: which thinking to have incountred an ill-eſtabliſhed Tyrant, found him ready, as a King, to defend his own, and give them ſharp entertainment. They were beaten by him; and their Navy was ſo Tempeſt-beaten, that they could neither do good by Land, nor Sea, but were glad to leave their buſineſs undone, and return into Africk.

The Carthaginians prepare a new Fleet; which being very gallantly manned and furniſhed, was broken, by foul weather, and the beſt part of it caſt away, even whilſt it was yet within kenning of their City. But Amilcar, the Son of Giſco, gathering together the remainders of his Ship-wrack, was bold to paſs over into Sicil, and landed not far from Gela; where Agathocles was ſoon ready to examine the cauſe of their coming. Many Skirmiſhes paſſed between them, in which (commonly) the Siracuſian had the better. But his good ſucceſs begat preſumption; whereby he loſt a Battel more important than all the other fights. One adverſe chance is enough to overthrow the State of a Tyrant, if it be not upheld by great circumſpection. The War was ſoon transferred to the walls of Syracuſe; within which Agathocles was cloſed up, and driven to make his laſt defence by their help, who may be judged to have loved him not very greatly. But the Inhabitants of Syracuſe, after that great Maſſacre of the principal men, made in the beginning of this new Tyranny (were for the moſt part) ſuch, as had been either mercenary Souldiers, infranchiſed ſlaves, or baſe and needy people; helpers in eſtabliſhing the preſent government, and Executioners of the Murders, and Spoil committed in that change. If there were any other (as ſome there were) they were ſo well obſerved, and (withal) ſo fearful, that they durſt not ſtir. But it was enough that they all agreed in the common defence of themſelves and their City; Famine was likely to grow upon them, and inforce them to change their reſolution. In this neceſſity Agathocles adventured upon a ſtrange courſe, which the event commended as wiſe. He imbarqued as many as he thought meet, in thoſe Veſſels that rode in the Haven; and committing the Government of the City to his Brother Antander, willed the people to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) he had bethought himſelf of a mean, both to raiſe the ſiege, and to repair all other loſſes. A Carthaginian Fleet lay in the mouth of the Haven, both to hinder the entrance of victuallers, and to keep the beſieged from iſſuing forth.

Now, at ſuch time as Agathocles was ready to depart, advertiſement came, that many Ships of burden, laden with Corn, and other proviſions, were drawing near unto Syracuſe. To intercept theſe the Carthaginians hoiſe ſail, and lanch forth into the deep. They were not far gone, when they might behold Agathocles iſſuing forth of the Port, with purpoſe (as they thought) to give convoy unto his victuallers. Hereupon they wheel about, and make amain toward him, as thinking him the better booty. He neither abode their coming, nor fled back into the City, but made all ſpeed towards Africk; and was purſued by the Carthaginians, as long as the day would give them light. In the mean ſeaſon the Victuallers were gotten to Syracuſe; which was the more plentifully relieved by their coming, for that Agathocles had unburdened the place of no ſmall number. When the Carthaginian Admiral perceived, firſt, that by purſuing two Fleets at once, he had miſſed of them both: And ſecondly, that Agathocles returned not again, but was gone to ſeek his fortune elſewhere, he thought it good to purſue thoſe that were fled, and to attend ſo well upon them, that they ſhould not have leiſure to do miſchief in ſome other part.

The Carthaginian Navy followed Agathocles (whether by chance, or by relation of ſuch as had met with him at Sea) directly towards Africk, and overtook him after ſix dayes. He had (at the firſt) a great ſtart of them; ſo that (belike) they rowed hard, and wearied themſelves in ſeeking their own misfortune: For he fought with them, and beat them; and, having ſunk or taken many, drave the reſt to flye which way they could, laden with ſuch ſtrange tydings of his Voyage.

When Agathocles had landed his men in Africk, then did he diſcover unto them his project, letting them underſtand, that there was no better way to divert the Carthaginians, not only from Syracuſe, but from all the Iſle of Sicil, than by bringing the War to their own doors. For here (ſaid he) they have many that hate them, and that will readily take Arms againſt them, as ſoon as they perceive that there is an Army on foot, which dares to look upon their Walls. Their Towns are ill fortified, their people untrained, and experienced in dangers; the mercenary forces that they levy in thoſe parts, will rather follow us than them, if we offer greater wages than they can give: which we may better promiſe and make good, by letting them have ſome ſhare with us in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can do, by making ſome addition to their ſtipends. Thus he talked, as one already Maſter of all the riches in Africk; and with many brave words encouraged his men ſo well, that they were contented to ſet fire on all their Ships (reſerving one or two to uſe as Meſſengers) to the end that no hope ſhould remain, ſave only in victory. In this heat of reſolution, they win by force two Cities; which after they had throughly ſacked, they burnt to the ground: as a mark of terrour to all that ſhould make reſiſtance. The Carthaginians hearing this, are amazed; thinking that Amilcar is broken, and his whole Army deſtroyed in Sicil. This impreſſion ſo diſmayes them, that when they know the truth of all, by ſuch as had ſcaped in the late Sea-fight; yet ſtill they fear, and know not what. They ſuſpect Amilcars faith, who had ſuffered Agathocles to land in Africk: they ſuſpected their principal Citizens at home, of a meaning to betray Carthage unto the enemy; they raiſe a great Army, and know not to whoſe charge they may ſafely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captains in the City, Hanno and Bomilcar, great enemies. And therefore the more unlikely to conſpire againſt the Common-wealth. Theſe are made Generals of the Army levied, which far exceed the forces of Agathocles. But it ſeldome happens, that diſſention between Commanders produceth any fortunate event. Neceſſity drave Agathocles to fight: and the courage of his men, reſolved to deal with the whole multitude of the Carthaginians, made eaſie the victory againſt the one half of them. For Bomilcar would not ſtir, but ſuffered Hanno to be cut in pieces.

The reputation of this great victory, brought over a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian ſociety, to take part with Agathocles: who purſued his victory, winneth many Towns, and ſends word to Syracuſe of his good ſucceſs. The Carthaginians alſo ſend unto Sicil, willing Amilcar, their General, to ſuccour the State of Africk, which was in danger to be loſt, whilſt he was travelling in the Conqueſt of Sicil. Amilcar ſends them five Thouſand men: All his forces he thought it not needful to tranſport; as hoping rather to draw Agathocles back into Sicil, than to be drawn home by one, that could ſcarce retain his own Kingdom. But theſe good hopes had a bad iſſue. He ſpent ſome time in winning a few Towns that adhered unto the Syracuſians: And having brought his matters to ſome good order, he conceived a certain hope of taking Syracuſe by ſurpriſe. It was a pretty (though tragical) Accident, if it were true, as Tully relates it. Amilcar had a dream which told him that he ſhould ſup the next day within Syracuſe. His fancy begot this dream, and he verily believed it. He made more haſte than good ſpeed toward the City: And coming upon it on the ſudden, had good hope to carry it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had laid an ambuſh to entrap him, whereinto he fell. So he was carried priſoner into the City; in which it was likely that he had no great chear to his supper: For they struck off his head, and sent it into Africk (a welcome present) to Agathocles.

This good success of things at home, did put such courage into the Sicilian Army, that Agathocles was bold to wear a Crown, and stile himself King of Africk. He had allured Opellas, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promises to deliver the Country into his hands: For that (as is said) it was sufficient unto himself to have diverted the Carthaginians from Sicil, wherein (after this War ended) he might Reign quietly. Opellas came with a great Army, and was friendly entertained. But the traiterous Silician, taking an advantage, did murther this his assistant; and afterwards by good words, and great promises, drew all the Cyrenean Army to follow him in his Wars. Thus his villany found good success; and he so prevailed in Africk, that he got leisure to make a step into Sicil. Many Towns in Sicil had embraced a desire of recovering their liberty; thinking it high time to fight at length for their own freedom, after that they had so long been exposed (as a reward of victory) either unto Aliens, or to Tyrants of their own Country. These had prevailed far, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cause: when the coming of Agathocles abated their high Spirits; and his good success in many fights, compelled them to Obedience. Out of Sicil he returned into Africk, where his affairs stood in very bad terms. Archagathus, his Son had lost a Battel; and (which was worse) had ill means to help himself: His Army being in mutiny for lack of pay. But Agathocles pacified the Tumult, by the accustomed promises of great booty and spoil. It had now been time for him to offer peace to the Carthaginians: which to obtain, they would (questionless) have given to him both money enough to pay his Army, and all that they then held in Sicil. For their City had been distressed, not only by this his War, but by the Treason of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making himself Tyrant over them. But ambition is blind. Agathocles had all his thoughts fixed upon the conquest of Carthage it self: Out of which dream he was awakened, by the loss of a Battel, not so memorable in regard of any accident therein, as of the strange events following it. The Carthaginians, after their great misfortunes in this War, had renewed their old sacrifices of Children to Saturn: From which they had abstained ever since they made peace with Gelon. And now they made choice of some, the goodliest of their prisoners taken in the Battel, to offer unto the said Idol; in way of thankfulness to their victory. The fire, with which these unhappy men were consumed, caught hold upon the lodgings nearest unto the Altar, and spreading it self farther through the Camp, with the destruction of many men, caused such a Tumult as is usual in the like cases. At the same time, the like accident of fire burnt up the Pavilion of Agathocles. Hereupon both the Armies fled away, each of them believing, that the noise in the adverse Camp, was a sign of the enemies coming to invade it. But the Carthaginians had a safe retrait: Agathocles, by a second error, fell into a new calamity. In the beginning of this his flight in the dark, he met with his own African Souldiers; and thinking them to be enemies (as indeed the one half of them had revolted from him, to the Carthaginians, in the last Battel) he began to assail them, and was so stoutly resisted, that he lost in this blind fight above four Thousand of his men. This did so discourage his proud heart, that, being fallen from the near hope of taking the City of Carthage, unto some distrust of his own safety, he knew no more how to moderate his present weak fears, than lately he had known how to govern his ambition. Therefore he took the way that came next into his hand; which was to steal closely aboard his Ships, with his younger Son (the elder he suspected of Incest, and of Ambition) and so to flye into Sicil; thinking it the best course to shift for himself, as wanting Vessels wherein to transport his Army. His elder Son Archagathus, perceiving his drift, arrested him, and put him under custody: But by means of a sudden Tumult, he was let loose, escaped, and fled alone, leaving both his Sons behind him. His flight being noysed through the Army, all was in an uproar; and extremity of Rage caused not only the common Souldier, but even such as had been friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold upon his two Sons, and kill them. That this flight of Agathocles was extreamly base, I need not use words to prove: That his fear was truly, as all fear is said to be, a passion, depriving him of the succours which reason offered, the sequel doth manifest. His forsaken Souldiers, being now a headless company, and no longer an Army to be feared, obtained nevertheless a reasonable composition from the Carthaginians: To whom they sold those places, whereof they had possession, for nineteen Talents. Likewise Agathocles himself, having lost his Army, did nevertheless, by the reputation of this late War, make peace with Carthage upon equal terms.

After this, the Tyrant being delivered from forain enemies, discovered his bloody nature, in most abominable cruelties, among the Sicilians. His wants and his fears, urged him so violently, that he was not satisfied with the spoils of the rich, or the death of those whom he held suspected: But in a beastly rage depopulated whole Cities. He devised new Engines of Torment; wherein striving to exceed the Bull of Phalaris, he made a frame of Brass, that should serve to scorch mens Bodies, and withal give him leave to behold them in their misery. So devilish is the nature of man, when reason, that should be his guide, is become a slave to his brutish affections. In these mischiefs he was so outragious, that he neither spared Sex, nor Age; especially, when he was informed of the slaughter of his Children in Africk. But this was not the way to preserve his estate: It threw him into new dangers. They whom he had chased out of their Country took arms against him, and drave him into such fears, that he was fain to seek that love at Carthage, which by ruling well he might have had in Sicil. He freely delivered into the Carthaginians hands, all those Towns of the Phœnicians in Sicil, belonging unto them, which were in his possession. They requited him honourably, with great store of Corn, and with four Hundred Talents of Gold and Silver. So (though not without much trouble and hazard) he prevailed against the Rebels, and setled his estate. Having no further business left in Sicil, he made a voyage into Italy. There he subdued the Brutians, rather by terrour of his name than by any force, for they yielded at his first coming. This done, he went to the Isle of Lipara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one Hundred Talents of Gold. But when he had gotten this great summ, he would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, he was bold to spoil the Temples of their Gods. Herein (me thinks) he did well enough. For how could he believe those to be Gods, that had continually given deaf ears to his horrible perjuries? Then he returned richly home, with Eleven Ships loaden with Gold: All which, and all the reſt of the Fleet, were caſt away by foul weather at Sea; one Gally excepted, in which he himſelf eſcaped, to ſuffer a more miſerable end. A grievous ſickneſs fell upon him, that rotted his whole Body, ſpreading it ſelf through all his veins and ſinews. Whilſt he lay in this caſe, all deſiring his end, ſave only Theogina (a Wife that he had taken out of Egypt) and her ſmall Children: His Nephew, the Son of Archagathus, before mentioned, and a younger Son of his own, began to contend about the Kingdom. Neither did they ſeek to end the controverſie by the old Tyrants deciſion; they regarded him not ſo much. But each of them laid wait for the others life: Wherein the Nephew ſped ſo well, that he ſlew his Uncle, and got his Grandfathers Kingdom, without asking any leave. Theſe tydings wounded the heart of Agathocles with fear and ſorrow. He ſaw himſelf without help, like to become a prey to his ungracious Nephew, from whom he knew that no favour was to be expected, either himſelf, or by thoſe, whom only he now held dear, which were Theogina and her Children. Therefore he adviſed her and them to fly before they were ſurpriſed: For that otherwiſe they could by no means avoid, either death, or ſomewhat that would be worſe. He gave them all his Treaſures and Goods, wherewith he even compelled them (weeping to leave him deſolate in ſo wretched a caſe) to imbark themſelves haſtily, and make ſpeed into Egypt. After their departure, whether he threw himſelf into the Fire, or whether his diſeaſe conſumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him, but he ended his life as baſely, as obſcure, and in as much want as he firſt began it.

After the death of Agathocles it was, that the Mamertines, his Souldiers, traiterouſly occupied Meſſana, and infeſted a great part of the Iſland. Then alſo did the Carthaginians begin to renew their attempts of Conquering all Sicil. What the Nephew of Agathocles did, I cannot find. Likely it is that he quickly periſhed. For the Sicilians were driven to ſend for Pyrrhus to help them, who had Married with a Daughter of Agathocles. But Pyrrhus was ſoon weary of the Countrey (as hath been ſhewed before) and therefore left it; Prophecying that it would become a goodly champion Field, wherein Rome and Carthage ſhould fight for ſuperiority. In which buſineſs, how theſe two great Cities did ſpeed, the order of our ſtory will declare.

SECT. V.

A recontinuation of the Roman War in Sicil. How Hieron, King of Syracuſe, forſook the Carthaginians, and made his peace with Rome.

WHen Appius Claudius, following the advantage of his Victory gotten at Meſſana, brought the War unto the Gates of Syracuſe, and Beſieged that great City; Hieron found it high time for him to ſeek peace: Knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reaſon to be offended with him, for helping himſelf by what means he could, when they were not in caſe to give him aſſiſtance; and foreſeeing withal, that when once he had purchaſed his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to ſit ſtill, without fear of moleſtation, whilſt Rome and Carthage were fighting for the maſtery. In this good mood the new Roman Conſuls, M. Valerius, and C. Octacilius found him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendſhip. Yet they made uſe of their preſent advantage, and ſold him peace for an Hundred (ſome ſay two Hundred) Talents.

Theſe Conſuls had brought a great Army into Sicil; yet did they nothing elſe in effect, than bring over Hiero to their ſide. If the Syracuſian held them buſied (which I find not, otherwiſe than by circumſtances, as, by the ſum of Money impoſed upon him, and by their performing none other piece of ſervice) all the whole time of their abode in the Iſland; then was his departure from the friendſhip of Carthage, no leſs to his honour than it was to his commodity. For by no reaſon could they require, that he ſhould ſuffer his own Kingdom to run into manifeſt peril of ſubverſion, for their ſakes that ſhould have received all the profit of the Victory: Seeing they did expoſe him to the whole danger without ſtraining themſelves to give him relief. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proof of the ſtrength of Syracuſe, in the days of Agathocles: And therefore knew, that it was able to bear a very ſtrong Siege. And hereupon it is like that they were the more ſlack, in ſending help: if (perhaps) it were not ſome part of their deſire, that both Rome and Syracuſe ſhould weaken one the other, whereby their own work might be the eaſier againſt them both. Yet indeed, the caſe of the Beſieged City was not the ſame, when the Romans lay before it, as it had been when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reaſon to try the uttermoſt hazard of War againſt the Carthaginians, who ſought no other thing than to bring it into ſlavery: Not ſo againſt the Romans, who thought it ſufficient if they could withdraw it from the party of their enemies. Beſides, it was not all one to be governed by Agathocles, or by Hiero. The former of theſe cared not what the Citizens endured, ſo long as he might preſerve his own Tyranny: The latter, as a juſt and good Prince, had no greater deſire than to win the love of his People by ſeeking their commodity; but including his own felicity within the publick, laboured to uphold both, by honeſt and faithful dealing. Hereby it came to paſs that he enjoyed a long and happy Reign, living dear to his own Subjects, beloved of the Romans, and not greatly moleſted by the Carthaginians; whom, either the conſideration, That they had left him to himſelf, ere he left their Society, made unwilling to ſeek his ruine; or their more earneſt buſineſs with the Romans, made unable to compaſs it.

SECT VI.

How the Romans Beſiege and win Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintain a Fleet. Their firſt loſs, and firſt victory by Sea. Of Sea-fight in general.

HIeron, having ſided himſelf with the Romans, aideth them with Victuals and other neceſſaries; saries: So that they, presuming upon his assistance, recal some part of their forces. The Carthaginians find it high time to bestir them; they send to the Ligurians, and to the Troops they had in Spain, to come to their aid; who being arrived, they made the City of Agrigentum the Seat of the War, against the Romans, filling it with all manner of munition.

* Agrigentum was a goodly City, built by the Geloi, under the conduct of Ariston and Pylistus. The compass was Ten Miles about the Walls; and it had sometimes in it Eight Hundred Thousand Inhabitants. This City, by reason of the fertility of the Soil, and the Neighbourhood of Carthage, grew in a short space from small beginnings, to great glory and riches. The plenty and luxury thereof was so great, as it caused Empedocles to say, that the Agrigentines built Palaces of such sumptuosity, as if they meant to live for ever; and made such feasts, as if they meant to dye the next day.

The Roman Consuls, having made Peace with Hieron, return into Italy, and, in their places, Lucius Posthumus and Quintus Mamilius arrive. They go on towards * Agrigentum: And finding no enemy in the Field, they Besiege it, though it were stuffed with Fifty Thousand Souldiers. After a while, the time of Harvest being come, a part of the Roman Army range the Country to gather Corn, and those at the Siege grow negligent; the Carthaginians sally furiously, and indanger the Roman Army, but are in the end repelled into the Town with great loss; but by the smart felt on both sides, the Assailants redoubled their Guards, and the Besieged kept within their Cover. Yet the Romans, the better to assure themselves, cut a deep Trench between the Walls of the City and their Camp: And another on the outside thereof; that neither the Carthaginians might force them suddenly, by a Sally; nor those of the Countrey without, break upon them unawares: Which double Defence kept the Besieged also from the receiving any relief of Victuals, and munitions, whilst the Syracusian supplies the assailants with what they want. The Besieged send for succor to Carthage, after they had been in this sort pent up Five Months. The Carthaginians imbark an Army, with certain Elephants, under the command of Hanno; who arrives with it at Heraclea, to the West of Agrigentum. Hanno put himself into the Field, and surpriseth Erbesus; a City wherein the Romans had bestowed all their Provision. By means hereof, the Famin without grew to be as great, as it was within Agrigentum; and the Roman Camp no less straightly assieged by Hanno, than the City was by the Romans: Insomuch, as if Hieron had not supplied them, they had been forced to abandon the Siege. But seeing that this distress was not enough to make them rise, Hanno determined to give them Battle. To which end departing from Heraclea, he makes approach unto the Roman Camp. The Romans resolve to sustain him, and put themselves in order. Hanno directs the Numidian Horsemen to change the Vant-guard, to the end to draw them further on; which done, he commands them to return as broken, till they came to the body of the Army, that lay shadowed behind some rising ground. The Numidians perform it accordingly; and while the Romans pursued the Numidians, Hanno gives upon them, and having slaughtered many, beats the rest into their Trenches.

After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two Months, but lay strongly encamped, waiting untill some opportunity should invite them. But Annibal that was Besieged in Agrigentum, as well by Signs as Messengers, made Hanno know how ill the extremity which he endured, was able to brook such dilatory courses. Hanno thereupon, a second time, provoked the Consuls to fight: But his Elephants being disordered by his own Vantguard, which was broken by the Romans, he lost the day: And with such as escaped, he recovered Heraclea. Annibal perceiving this, and remaining hopeless of succour, resolved to make his own way. Finding therefore that the Romans, after this dayes Victory, wearied with labour, and secured by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the Night; he rusht out of the Town, with all the remainder of his Army, and past by the Roman Camp without resistance. The Consuls pursue him in the Morning, but in vain: Sure they were, that he could not carry the City with him, which with little a do the Romans entered, and pitifully spoiled. The Romans, proud of this Victory, pursued rather to follow the direction of their present good fortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolved in the beginning of this War, only to succour the Mamertines, and to keep the Carthaginians from their own Coasts: But now they determine to make themselves Lords of all Sicil; and from thence, being favoured with the Wind of good success, to Sail over into Africk. It is the disease of Kings, of States, and also of private men, to covet the greatest things, but not to enjoy the least; the desire of that which we neither have nor need, taking from us the true use and fruition of what we have already. This curse upon mortal men, was never taken from them since the beginning of the World unto this day.

To prosecute this War, Lucius Valerius and Titus Octacilius, two new Consuls, are sent into Sicil. Whereupon, the Romans being Masters of the Field, many in-land Towns gave themselves unto them. On the contrary, the Carthaginians keeping still the Lordship of the Sea, and many Maritime places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well to secure their own Coasts, often invaded by the African Fleets, as to equal themselves in every kind of Warfare with their Enemies, determine to make a Fleet. And herein fortune favoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in Ship-wrights Craft, a storm of Wind thrust one of the Carthaginians Gallies, of Five Banks, to the shore.

Now had the Romans a Pattern, and by it they began to set up an Hundred Quinqueremes, which were Gallies, rowed by Five on every Bank; and Twenty, of three on a Bank: And while these were in preparing, they exercised their men in the feat of Rowing. This they did after a strange fashion. They placed upon the Sea Sands many Seats, in order of the Banks in Gallies, whereon they placed their Water-men, and taught them to beat the Sand with long Poles, orderly, and as they were directed by the Master, that so they might learn the stroak of the Gally, and how to mount and draw their Oares.

But their greatest pomp and magnificence, was in their goodly Temples, and Theatres, Water-Conduits, and Fish-Ponds: The ruines whereof at this day are sufficient arguments, that Rome it self could never boast of the like. In the Porch of the Temple of Jupiter Olympius, (by which we may judge of the Temple it self) there was set out on one side the full proportion of the Giants, fighting with the gods, all cut out in polished Marble of divers colours; a work the most magnificent and rare that ever hath been seen: On the other side, the War of Troy, and the encounters which hapned at that Siege; with the Personages of the Heroes that were doers in that War; all of the like beautiful Stone, and of equal Stature to the Bodies of those men in Ancient times: In comparison of which, the latter works of that kind, are but petty things, and meer trifles. It would require a Volume to express the magnificence of the Temples of Hercules, Aesculapius, Concord, Juno, Lutina, Chastity, Proserpina, Castor and Pollux, wherein the Master-Pieces of those exquisite Painters and Carvers Phidias, Zeuxis, Myron, and Polycletus, were to be seen. But in process of time it ran the same fortune that all other great Cities have done, and was ruined by divers calamities of War: Whereof this War present brought unto it not the least.

When their Fleet was finiſhed, ſome Rigging and other implements excepted, C. Cornelius, one of the new Conſuls (for they changed every Year) was made Admiral: Who being more in love with this new kind of Warfare, then well adviſed, paſt over to Meſſana with Seventeen Gallies, leaving the reſt to follow him. There he ſtayed not, but would needs Row along the Coaſt to Lipara, hoping to do ſome piece of ſervice. Hannibal a Carthaginian was at the ſame time Governour in Panormus; who being advertiſed of this new Sea-mans arrival, ſent forth one Boodes, a Senator of Carthage, with Twenty Gallies, to entertain him, Boodes, falling upon the Conſul unawares, took both him and the Fleet he commanded. When Hannibal received this good news, together with the Roman Gallies, and their Conſul; he grew no leſs fooliſh hardy than Cornelius had been. For he, fancying to himſelf to ſurprize the reſt of the Roman Fleet, on their own Coaſt, ere they were yet in all points provided; ſought them out with a Fleet of Fifty Sail: Wherewith falling among them, he was well beaten, and leaving the greater number of his own behind him, made an hard eſcape with the reſt: For of One Hundred and Twenty Gallies, the Romans under Cornelius had loſt but Seaventeen, ſo as one Hundred and Three remained, which were ever not eaſily beaten by Fifty.

The Romans, being advertiſed of Cornelius his overthrow, make haſte to redeem him, but give the charge of their Fleet to his Colleague, Duilius. Duilius, conſidering that the Roman Veſſels were heavy and ſlow, the African Gallies having the ſpeed of them, deviſed a certain Engine in the prow of his Gallies, whereby they might faſten or grapple themſelves with their Enemies, when they were (as we call it) boord and boord, that is, when they brought the Gallies ſides together. This done, the weightier Ships had gotten the advantage, and the Africans loſt it. For neither did their ſwiftneſs ſerve them, nor their Marriners craft; the Veſſels wherein both Nations fought, being open: So that all was to be carryed by the advantage of weapon, and valour of the men. Beſides this, as the heavier Gallies were accidentally likely to cruſh, and crack the ſides of the lighter and weaker, ſo were they by the reaſon of their breadth, more ſteady; and thoſe that beſt kept their feet, could alſo beſt uſe their hands. The example may be given between one of the long Boats of his Majeſties great Ships, and a London-Barge.

Certainly, he that will happily perform a fight at Sea, muſt be skilful in making choice of Veſſels to fight in: He muſt believe that there is more belonging to a good man of War, upon the waters, than great daring; and muſt know, that there is a great deal of difference, between fighting looſe or at large, and grappling. The Guns of a ſlow Ship pierce as well, and make as great holes, as thoſe in a ſwift. To clap Ships together, without conſideration, belongs rather to a mad man than to a man of War: For by ſuch an ignorant bravery was Peter Stroſſie loſt at the Azores, when he fought againſt the Marqueſs of Santa Cruz. In like ſort, had the Lord Charles Howard Admiral of England, been loſt in the Year 1588. if he had not been better adviſed, than a great many malignant fools were, that found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an Army aboard them; and he had none: They had more Ships than he had, and of higher building and charging; ſo that, had he intangled himſelf with thoſe great and powerful Veſſels, he had greatly endangered this Kingdom of England. For Twenty men upon the defences, are equal to an Hundred that boord and enter; whereas then, contrariwiſe, the Spaniards had an Hundred, for Twenty of ours to defend themſelves withall. But our Admiral knew his advantage, and held it: Which had he not done, he had not been worthy to have held his head. Here to ſpeak in general of Sea-fights (for particulars are fitter for private hands than for the Preſs,) I ſay, that a Fleet of Twenty Ships, all good Sailers, and good Ships, have the advantage, on the open Sea, of an Hundred as good Ships and of ſlower Sailing. For if the Fleet of an Hundred Sail keep themſelves near together, in a groſs Squadron; the Twenty Ships, charging them upon any angle, ſhall force them to give ground, and to fall back upon their own next fellows: Of which ſo many as intangle, are made unſerviceable or loſt. Force them they may eaſily, becauſe the Twenty Ships, which give themſelves ſcope, after they have given one broad ſide of Artillery, by clapping into the Wind, and ſtaying, they may give them the other: And ſo the Twenty Ships batter them in pieces with a perpetual volly; whereas thoſe that fight in a Troop, have no room to turn, and can alwayes uſe but one and the ſame beaten ſide. If the Fleet of an Hundred Sail give themſelves any diſtance, then ſhall the leſſer Fleet prevail, either againſt thoſe, that are arear and hindmoſt, or againſt thoſe, that by advantage of overſailing their follews keep the Wind: and if upon a Lee-ſhore, the Ships next the Wind, be conſtrained to fall back into their own Squadron, then it is all to nothing, the whole Fleet muſt ſuffer Shipwrack, or render it ſelf. That ſuch advantage may be taken upon a Fleet of unequal ſpeed, it hath been well enough conceived in old time; as by the Oration of Hermocrates, in Thucydides, which he made to the Syracuſians, when the Athenians invaded them, it may eaſily be obſerved.

Of the Art of War by Sea, I had written a Treatiſe, for the Lord Henry, Prince of Wales; a ſubject, to my knowledge, never handled by any man, Ancient or Modern: But God hath ſpared me the labour of finiſhing it, by his loſs; by the loſs of that brave Prince; of which, like an Eclipſe of the Sun, we ſhall find the effects hereafter. Impoſſible it is to equal words and ſorrows; I will therefore leave him in the hands of God that hath him. Curæ leves loquuntur, ingentes ſtupent.

But it is now time to return to the beaten Carthaginians; who by loſing their advantage of ſwift Boats, and boarding the Romans, have loſt Fifty Sail of their Gallies: As on the other ſide, there Enemies by commanding the Seas, have gotten liberty to Sail about the Weſt part of Sicil; where they raiſed the Siege laid unto Segeſta by the Carthaginians, and won the Town of Marcella, with ſome other places.

SECT.

SECT. VII.

Divers Enterfeats of War, between the Romans and Carthaginians, with variable ſucceſs. The Romans prepare to invade Africk: And obtain a great Victory at Sea.

THE Victory of Duilius, as it was honoured at Rome, with the firſt Naval Triumph, that was ever ſeen in that City; ſo gave it unto the Romans great incouragement, to proceed in their Wars by Sea; whereby they hoped, not only to get Sicil; but all the other Iſles between Italy and Africk, beginning with Sardinia, whither ſoon after they ſent a Fleet for that purpoſe. On the contrary ſide, Amilcar, the Carthaginian, lying in Panormus, carefully waited for all occaſions, that might help to recompence the late misfortune: and being advertiſed, that ſome quarrel was grown between the Roman Souldiers, and their Auxiliaries, being ſuch as cauſed them to incamp apart, he ſent forth Hanno to ſet upon them; who taking them unawares, buried Four Thouſand of them in the place. Now during the continuance of the Land-War in Sicil, Hannibal, who had lately been beaten by Sea, but eſcaped unto Carthage, meaning to make amends for his former erroûr, obtained the truſt of a new Fleet, wherewith he arrived at Sardinia: The Conqueſt of which Iſland, the Romans had entertained for their next enterpriſe. Now it fo fell out, that the Romans, croſſing the Sea from Sicil, arrived in the Port where Hannibal with his new Fleet Anchored. They ſet upon him unawares, and took the better part of the Fleet which he conducted; himſelf hardly eſcaping the danger. But it little availed him to have eſcaped from the Romans. His good friends the Carthaginians, were ſo ill pleaſed with this his ſecond unfortunate voyage, that they hanged him up for his diligence: For (as it hath been ſaid of old) Non eſt bis in bello peccare; In War it is too much to offend twice.

After this, it was long ere any thing of importance was done by the Conſuls, till * Panormus was Beſieged; where, when the Romans had fought in vain to draw the Carthaginians into the Field; being unable to force that great City, becauſe of the ſtrong Garriſon therein beſtowed: They then departed from thence, and took certain In-land Towns, as Myciſtratum, Enna, Camerina, Hippana, and others, between Panormus and Meſſana.

The Year following, C. Atilius the Conſul who commanded the Roman Fleet, diſcovered a company of the Carthaginians Gallies, ranging the Coaſt: And, not ſtaying for his whole number purſued them with Ten of his. But he was well beaten for the haſte he made, and loſt all, ſave the Gally which tranſported him: Wherein himſelf eſcaped with great labour. But ere all was done, the reſt of Atilius his Fleet was gotten up: Who renewing the fight, recovered from the Carthaginians a double number of theirs; by which the Victory remaining doubtful, both challenge it. Now to try at once, which of theſe two Nations ſhould command the Seas, they both prepare all they can. The Romans make a Fleet of three Hundred and Thirty Gallies; the Carthaginians, of Three Hundred and Fifty, * Triremes, Quadriremes, and Quinqueremes.

* The Quinqueremes are Gallies, wherein every Oar have five men to draw it: The Quadriremes had four to an Oar: And the Triremes three. Some have thought, that the Quinqueremes had five ranks of Oars, one over another; and the other Gallies (rateably) fewer. But had this been ſo, they muſt then have had five Decks each over other: Which hath ſeldome been ſeen in Ships of a Thouſand Tuns; neither could the third, fourth, and fifth ranks, have reached unto the Water with the Oars.

The Romans reſolve to tranſport the War into Africk; the Carthaginians, to arreſt them on the Coaſt of Sicil. The numbers, with which each of them filled their Fleet, was (perhaps) the greateſt that ever fought on the Waters. By Polybius his eſtimation, there were in the Roman Gallies an Hundred and Forty Thouſand men; and in thoſe of Carthage, an Hundred and Fifty Thouſand: Reckoning One Hundred and Twenty Souldiers, and Three Hundred Rowers to every Gally, one with the other. The Roman Fleet was divided into Four parts, of which the Three firſt made the form of a Wedge or Triangle; the two firſt Squadrons making the Flanks, and the Third Squadron, the Baſe: The point thereof (wherein were the Two Conſuls as Admirals) looking toward the Enemy, and the middle ſpace lying empty. Their Veſſels of carriage were towed by the Third Squadron. After all came up the Fourth, in form of a Creſcent; very well manned, but exceeding thin: So that the horns of it incloſed all the Third Squadron, together with the corner of the Firſt and Second. The order of the Carthaginian Fleet I cannot receive by relation; but, by the manner of the fight afterwards, I conjecture, that the Front of their Fleet was thin, and ſtretched in a great length, much like to that which the French call Combat en haye, a long Front of Horſe, and thin: which form, ſince the Piſtol prevailed over the Lance, they have changed. Behind this firſt outſtretched Front, their Battalions were more ſolid: For Amilcar, Admiral of the Carthaginians had thus ordered them, of purpoſe, (his Gallies having the ſpeed of the Romans) that, when the firſt Fleet of the Romans haſted to break through the firſt Gallies, they ſhould all turn tail, and the Romans purſuing them (as after a Victory) diſorder themſelves, and, for eagerneſs of taking the Run-awayes, leave their own Three Squadrons

* If we may give credit to Antiquities, which Fazellus a diligent Writer, hath left us in his Hiſtory of Sicil. Panormus, now called Palermo, is one of the firſt Cities that hath been built in all Europ. For whereas Thucydides ſeems to make it a Colony of the Phœnicians; Ranzanus, in libello de Panormo, lib. 6. affirms that it was firſt and long before the time which Thucydides ſet down, founded by the Caldæans, and Damaſcenes. To prove which, he tells us of two inſcriptions upon Marble in the Hebrew Character found at Panormus, in the time of William the Second, King of Sicil, that were then beheld of all the Citizens and other ſtrangers, which being tranſlated into Latine, ſay as followeth; Vivente Iſaac filio Abrahæ, & regnante in Idumea, atque in valle Damaſcenæ, Eſau filio Iſaac, ingens Hebræorum manus, quibus adjuncti ſunt multi Damaſceni, atque Phœnices, profecti in hanc triangularem inſulam, ſedes perpetuas locaverunt in hoc amæniſſimo loco, quem Panormum nominaverunt. In the other Marble are found theſe words; Non eſt alius Deus præter unum Deum; non eſt alius potens præter eundem deum, &c. Hujus Turris Præfectus eſt Saphu filius Eliphaz, filii Eſau fratris Jacob filii Iſaac, filii Abraham: & Turri quidem ipſi nomen eſt Baych; ſed Turri huic proximæ nomen eſt Phaxab. And this inſcription (ſaith Fazellus) was found intire in the Caſtle Baych, in the Year 1534. Now whether theſe inſcriptions were truly as ancient, as theſe men believe they were, I leave every man to his own faith. But that the City was of aged times, it appears by Thucydides, who affirmeth; when the Greeks paſt firſt into Sicil, that then the Phœnicians, inhabited Panormus: Which certain it is they did in the firſt Punick War; to wit, the Carthaginians who were Phœnicians, from whom the Romans (A. Aquilius, and C. Cornelius, commanding this Army) took it; And when Marcellus Beſieged Syracuſe, it ſent him in aid 3000 Souldiers. But it was rather confederate, than ſubject to the Romans. For Cicero againſt Verres, names it among the free Cities of Sicil. After Syracuſe was deſtroyed, it became the firſt City, and Regal Seat, as well of the Goths and Sarazans in that Iſland, as of the Emperours of Conſtantinople; of the Normans, French, and Arragonians, which honour it holds this Day, and is much frequented, for the excellent Wine which grows about it.

ſar behind them. For ſo it muſt needs fall out; ſeeing that the Third Squadron towed their Horſe-Boats and Victuallers; and the Fourth had the Rearward of all. According to Amilcars direction it ſucceeded. For when the Romans had charged, and broken the thin Front of the Carthaginian firſt Fleet, which ran away, they forth-with gave after them with all ſpeed poſſible, not ſo much as looking behind them for the Second Squadron. Hereby the Romans were drawn near unto the body of the Carthaginian Fleet, led by Amilcar, and by him (at the firſt) received a great loſs, until their Second Squadron came up, which forced Amilcar to betake him to his Oars. Hanno alſo who commanded the right wing of the Carthaginian Fleet, invaded the Roman Rearward, and prevailed againſt them. But Amilcar being beaten off, Marcellus Atilius fell back to their ſuccour, and put the Carthaginians to their heels; as not able to ſuſtain both Squadrons. The Rear being relieved, the Conſuls came to the aid of their Third Battalion, which towed their Victuallers, which were alſo in great danger of being beaten by the Africans: But the Conſuls, joyning their Squadrons to it, put the Carthaginians on that part alſo to running.

This Victory fell unto the Romans, partly by the hardineſs of their Souldiers; but principally, for that Amilcar, being firſt beaten, could never after joyn himſelf unto any of his other Squadrons, that remained, as yet in a fair likelihood of prevailing, ſo long as they fought upon equal terms, and but Squadron to Squadron. Bnt Amilcar forſaking the fight, thereby left a full Fourth part of the Roman Fleet uningaged, and ready to give ſuccour to any of the other parts that were oppreſt. So as in concluſion, the Romans got the honour of the day: For they loſt but Four and Twenty of theirs; whereas the Africans loſt Thirty that were ſunk, and Threeſcore and Three that were taken.

Now, if Amilcar who had more Gallies than the Romans, had alſo divided his Fleet into Four Squadrons, (beſides thoſe that he ranged in the Front to draw on the Enemies, and to ingage them) and that, whilſt he himſelf fought with One Squadron that charged him, all the reſt of the Enemies Fleet had been at the ſame time entertained, he had prevailed: But the Second Squadron, being free, came to the reſcue of the firſt, by which Amilcar was oppreſt: and Amilcar, being oppreſſed and ſcattered, the Conſuls had good leiſure to relieve both the Third and the Fourth Squadron, and got the Victory.

Charles the fifth, among other the Precepts to Philip the Second his Son, where he adviſed him concerning War againſt the Turks, tells him, that in all Battels between them and the Chriſtians, he ſhould never fail to charge the Janiſars in the beginning of the fight, and to ingage them at once with the reſt. For (ſaith he) the Janiſars, who are alwayes reſerved intire in the Rear of the Battle, and in whom the Turk repoſeth his greateſt confidence; come up, in a groſs body, when all the Troops on both ſides, are disbanded and in confuſion; whereby they carry the Victory before them without reſiſtance. By the ſame order of fight, and reſervation, did the Romans alſo prevail againſt other Nations. For they kept their Triarii in ſtore (who were the choice of their Army) for the up-ſhot and laſt blow. A great and Victorious advantage it hath ever been found, to keep ſome one or two good Troops to look on, when all elſe are disbanded and ingaged.

SECT VIII.

The Romans prevail in Africk. Atilius the Conſul, propoundeth intolerable conditions of Peace to the Carthaginians. He is utterly beaten and made Priſoner.

NOW the Romans, according to their former reſolution, after they had repaired and re-Victualled their Fleet, ſet Sail for Africa, and arrived at the Promontory of Hercules, a great Head-land, ſomewhat to the Eaſt of the Port of Carthage, and ſome Forty Leagues from Heraclia in Sicil, where Amilcar himſelf as yet ſtaid. From this Head-land (leaving the entrance into Carthage) they coaſted the Eaſt-ſide of the Promontory, till they came to Clypea, a Town about Fifty Engliſh Miles from it. There they diſ-embarked and prepared to Beſiege Clypea; which to eaſe them of labour, was yielded unto them. Now had they a Port of their own on Africk ſide; without which all invaſions are fooliſh. By this time were the Africans alſo arrived at their own Carthage, fearing that the Roman Fleet and Army had directed themſelves thither: But being advertiſed that they had taken Clypea, they made Proviſions of all ſorts, both by Sea and Land, for their defence. The Romans ſend to Rome for directions, and in the mean while waſt all round about them. The Order given for the Senate, was, That one of the Conſuls ſhould remain with the Army, and that the other ſhould return with the Fleet into Italy. According to this direction, Manlius the Conſul is ſent home to Rome; whither he carried with him Twenty Thouſand African Captains, with all the Roman Fleet and Army; except forty Ships, fifteen Thouſand Foot, and five Hundred Horſe, that were left with Atilius.

With theſe forces, Regulus eaſily wan ſome Towns and places that were unwalled, and laid Siege to others. But he performed no great matter before he came to Adis. Yet I hold it worthy of relation, that near unto the River of Bragada, he encountred with a Serpent of One Hundred and Twenty foot long, which he ſlew, not without loſs of many Souldiers, being driven to uſe againſt it ſuch Engines of War, as ſerved properly for the aſſaulting of Towns. At Adis he met with the Carthaginian Army, whereof the Captains were Hanno and Boſtar, together with Amilcar, who had brought over out of Sicil Five Thouſand Foot, and Five Hundred Horſe to ſuccour his Country. Theſe (belike) had an intent, rather to weary him out of Africk, by wary protraction of time, than to undergo the hazard of a main fight. They were careful to hold themſelves free from neceſſity of coming to blows: yet had they a great deſire to ſave the Town of Adis out of his hands. Intending therefore to follow their general purpoſe, and yet to diſturb him in the Siege of Adis, they incamp near unto him, and ſtrongly (as they think) on the top of an Hill: But thereby they loſe the ſervices both of their Elephants, and of their Horſe-men. This diſadvantage of theirs, Regulus diſcovers, and makes uſe of it. He aſſails them in their ſtrength, which they defend a while while, but in fine the Romans prevail, and force them from the place, taking the spoil of their Camp. Following this their good fortune at the heels, they proceed to * Tunis a City within sixteen miles of Carthage, which they assault and take.

* This City was taken from the Turks by Charles the fifth in the year 1536. and was one of the three Keys, which he gave in charge to Philip the second his Son to keep safe; to wit, this Tunis, the Key of Africa: Flushing, the Key of the Netherlands: And Kedez, the Key of Spain. But two of these Philip so lost, that he never found them again; the third our English were bold, in the time of the renowned Queen Elizabeth, to wring out of his hand: where we stayed not to pick any lock, but brake open the doors, and having rifled all, threw it into the fire.

By the loss of this Battail at Adis, and more especially by the loss of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly dismayed. The Numidians, their next Neighbours towards the West, insult upon their misfortunes; invade, and spoil their Territory, and force those that Inhabit abroad, to forsake their Villages and Fields, and to hide themselves within the walls of Carthage. By reason hereof, a great Famine at hand threatens the Citizens. Atilius finds his own advantage, and assures himself that the City could not long hold out: Yet he feared least it might defend it self, until his time of Office, that was near expired, should be quite run out, whereby the new Consuls were like to reap the honour of obtaining it. Ambition therefore, that hath no respect but to it self, perswades him to treat of peace with the Carthaginians. But he propounded unto them so unworthy and base conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly possessed with fear, became now so couragious and disdainful, that they resolved, either to defend their liberty, or dye to the last man. To strengthen this their resolution, there arrived at the same time a great troop of Greeks, whom they had formerly sent to entertain. Among these was a very expert Souldier, named Xantippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had passed, and of the overthrow which the Carthaginians received near unto Adis, gave it out publickly; that the same was occasioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit, ran till it came to the Senate; Xantippus is sent for; gives the reason of his opinion; and in conclusion, being made General of the African Forces, he puts himself into the Field. The Army which he led, consisted of no more than twelve Thousand Foot, and four Thousand Horse, with an Hundred Elephants. No greater were the Forces wherewith the Carthaginians fought for all that they had, Liberties, Lives, Goods, Wives, and Children: which might well make it suspected, that the Armies by Sea, before spoken of, were mis-numbered; the one consisting of an Hundred and forty Thousand, and the other of an Hundred and fifty Thousand, were it not commonly found that they which use the service of mercenary Souldiers, are stronger abroad, than at their own doors.

Xantippus, taking the Field with his Army, marched directly towards the Romans; and ranging his Troops upon fair and level ground, fittest both for his Elephants and Horse, presented them Battel. The Romans wondred much, whence this new courage of their enemies might grow: But confident they were, that it should soon be abated. Their chief care was, how to resist the violence of the Elephants. Against them they placed the Velites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a forlorn hope; that these might either with darts and other casting-weapons, drive back the Beasts upon the enemies, or at least break their violence, and hinder them from rushing freely upon the Legions. To the same end, they made their Battails deeper in file, than they had been accustomed to do. By which means, as they were the less subject unto the impression of the Elephants; so were they so much the more exposed unto the violence of the Horse, wherein the enemy did far exceed them. The Elephants were placed by Xantippus, all in one rank, before his Army; which followed him at a reasonable distance: His Horsemen, and some light-armed Foot, of the Carthaginians Auxiliaries, were in the wings. The first onset was given by the Elephants, against which the Velites were so unable to make resistance, that they brake into the Battalions following, and put them into some disorder. In this case, the depth of the Romans Battail was helpful. For when the Beasts had spent their Force, in peircing through a few of the first Ranks; the Squadrons nevertheless persisted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian Horse, having at the first encounter, by reason of their advantage in number, driven those of Atilius out of the Field, began to charge the Roman Battalians in flank, and put them in great distress; who being forced to turn face every way, could neither pass forward nor yet retire; but had very much ado to make good the ground whereon they stood. In the mean while, such of the Romans, as had escaped the fury of the Elephants, and left them at their backs, fell upon the Carthaginian Army, that met them in very good array. It was no even match. The one were a disordered Company, wearied with labour and hurt; the other, fresh, and well prepared, to have dealt with the enemy upon equal terms. Here was therefore a great slaughter with little fight; the Romans hastily recoiled to the body of their Army, which being surrounded with the enemy, and spent with travail, fell all to rout, upon the defeat of these Troops, that open the way to a general overthrow. So the Carthaginians obtained a full Victory; destroying the whole Roman Army, save two Thousand, and taking five Hundred Prisoners, together with Atilius the Consul. Of their own they lost no more than eight Hundred Mercenaries, which were slain when the fight began, by two Thousand of the Romans: That wheeling about to avoid the Elephants, bare down all before them: And made way even to the Carthaginian Trenches. These were the two Thousand that escaped, when the whole Army behind them was routed. All the rest were either taken or slain. Hereby fortune made the Romans know, that they were no less her Vassals, than were the Carthaginians: How insolent soever they had been in their proposition of peace, as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their prosperity, which she never gave nor sold to any mortal man. With what joys these news were welcomed, when they came to Carthage, we may easily conjecture; and what great things the vertue of one man hath often brought to pass in the World, there are many examples to prove, no less than this of Xantippus: All of them confirming that sentence of Eurypedes, Mens una sapiens, plurimum vincit manus; Many mens hands equal not one wise mind.

After this great service done to the Carthaginians, Xantippus, returned into Greece; whether for that he was more envied than honoured, or for what other cause, it is unknown.

The death of Atilius Regulus the Consul, was very memorable. He was sent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange and ransom of Prisoners on both sides: Giving his faith to return if the business were not effected. When he came to Rome;

and

and plainly saw that his Country should lose by the bargain: So far was he from urging the Senate unto compassion of his own misery, that he earnestly perswaded to have the Prisoners in Africk, left to their ill destines. This done, he returned to Carthage: where for his pains taken, he was rewarded with an horrible death. For this his constancy and faith, all Writers highly extol him. But the Carthaginians seem to have judged him an obstinate and malicious enemy, that neither in his prosperity would hearken to reason, nor yet in his calamity would have the natural care, to preserve himself and others, by yielding to such an office of humanity, as is common in all Wars (not grounded upon deadly hatred) only in regard of some small advantage. Whatsoever the Carthaginians thought of him; sure it is that his faithful observance of his word given, cannot be too much commended. But that grave speech, which he made in the Senate, against the exchange of Prisoners, appears, in all reason, to have proceeded from a vainglorious forwardness, rather than from any necessity of State. For the exchange was made soon after his death; wherein the Romans had the worse bargain, by so much as Regulus himself was worth. As for the authority of all Historians, that magnifie him in this point; we are to consider, that they lived under the Roman Empire: Philinus, the Carthaginian, perhaps did censure it otherwise. Yet the death which he suffered with extream torments, could not be more grievous to him, than it was dishonourable to Carthage. Neither do I think that the Carthaginians could excuse themselves herein; otherwise than by recrimination: Saying, that the Romans deserved to be no better intreated, for as much as it is their ordinary practice to use others in the like sort. Cruelty doth not become more warrantable, but rather more odious, by being customary. It was the Roman fashion, to whip almost to death, and then to behead the Captains of their enemies whom they took, yea, although they were such as had alwayes make fair Wars with them. Wherefore it seems not meet, in reason, that they should cry out against the like Tyrannical insolency in others, as if were lawful only in themselves.

The consideration both of this misfortune, that rewarded the pride of Atilius his intolerable demands; and of the sudden valour, whereinto the Carthaginians fear was changed by meer desperation; calls to remembrance, the like insolency of others in prosperity, that hath bred the like resolution in those, to whom all reasonable grace hath been denyed. In such cases I never hold it impertinent, to add unto one, more testimonies; approving the true rules, from which our passions carry us away.

In the year 1378. the Genowaies won so fast upon the Venetians, as they not only drave their Gallies out of the Sea, but they brought their own Fleet within two miles of Venice it self. This bred such an amazement in the City of Venice, that they offered unto the Genowaies (their state reserved) whatsoever they would demand. But Peter Doria blown up with many former Victories, would hearken to no composition; save the yielding of their City and State to his discretion. Hereupon the Venetians, being filled with disdain, thrust out to Sea with all their remaining power, and assail Doria with such desperate fury, that they break his Fleet, kill Doria himself, take nineteen of his Gallies, fourscore Boats of Padoa; and four Thousand Prisoners, recover Chiozza, and all the places taken from them; and following their Victory, enter the Port of Genoa, enforcing the Genowaies basely to beg peace, to their extream dishonour and disadvantage, being beaten: which, being Victorious, they might have commanded, to their greatest honour and advantage. The like hapned to the Earl of Flanders, in the year 1380. when having taken a notable, and withal an over-cruel revenge upon the Gantois, he refused mercy to the rest, who in all humility, submitting themselves to his obedience, offered their City, Goods, and Estates, to be disposed at his pleasure. This when he had unadvisedly refused, and was resolved to extinguish them utterly; they issue out of their City with five Thousand chosen men, and armed with a desperate resolution, they charge the Earl, break his Army, enter Bruges (pell-mell) with his vanquished followers; and enforce him to hide himself under an heap of straw, in a poor Cottage; out of which with great difficulty he escaped, and saved himself. Such are the fruits of Insolency.

SECT. IX.

How the affairs of Carthage prospered after the Victory against Atilius: How the Romans, having lost their Fleet by Tempest, resolve to forsake the Seas: The great advantages of a good Fleet in War, between Nations divided by the Sea.

BY the reputation of this late Victory, all places that had been lost in Africk, return to the obedience of Carthage. Only Clypea stands out; before which the Carthaginians sit down, and assail it, but in vain: For the Romans, hearing of the loss of Atilius, with their forces in Africk, and withal, that Clypea was besieged, make ready a gross Army, and transport it in a Fleet of three Hundred and fifty Gallies, commanded by M. Emilius, and Ser. Fulvius, their Consuls. At the Promontory of Mercury, two Hundred Carthaginian Gallies, set out of purpose, upon the bruit of their coming, encounter them: But greatly to their cost. For the Romans took by force an Hundred and fourteen of their Fleet, and drew them after them to Clypea; where they staid no longer, than to take in their own men that had been besieged: And this done they made amain toward Sicil, in hope to recover all that the Carthaginians held therein. In this hasty Voyage they despise the advise of the Pilots, who pray them to find harbour in time, for that the season threatned some violent Storms, which ever hapned between the rising of Orion, and of the * Dog-star. Now although the Pilots of the Roman Fleet had thus fore-warned them of the weather at hand, and certified them withal, that the South Coast of Sicil had no good Ports, wherein to save themselves upon such an accident: Yet this Victorious Nation was perswaded, that the Winds and Seas feared them no less, than did the Africans; and that they were able to Conquer Elements themselves. So refusing

* There is no part of the World, which hath not some times of outragious weather, beside their accidental storms. We have upon our Coast a Michaelmas flaw that seldome or never fails. In the West Indies in the Moneths of August and September, those most forcible Winds, which the Spaniards call the Nortes, or North-winds, are very fearful: And therefore they that Navigate in those parts, take harbour till those Moneths take end. Charles the Fifth being as ill advised, in passing the Seas towards Algier, in the Winter quarter contrary to the Consul of A. Doria; as he was in like unseasonable times to continue his siege before Metz in Lorrain, lost an Hundred and forty Ships by Tempests, and fifteen Gallies, with all in effect in them, of men, Victuallers, Horses, and munition: a loss no less great, than his retreat, both from before the one and the other, was extream dishonourable.

to ſtay within ſome Port as they were adviſed, they would needs put out to Sea; thinking it a matter much helping their reputation, after this Victory againſt the Carthaginian Fleet, to take a few worthleſs Towns upon the Coaſt. The mercileſs winds in the mean while overtake them, and near unto Camerina, overturn and thruſt headlong on the Rocks, all but fourſcore of three Hundred and forty Ships, ſo as their former great Victory was devoured by the Seas, before the fame thereof recovered Rome.

The Carthaginians, hearing what had hapned, repair all their Warlike Veſſels, hoping once again to command the Seas: They are alſo as confident of their Land-forces ſince the overthrow of Atilius. They ſend Aſdrubal into Sicil with all their old Soulders, and an Hundred and forty Elephants imbarked in two Hundred Gallies. With this Army and Fleet he arrives at Lilybæum, where he begins to vex the Partiſans of Rome. But adverſity doth not diſcourage the Romans: They build in three moneths (a matter of great note) one Hundred and twenty Ships; with which, and the remainder of their late Ship-wrack, they row to Panormus, or Palerma, the chief City of the Africans in Sicil, and ſurround it by Land and Water: After a while they take it, and leaving a Garriſon therein, return to Rome.

Very deſirous the Romans were to be doing in Africk: To which purpoſe they imployed C. Servilius, and C. Sempronius, their Conſuls. But theſe wrought no wonders. Some ſpoil they made upon the Coaſts of Africk: But Fortune robbed them of all their gettings. For in their return, they were firſt ſet upon the Sands, and like to have had periſhed, near unto the leſſer Syrtes, where they were fain to heave all over-board, that ſo they might get off: Then, having with much ado doubled the Cape of Lilybæum, in their paſſage from Panormus towards Italy, they loſt an Hundred and fifty of their Ships by foul weather. A greater diſcouragement never Nation had; the god of the Wars favoured them no more, than the god of the waters afflicted them. Of all that Mars enricht them with upon the Land, Neptune robbed them upon the Seas. For they had now loſt, beſides what they loſt in fight, four Hundred and ſix Ships and Gallies, with all the munition and Souldiers tranſported in them.

The exceeding dammage hereby received, perſwaded them to give over their Navigation, and their fight by Sea, and to ſend only a Land-Army into Sicil, under L. Cæcilius, and F. Furius, their Conſuls. Theſe they tranſport in ſome threeſcore ordinary paſſage Boats, by the ſtraights of Meſſana, that are not above a mile and an half broad from land to land. In like ſort, the overthrow which Atilius received in Africa, occaſioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them leſs cholerick againſt the Carthaginians, than before; ſo that for two years after, they kept the high and woody grounds, not daring to fight in the fair and Champion Countreys. But this late reſolution of forſaking the Seas laſted not long. For it was impoſſible for them to ſuccour thoſe places which they held in Sicil, without a Navy, much leſs to maintain the War in Africa. For, whereas the Romans were to ſend Forces from Meſſana to Egeſta, to Lilybæum, and to other places in the extream Weſt parts of Sicil, making ſometime a march of above an Hundred and forty Engliſh mile by land, which could not be performed without an Army, and the proviſions that follow it, in leſs than fourteen dayes; the Carthaginians would paſs it with their Gallies, in eight and forty hours.

An old example we have, of that great advantage of tranſporting Armies by water, between Canutus, and Edmund Ironſide. For Canutus, when he had entred the Thames with his Navy and Army, and could not prevail againſt London; ſuddenly imbarqued; and ſailing to the Weſt, landed in Darſet-ſhire, ſo drawing Edmund and his Army thither. There finding ill entertainment, he again ſhipt his men, and entred the Severn, making Edmund to march after him, to the ſuccour of Worceſter-ſhire, by him greatly ſpoiled. But when he had Edmund there, he ſailed back again to London: By means whereof, he both wearied the King, and ſpoiled where he pleaſed, ere ſuccour could arrive. And this was not the leaſt help, which the Netherlands have had againſt the Spaniards, in the defence of their liberty, that being Maſters of the Sea, they could paſs their Army from place to place, unwearied, and entire; with all the Munition and Artillery belonging unto it, in the tenth part of the time, wherein their enemies have been able to do it. Of this an inſtance or two. The Count Maurice of Naſſau, now living, one of the greateſt Captains, and one of the worthieſt Princes, that either the preſent or preceeding Ages have brought forth, in the year 1590. carried his Army by Sea, with forty Cannons to Breda: Making countenance either to beſiege Boiſleduc, or Gertreviden Berg; which the enemy (in prevention) filled with Souldiers, and Victuals. But as ſoon as the wind ſerved, he ſuddenly ſet ſail, arriving in the mouth of the Meuze, turned up the Rhine, and thence to Yſſel, and ſate down before Zutphen. So before the Spaniards could march over land round about Holland, above fourſcore mile, and over many great Rivers, with their Cannon and carriage, Zutphen was taken. Again, when the Spaniſh Army had overcome this wearisome march, and were now far from home, Prince Maurice, making countenance to ſail up the Rhine, changed his courſe in the night, and ſailing down the ſtream, he was ſet down before Hulſt in Brabant, ere the Spaniards had knowledge what was become of him. So this Town he alſo took, before the Spaniſh Army could return. Laſtly, the Spaniſh Army was no ſooner arrived in Brabant, than the Prince of Maurice, well attended by his good Fleet, having fortified Hulſt, ſet ſail again, and preſented himſelf before Nymegen in Gelders, a City of notable importance, and maſtered it.

And to ſay the truth; it is impoſſible for any maritime Countrey, not having the Coaſts admirably fortified, to defend it ſelf againſt a powerful enemy, that is Maſter of the Sea. Hereof I had rather, that Spain than England ſhould be an example. Let it therefore be ſuppoſed, that King Philip the ſecond had fully reſolved to hinder Sir John Norris in the year 1589. from preſenting Don Antonio, King of Portugal, before the gates of Lisborn; and that he would have kept off the Engliſh by power of his Land-Forces; as being too weak at Sea, through the great overthrow of his mighty Armado, by the Fleet of Queen Elizabeth, in the year foregoing. Surely, it had not been hard for him, to prepare an Army, that ſhould be able to reſiſt our eleven Thouſand. But where ſhould this his Army have been beſtowed? If about Lisborn; then would it have been eaſie unto the Engliſh, to take, ranſack, and burn the Town of Croin, and to waſte the Countrey round about it. For the great and threatning preparations of the Earl of Altemira, the Marqueſs of Seralba, and others did not hinder them from performing all this. Neither did the haſty levy of eight Thouſand under the Earl of Andradas drada, ſerve to more effect, than the increaſe of honour to Sir John Norris, and his Aſſociates: Conſidering that the Engliſh charged theſe, at Puente de Burgos, and paſſing the great Bridge, behind which they lay, that was flanked with ſhot, and barricadoed at the further end, routed them, took their Camp; took their General Standard with the Kings Arms, and purſued them over all the Countrey, which they fired. If a Royal Army, and not (as this was) a Company of private adventurers, had thus begun the War in Galicia; I think it would have made the Spaniards to quit the guard of Portugal, and make haſte to the defence of their St. Jago, whoſe Temple was not far from the danger. But, had they held their firſt reſolution, as knowing, that Sir John Norris his main intent was, to bring Don Antonio, with an Army into his Kingdom, whither coming ſtrong, he expected to be readily and joyfully welcomed: Could they have hindred his landing in Portugal? Did not he land at Penicha, and march over the Country to Lisborn, ſix dayes journey? Did not he (when all Don Antonio his promiſes failed) paſs along by the River of Lisborn to Caſcaliz, and there, having won the Fort, quietly imbarque his men, and depart? But theſe, though no more than an handful, yet were they Engliſhmen. Let us conſider of the matter it ſelf; what another Nation might do, even againſt England, in landing an Army, by advantage of a Fleet, if we had none. This queſtion, Whether an invading Army may be riſiſted at their landing upon the Coaſt of England, were there no Fleet of ours at the Sea to impeach it; is already handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his obſervations upon Cæſars Commentaries, that maintains the affirmative. This he holds only upon ſuppoſition; in abſence of our ſhipping: And comparatively, as that it is a more ſafe and eaſie courſe, to defend all the Coaſt of England, than to ſuffer any enemy to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surely I hold with him, that it is the beſt way, to keep our enemies from treading upon our ground; wherein, if we fail, then muſt we ſeek to make him wiſh, that he had ſtayed at his own home. In ſuch a caſe, if it ſhould happen, our judgments are to weigh many particular circumſtances, that belongs not unto this diſcourſe. But making the queſtion general, and poſitive, Whether England, without the help of her Fleet, be able to debar an enemy from landing. I hold that it is unable ſo to do: And therefore I think it moſt dangerous to make the adventure. For the incouragement of a firſt Victory to an enemy, and the diſcouragement of being beaten to the invaded, may draw after it a moſt perilous conſequence.

It is true, that the Marſhal Monluc, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complain, that by his wanting Forces, wherewith to have kept the frontier of Guyenne, they of the Proteſtant Religion, after the Battel of Moncontour, entred that Country, and gathered great ſtrength and relief thence; for if the King (ſaith he) would have given me but reaſonable means, j'euſſe bien garde a Monſieur l' Admiral de fair boire ſes Chevaux en la Garonne; I would have kept the Admiral from watering his Horſes in the River of Garonne. Monſieur de Langey, on the contrary ſide, prefers the not fighting upon a frontier with an invading enemy, and commends the delay; which courſe the Conſtable of France held againſt the Emperour Charles, when he invaded Provence. Great difference I know there is, and a diverſe conſideration to be had, between ſuch a Country as France is, ſtrengthened with many fortified places: And this of ours where our Rampars are but of the bodies of men. And it was of invaſions upon firm land, that theſe great Captains ſpake: whoſe entrances cannot be uncertain. But our queſtion is an Army to be tranſported over Sea, and to be landed again in an enemies Countrey, and the place left to the choice of the invader. Hereunto I ſay, that ſuch an Army cannot be reſiſted on the Coaſt of England, without a Fleet to impeach it; no, nor on the Coaſt of France, or any other Countrey: Except every Creek, Port, or ſandy Bay, had a powerful Army, in each of them, to make oppoſition. For let his whole ſuppoſition be granted; that Kent is able to furniſh twelve Thouſand foot, and thoſe twelve Thouſand be layed in the three beſt landing places within that Countrey, to wit, three Thouſand at Margat, three Thouſand at the Neſſe, and ſix Thouſand at Fulkſton, that is ſomewhat equally diſtant from them both; as alſo that two of theſe Troops (unleſs ſome other order be thought more fit) be directed to ſtrengthen the third, when they ſhall ſee the enemies Fleet to bend towards it: I ſay, that notwithſtanding this proviſion, if the enemy, ſetting ſail from the Iſle of Wight, in the firſt watch of the night, and towing their long Boats at their Sterns, ſhall arrive by dawn of day at the Neſſe, and thruſt their Army on ſhore there; it will be hard for thoſe three thouſand that are at Margat (twenty and four long miles from thence) to come time enough to re-enforce their fellows at the Neſſe. Nay, how ſhould they at Fulkſtone be able to do it, who are nearer by more than half the way? ſeeing that the enemy, at his firſt arrival, will either make his entrance by force, with three or four Hundred ſhot of great Artillery, and quickly put the firſt three Thouſand, that were intrenched at the Neſſe, to run; or elſe give them ſo much to do, that they ſhall be glad to ſend for help to Fulkſton, and perhaps to Margat: whereby thoſe places will be left bare. Now let us ſuppoſe, that all the twelve Thouſand Kentiſh Souldiers arrive at the Neſſe, ere the enemy can be ready to diſ-embarque his Army, ſo that he will find it unſafe, to land in the face of ſo many, prepared to withſtand him; yet muſt we believe, that he will play the beſt of his own game; (having liberty to go which way he liſt) under covert of the night, ſet ſail towards the Eaſt, where what ſhall hinder him to take ground, either at Margat, the Downes, or elſewhere, before they at the Neſſe can be well aware of his departure? Certainly, there is nothing more eaſie than to do it. Yea, the like may be ſaid of Waymouth, Purbeck, Poole, and of all landing places on the South Coaſt. For there is no man ignorant, that Ships, without putting themſelves out of breath, will eaſily outrun the Souldiers that coaſt them. Les armees ne volent point en poſte; Armies neither flye, nor run poſt, ſaith a Marſhal of France. And I know it to be true, that a Fleet of Ships may be ſeen at Sun-ſet, and after it, at the Lizard; yet by the next morning they may recover Portland, whereas an Army of foot ſhall not be able to march it in ſix dayes. Again, when thoſe troops lodged on the Sea-ſhores, ſhall be forced to run from place to place in vain, after a Fleet of Ships; they will at length ſit down in the mid-way; and leave all at adventure. But ſay it were otherwiſe; that the invading enemy will offer to land in ſome ſuch place, where there ſhall be an Army of ours ready to receive him; yet it cannot be doubted, but that when the choice of all our Trained Bands, and the choice of our Commanders and Captains, ſhall be drawn together (as they were at Tilbury in the year 1588.) to attend the the perſon of the Prince, and for the defence of the City of London: They that remain to guard the Coaſt can be of no ſuch force, as to encounter an Army like unto that wherewith it was intended that the Prince of Parma ſhould have landed in England.

The Iſle of Tercera hath taught us by experience, what to think in ſuch a caſe. There are not many Iſlands in the World, better fenced by nature, and ſtrengthened by Art: it being every where hard of acceſs; having no good harbour wherein to ſhelter a Navy of friends, and upon every cove or watering place a Fort erected, to forbid the approach of an enemies Boat. Yet when Emanuel de Sylva, and Monſieur de Chattes, that held it to the uſe of Don Antonio, with five or ſix Thouſand men, thought to have kept the Marqueſs of Santa Cruz, from ſetting foot on ground therein; the Marqueſs having ſhewed himſelf in the Road of Angra, did ſet ſail, ere any was aware of it, and arrived at the Port des Moles, far diſtant from thence; where he wan a Fort, and landed ere Monſieur de Chattes, running thither in vain, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip Stroſſie, ſlain the year before, without all regard of his worth, and of three Hundred French Priſoners murdered in cold bloed; had inſtructed de Chattes, and his followers, what they might expect at that Marqueſs his hands: Therefore it is not like, that they were ſlow in carrying in relief to Port des Moles. Whether our Engliſh would be perſwaded to make ſuch diligent haſte, from Margat to the Neſſe, and back again, it may be doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Tercera; whereof the French-men had not meaſured the one half when they found themſelves prevented by the more nimble Ships of Spain.

This may ſuffice to prove, that a ſtrong Army, in a good Fleet, which neither foot nor horſe is able to follow, cannot be denyed to land where it liſt, in England, France, or elſewhere, unleſs it be hindred, encountred, and ſhuffled together, by a Fleet of equal or anſwerable ſtrength.

The difficult landing of our Engliſh, at Fayal, in the year 1597. is alledged againſt this: which example moves me no way to think, that a large Coaſt may be defended againſt a ſtrong Fleet. I landed thoſe Engliſh in Fayal my ſelf, and therefore ought to take notice of this inſtance. For whereas I find an Action of mine cited, with omiſſion of my name; I may, by a civil interpretation, think, that there was no purpoſe to defraud me of any honour; but rather an opinion, that the enterprize was ſuch, or ſo ill managed, as that no honour could be due unto it. There were indeed ſome which were in that Voyage, who adviſed me not to undertake it: And I hearkned unto them ſomewhat longer than was requiſite, eſpecially, whilſt they deſired me to reſerve the title of ſuch an exploit (though it were not great) for a greater perſon. But when they began to tell me of difficulty; I gave them to underſtand, the ſame which I now maintain, that it was more difficult to defend a Coaſt, than to invade it. The truth is, that I could have landed my men with more eaſe than I did; yea without finding any reſiſtance, if I would have rowed to another place; yea even there where I landed, if I would have taken more company to help me. But, without fearing any imputation of raſhneſs, I may ſay, that I had more regard of reputation in that buſineſs, than of ſafety. For I thought it to belong unto the honour of our Prince and Nation, that a few Iſlanders ſhould not thing any advantage great enough, againſt a Fleet ſet forth by Q. Elizabeth: And further, I was unwilling, that ſome Low-Country Captains, and others, not of mine own ſquadron, whoſe aſſiſtance I had refuſed, ſhould pleaſe themſelves with a ſweet conceit (though it would have been ſhort, when I had landed in ſome other place) That for want of their help I was driven to turn tail. Therefore I took with me none, but men aſſured, Commanders of mine own ſquadron, with ſome of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, Voluntaries, whom I could not refuſe; as, Sir William Brook, Sir William Harvey, Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir John Skot, Sir Thomas Bridgeway, Sir Henry Tinnes, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir Walter Chute, Marcellus Throckmorton, Captain Laurence Kemis, Captain William Morgan, and other ſuch as well underſtood themſelves and the enemy; By whoſe help, with Gods favour, I made good the enterprize I undertook. As for the working of the Sea, the ſteepneſs of the Cliffs, and other troubles that were not new to us, we overcame them well enough. And theſe (notwithſtanding) made five or ſix Companies of the enemies, that ſought to impeach our landing, abandon the wall, whereon their Musketiers lay on the Reſt for us, and won the place of them without any great loſs. This I could have done with leſs danger, ſo that it ſhould not have ſerved for example of a Rule, that failed even in this example: But the reaſons before alledged (together with other reaſons well known to ſome of the Gentlemen above named, though more private than to be here laid down) made me rather follow the way of bravery, and take the ſhorter courſe; having it ſtill in mine own power to fall off when I ſhould think it meet. It is eaſily ſaid, that the Enemy was more then a Coward; (which yet was more than we knew) neither will I magnifie ſuch a ſmall peice of ſervice, by ſeeking to prove him better: whom had I thought equal to mine own followers, I would otherwiſe have dealt with. But for ſo much as concerns the propoſition in hand; he that beheld this, may well remember that the ſame enemy troubled us more in our march towards Fayal, than in our taking the ſhore; that he ſought how to ſtop us in place of his advantage, that many of our men were ſlain or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthur Gorges was ſhot in that march; and that ſuch, as (thinking all danger to be paſt, when he had won good footing) would needs follow us to the Town, were driven by him, to forſake the place of a man of War, and betake themſelves to an haſty trot.

For end of this Digreſſion, I hope that this queſtion ſhall never come to tryal; his Majeſties many moveable Forts will forbid the experience. And although the Engliſh will no leſs diſdain, than any Nation under Heaven can do, to be beaten upon their own ground, or elſewhere by a forain enemy; yet to entertain thoſe that ſhall aſſail us, with their own Bief in their bellies, and before they eat of our Kentiſh Capons, I take it to be the wiſeſt way. To do which, his Majeſty after God, will imploy his good Ships on the Sea, and not truſt to any intrenchment upon the ſhore.

SECT. X.

How the Romans attempt again to get the Maſtery of the Seas. The Victory of Cæcilius the Roman Conſul at Panormus : The ſiege of Lilybæum. How a Rhodian Gally entred Lilybæum at pleaſure, in deſpight of the Roman Fleet. That it is a matter of great difficulty to ſtop the paſſage of good Ships. The Romans, by reaſon of grievous loſſes received under Claudius and Junius their Conſuls, abandon the Seas again.

WHen without a ſtrong Navy, the Romans found it altogether impoſſible, either to keep what they had already gotten in Sicil, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa, or elſewhere; they reſolved once again, notwithſtanding their late miſadventures, to ſtrengthen their Fleet and Ships of War. So cauſing fifty new Gallies to be built, and the old to be repaired, they gave them in charge (together with certain Legions of Souldiers) to the new Conſuls, C. Atilius, and L. Manlius. On the other ſide, Aſdrubal perceiving that the Romans, partly by reaſon of the Shipwrack which they had lately ſuffered, partly by reaſon of the overthrow which they received by Xantippus in Africa, were leſs daring than they had been in the beginning of the War: And withal, that one of the Conſuls was returned into Italy, with the one half of the Army, and that Cæcilius, with only the other half, remained at Panormus; he removed with the Carthaginian forces from Lilybæum towards it, hoping to provoke Cæcilius to fight. But the Conſul was better adviſed. For when Aſdrubal had made his approaches ſomewhat near the Town, Cæcilius cauſed a deep trench to be cut, a good diſtance without the ditch of the City: Between which and his trench he left ground ſufficient, to embattel a Legion of his Souldiers. To theſe he gave order that they ſhould advance themſelves, and paſs over the new trench, till ſuch time as the African Elephants were thruſt upon them. From thoſe Beaſts he commanded them to retire by ſlow degrees till they had drawn on the Elephants to the brink of the new trench, which they could by no means paſs. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a ſtand, they were ſo gawled and beaten, both by thoſe Souldiers that were on the inſide of the trench, and by thoſe that lay in the trench it ſelf, that being inraged by their many wounds, they brake back furiouſly upon their own foot-men, and utterly diſordered them. Cæcilius eſpying his advantage; ſallied with all the force he had; and charging the other Troops, that ſtood embattailed, he utterly brake them, and put them to their heels; making a great ſlaughter of them, and taking all their Elephants.

The report of this Victory being brought to Rome; the whole State filled with courage, prepared a new Fleet of two Hundred ſail, which they ſent into Sicil, to give end to that War, that had now laſted fourteen years. With his Fleet and Army the Romans reſolved to attempt Lilybæum, the only place of importance which the Carthaginians held in Sicil; and all (indeed) ſave Drepanum, that was near adjoyning. They ſet down before it, and poſſeſs themſelves of all the places of advantage near unto it, eſpecially of ſuch as command the Haven, which had a very difficult entrance. They alſo beat to the ground ſix Towers of defence; and by forcible engines weaken ſo many other parts of the City, as the defendants begin to deſpair. Yet Himilco, Commander of the place, faileth not in all that belongs to a man of War. All that is broken he repaireth with admirable diligence; he maketh many furious ſallies, and giveth to the Romans all the affronts that poſſible could be made. He hath in Garriſon (beſides the Citizens) ten Thouſand Souldiers; among which there are certain Lieutenants, and other petty Officers, that conſpire to render and betray the Town. But the matter is revealed by an Achæan, called Alexon, who had formerly in danger of the like Treaſon, ſaved Agrigentum. Himilco uſeth the help of Alexon, to aſſure the hired Souldiers, and imploys Hannibal to appeaſe the Troops of the Gaules, which did waver, and had ſent their agents to the enemy. All promiſe conſtancy and truth; ſo that the Traitors, being unable to perform what they had undertaken, are fain to live in the Roman Camp as fugitives, that had wrought no good whereby to deſerve their bread. In the mean while, a ſupply of ten Thouſand Souldiers is ſent from Carthage to their relief, having Hannibal the Son of Amilcar for their Conductor: who, in deſpight of all reſiſtance, entred the Port and City, to the incredible joy of the beſieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies (thereto perſwaded by Himilco with hope of great reward) reſolved to ſet upon the Romans in their trenches, and either force them to abandon the ſiege, or (at leaſt) to take from them, or ſet on fire their Engines of Battery. The attempt is preſently made, and purſued to the uttermoſt, with great ſlaughter on both ſides. But the Romans, being more in number, and having the advantage of the ground, hold ſtill their places, and with extream difficulty defend their Engines.

They of Carthage deſire greatly to underſtand the ſtate of things at Lilybæum; but know not how to ſend into the Town. A certain Rhodian undertakes the ſervice; and having received his diſpatch, ſails with one Gally to Æguſa, a little Iſland near Lilybæum. Thence, taking his time he ſteared directly with the Port; and having a paſſing ſwift Gally, he paſt through the beſt of the Channel, and recovered the water-gate ere any of thoſe which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thruſt from the ſhores on either ſide.

The next day, neither attending the covert of the dark night, nor dreading to be boarded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his return, he ſet ſail, and ſhipped his Oars (his Gally being exceeding quick of ſtearage, and himſelf expert in all parts of the Channel) recovered the Havens mouth, and the Sea, in deſpight of all the purſuit made after him. Then, finding himſelf out of danger of being encompaſſed by many, he turned again towards the mouth of the Haven, challenging any one, if any one durſt come forth to undertake him. This enterpriſe, and the well performing of it, was very remarkable, and much wondered at in thoſe dayes: And yet, where there was no great Artillery, nor any other weapons of fire, to kill afar off, the adventure which this Rhodian made was not greatly hazardous. For in this Age, a valiant and judicious man of War will not fear to paſs by the beſt appointed Fort of Europe, with the help of a good Tide, and a leading gale of wind: No, though forty pieces of great Artillery open their mouths againſt him, and threaten to tear him in pieces.

In the beginning of our late Queens time, when Denmark and Sueden were at War, our Eaſt-land Fleet, bound for Leif-land, was forbidden by the King

King of Denmark to trade with the subjects of his Enemies, and he threatned to sink their Ships if they came through the Streights of Elsenour. Notwithstanding this, our Merchants (having a Ship of her Majesties, called the Minion, to defend them) made the adventure, and sustaining some Vollies of shot, kept on their course. The King made all the Provision he could to stop them, or sink them at their return. But the Minion, commanded (as I take it) by William Burrough, leading the way, did not only pass out with little loss, but did beat down, with Artillery, a great part of the Fort of Elsenour; which at that time was not so well rampard, as now perhaps it is: And the Fleet of Merchants that followed him, went through without any wound received. Neither was it long since that the Duke of Parma, Besieging Antwerp, and finding no possibility to master it, otherwise than by Famin, laid his Cannon on Bank of the River, so well to purpose, and so even with the face of the Water, that he thought it impossible for the least Boat to pass by. Yet the Hollanders and Zelanders, not blown up by any wind of glory, but coming to find a good Market for their Butter and Cheese, even the poor men, attending their profit when all things were extream dear in Antwerp, passed in Boats of Ten or Twelve Tun, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in despight of it; when a strong Westerly Wind, and a Tide of Flood favoured them; as also with a contrary Wind, and an Ebbing Water, they turned back again: So as he was forced, in the end, to build his Stockado overthwart the River, to his marvellous trouble and charge.

The Fort Saint Philip terrified not us in the Year 1596, when we entered the Port of Caliz, neither did the Fort at Puntal, when we were entred, beat us from our anchoring by it; though it plaid upon us with Four Demi-Cannons within point-blank, from six in the Morning till twelve at noon. The Siege of Ostend, and of many other places, may be given for proof, how hard a matter it is to stop the passage of a good Ship, without another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Fort is so set, as that of Angra in Tercera, that there is no passage along beside it, or that the Ships are driven to turn upon a bow-line towards it, wanting all help of Wind and Tyde; there, and in such places, it is of great use, and fearful: otherwise not.

But to return to our adventrous Rodian: He arrives in safety at Carthage, and makes them know the estate of Lilybæum. Others also, after this, take upon them to do the like, and perform it with the same success. The Romans therefore labour to choak the Channel; and, for that purpose, fill many Merchants Ships with great Stones, and sink them therein. The force of the Tydes clear it again in part: But they grounded so many of those great bellied-Boats in the best of the entrance, as at last it made a manifest rising and heap, like a ragged Island in the passage. Hereby it came to pass, that a Carthaginian Galley, taking her course by Night, and not suspecting any such impediment, ran her self aground thereon, and was taken. Now comes that brave Rhodian, thinking to enter, as he had done before: But this Carthaginian Gally, a little before taken, gave him chase, and gathered upon him, he finds what she is, both by her form, and by her swiftness: And being not able to run from her, resolved to fight with her. But she is too well manned for him, so that he is beaten and taken.

Lilybæum, after this, is greatly distressed, the Souldiers being worn with labour and watching. But in this despair there rose so violent a Tempest, as some of the Romans Wooden-Towers, by which they over-topt the walls of Lilybæum, were overturned. A Greek Souldier undertakes to fire those that were fallen, and performs it: For the fire was no sooner kindled, but being blown unto by the bellows of a Tempest, it increased so fast, as it became resistless, and in the end burned all to ashes, and melted the Brazen heads of the battering Rams. Hereupon, despair and weariness hinder the Romans from repairing their Engines: So that they resolve, by a long Siege, to starve the defendants.

Upon relation of what had past, a supply of Ten Thousand Souldiers is sent from Rome, under M. Claudius, the Consul. He arrives at Messana, and marcheth over Land to Lilybæum: Where having re-inforced the Army, and supplied the Gallies with new Rowers, he propounds the surprise of Drepanum, a City on the other side of the Bay of Lilybæum. This service the Captains and Souldiers willingly embrace. So the Consul embarques his Troops, and arrives on the sudden in the mouth of the Port. Adherbal is Governour of the Town, a valiant and prudent man of War, who being ignorant of the new supply arrived at Lilybæum, was at first amazed at their sudden approach; but having recovered his Spirits, he perswades the Souldiers rather to fight abroad, than to be encloſed. Herewithal he promiseth great rewards to such, as by their valour shall deserve them; offering to lead them himself, and to fight in the head of his Fleet. Having sufficiently encouraged his men, he thrust into the Sea towards the Romans. The Consul, deceived of his expectation, calls back the foremost Gallies, that he might now marshal them for defence. Hereupon some row backward, some forward, in great confusion. Adherbal finds and follows his advantage, and forceth the Consul into a Bay at hand, wherein he rangeth himself, having the Land on his back: Hoping thereby to keep himself from being incompassed. But he was thereby, and for want of Sea-room, so straightned, as he could not turn himself any way from his Enemies, nor range himself in any order. Therefore when he found no hope of resistance, keeping the shore on his left hand, he thrust out of the Bay with Thirty Gallies, besides his own, and so fled away: All the rest of his Fleet, to the number of Ninety and Four Ships, were taken or sunk by the Carthaginians. Adherbal for his service is greatly honoured at Carthage; and Claudius, for his indiscretion and flight, as much disgraced at Rome.

The Romans, notwithstanding this great loss, arm Threescore Gallies, with which they send away L. Junius, their Consul, too take charge of their business in Sicil. Junius arrives at Messana, where he meets with the whole remainder of the Roman Fleet, those excepted which rode in the Port of Lilybæum. One Hundred and Twenty Gallies he had; and besides these, he had gotten together almost Eight Hundred Ships of burthen, which were laden with all necessary Provisions for the Army. With this great Fleet he arrives at Syracuse, where he stayes a while; partly to take in Corn, partly to wait for some that were too slow of Sail to keep company with him along from Messana. In the mean time he dispatcheth away towards Lilybæum his Questors or Treasurers; to whom he commits the one half of his Victuallers, with some Gallies for their Convoy.

Adherbal was not careless after his late Victory; But studied how to use it to the best advantage.

The Ships and Priſoners that he had taken, he ſent to Carthage. Of his own Gallies he delivered Thirty to Carthalo, who had Threeſcore and Ten more under his own charge; and ſent him to try what good might be done againſt the Roman Fleet in the Haven of Lilybæum. According to his direction, Carthalo ſuddenly enters the mouth of that Haven, where he finds the Romans more attentive to the keeping in of the Beſieged Carthaginians, than to the defence of their own againſt another Fleet. So he chargeth them, boords, and takes ſome, and fires the reſt. The Romans Camp takes alarm, and haſtens to the reſcue. But Himilco, Governour of the Town, is not behind hand; who ſallies out at the ſame time, and putting the Romans to great diſtreſs, gives Carthalo good leiſure to go through with his enterpriſe.

After this exploit, Carthalo ran all along the South Coaſt of Sicil, deviſing how to work miſchief to the Enemy; wherein Fortune preſented him with a fair occaſion, which he wiſely mannaged. He was advertiſed by his Scouts, that they had deſcryed, near at hand, a great Fleet, conſiſting of all manner of Veſſels. Theſe were the Victuallers, which the Conſul Junius, more haſtily than providently, had ſent before him towards Lilybæum. Carthalo was glad to hear of their coming: For he and his men were full of courage, by reaſon of their late victories. Accounting therefore the great Multitude of Roman Hulks, approaching, to be rather a prey then a Fleet likely to make ſtrong oppoſition, he haſtens to encounter them. It fell out according to his expectation. The Romans had no mind to fight: But were glad to ſeek ſhelter in an open Road, full of Rocks under the covert of a poor Town, belonging to their party; that could help to ſave them only from the preſent danger, by lending them Engins and other aid, wherewith to beat off the Carthaginians that aſſailed them. Carthalo therefore, having taken a few of them, lay waiting for the reſt, that could not long ride under thoſe Rocks, but would be forced by any great change of Wind, either to put out into the deep, or to ſave their men how they could, by taking land, with the loſs of all their Shipping. Whilſt he was buſie in this care, the Conſul Junius drew near, and was diſcovered. Againſt him Carthalo makes out, and finds him altogether unprepared to fight, as being wholly ignorant of that which had hapned. The Conſul had neither means to fly, nor ability to fight. Therefore he likewiſe ran into a very dangerous Creek; thinking no danger ſo great as that of the Enemy. The Carthaginian ſeeing this, betakes himſelf to a ſtation between the two Roman Fleets; where he watcheth, to ſee which of them would firſt ſtir, with a reſolution to aſſault that, which ſhould firſt dare to put it ſelf into the Sea. So as now all the Three Fleets were on the South Coaſt of Sicil, between the Promontory of Pachinus and Lilybæum; a Tract exceeding dangerous, when the Wind ſtormed at South. The Carthaginians, who knew the times of Tempeſt, and their ſignes, finding (belike) ſome ſwelling Billow (for ſo we do in the Weſt of England, before a Southernly Storm) haſted to double the Cape of Pachinus, thereby to cover themſelves from the rage at hand. But the Romans, who knew better how to fight than how to Navigate, and never found any foul weather in the entrails of their Beaſts, their South-ſayers being all Land-Prophets, were ſuddenly overtaken with a boiſterous South-wind, and all the Gallies forced againſt the Rocks, and utterly wrackt.

This calamity ſo diſcouraged the Romans, that they reſolved again to forſake the Seas, and truſt only to the ſervice of their Legions upon firm ground. But ſuch a reſolution cannot long hold. Either they muſt be ſtrong at Sea, or elſe they muſt not make War in an Iſland, againſt thoſe that have a mightier Fleet. Yet are they to be excuſed, in regard of the many great calamities which they had ſuffered through their want of skill. Here I cannot forbear to commend the patient vertue of the Spaniards. We ſeldom or never find, that any Nation hath endured ſo many miſadventures and miſeries, as the Spaniards have done, in their Indian Diſcoveries. Yet perſiſting in their enterpriſes with an invincible conſtancy, they have annexed to their Kingdom ſo many goodly Provinces, as bury the remembrance of all dangers paſt. Tempeſts and Shipwracks, Famin, Overthrows, Mutinies, Heat and Cold, Peſtilence, and all manner of diſeaſes both old and new, together with extream poverty, and want of all things needful, have been the Enemies wherewith every one of their moſt noble diſcoverers, at one time or other, hath encountred. Many Years have paſſed over ſome of their heads in the ſearch of not ſo many Leagues: Yea more than one or two have ſpent their labour, their wealth, and their lives, in ſearch of a Golden Kingdom, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their firſt ſetting forth. All which notwithſtanding, the Third, Fourth, and Fifth undertakers, have not been diſheartned. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with thoſe Treaſuries and Paradiſes which they enjoy; and well they deſerve to hold them quietly, if they hinder not the like vertues in others, which (perhaps) will not be found.

SECT XI.

The City of Eryx is ſurpriſed by the Romans, and recovered by Amilcar, who ſtoutly holds War with them Five Years. The Romans, having emptied their common Treaſury, build a new Fleet at the charges of private men. The great Victory at Sea of Luctatius the Conſul; whereby the Carthaginians are forced to crave Peace. The conditions of the Peace between Rome and Carthage.

THE Romans were careful to ſupply with all induſtry, by Land, the want of ſtrength at Sea. Therefore they continue the Siege of Lilybæum, and ſeek to make ſure to themſelves all places, whither the Enemies Ships could not bring relief. The Conſul Junius, to cure the wound of diſhonour, which he had received, bethought him what enterpriſes to undertake. In the end he reſolved to attempt the Mountain and City of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina: Which was the faireſt and richeſt of all the Iſland; and of theſe, by cunning or Treaſon, he got poſſeſſion. Eryx was commodiouſly ſeated between Drepanum and Panormus; ſo that it ſeemed a fit place for a Garriſon, that ſhould reſtrain the Carthaginians from making Roads into the Country. Wherefore Junius fortified both the top of the Mountain, and the firſt entrance of the paſſage from the bottom, (both of which places were very defenſible) with a good ſtrength of men. But ſhortly after, in the Eighteenth Year of this War, the Carthaginians ſet forth Amilcar, ſurnamed Barcas, Father of the great Hannibal, with a Fleet and Army, who ſailing to the Coaſt of Italy, did throughly repay the ſpoils which the Romans made in Africa. For he firſt of all waſted and deſtroyed the Territories of the Locrians, and of the Brutians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entred he into Sicil, and finding there no Walled City in the Carthaginians power, that ſerved fitly to infeſt the Romans, he occupied a piece of ground of great advantage, and lodged his Army thereon; to confront as well the Romans, that were in Panormus, as thoſe that kept about Eryx, putting himſelf between both Armies with admirable reſolution.

The place that Amilcar had ſeized upon, was not only very ſtrong by ſituation, but had the command of a Port: Whereby it gave him opportunity to ſcour all the Coaſt of Italy with his Fleet, waſting all along as far as to Cuma. In the Iſle of Sicil he held the Romans to hard work, lying near unto Panormus: Where in Three Years abode, he did many notable acts, though not of much conſequence, for that the Enemy could never be drawn to hazard the main chance. Having wearied himſelf and the Romans long enough about Panormus, he undertook a ſtrange piece of work at Eryx. The Roman Garriſons, placed there by Junius, on the top, and at the bottom of the Mountain, were very ſtrongly lodged. Nevertheleſs Amilcar found a way, lying towards the Sea-ſide, by which he conveighed his men into the City of Eryx, that was about the midſt of the aſcent, ere the Enemy knew of it. By this it came to paſs, that the Romans which kept the top of the Mountain, were ſtraightly held (as it were) Beſieged. And no leſs was Amilcar himſelf reſtrained by both of theſe Garriſons, and ſuch as came to relieve them. There he found them paſtime about Two Years more, hoping ſtill to weary out thoſe that lay over his head, as they on the contrary did their beſt, to thruſt him out of thoſe Quarters.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent unto the proſecuting of his buſineſs at Eryx. Wherein it ſeems true (as Hannibal in Livie, ſpake unto Scipio) that the affairs of Carthage never ſtood in better terms, ſince the beginning of the War, than now they did. For whereas the Romans had utterly forſaken the Seas, partly by reaſon of their great loſſes; partly upon confidence of their Land-Forces, which they held reſiſtleſs; Amilcar, with a ſmall Army, had ſo well acquitted himſelf, to the honour of his Country, that by the trial of Five Years War, the Carthaginian Souldier was judged equal, if not ſuperior to the Roman. Finally, when all that might be, had been deviſed and done, for the diſlodging of this obſtinate Warriour: No, way ſeemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once again to build a Fleet; whereby, if the maſtery of the Sea could once be gotten, it was likely that Amilcar, for lack of ſupply, ſhould not long be able to hold out. But in performing this, extream difficulty was found. The common Treaſury was exhauſted: And the coſt was not little, that was requiſite unto ſuch an enterpriſe. Wherefore there was none other way left, than to lay the burden upon private Purſes. Divers of the principal Citizens undertook to build (each at his own charges) One Quinquereme, which example wrought ſo well, that they, whoſe ability would not ſerve to do the like, joyned with ſome others, and laying their Monies together, concurred Two or Three of them, in building of another; with condition to be repayed, when the War was finiſhed. By this voluntary contribution, they made and finiſhed Two Hundred new Quinqueremes: Taking for their Pattern, that excellent ſwift rowing Gally which they had gotten from the Rhodian, in the Port of Lilybæum, as was ſhewed before. The charge of this Fleet was commited to C. Luctatius Catulus; who paſt with the ſame into Sicil the Spring following, and entred the Port of Drepanum; endeavouring by all means to have forced the City. But being advertiſed that the Carthaginian Fleet was at hand, and being mindful of the late loſſes which his Predeceſſors had received; he was careful to put himſelf in order, againſt their arrival.

Hanno was Admiral of the Carthaginian Fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) wiſe in picture, exceedingly formal, and skilful in the Art of ſeeming reverend. How his reputation was firſt bred, I do not find; but it was upheld by a factious contradiction, of things undertaken by men more worthy than himſelf. This quality procured unto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking among the ancient ſort, whoſe cold temper is averſe from new enterpriſes; and therewithal an opinion of great foreſight, confirmed by very loſs received. More particularly, he was gracious among the People, for that he was one of the moſt grievous oppreſſors of their ſubject Provinces; whereby he procured unto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithal ſuch hatred, as turned it all to their great loſs. He had ere this been imployed againſt the Numidians and wild Africans, that were more like to Rovers than to Souldiers, in making War. Of thoſe fugitive Nations he learned to neglect more manly Enemies, to his own great diſhonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which loſt not more by his bad conduct, than by his malicious counſel, when, having ſhewed himſelf an unworthy Captain, he betook himſelf to the long Robe. Yet is he much commended in Roman Hiſtories, as a temperate man, and one that ſtudied how to preſerve the League between Carthage and Rome. In which regard, how well he deſerved of his own Country, it will appear hereafter: How beneficial he was to the Romans, it will appear, both hereafter, and in this preſent Voyage; wherein he reduced the Carthaginians to a miſerable neceſſity of accepting, upon hard conditions, that Peace which he thenceforth commended.

Hanno had very well furniſhed his Navy, with all needful Proviſions for the Souldiers at Eryx (for dexterity in making preparation was the beſt of his qualities): But he had neither been careful in training his Mariners, to the practice of Sea-fight, nor in manning his Gallies with ſtout fellows. He thought, that the fame of a Carthaginian Fleet was enough, to make the unexpert Romans give way: Forgetting, that rather the reſiſtleſs force of Tempeſts, than any other ſtrength of oppoſition, had made them to forſake the Seas. Yet in one thing he had either conceived aright, or elſe was ſent forth well inſtructed. It was his purpoſe, firſt of all to ſail to Eryx, and there to diſcharge his Ships of their lading: And having thus lightned himſelf, he meant to take aboard ſome part of the Land-Army, together with Amilcar himſelf, by whoſe help he doubted not, but that he ſhould be able to make his Enemy repent of his new adventure to Sea. This was a good course, if it could have been performed. But Catulus used all possible diligence, to prevent the execution of this design: Not because he was informed of the Enemies purpose, but that he knew it to be the best for them, and for that he feared no danger so greatly, as to encounter with Amilcar. Wherefore although the weather was very rough, and the Seas went high, when the Carthaginian Fleet was descryed; yet he rather chose to fight with the Enemies, that had the Wind of him, than to suffer his Convoy to pass along to Eryx, upon unlikely hope of better opportunity in the future. All that Hanno should have done, Catulus had performed. He had carefully exercised his men in Rowing; he had lightned his Gallies of all unnecessary burthens; and he had taken aboard the choice men of the Roman Land-Souldiers. The Carthaginians therefore, at the first encounter were utterly broken and defeated, having Fifty of their Gallies stemmed and sunk, and Seventy taken, wherein were few less than Ten Thousand men, that were all made Prisoners: The rest, by a sudden change of Wind, escaping to the Isle of Hieronesus.

The state of Carthage, utterly discouraged by this change of fortune, knew not whereon to resolve. Means to repair their Fleet in any time, there were none left; their best men of War by Sea were consumed; and Amilcar, upon whose valour and judgment the honour and safety of the Common-weal rested, was now surrounded by his Enemies in Sicil, where he could not be relieved. In this extremity, they make dispatch unto Amilcar himself, and authorized him to take what course should seem best unto his excellent wisdom, leaving all conclusions to his election and sole counsel.

Amilcar, whom no adversity, accompanied with the least hope or possibility of recovery, had ever vanquished, looking over every promise, true or false, that the present time could make him, (for to attend any thing from the future he was not able) resolved to make trial, whether his necessity might be compounded upon any reasonable terms. He therefore sent to Lutatius the Consul an overture of Peace: Who considering it well, gathered so many arguments from the present poverty of the Roman State, wasted beyond expectation in the former War, that he readily harkened unto it. So, in conclusion, an accord was made, but with Provision, That it should hold none otherwise, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratifie it with their allowance.

The conditions were: First, That the Carthaginians should clearly abandon the Isle of Sicil. Secondly, That they should never undertake upon Hieron King of Syracuse, nor invade any part of his Territories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, That they should set at liberty, and send back in Italy, all the Romans, whom they held Prisoners, without Ransome. Lastly, That they should pay unto the Romans Two Thousand and Two Hundred Talents; which make, as the French reckon the Talent, Thirteen Hundred and Twenty Thousand Crowns, the same to be delivered with Twenty Years next following.

These Articles were sent to Rome, where they were not throughly approved: But Ten Commissioners were sent into Sicil, to make perfect the agreement. These Commissioners added a Thousand Talents to the former sum; and required a shorter time of payment. Further also they took order, that the Carthaginians should not only depart out of Sicil it self, but should also withdraw their Companies out of all other Islands between it and Italy, renouncing their whole interest therein.

Such was the end of the first Punick War, that had lasted about Twenty Four Years without intermission; in which time the Romans had lost, by fight or Shipwrack, about Seven Hundred Quinqueremes; and the Carthaginians about Five Hundred: The greatness of which losses, doth serve to prove the greatness both of these two Cities, and of the War it self; wherein I hold good the judgment of Polybius, That the Romans, in general, did shew themselves the braver Nation; and Amilcar, the most worthy Captain.

CHAP. II.

Of divers actions passing between the First and Second Punick Wars.

SECT. I.

Of the cruel War begun between the Carthaginians and their own Mercenaries.

THE Romans having partly by force, and partly by compolition, thrust the Carthaginians out of Sicil, and all the little Islands thereunto adjacent, gave them rather means and leisure to help themselves in a following War, than cause to hold themselves contented with the present Peace. It is an ancient and true rule, Quod leges a victoribus dicuntur, accipiuntur a victis; That Laws are given by the Conquerors, and received of the Conquered. But the Romans had either forgotten the answer that was made unto them, by one of the Privernates; or else had forgotten to follow it in this weighty business. For when one of Privernum, after a Rebellion, defending in the Senate the Cause of his City, was demanded by a Senator, What Peace the Romans might hope for, or assure themselves of, if they quitted their present advantage over them; he answered in those words, Si bonam dederitis, & fidam & perpetuam; si malam, haud diuturnam; If the Peace be good and faithful that you give us, it will be perpetual; if it be ill, then of little continuance. To this answer answer the Senate, at that time gave such approbation, that it was said, Viri & liberi vocem auditam; An credi posset, ullum populum, aut hominem deniq; in ea conditione, cujus eum pœniteat, diutius quam necesse sit mansurum? That was the speech of a manly and free man; for who could beleive, that any People, or indeed any one Man, would continue longer in an over-burdened estate, than meer necessity did enforce? Now, if the Romans themselves could make this judgment of those Nations, who had little else besides their manly resolution, to defend their liberty; surely they grosly flattered themselves, in presuming that the Carthaginians, who neither in power nor in pride, were any way inferiour unto themselves, would sit down any longer by the loss and dishonour received, than untill they could recover their legs, and the strength which had a while failed them to take revenge. But occasion, by which (while well entertained) not only private men, but Kings and publick States, have more prevailed, than by any proper prowess or vertue, with-held the Tempest from the Romans for a time, and turned it most fearfully upon Africa, and the Carthaginians themselves.

For after the first Punick War was ended, Amilcar, leaving Eryx, went to Lilybæum, from whence most conveniently the Army might be transported into Africk: The care of which business he committed unto Gesco, to whom, as to a man of approved sufficiency, he delivered over his charge. Gesco had an especial consideration of the great sums, wherein Carthage was indebted unto these Mercenaries; and withal, of the great disability to make payment. Therefore he thought it the wisest way, to send them over (as it were) by handfuls, a few at a time; that so the first might have their dispatch, and be gone, ere the Second or Third Companies arrived. Herein he dealt providently. For it had not been hard to perswade any small number, lodged within so great a City as Carthage, unto some such reasonable composition, as the present emptiness of the common Treasury did require: so that the first might have been friendly discharged, and a good president left unto the Second and Third, whilst their dis-junction had made them unable to recover their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrary opinion. They thought to find, in the whole Army, some that would be contented to gratifie the Publick State, by remitting a great part of their own due: And hoped, by such an example, to draw all the Multitude to the like agreement and capitulation. So they detained the first and second commers; telling them, that they would make an even reckoning with all together. Thus every day the number increased, and many disorders (a thing incident among Souldiers) were commited; which much disquieted the City, not accustomed unto the like. In this regard it was thought fit, to remove them all to some other place, where they might be less troublesome. This must be done by some colourable words of perswasion: For their number was already so great, that it was not safe to offend them too far. Wherefore it is devised, that they should all attend the coming of their fellows, at Sicca: Receiving every one a piece of Gold, to bear his charges in the mean while.

This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers began to dis-lodge; leaving behind them their Wives, their Children, and all their Baggage, as meaning shortly to fetch away all, when they came back for their pay. But the Carthaginians have no fancy to their returning into the Town; and therefore compel them to truss up their fardels, that they might have none occasion left to make any Errants thither. So to Sicca they removed, with all their goods: And there lay waiting for news of their fellows arrival, and their own pay. Business they had none to do, and therefore might easily be drawn to munity: The whole argument of their discourse inclining them to nothing else. Their daily talk was, how rich they should be, when all their mony came in; how much would fall to every single share, and for how long time the City was behind hand with them in reckoning. They were all grown Arithmeticians; and he was thought a man of worth, that could find most reason to increase their demands, to the very highest, even beyond their due. No part of their long service was forgotten; but the comfortable words and promises of their Captains, leading them forth to any dangerous Fight, were called to mind, and so many Obligations, not to be cancelled without satisfying their expectation by some unordinary largess.

Thus the time passeth away, untill the whole Army being arrived, and lodged in Sicca, Hanno comes thither to clear the accompt. Now is the day come, wherein they shall be all made rich; especially if they can hold together, in maintaining stoutly the common cause. So think they all; and assemble themselves to hear what good news this Messenger had brought; with a full resolution to help his memory, in case he should happen to forget any part of the many promises made to them; all which were to be considered in their Donative. Hanno begins a very formal Oration; wherein he bewails the poverty of Carthage, tells them how great a sum of Money is to be paid unto the Romans; reckons up the excessive charges whereat the Common-wealth had been in the late War; and finally desires them to hold themselves contented with part of their pay, and out of the love which they bare unto the City, to remit the rest. Few of them understood his discourse: For the Carthaginian Army was composed of sundry Nations, as Greeks, Africans, Gaules, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others; all of different Languages. Yet they stared upon him, and were (as I think) little pleased with his very gesture. But when such as conceived the whole tenour of his Speech, had informed the rest what cold comfort he brought; they were all inraged, and fared like mad-men, so that nothing would serve to appease them.

Hanno would fain have asswaged their fury, but he knew not how: For he less understood their dissonant loud noises, than they did his Oration. An Army collected out of so many Countries, that have no one Language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither easily stirred up to Mutiny, nor easily pacified, when once it is broken into out-rage. The best that Hanno can do, is to use the help of Interpreters and Messengers. But these Interpreters mistake his meaning; some for want of skil; others of set purpose; and such as deliver his Errants in the worst sence, are best believed. Finally, they think themselves much abused by the Carthaginians, and resolve to demand their own in peremptory terms, at a nearer distance. In this mood they leave Sicca, and march as far as Tunis, that is within a very little of Carthage, and there they encamp.

Now begin the Carthaginians to find their own errour. It is a good Rule,

Curandum imprimis, ne magna injuria fiat
Fortibus & miseris.

Have

Have ſpecial care, that valiant poverty
Be not oppreſt with too great injury.

But this proud City, having neglected the Rule, hath alſo been careleſs in providing to ſecure her ſelf againſt the inconvenience that might follow. She had ſuffered the whole Multitude, whereupon ſhe was like to give cauſe of diſcontent, to joyn it ſelf into one body, when the ſeveral Troops might eaſily have been diſperſed: She hath turned out of her Gates the Wives, Children, and goods of theſe poor men; which, had ſhe retained in ſhew of kindneſs, ſhe might have uſed them as Hoſtages for her own ſafety; and by imploying a miſerable penny-father, in her Negotiation with men of War, ſhe hath weakned the reputation of her braveſt Captains, that might beſt have ſerved to free her from the threatning danger. Yet likely it is, that Amilcar had no deſire to be uſed as an inſtrument in defrauding his own Souldiers of their wages: Eſpecially conſidering, that as he beſt could bear witneſs of their merits, ſo was he not ignorant, that means to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had been willing thereunto. Hereupon may be added a probable conjecture that Hanno, with his complices, who at this very time was a bitter enemy to Amilcar, had the boldneſs to impoſe the blame of his own wretched counſel upon the liberal promiſes made by the Captains. Amilcar therefore did wiſely, in ſuffering thoſe that maligned him, to have the managing of their own plot, and to deal the Cards which themſelves had ſhuffled. This they continue to do as fooliſhly as they had at firſt begun. They furniſh a Market at Tunis, for the Souldiers; whom they ſuffer to buy what they liſt, and at what price they liſt. They ſend ever and anon ſome of their Senatours into the Camp; who promiſe to ſatisfie all demands, as far forth as it ſhould be poſſible. And thus by ſhifting from one extream to another, they make the Souldiers underſtand into what fear the City was driven; which cannot chuſe but add much inſolency to the paſſions already ſtirred up.

This ſudden change of weather, and the true cauſe of it, is quickly found by the Army, which thereupon grows wiſe, and finding the ſeaſon fit, labours to make a great Harveſt. Mony muſt be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many have loſt their Horſes in publick ſervice of the State. The State ſhall pay for them. They had lived ſome Years by making hard ſhift, without receiving their allowance of Victuals from Carthage. If they had lived, they wanted not meat; therefore what was this to the Carthaginians? Was it not all one, whether the Ships did bring in Proviſion, or their Captains direct them where to fetch it? But this would not ſerve. They ſaid that they had been ſometimes driven to buy; and that (ſince they could not remember how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their Proviſion during the whole time, and according to the deareſt price that Wheat had born, whilſt the War laſted. Such are now the demands of theſe Mutiners; who might eaſily have been ſatisfied with far leſs charges, and far more honour, by receiving their due at the firſt. But now they make no end of craving. For whilſt the Carthaginians are perplexed about this Corn-mony; the Souldiers have deviſed many more tricks, whereby to extort a greater ſum of Mony, without all regard of ſhame. Since therefore no good end could be found of theſe controverſies which daily did multiply, it was thought convenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Sicil, ſhould be choſen by the Souldiers to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Army condeſcended, and made choice of Geſco: partly out of good liking to him, who had ſhewed himſelf at all times, a friendly man to them, and careful of their good, eſpecially when they were to be tranſported into Africk: partly out of a diſlike which they had conceived of Amilcar; for that he had not viſited them in all this buſie time. So Geſco comes among them; and to pleaſe them the better, comes not without Mony: Which might give better countenance to his proceedings, than barren eloquence had done to the Negotiation of Hanno. He calls unto him firſt of all the Captains, and then the ſeveral Nations apart, rebuking them gently for that which had paſſed; adviſing them temperately concerning the preſent; and exhorting them to continue their love unto their State, which had long entertained them, and would needs alwayes be mindful of their good ſervices. After this he began to put hand to his Purſe, offering to give them their whole pay in hand; and then after to conſider of other reckonings at a more convenient time. This had been well accepted, and might have ſerved to bring all to a quiet paſs, if two ſeditious Ring-leaders of the multitude had not ſtood againſt it.

There was in the Camp one Spendius, a ſturdy fellow, and audacious, but a Slave; that in the late War had fled from a Roman, who he ſerved, and therefore ſtood in fear, leſt he ſhould be delivered back to his Maſter; at whoſe hands he could expect no leſs, than to be Whipt and Crucified. This wretch could find no better way to prolong his own life, than by raiſing ſuch troubles as might ſerve to withdraw men from care of private matters, and make his own reſtitution impoſſible, were his Maſter never ſo importunate. With Spendius there aſſociated himſelf one Matho, an hot-headed man, that had been ſo forward in ſtirring up the Tumult, as he could not choſe but fear, leaſt his own death ſhould be made an example, to deter others from the like ſeditious behaviour. This Matho deals with his Country-men the Africans; telling them, that they were in far worſe condition, than either the Gaules, the Greeks, the Spaniards, or any foraign Mercenaries. For (ſaith he) Theſe our companions have no more to do, than to receive their Wages, and ſo get them gone: But we that are to ſtay behind in Africa, ſhall be called to another manner of Accompt, when we are left alone; ſo that we ſhall have cauſe to wiſh that we had returned home Beggars, rather than loaden with the Money, which (little though it be) ſhall break our backs. Ye are not ignorant, how tyrannically thoſe our haughty Maſters of Carthage do Reign over us. They think it reaſonable, that our lives and goods ſhould be at their diſpoſition; which they have at other times been accuſtomed to take from us even without apparent cauſe, as it were to declare their ſoveraignty: What will they now do, ſeeing that we have demeaned our ſelves as Free-men, and been bold to ſet a good face on the matter, demanding our own, as others have done? Ye all do know, that it were a very ſhame for us, if having been as forward in every danger of War, as any other men, we ſhould now ſtand quaking like Slaves, and not dare to open our mouths, when others take liberty to require their due. This notwithſtanding ye may aſſure your ſelves, that we are like to be taught better manners, as ſoon as our fellows are gone: in regard of whom they are content to ſhadow their indignation with a good, but a forced countenance.

Let

Let us therefore be wise, and consider that they hate and fear us: Their hatred will shew it self when their fear is once past: Unless we now take our time, and whilst we are the stronger, enfeeble them so greatly, that their hatred shall not be able to do us wrong. All their strength consisteth in money, wherewithal they have hired others against us, and us against others. At the present they have neither money nor friends. The best Army that ever served them, whereof we are no small part, lyes at their gates, ready to help us if we be men. A better opportunity cannot be expected; for were our Swords once drawn, all Africk would rise on our side. As for the Carthaginians, whither can they send for help? The case it self is plain. But we must quickly resolve. Either we must prevent the diligence of Gesco, by incensing these Gaules and Spaniards, and procuring them to draw blood; or else it behoveth us to please our good Masters, by joyning with them against our fellows, yea by offering to forgive unto them all our wages, if so (peradventure) they may be won to forgive us, or not over-cruelly to punish our faults committed. He is most worthily a wretched Slave, that neither hath care to win his Masters love, nor the courage to attempt his own liberty.

By such perswasions Matho wins the African Souldiers to his own purpose. They are not now so greedy of money, as of quarrel, which he that seeketh will not miss to find. When Gesco therefore offered to pay them their whole stipend presently, but referred their other demands, for Horses and Victuals, to some other more convenient time; they brake into great outrage, and say, that they will have all, even all at once, and that out of hand. In this tumult, the whole Army flock together about Matho and Spendius; whose diligence is not wanting to add more fuel to the fire already blazing. Matho and Spendius are the only men to whom the Souldiers will hearken: If any other stand up to make a speech, a showre of stones, flying about his ears, puts him to silence, that he shall never afterwards speak word more. Neither stay they to consider what it is that any man would say: enough hath been said already by those good spokes-men; so that no other word (though perhaps to the same purpose) can be heard, save only throw, throw.

Now the rebellion begins to take form. Matho and Spendius are chosen Captains; who, followed by a desperate crue of Ruffians, will suffer no man to make his own peace, but pursue their own ends, under fair pretence of the common cause. All which notwithstanding, Gesco is not wanting to the good of his Country, but adventures himself upon their fury. One while he deals with the Captains, and other principal men; taking them by the hand, and giving gentle words: Another while, he works with the several Nations; putting them all in hope of their own hearts desire, if any reason would content them. None of them are so sullen as the Africans: Indeed none of them had so good cause: They require him peremptorily to give them their own, and not to feed them with words. The truth is, that they are not so covetous as they seem: But will be more glad of an ill answer, than of a good payment. This is more than Gesco knows: He sees not that Matho hath any more than bare words to bestow upon them. Wherefore, as rebuking their inconsiderate heat, he tells them, that they may do well, if they stand in want of money, to seek it of their Captain Matho. This is enough. Shall he both defraud them and deride them? They stay no longer, but lay violent hands upon the treasure that he had brought; yea upon him also, and all that are with him: As intending to take this in part of payment, and, for the rest, to take another course. Matho and Spendius are glad of this. It had little pleased them to see their fellows begin to grow calm, by his fair language: Wherefore they cast into bonds both him, and all the Carthaginians that they can find; that so the Army may be freed from danger of good admonition, which they call Treason. After this follows open War. Matho solicites all Africk, and his Embassadors are every where well entertained. Neither is it needful to use perswasion: The very fame of this Rebellion sufficeth to draw the whole Country into it. Now must the Carthaginians be plagued for those oppressions, with which they have plagued others. It is true that adversity hath never been untold of her errours: And as she is ever assured to hear her own; so commonly with her own she undergoes those of other men. The Africans finding the Carthaginians hang under the wheel, tell them boldly, that their Impositions were mercilesse; that they took from them the one half of their Corn; that they doubled their Tributes in all things else; and that they inflicted upon their Vassals the greatest punishment for the least offences. These cruelties the Carthaginians themselves have forgotten: But the people, that have suffered so much, retain all in perfect memory. Wherefore not only such as can bear arms, are ready to do service in this great commotion; but the very women bring forth their Jewels, and other Ornaments, offering all to sail for the maintenance of so just a quarrel. By this great forwardness, and liberal contribution; Matho and Spendius are supplied with a strong aid of threescore and ten Thousand Africans: And are moreover furnished with money, not only to satisfie the present appetite of their men; but sufficient to continue the War begun, though it should be of long endurance.

SECT. II.

Divers Observations upon this War with the Mercenaries.

†. I.

Of Tyranny, and how Tyrants are fain to use the help of Mercenaries.

HEre let us rest a while, as in a convenient place, whence we may take a prospect of the subject, over which we travail. Behold a Tyrannical City, persecuted by her own Mercenaries with a deadly War. It is a common thing, as being almost necessary, that a Tyranny should be upheld by Mercenary forces: It is common that Mercenaries should be false: And it is common that all War made against Tyrants, should be exceeding full of hate and cruelty. Yet we seldome hear, that ever the ruine of a Tyranny is procured or sought by those that were hired to maintain the power of it: And seldome or never do we read of any War that hath been prosecuted with such inexpiable hatred, as this that is now in hand.

That which we properly call Tyranny, is, A violent form of Government, not respecting the good of the subject, but only the pleasure of the Commander. I purposely forbear to say that it is, the unjust rule of one over many: For very truly doth Cleon in Thucydides tell the Athenians, that their dominion over their ſubjects, was none other, than a mear Tyranny; though it were ſo, that they themſelves were a great City, and a popular eſtate. Neither is it peradventure greatly needful, that I ſhould call this form of commanding, violent: ſince it may well and eaſily be conceived, that no man willingly performs obedience to one regardleſs of his life and welfare; unleſs himſelf be either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly poſſeſſed with ſome extreme paſſion of love. The practice of Tyranny is not alwayes of a like extremity: For ſome Lords are more gentle than others, to their very Slaves; and he that is moſt cruel to ſome, is mild enough towards others, though it be but for his own advantage. Nevertheleſs, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers diſcretion cannot extend it ſelf unto notice of the difference which might be found between the worth of ſeveral men, it is commonly ſeen, that the taſte of ſweetneſs drawn out of oppreſſion, hath ſo good a reliſh, as continually inflames the Tyrants appetite, and will not ſuffer it to be reſtrained with any limits of reſpect. Why ſhould he ſeek out bounds to preſcribe unto his deſires, who cannot endure the face of one ſo honeſt, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that he hath gotten by extorting from ſome few: By ſparing none, he ſhould have riches in goodly abundance. He hath taken a great deal from every one: But every one could have ſpared more. He hath wrung all their Purſes, and now he hath enough: But (as Covetouſneſs is never ſatisfied) he thinks that all this is too little for a ſtock, though it were indeed a good yearly Income. Therefore he deviſeth new tricks of Robbery, and is not better pleaſed with the gains, than with the Art of getting. He is hated for this, and he knows it well: But he thinks by cruelty to change hatred into fear. So he makes it his exerciſe, to torment and murder all whom he ſuſpecteth: In which courſe, if he ſuſpect none unjuſtly, he may be ſaid to deal craftily; but if Innocency be not ſafe, how can all this make any Conſpirator to ſtand in fear, ſince the Traitor is no worſe rewarded than the quiet man? Wherefore he can think upon none other ſecurity, than to diſarm all his Subjects; to fortifie himſelf within ſome ſtrong place; and, for defence of his Perſon and State, to hire as many luſty Souldiers as ſhall be thought ſufficient. Theſe muſt not be of his own Country: For if not every one, yet ſome one or other may chance to have a feeling of the publick miſery. This conſidered, he allures unto him a deſperate rabble of ſtrangers, the moſt unhoneſt that can be found; ſuch as have neither wealth nor credit at home, and will therefore be careful to ſupport him, by whoſe only favour they are maintained. Now, leaſt any of theſe, either by deteſtation of his wickedneſs, or (which in wicked men is moſt likely) by promiſe of greater reward than he doth give, ſhould be drawn to turn his Sword againſt the Tyrant himſelf: They ſhall all be permitted to do as he doth; to Rob, to Raviſh, to Murder, and to ſatisfie their own appetites, in moſt outragious manner, being thought ſo much the more aſſured to their Maſter, by how much the more he ſees them grow hateful to all men elſe. Conſidering in what age, and in what language I write; I muſt be fain to ſay, that theſe are not dreams: Though ſome Engliſh-man perhaps that were unacquainted with Hiſtory, lighting upon this leaf, might ſuppoſe this diſcourſe to be but little better. This is to ſhew, both how Tyranny grows to ſtand in need of mercenary Souldiers, and how thoſe mercenaries are, by mutual obligation, firmly aſſured unto the Tyrant.

†. II.

That the Tyranny of a City over her Subjects is worſe than the Tyranny of one man: And that a Tyrannical City muſt likewiſe uſe mercenary Souldiers.

NOW concerning the Tyranny wherewith a City or State oppreſſeth her Subjects; it may appear ſome wayes to be more moderate, than that of one man: But in many things it is more intollerable. A City is jealous of her Dominion; but not (as is one man) fearful of her life: The leſs need hath ſhe therefore to ſecure her ſelf by cruelty. A City is not luxurious in conſuming her treaſures, and therefore needs the leſs to pluck from her Subjects. If War, or any other great occaſion drive her to neceſſity of taking from her Subjects more than ordinary ſumms of money; the ſame neceſſity makes either the contribution eaſie, or the taking excuſable. Indeed no wrongs are ſo grievous and hateful, as thoſe that are inſolent. Remember (ſaith Caligula the Emperour, to his Grandmother Antonia) that I may do what I liſt, and to whom I liſt: Theſe words were accounted horrible, though he did her no harm. And Juvenal [illegible]ons it, as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruel Roman Dame upon her Slaves, that whilſt ſhe was whipping them, ſhe painted her face, talked with her Goſſips, and uſed all ſigns of neglecting what thoſe wretches felt. Now ſeeing that the greateſt grievance wherewith a domineering State offendeth her Subjects, are free from all ſenſe of indignity; likely it is, that they will not extreamly hate her, although deſire of liberty make them weary of her Empire. In theſe reſpects it is not needful that ſhe ſhould keep a Guard of licentious cutthroats, and maintain them in all villany, as a Dionyſius or Agathocles muſt do: her own Citizens are able to terrifie and to hold perforce in obedience, all male-contents. Theſe things, conſidered alone by themſelves, may ſerve to prove, that a City is ſcarce able to deſerve the name of a Tyranneſs, in the proper ſignification.

All this notwithſtanding, it ſhall appear, that the miſeries wherewith a Tyrant loadeth his people, are not ſo heavy, as the burdens impoſed by a cruel City. Not without ſome appearance of truth, it may be ſaid, that Luſt, and many other private paſſions, are no way incident to a City or Corporation. But to make this good, we ſhall have need to uſe the help of ſuch diſtinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome laſcivious, when Cato was fain to riſe and leave the Theater, to the end, that the reverend regard of his gravity might not hinder the people from calling for a ſhew of naked Courtiſans, that were to be brought upon the open ſtage? By common practice, and general approved cuſtome, we are to cenſure the quality of a whole State; not by the private vertue or vice of any one man, nor by metaphyſical abſtraction of the univerſal from the ſingular; or of the Corporation, from thoſe of whom it is compounded: I ſay therefore (as I have ſaid elſewhere) that it were better to live under one pernicious Tyrant, than under many Thouſands. The reaſons proving this, are are too many to set down, but a few may suffice. The desires of one man, how inordinate soever, if they cannot be satisfied, yet they may be wearied; he is not able to search all corners; his humour may be found, and soothed; age or good advise, yea, or some unexpected accident may reform him: All which failing, yet there is hope, that his successour may prove better.

Many Tyrants have been changed into worthy Kings: And many have ill used their ill-gotten Dominion, which, becoming hereditary to their posterity, hath grown into the most excellent form of Government, even a lawful Monarchy. But they that live under a Tyrannical City, have no such hope: Their Mistress is immortal, and will not slacken the reins, untill they be pulled out of her hands, and her own mouth receive the bridle of a more mightier Charriotter. This is woful: Yet their presents sufferings make them less mindful of the future. New flies, and hungry ones, fall upon the same sore, out of which others had already sucked their fill. A new Governour comes yearly among them, attended by all his poor kindred and friends, who mean not to return home empty of their hives, without a good lading of wax and honey. These fly into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with every mans wealth, or whatsoever else, in all the Province, is worthy to be desired. They know all a mans enemies, and all his fears: Becoming themselves, within a little space, the enemies that he feareth most. To grow into acquaintance with these masterful guests, in hope to win their friendships, were an endless labour (yet it must be undergone) and such as every one hath not means to go about: But were this affected, what availeth it? The love of our Governour is purchased with gifts: The Successour of this man, he is more loving than could be wished in respect of a fair Wife or Daughter; then comes the third, perhaps of the contrary faction at home, a bitter enemy to both his fore-goers, who seeks the ruine of all that have been inward with them. So the misery of this Tyranny are not simple, but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of civil War. The Romans had a Law De Repetundis, or, Of Recovery, against extorting-Magistrates: Yet we find, that it served not wholly to restain their Provincial Governours; who presuming on the favour of their own Citizens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bold in their Provinces, to work all these inormities rehearsed; though somewhat the more sparingly, for fear of judgment. If the Subjects of Rome groaned under such oppressions, what must we think of those that were Vassals unto Carthage? The Romans imposed no burthensome Tributes; they loved not to hear, that their Empire was grievous; they condemned many noble Citizens for having been ill Governours. At Carthage all went quite contrary: The Rapines newly devised by one Magistrate, served as presidents to instruct another; every man resolved to do the like, when it should fall to his turn; and he was held a notable Statesman, whose Robberies had been such, as might afford a good share to the common treasure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practice are not extant: The Governour of Verres the Roman in Sicil, that it is lively set out by Tully, may serve to inform us, what was the demeanour of these Punick Rulers, who stood in fear of no such condemnation, as Verres underwent. By prosecuting this discourse, I might infer a more general proposition; that a City cannot govern her subject Provinces so mildly as a King, But it is enough to have shewed, that the Tyranny of a City is far more intolerable, than that of any one most wicked man.

Sutable to the cruelty of such Lords, is the hatred of their subjects: And again, sutable to the hatred of the subjects, is the jealousie of their Lords. Hence it followed, that, in Wars abroad, the Carthaginians durst use the service of African Souldiers; in Africk it self they had rather be beholding to others, and were farther fetcht. For the same purpose did Hannibal, in the second Punick War, shift his Mercenaries out of their own Countries; Ut Afri in Hispania, Hispani in Africa, melior procul ab domo futurus uterq; miles, velut mutuis pignoribus obligati stipendia facerent; that the Africans might serve in Spain, the Spaniards in Africk, being each of them like to prove the better Souldiers, the farther they were from home, as if they were obliged by mutual pledges. It is disputable, I confess, whether these African and Spanish hirelings could properly be termed Mercenaries: For they were subject unto Carthage, and carried into the field, not only by reward, but by duty. Yet seeing their duty was no better than inforced, and that it was not any love to the State, but meer desire of gain, that made them fight; I will not nicely stand upon propriety of a word, but hold them, as Polybius also doth, no better than Mercenaries. Liv. Dec. 3. l. 2.

†. III.

The dangers growing from the use of mercenary Souldiers, and forrain Auxiliaries.

THE extream danger, growing from the imployment of such Souldiers, is well observed by Machiael: Who sheweth, that they are more terrible to those whom they serve, than to those against whom they serve. They are seditious, unfaithful, disobedient, devourers, and destroyers of all places and Countries, whereinto they are drawn; as being held by no other bond, than their own commodity. Yea, that which is most fearful among such hirelings, is, that they have often, and in time of greatest extremity, not only refused to fight, in their defence, who have entertained them, but revolted unto the contrary part; to the utter ruine of those Princes and States that have trusted them. Those mercenaries (saith Machiavel) which filled all Italy when Charles the Eighth of France, did pass the Alpes, were the cause that the said French King won the Realm of Naples with his Buckler without a Sword. Notable was the example of Sforza the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Millan; who being entertained by Queen Joan of Naples, abandoned her service on the sudden, and forced her to put her self into the hands of the King of Aragon. Like unto his Father Francis Sforza, the first of that Race, Duke of Millan; who being entertained by the Millanois, forced them to become his slaves, even with the very same Army which themselves had levied for their own defence. But Lodowick Sforza, the Son of this Francis, by the just judgment of God, was made a memorable example, unto posterity, in losing his whole estate by the treachery of such faithless Mercenaries, as his own Father had been. For having waged an Army of Switzers, and committed his Dutchy, together with his person, into their hands, he was by them delivered up unto his enemy the French King, by whom he was inclosed in the Castle of Loches unto his dying day.

The like inconvenience is found, in using the help of forrain Auxiliaries. We see, that when the Emperour of Constantiople had hired ten Thousand Turks against his neighbour Princes, he could never, either by perswasion or force, set them again over the Sea upon Asia side; which gave beginning to the Christian servitude, that soon after followed. Alexander the Son of Cassander, sought aid of the great Demetrius: But Demetrius, being entred into his Kingdom, slew the same Alexander, who had invited him, and made himself King of Macedon. Syracon the Turk was called into Egypt by Sanor Soldan, against his opposite: But the Turk did settle himself so surely in Egypt, that Saladine his successor became Lord thereof; and of all the holy Land, soon after. What need we look about for examples of this kind? Every Kingdom, in effect, can furnish us. The Britains drew the Saxons into this our Countrey; and Mac Murrough drew the English into Ireland; but the one and the other soon became Lords of those two Kingdoms.

Against all this, may be alledged the good success of the United Provinces of the Netherlands, using none other than such kind of Souldiers, in their late War. Indeed these Low-Countreys have many goodly and strong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthy, industrious, and valiant in their kind. They are stout Sea-men, and therein is their excellency; neither are they bad at the defence of a place well fortified: But in open Field they have seldome been able to stand against the Spaniard. Necessity therefore compelled them to seek help abroad: And the like necessity made them forbear to arm any great numbers of their own. For, with money raised by their Trade, they maintained the War: And therefore could ill spare unto the Pike and Musket, those hands, that were of more use in helping to fill the common purse. Yet what of this? They sped well. Surely they sped as ill as might be, whilest they had none other than mercenary Souldiers. Many fruitless attempts, made by the Prince of Orenge, can witness it: And that brave Commander Count Lodowick of Nassau, felt, to his grief, in his retrait from Græningham; when, in the very instance that required their service in fight, his Mercenaries cried out aloud for money, and so ran away. This was not the only time, when the hired Souldiers of the States, have either sought to hide their cowardize under a shew of greedines; or at least, by mear covetousnes, have ruined in one hour, the labour of many moneths. I will not stand to prove this by many examples: For they themselves will not deny it. Neither would I touch the honour of Monsieur the Duke of Anjou, brother to the French King; save that it is folly to conceal what all the World knows. He that would lay open the danger of forrain Auxiliaries, needeth no better pattern. It is commonly found, that such Aiders make themselves Lords over those, to whom they lend their succour: But where shall we meet with such another as this Monsieur, who, for his protection promised, being rewarded with the Lordship of the Countrey, made it his first work, to thrust by violence a galling yoak upon the peoples neck? Well, he lived to repent it, with grief enough. Even whilest he was counterfeiting unto those about him, that were ignorant of his plot, an imaginary sorrow for the poor Burghers of Antwerpe, as verily believing the the Town to be surprised and won; the death of the Count St. Aignau, who fell over the wall, and the Cannon of the City, discharged against his own Troops, informed him better what had hapned; shewing, that they were his own French who stood in need of the pity. Then was his feined passion changed into a very bitter anguish of mind, wherein, smiting his breast, and wringing his hands. he exclaimed, Helas, mon dieu; que veux tu faire de moy? Alas, my God, what wilt thou do with me? So, the affairs of the Netherlands will not serve to prove, that there is little danger in using Mercenaries Souldiers, or the help of forrain Auxiliaries, This notwithstanding, they were obedient unto necessity, and sought help of the English, Scots, and French: Wherein they did wisely, and prospered. For when there was in France a King, pertaker with them in the same danger; when the Queen of England refused to accept the Soveraignty of their Countrey, which they offered, yet being provoked by the Spaniard their enemy, pursued him with continual War: when the heir of England reigned in Scotland, a King too just and wise (though not engaged in any quarrel) either to make profit of his neighbours miseries, or to help those that had attempted the Conquest of his own Inheritance: Then might the Netherlands very safely repose confidence in the forces of these their Neighbour Countries. The Souldiers that came unto them from hence, were (to omit any other commendations) not only regardful of the pay that they should receive, but well affected unto the cause that they took in hand: Or, if any were cold in his devotion unto the side whereon he fought, yet was he kept in order, by remembrance of his own home, where the English would have rewarded him with death, if that his faith had been corrupted by the Spaniards. They were therefore trusted with the Custody of Cities; they were held as friends, and patrons; the necessity of the poorer sort was relieved, before the pay-day came, with lendings, and other helps, as well as the ability of the States could permit. When three such Princes, reigning at one time, shall agree so well, to maintain against the power of a fourth, injurious (or at the least so seeming) to them all, a Neighbour-Country of the same Religion, and to which they all are lovingly affected: Then may such a Country be secure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other business, in hope of like success. But these circumstances meet so seldom, as it may well hold true in general: That mercenary and forraign Auxiliary Forces are no less dangerous, than the enemy against whom they are entertained.

†. IV.

That the moderate government of the Romans, gave them assurance to use the service of their own subjects in their Wars. That in mans nature there is an affection breeding Tyranny, which hindereth the use and benefit of the like moderation.

HEre it may be demanded, whether also the Romans were not compelled to use the service of other Souldiers in their many great Wars, but performed all by their own Citizens? For if it were their manner to arm their own subjects, how hapned it, that they feared no rebellion? If strangers, how then could they avoid the inconveniences above rehearsed? The answer is, that their Armies were compounded usually of their own Citizens, and of the Latines in equal number: To which they they added, as occasion required, some companies of Campanes, Hetrurians, Samnites, or other of their subjects, as were either interessed in the quarrel, or might best be trusted. They had about these times (though seldom they did imploy so many) ten Roman Legions; a good strength, if all other help had been wanting; which served to keep in good order their Subjects, that were alwayes fewer in the Army than themselves. As for the Latines, if consanguinity were not a sufficient obligation; yet many priviledges and immunities, which they injoyed, made them assured unto the State of Rome: Under which they lived almost at liberty, as being bound to little else, than to serve it in War. It is true, that a yoke how easie soever, seems troublesome to the neck that hath been accustomed to freedom. Therefore many people of Italy have taken occasion of several advantages, to deliver themselves from the Roman subjection. But still they have been reclaimed by War, the Authors of rebellion have sharply been punished, and the people by degrees have obtained such liberty, as made them esteem none otherwise of Rome, than as the common City of all Italy. Yea, in process of time it was granted unto many Cities, and those far off removed, even to Tarsus in Cilicia, where St. Paul was born, that all the Burgesses should be free of Rome it self. This favour was conferred absolutely upon some, with restraint of giving notice in election of Magistrates, or with other such limitation as was thought fit. Hereunto may be added, that it was their manner, after a great Conquest, to release unto their new Subjects half of their Tribute which they had been wont to pay to their former Lords, which was a ready way to bring the multitude into good liking of their present condition; when the review of harder times past, should rather teach them to fear a relapse, than to hope for better in the future, by seeking innovation. Neither would it be forgotten, as a special note of the Romans good Government, that when some, for their well-deserving, have had the offer to be made Citizens at Rome, they have refused it, and held themselves better contented with their own present estate. Wherefore it is no marvel, that Petellia, a City of the Brutians in Italy, chose rather to endure all extremity of War, than, upon any condition, to forsake the Romans; even when the Romans themselves had confessed, that they were unable to help these their Subjects, and therefore willed them to look to their own good, as having been faithful to the utmost. Such love purchased these mild Governours, without impairing their Majesty thereby. The sum of all is; they had, of their own, a strong Army; they doubled it by adjoyning thereunto the Latines; and they further increased it, as need required, with other help of their own Subjects: All, or the most of their followers, accounting the prosperity of Rome to be the common good.

Liv. Dec. 1. lib. 3.

Liv. ibid.

The moderate use of soveraign power being so effectual, in assuring the people unto their Lords, and consequently in the establishment or inlargement of Dominion: It may seem strange, that the practice of Tyranny, whose effects are contrary, hath been so common in all ages. The like, I know, may be said of all Vice and Irregularity, whatsoever. For it is less difficult (whosoever thinks otherwise) and more safe, to keep the way of Justice and Honesty, than to turn aside from it; yet commonly our passions do lead us into by-paths. But where Lust, Anger, Fear, or any the like Affection, seduceth our reason; the same unruly appetite, either bringeth with it an excuse, or, at least-wise, taketh away all cause of wonder. In Tyranny it is not so: For as much as we can hardly descry the passion, that is of force to insinuate it self into the whole tenour of a Government. It must be confessed, that lawless desires have bred many Tyrants: Yet so that these desires have seldome been hereditary, or long-lasting, but have ended commonly with the Tyrants life, sometimes before his death; by which means the government hath been reduced to a better form. In such cases, the saying of Aristotle holds, That Tyrannies are of a short continuance. But this doth not satisfie the question in hand. Why did the Carthaginians exercise Tyranny? Why did the Athenians? Why have many other Cities done the like? If in respect of their general good; how could they be ignorant, that this was an ill course for the safety of the Weal publick? If they were led hereunto by any affection; what was that affection wherein so many Thousand Citizens, divided and subdivided within themselves by factions, did all concur, notwithstanding the much diversity of temper, and the vehemency of private hatred among them? Doubtless, we must be fain to say, that Tyranny is, by it self, a vice distinct from others. A man, we know, is Animal politicum, apt even by Nature, to command or to obey; every one in his proper degree, other desires of Mankind, are common likewise unto brute Beasts; and some of them, to Bodies wanting sense: But the desire of rule belongeth unto the nobler part of reason; whereunto is also answerable an aptness to yield obedience. Now as hunger and thirst are given by nature not only to Man and Beast, but unto all sorts of Vegetables, for the sustentation of their life: As Fear, Anger, Lust, and other affections are likewise natural, in convenient measure, both unto Mankind, and to all Creatures that have sense, for the shunning or repelling of harm, and seeking after that which is requisite: Even so is this desire of ruling or obeying, ingrafted by Nature in the race of Man, and in Man only as a reasonable Creature, for the ordering of his life, in a civil form of Justice. All these in-bred qualities are good and useful. Nevertheless, Hunger and Thirst are the Parents of Gluttony and Drunkenness, which, in reproach, are called beastly, by an unproper term: Since they grow from appetites, found in less worthy Creatures than Beasts, and are yet not so common in Beasts, as in Men. The effects of Anger, and of such other Passions as descend no lower than unto brute Beasts, are held less vile; and perhaps not without good reason: Yet are the more pernicious. But as no corruption is worse by sharper Laws, as being in general more horrible, and punished for grievously, than of that which is best; there is not any passion, that nourisheth a vice more hurtful unto Mankind, than that which issueth from the most noble root, even the depraved Affection of Ruling. Hence arise those two great mischiefs, of which hath been an old question in dispute, whether be the worse; that all things, or that nothing should be lawful. Of these a dull Spirit and overloaden by fortune with power, whereof it is not capable, occasioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrary distemper, whose vehemency the bounds of Reason cannot limit. Under the extremity of either, no Country is able to subsist, yet the defective dulness, that permitteth any thing, will also permit the execution of Law, to which meer necessity doth enforce the ordinary Magistrate; whereas Tyranny is more active and pleaseth it self in the excess, with a false colour of Justice. Examples of stupidity, and unaptness to rule, are not very frequent, quent, though ſuch Natures are every where to be found: For this quality troubles not it ſelf in ſeeking Empire; or if by ſome errour of fortune, it encounter therewithal, (as when Claudius, hiding himſelf in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) ſome friend, or elſe a Wife, is not wanting to ſupply the defect, which alſo, cruelty doth help to ſhadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing unknown, is without a name. Tyranny is more bold, and feareth not to be known, but would be reputed honourable: For it is proſperum & fœlix ſcelus, a fortunate miſchief, as long as it can ſubſiſt. There is no reward or honour (ſaith Peter Charron) aſſigned unto thoſe, that know how to increaſe, or preſerve humane Nature: All Honours, Greatneſs, Riches, Dignities, Empires, Triumphs, Trophees, are appointed for thoſe, that know how to afflict, trouble, or deſtroy it. Cæſar and Alexander, have un-made and ſlain, each of them, more than a Million of men: But they made none, nor left none behind them. Such is the errour of Mans judgment in valuing things according to the common opinion. But the true Name of Tyranny, when it grows to ripeneſs, is none other than Feritie: The ſame that Ariſtotle ſaith to be worſe than any Vice. It exceedeth indeed all other Vices, iſſuing from the paſſions incident both to Man and Beaſt; no leſs, than Perjury, Murder, Treaſon, and the like horrible crimes, exceed in villany, the faults of Gluttony and Drunkenneſs, that grow from more ignoble Appetites. Hereof Sciron, Procruſtes, and Pityocamptes, that uſed their bodily force to the deſtruction of Mankind, are not better examples, than Phalaris, Dionyſius, and Agathocles, whoſe miſchievous heads were aſſiſted by the hands of deteſtable Ruffians. The ſame barbarous deſire of Lordſhip, tranſported thoſe old examples of Feritie, and theſe latter Tyrants, beyond the bounds of Reaſon: Neither of them knew the uſe of Rule, nor the difference between Freemen and Slaves.

The Rule of the Husband over the Wife, and of Parents over their Children, is Natural, and appointed by God himſelf; ſo that it is alwayes, and ſimply, allowable and good. The former of theſe, is as the dominion of Reaſon over Appetite; the latter is the whole Authority, which one Freeman can have over another. The Rule of a King is no more, nor none other, than of a common Father over his whole Countrey: Which he that knows what the Power of a Father is, or ought to be, knows to be enough. But there is a greater and more Maſterly rule, which God gave unto Adam, when he ſaid; Have dominion over the Fiſh of the Gen. 2.28. Sea, and over the Fowl of the Air, and every living thing that moveth upon the Earth: Which alſo he continued unto Noah and his Children, ſaying, The Gen. 9. 2. fear of you, and the dread of you, ſhall be upon every Beaſt of the Earth, and upon every Fowl of the Air, upon all that moveth upon the Earth; and upon all the Fiſhes of the Sea: Into your hands are they delivered. He who gave this dominion unto Man, did give alſo an aptitude to uſe it. The excution of this power hath ſince extended it ſelf, over a very great part of Mankind. There are indeed no ſmall numbers of men, whoſe diſability to govern themſelves, proves them, according to Ariſtotles Doctrine, to be naturally Slaves. Ariſt. pol. 1. c. 3.

Yet find I not in Scripture any warrant to oppreſs men with bondage: unleſs the lawfulneſs thereof be ſufficiently intimated, where it is ſaid, That a man ſhall not be puniſhed for the death of a ſervant; whom he hath ſlain by correction, if the ſervant live a day or two, becauſe he is his Money: Exod. 21. 21
Or elſe by the Captivity of the Midianitiſh Girls, which were made Bond-ſlaves, and the Sanctuary had part of them for the Lords Tribute. Doubtleſs the cuſtom hath been very antient: For Noah laid this Curſe upon Canaan, that he ſhould be a Servant of Servants; and Abraham had of Pharaoh, among other gifts, Men-ſervants and Maid-ſervants, which were none other than Slaves. Chriſtian Religion is ſaid to have abrogated this old kind of ſervility: But ſurely they are deceived that think ſo. Saint Paul deſired the liberty of Oneſimus, whom he had won unto Chriſt: Yet wrote for this unto Philemon by way of requeſt, craving it as a benefit, not urging it as a duty. Agreeable hereto is the direction. which the ſame Saint Paul giveth unto Servants: Let every man abide in the ſame calling wherein 1 Cor. 7. 20, 21. he was called: Art thou called, being a Servant? Care not for it, but if thou maiſt be made free, uſe it rather. It is true, that Chriſtian Religion hath procured liberty unto many; not only in regard of piety, but for that the Chriſtian Maſters ſtood in fear of being diſcovered by their Slaves, unto the perſecutors of Religion. Mahomet likewiſe, by giving liberty to his followers, drew many unto his impiety: But whether he forbade it, as unlawful, unto his Sectators, to hold one another of them in Bondage, I cannot tell; ſave that by the practice of the Turks and Moors, it ſeems he did not. In England we had many Bond-ſervants, untill the time of our laſt civil Wars; and I think that the Laws concerning Villenage are ſtill in force, of which the lateſt are the ſharpeſt. And now, ſince Slaves were made free, which were of great uſe and ſervice, there are grown up a rabble of Rogues, Cut-purſes, and other the like Trades; Slaves in Nature, though not in Law.

Exod. 21. 21
Num. 30. 40.

Gen. 12. 16.
Epiſt. to Phil. v. 14.

But whether this kind of dominion be lawful, or not; Ariſtole hath well proved, that it is Natural. And certainly, we find not ſuch a Latitude of difference in any Creature, as in the Nature of man; wherein (to omit the infinite diſtance in eſtate of the Elect and Reprobate) the wiſeſt excel the moſt fooliſh, by far greater degree, than the moſt fooliſh of men doth ſurpaſs the wiſeſt of Beaſts. Therefore when Commiſeration hath given way to reaſon, we ſhall find, that Nature is the ground even of Maſterly power, and of ſervile obedience, which is thereto correſpondent. But it maybe truly ſaid, that ſome Countries have ſubſiſted long without the uſe of any ſervility; as alſo it is true, that ſome Countries have not the uſe of any tame Cattle. Indeed the affections which uphold civil Rule, are (though more noble) not ſo ſimply needful, unto the ſuſtentation either of our kind, as are Luſt, and the like; or of every one, as are Hunger and Thirſt; which notwithſtanding are the loweſt in degree. But where moſt vile and ſervile diſpoſitions have liberty to ſhew themſelves begging in the Streets, there may we more juſtly wonder, how the dangerous toil of Seafaring men can find enough to undertake them, than how the ſwarm of idle Vagabonds ſhould increaſe, by acceſs of thoſe, that are weary of their own more painful condition. This may ſuffice to prove, that in Mankind there is found, ingraffed even by Nature, a deſire of abſolute dominion: Whereunto the general cuſtom of Nations doth ſubſcribe; together with the pleaſure which moſt men take in flatterers, that are the baſeſt of Slaves.

This being ſo, we find no cauſe to marvel, how Tyranny hath been ſo riſe in all Ages, and practiſed, not only in the ſingle rule of ſome vicious

Prince

Prince, but ever by consent of whole Cities and Estates: since other Vices have likewise gotten head, and born a general sway, notwithstanding that the way of Vertue be more honourable, and commodious. Few there are that have used well the inferiour Passions: How then can we expect, that the most noble affections should not be disordered? In the Government of Wife and Children, some are utterly careless, and corrupt all by their dull connivency: others, by masterly rigour, hold their own blood under condition of slavery. To be a good Governour is a rare commendation: And to prefer the Weal publick above all respects whatsoever, is the Vertue justly termed Heroical. Of this Vertue many Ages afford not many examples. Hector is named by Aristotle as one of them; and deservedly, if this praise be due to extraordinary height of fortitude, used in defence of a mans own Country. But if we consider, that a love of the general good cannot be perfect, without reference unto the fountain of all goodness: We shall find, that no moral Vertue, how great soever, can by it self, deserve the commendation of more than Vertue, as the Heroical doth. Wherefore we must search the Scriptures, for patterns hereof; such as David, Josaphat, and Josias were. Of Christian Kings, if there were many such, the World would soon be happy. It is not my purpose wrong the worth of any, by denying the praise where it is due, or by preferring a less excellent. But he that can find a King Religious, and zealous in Gods cause, without enforcement, either of adversity, or of some regard of State; a procurer of general Peace and quiet; who not only useth his Authority, but adds the travel of his Eloquence, in admonishing his Judges to do justice; by the vigorous influence of whose Government, civility is infused, even into those places, that have been the Dens of savage Robbers and Cut-throats; one that hath quite abolished slavish Brehon Law, by which a whole Nation of his subjects were held in bondage; and one, whose higher vertue and wisdom doth make the praise not only of Nobility and other Ornaments, but of abstinence from the blood, the Wives, and the goods of those that are under his power, together with a world of chief commendations belonging unto some good Princes, to appear less regardable: He, I say, that can find such a King, findeth an example, worthy to add unto Vertue an honourable Title, if it were formerly wanting. Under such a King, it is likely, by Gods blessing, that a Land shall flourish, with increase of Trade, in Countries before unknown; that Civility and Religion shall be propagated, into barbarous and heathen Countries; and that the happiness of his Subjects, shall cause the Nations far off removed, to wish him their Soveraign. I need not add hereunto, that all the actions of such a King, even his bodily exercises, do partake of Vertue; since all things tending to the preservation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, (who fixing his contemplation upon God, seeketh how to imitate the unspeakable goodness, rather than the inaccessible Majesty, with both of which himself is indued, as far as humane Nature is capable) do also belong to the furtherance of that common good, which he procureth. Lest any man should think me transported with admiration, or other affection, beyond the bounds of reason; I add hereunto, that such a King is nevertheless a man, must dye, and may err: Yet wisdom and fame shall set him free, from error, and from death, both with and without the help of time. One thing I may not omit, as a singular benefit (though there be many other besides redounding unto this King, as the fruit of his goodness) The People that live under a pleasant Yoke, are not not only loving to their Soveraign Lord, but free of courage; and no greater in Muster of men, than of stout fighters, if need require: whereas on the contrary, he that ruleth as over Slaves, shall be attended in time of necessity, by slavish minds, neither loving his person, nor regarding his or their own honour. Cowards may be furious, and Slaves outragious, for a time: But among Spirits that have once yielded unto slavery, universally it is found true, what Homer saith, God bereaveth a man of half his vertue, that day when he casteth him into bondage.

Of these things, I might perhaps more seasonably have spoken, in general discourse of Government: but where so lively an example of the calamity following a tyrannical rule, and the use of Mercenaries, thereupon depending, did offer it self, as is this present business of the Carthaginians; I thought that the note would be more effectual, than being barely delivered, as out of a common place.

SECT. III.

How the War against the Mercenaries was diversly mannaged by Hanno and Amilcar, with variable success. The bloody councels of the Mercenaries; and their final destruction.

BEing now to return unto those Mercenaries, from whom I have thus far digressed, I cannot readily find, by what name henceforth I should call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginians; neither care they to pretend, that they seek their wages already due; so that they are neither Mercenaries, nor Mutiners. Had they all been Subjects unto Carthage, then might they justly have been termed Rebels: But Spendius, and others, that were the principal part of them, ought none allegiance to that State, which they endeavoured to subvert. Wherefore I will borrow the name of their late occupation, and still call them Mercenaries, as Polybius also doth.

These, using the advantage of their present strength, Besieged * Utica and Hippagreta, Cities of great importance, as being seated upon the Western Haven of Carthage, where it is divided by a neck of Land; Hippagreta standing towards upon the great Lake, Utica further out upon the Sea. Neither was the Camp at Tunis abandoned, which lay fitly to hinder the Carthaginians from passing up into the Countrey: For Matho and Spendius wanted not men to follow the War in all parts at once.

* Utica is seated in the great Bay that enters towards Carthage, not far within the promontory of Apollo. At this time it is called Porto Ferma, or Biserta, and by the Africans themselves, Geral Melha. Niger saith, that the Town it self is ruined, and the place whereon it stood, now called Mazachanes. It was very ancient, and built before Carthage, saith Silius. As it flourished before Carthage was set up, so did it after Carthage was thrown down by the Romans in the third Punick War. Famous it was by the death of Cato the younger, who held it against Cæsar. Victor that worthy Divine, was Bishop thereof in the time of Genserick the Arrian, who lived all the time of that Tyrant, and hath written the story of his cruelties.

How the Carthaginians were amazed with this unexpected peril, any man may conceive. But the business it self awakes them hastily. They are hardly prest on all sides; and therefore travelled their brains the uttermost, how to shake off these furious Dogs from their shoulders, who sometimes by Night, sometimes by Day, came unto the very Walls of their City. In this exigent, Hanno was made their General: Who failed not in his accustomed diligence of making all good preparation:

But

ing all offences paſt, and diſmiſſing as many as But had gotten together whatſoever was needful, as well to relieve a Town Beſieged, as to batter and and aſſail any place defended againſt him. With theſe Proviſions, and with an Hundred Elephants, he came to Utica, ſo ſuddenly, that the Enemies as men ſurpriſed, forſook their Trenches, and retired themſelves unto a riſing piece of Woody ground, where they might be ſafe againſt the violence of his Beaſts. Hanno, thinking that he had to do with the Numidians, whoſe cuſtome was after any loſs, to flie two or three whole dayes journy off; preſently entred the Town; to ſhew himſelf after this his Victory. But theſe good fellows, againſt whom he was to War, had learned of Amilcar, to retire and to fight again, many times in one day, as need required. Therefore as ſoon as they perceived, that he knew not how to uſe a Victory; they aſſailed their own Camp, and with great ſlaughter, drave the Carthaginians out of it, forced them to hide themſelves within Utica; and got poſſeſſion of all the ſtore that Hanno had brought for the relief of the Town. This bad beginning Hanno followed with ſutable indiſcretion; loſing the benefit of many fair opportunites, and ſuffering the Enemies to take poſſeſſion of all the entrance from Carthage to the firm Land.

The Carthaginians perceiving this, were exceedingly troubled, and did therefore let fall their Shete-Anchor; ſending to the Field their great Captain Amilcar, whom they furniſhed with ten Thouſand foot of ſupply, and Seventy Elephants. Amilcar had work enough to do, before he ſhould be able to meet with the Enemy upon equal ground. For, beſides other places of advantage that the Mercenaries had occupied. Hanno had ſuffered them to win the only Bridge, by which the River Macra, or Bagradas, was paſſable unto theſe, that were to travel into the Continent. This River had not many Foords, nor thoſe eaſie for a ſingle man to get over: But upon them all was kept ſuch Guard, as gave to Amilcar little hope of prevailing in ſeeking way by force. As for the Bridge it ſelf, Matho and his followers were there lodged: And had there built a Town, wherein to lye commodiouſly, intentive only to the cuſtody thereof. But Amilcar had obſerved, that the very mouth of Bagradas uſed to be ſometimes cloyed with Sand and Gravel, that was driven in by certain cuſtomary Winds, and could not be driven out again, by force of that ſlow River, till the Wind failing or changing, ſuffered the weight of the Waters, to disburden their channel. Hereof he made uſe; and taking his opportunity paſſed the River, contrary to all expectation, either of the Enemy, or of his own Citizens.

There was no need to bid Spendius look about him, when once it was heard, that Amilcar was come over Bagradas: All the Mercenaries were troubled with the news; knowing that they were no longer to deal with the improvident gravity of Hanno, but with an able Spirit, even with their own Maſter in the Art of War, whom they admired, though they hated him. But this fear was ſoon changed into preſumption; when more than Fifteen Thouſand of their own Society, were come from Utica, and other Ten Thouſand from the Guard of the Bridge. Their Army was far greater, than that of Amilcar; and they were in their own judgment, the better men; upon which confidence, they reſolved to charge him on all ſides, and beat him down, in deſpight of his worth and reputation. With this reſolution they attend upon him, watching for ſome advantage; and ſtill exhorting one another to play the men, and give the onſet. Eſpecially they that followed him in the Rear, had a great mind to begin the fight; whereunto their promptneſs was ſuch, as took from them their former circumſpection. Amilcar held his way toward the Bridge, keeping himſelf on plain grounds, that were fitteſt for the ſervice of his Elephants, which he placed in Front of his Army. Neither made he ſhew of any deſire to fight, but ſuffered the raſhneſs of his Enemies to encreaſe, till it ſhould break into ſome diſorder. At length perceiving, that with more boldneſs than good heed, they followed him ſo near, as would be little for their good, if he ſhould turn unto them, he haſted his march, even to ſuch a pace, as made a ſhew little differing from plain flight. The Mercenaries preſently fell upon his skirts; believing, that for fear of them he was ready to run away. But whilſt they confuſedly, as in ſudden opinion of victory, were driven at the heels of thoſe that had the Rear; Amilcar wheeled about, and met them in the face, charging them hotly, but in very good order; ſo that amazed, with the apprehenſion of un-expected danger, they fled without making any reſiſtance. In this overthrow there were Six Thouſand of the Mercenaries ſlain, and about Two Thouſand taken, the reſt fled, ſome to the Camp at Utica, others to the Town at the Bridge; whither Amilcar followed them ſo faſt, that he wan the place eaſily; the Enemies being thence alſo fled unto Tunis, as not having recollected their Spirits to make it good.

The fame of this Victory, together with the diligence of Amilcar in purſuing it, cauſed many Towns revolted, partly by fear, partly by force, to return to their former obedience. Yet was not Matho wanting to himſelf in this dangerous time. He ſent about Numidia and Africk, for new ſupplies; admoniſhing the People, now or never, to do their beſt, for the recovery of their freedom: He perſwaded Spendius, and Autarius, that was a Captain of the Gaules, to wait upon Amilcar, and always to keep the higher grounds, or at leaſt, the foot of ſome Hill, where they might be free from the Elephants; and he himſelf continued to preſs the Town of Hippagreta with an hard Siege. It was neceſſary for Amilcar, in paſſing from place to place, as his buſineſs required, to take ſuch wayes as there were: For all the Countrey lay not level. Therefore Spendius, who ſtill coaſted him, had once gotten a notable advantage of ground; the Carthaginians lying in a plain, ſurrounded with Hills, that were occupied by the Mercenaries, with their Numidian and African ſuccours. In this difficulty, the fame of Amilcar his perſonal worth did greatly benefit his Countrey. For Naravaſus, a young Gentleman commanding over the Numidians, was glad of this occaſion, ſerving to get the acquaintance and love of ſo brave a man, which he much deſired: And therefore came unto Amilcar ſignifying his good affection to him, with offer to do him all ſervice. Amilcar joyfully entertained this friend, promiſed unto him his own Daughter in Marriage; and ſo wan from the Enemies 2000 Horſe, that following Naravaſus turned unto the Carthaginian ſide. With this help he gave Battel unto Spendius: wherein the Numidian laboured to approve his own valour to his new friend. So the Victory was great: For there were ſlain Ten Thouſand of Spendius his fellows, and Four Thouſand taken Priſoners; but Spendius himſelf, with Autarius the Gaul, eſcaped to do more miſchief. Amilcar dealt very gently with his Priſoners: Pardonwere unwilling to become his followers; yet with condition, that they ſhould never more bear Arms againſt the Carthaginians; threatning to take ſharp revenge upon all that ſhould break this Covenant.

This humanity was vehemently ſuſpected by Matho, Spendius, and Autarius, as attending to win from them the hearts of their Souldiers. Wherefore they reſolved to take ſuch order, that no man among them ſhould dare to truſt in the good Nature of Amilcar, nor to hope for any ſafety whilſt Carthage was able to do him hurt. The counterfeited Letters of advertiſement, wherein was contained, that ſome of their company, reſpective only of their private benefit, and careleſs of the general good, had a purpoſe to betray them all to the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligence; and that it was needful to look well unto Geſco, and his companions, whom theſe Traitors had a purpoſe to inlarge. Upon this Theme Spendius makes an Oration to the Souldiers, exhorting them to fidelity; and ſhewing with many words, that the ſeeming humanity of Amilcar, toward ſome, was none other than a bait, wherewith to intrap them all at once together; as alſo telling them what a dangerous Enemy Geſco would prove, if he might eſcape their hands. Whilſt he is yet in the midſt of his tale, were letters come to the ſame purpoſe. Then ſteps forth Autarius, and ſpeaks his mind plainly: Saying, that it were the beſt, yea, the only way, for the common ſafety, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if ſome were deviſing to make their own peace, it will go hard with thoſe that had a care of the War; that it were better to make an end of Geſco his life, than to trouble themſelves with looking to his cuſtody; that by ſuch a courſe every one ſhould be ingaged in the preſent Action, as having none other hope left, than in Victory alone; finally, that ſuch as would ſpeak here-againſt, were worthy to be reputed Traitors. This Autarius was in great credit with the Souldiers, and could ſpeak ſundry Languages, in ſuch ſort, that he was underſtood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed, that Geſco, and all the other Priſoners, ſhould forthwith be put to horrible death, by torments. Nevertheleſs therewere ſome, that for love of Geſco ſought to alter his intended cruelty; but they were forthwith ſtoned to death, as a Document unto others; and ſo the Decree was put in execution, Neither were they there withal contented, but further or- dained, that all Carthaginian Priſoners which they took, ſhould be ſerved in like ſort: and that the ſubjects or friends of Carthage, ſhould loſe their hands, and ſo be ſent home, which rule they obſerved ever afterwards.

Of this cruelty I need ſay no more, than that it was moſt execrable ferity. As for the councel of uſing it, it was like unto the councel of Achitophel; All Iſrael ſhall hear, that thou art abhorred of thy Father; then ſhall the hands of all that are with thee be ſtrong. Such are the fruits of deſperation. He that is paſt all hope of pardon, is afraid of his own fellows, if they be more innocent; and to avoid the puniſhment of leſs offences, committeth greater. The cowardize of offenders, and the revengeful Spirits of thoſe that have been wronged, are breeders of this deſperation: To which may be added ſome deficiency of Laws, in diſtinguiſhing the puniſhments of Malefactors, according to the degree of their ſeveral crimes. A coward thinks all proviſion too little for his own ſecurity. If Phocas be a coward (ſaid the Emperour Mauritius) then he is murderous. To be ſteadfaſt and ſure, in taking revenge, is thought a point of honour, and a defenſative againſt new injuries: But wrongfully: for it is oppoſite to the rule of Chriſtianity; and ſuch a quality diſcovered, makes them deadly Enemies, who otherwiſe would have repented, and ſought to make amends, for the wrong done in paſſion. This was it which wrought ſo much wo to the Carthaginians; teaching Matho, and his Africans, to ſuſpect even their gentleneſs, as the introduction to extream rigour. Like unto the errours of Princes and Governours, are the errours of Laws. Where one and the ſame puniſhment is awarded unto the leſſoffence, and unto the greater; he that hath adventured to rob a man, is eaſily tempted to kill him, for his own ſecurity.

Againſt theſe inconveniences, Mercy and Severity, uſed with due reſpect, are beſt remedies. In neither of which Amilcar failed. For as long as theſe his old Souldiers were any way likely to be reclaimed by gentle courſes, his humanity was ready to invite them But when they were tranſported with beaſtly outrage, beyond all regard of honeſty and ſhame, he rewarded their villany with anſwerable vengeance; caſting them unto wild Beaſts to be devoured.

Until this time Hanno, with the Army under his command, had kept himſelf apart from Amilcar, and done little as may ſeem, for that nothing is remembered of him ſince his late loſſes. Neither was Amilcar ſorry to want his help; as being able to do better without him. But when the War grew to ſuch extremity, as threatned utter ruine to the one or the other ſide: Then was Hanno ſent for, and came to Amilcar, with whom he joyned his Forces. By this acceſs of ſtrength Amilcar was not enabled to do more than in former times; rather he could now perform nothing: Such was the hatred between him and his unworthy Colleague. The Towns of Utica and Hippagreta, that had ſtood alwayes firm to the Carthaginian party, did now revolt unto the Enemy, murdering all the Souldiers that they had in Garriſon, and caſting their bodies forth, without ſuffering them to be buried. The Proviſions brought by Sea, for maintenance of the Army, were loſt in foul weather; and Carthage it ſelf ſtood in danger of being Beſieged, about which Matho and Spendius conſulted, whilſt one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as it were) bind the others hands.

It hath in all Ages been uſed as the ſafeſt courſe to ſend forth, in great Expeditions, two Generals of one Army. This was the common practice of thoſe two mighty Cities Athens and Rome, which other States and Princes have often imitated; perſwading themſelves, that great Armies are not ſo well conducted by one, as by two: Who out of emulation to excel each other, will uſe the greater diligence. They have alſo joyned Two chief Commanders in equal commiſſion, upon this further conſideration; the better to reſtrain the ambition of any one, that ſhould be truſted with ſo great a ſtrength. For hereof all Common-weals have been jealous, having been taught by their examples that have made themſelves Tyrants over thoſe Cities and States that have imployed them: In this point the Venetians having been ſo circumſpect, as they have, for the moſt part, truſted ſtrangers, and not their own in all the Wars which they have made. It is true, that the equal authority of Two commanding in chief, ſerveth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning upon the Prince or State that hath given them truſt: But in managing the War it ſelf, it is commonly the cauſe of ill ſucceſs. In wars made near unto Rome it ſelf, when two good friends were Conſuls, or ſuch Two at leaſt, as concurred in one deſire of Triumph, which honour (the greateſt of any that Rome could give) was to be obtained by that One Years ſervice; it is no marvel, though each of the Conſuls did his beſt, and inferred all his thoughts unto none other end than victory. Yet in all dangerous caſes, when the Conſuls proceeded otherwiſe than was deſired, one Dictator was appointed, whoſe power was neither hindred by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeed the manner, to ſend forth both the Conſuls to one War; but each went whither his lot called him, to his own Province; unleſs one buſineſs ſeemed to require them both, and they alſo ſeemed fit to be joyned in the adminiſtration. Now although it was, that the Romans did many times prevail with their joynt-Generals: Yet was this never ſo ſeldom, without as much concord, as any other vertue of the Commanders. For their modeſty hath often been ſuch, that the leſs able Captain, though of equal authority, hath willingly ſubmitted himſelf to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithſtanding, they have many times by ordaining Two Commanders of one Army, received great and moſt dangerous overthrows; wherefore in the Second Punick War we ſhall find examples. On the contrary ſide, in their Wars moſt remote, that were alwayes mannaged by one, they ſeldom failed to win exceeding honour, as hereafter ſhall appear. Now of thoſe Ten Generals, which ſerved the Athenians at the Battel of Marathon, it may be truly ſaid, that had not their temper been better than the judgment of the People that ſent them forth, and had not they ſubmitted themſelves to the conduction of Miltiades; their affairs had found the ſame ſucceſs which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Sicil: The one being ſo over-wary, and the other ſo haſty, as all came to nought that they undertook: Whereas Cimon alone, as alſo Ariſtides, and others, having ſole charge of all, did their Country and Commonweal moſt remarkable ſervice. For it is hard to Two great Captains of equal diſcretion and valour; but that the one hath more of fury than of judgment, and ſo the contrary, by which the beſt occaſions are as often overſlipt, as at other times many actions are unſeaſonably undertaken. I remember it well, that when the Prince of Conde was ſlain after the Battle of Jarnac, (which Prince, together with the Admiral Chaſtillan, had the conduct of the Proteſtant Army) the Proteſtants did greatly bewail the loſs of the ſaid Prince, in reſpect of his Religion, Perſon, and Birth; yet comforting themſelves, they thought it rather an advancement, than an hinderance to their affairs. For ſo much did the Valour of the one outreach the adviſedneſs of the other, as whatſoever the Admiral intend to win by attending the advantage, the Prince adventured to loſe, by being over-confident in his own courage.

But we need no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this preſent buſineſs: Who, though they were ſtill ſick of their ill-grounded love to Hanno, and were unwilling to diſgrace him; yet ſeeing that all ran towards ruine, through the diſcord of the Generals, commited the deciſion of their Controverſies, unto the Army that ſerved under them. The judgment of the Army was, that Hanno ſhould depart the Camp: Which he did, and Hannibal was ſent in his ſtead, one that would be directed by Amilcar, and that was enough.

After this, the affairs of Carthage began to proſper ſomewhat better. Matho and Spendius had brought their Army near unto the City; and lay before it, as in a Siege. They might well be bold to hope and adventure much, having in their Camp above Fifty Thouſand, beſides thoſe that lay abroad in Garriſons. Nevertheleſs, the City was too ſtrong for them to win by aſſault: And the entrance of victuals they could not hinder, if any ſhould be ſent in by friends from abroad.

Hieron King of Syracuſe, though during the Wars in Sicil he aſſiſted the Romans, and ſtill continued in their alliance, yet now ſent ſuccours to the Carthaginians: Fearing their fall, and conſequently his own; becauſe if no other State gave the Romans ſomwhat to trouble their digeſtion, the Principality of Syracuſe would ſoon be devoured by them. The Romans alſo gave them ſome ſlender aſſiſtance, and, for the preſent, refuſed good offers made unto them by the Mercenaries. This they did to ſhew a noble kind of diſpoſition; which was indeed but counterfeit, as the ſequel manifeſtly proved.

Whilſt Matho and his followers were buſily preſſing the City, Amilcar was as diligent in waiting at their backs, and cutting off all that come to their ſupply: So that finding themſelves more ſtraightly Beſieged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purpoſed to deſiſt from their vain attempt, and try ſome other courſe. Hereupon they iſſued into the Field: When Spendius, and one Zarxas, an African Captain aſſiſting the Rebellion, take upon them to find Amilcar work; leaving Matho in Tunis, to negotiate with their friends, and take a general care of the buſineſs. The Elephants of Carthage, and Horſe of Naravaſus, made Spendius fearful to deſcend into the Plains. Wherefore he betook himſelf to his former method of War, keeping the Mountains, and rough grounds, or occupying the ſtraighteſt paſſages wherein the deſperate courage of his men might ſhew it ſelf, with little diſadvantage. But Amilcar had more skill in this Art, than could be matched by the labour of Spendius. He drew the Enemy to many skirmiſhes; in all which the ſucceſs was ſuch, as added courage to his own men, and abated the ſtrength and ſpirit of the Rebels. Thus he continued, provoking them Night and Day: Still intrapping ſome of them, and ſometimes giving them the over-throw in plain Battel: until at length he got them into a ſtraight, whence ere they ſhould get out, he meant to make of them a good account. Their judgment was enough to perceive their own diſadvantage; and therefore they had the leſs ſtomach to fight; but awaiting for help from Tunis. Amilcar prudently foreſeeing, that neceſſity might teach them to dare impoſſibilities, uſeth the benefit of their preſent fear, and ſhut them cloſe up with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miſerable, for ſuccour that came not: And having ſpent all their Victuals, were ſo pinched with hunger, that they fed upon the bodies of their Priſoners. This they ſuffered patiently, as knowing that they had not deſerved any favour from Carthage: And hoping that their friends at Tunis would not be unmindful of them. But when they were driven to ſuch extremity that they were fain to devour their own companions, and yet ſaw none appearance or likelihood of relief: Their obſtinacy was broken, and they threatned their Captains with what they deſerved, unleſs they would go forth to Amilcar, and ſeek ſuch Peace as might be gotten. So Spendius, Zarxas, and Autarius, fell to conſultation, wherein it was reſolved to obey the Multitude, and yield themſelves, if it were ſo required, unto the death, rather than periſh by the hands of their own companions. Hereupon they ſend to crave crave Parly, which is granted; and these Three come forth to talk with Amilcar in person. What they could say unto him it is hard to conjecture: Yet by the condition which Amilcar granted, it seems that they took the blame upon themselves, and craved pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaginians should chuse, out of the whole number of these enemies, any ten whom they pleased, to remain at their discretion; and that the rest should all be dimissed, each in his shirt, or in one single Coat. When the peace was thus concluded, Amilcar told these Ring-leaders, that he chose them presently, as part of the ten, and so commanded to lay hands on them: The rest he forthwith went to fetch with his whole Army in order. The Rebels, who knew not that peace was concluded upon so gentle Articles, thought themselves betrayed: And therefore amazedly ran to Arms. But they wanted Captains to order them; and the same astonishment that made them break the Covenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gave unto Amilcar both colour of Justice, in accomplishing revenge, and ease in doing the execution. They were all Slain: Being forty Thousand, or more, in number.

This was a famous exploit: And the news thereof exceeding welcome to Carthage; and terrible to the revolted Cities of Africk. Henceforward Amilcar, with his Naravasus, and Hannibal, carried the War from Town to Town, and found all places ready to yield: Utica and Hippagreta only standing out, upon fear of deserved vengeance; and Tunis, being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Army. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chief strength of the enemy. Coming before this Town, they brought forth Spendius, with his fellows, in view of the defendants, and crucified them under the walls; to terrifie those of his old companions, that were still in Arms. With this rigour the Siege began; as if speedy victory had been assured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunis, which lay toward Carthage. Amilcar on the opposite side: Too far asunder to help one another in sudden accidents: And therefore it behoved each to be the more circumspect.

Matho from the walls beheld his own destiny, in the misery of his companion, and knew not how to avoid it otherwise than by a cast at dice with fortune. So he brake out upon that part of the Carthaginian Army, that lay secure, as if all danger were past, under the command of Hannibal; and with so great and unexpected fury he sallied, that after an exceeding slaughter, he took Hannibal prisoner: On whom, and thirty the most noble of the Carthaginian prisoners, he presently revenged the death of Spendius, by the same Torture. Of this, Amilcar knew nothing, till it was too late; neither had he strength enough remaining, after this great loss, to continue the Siege; but was fain to break it up, and remove unto the mouth of the River Bagradis, where he incamped.

The terrour was no less within Carthage, upon the fame of this loss, than had been the joy of the late great victory. All that could bear Arms, were sent into the Field, under Hanno; whom, it seems, they thought the most able of their Captains surviving the late accidents of War. If there were any Law among them forbidding the imployment of one sole General near unto their City (for they are known to have trusted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this hasty exigent, to devise about repealing it. But thirty principal men are chosen by the Senate, to bring Hanno to Amilcars Camp, and by all good perswasions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day. It nearly touched Amilcar in his honour, that the carelesness of Hannibal seemed to be imputed unto him; by sending his enemy to moderate his proceedings. Nevertheless, after many conferences, the authority of the Senators prevailed; Amilcar and Hanno were made friends; and thenceforth, whilst this War lasted, Hanno took warning by Hannibals calamities, to follow good directions, though afterwards he returned to his old and deadly hatred.

In the mean season Matho was come abroad, as meaning to use the reputation of his late success, whilst it gave some life unto his business. He had reason to do as he did: But he wanted skill to deal with Amilcar. The skirmishes, and light exercises of War, wherein Amilcar trained his Carthaginians, did so far abate the strength, and withal diminish the credit of Matho; that he resolved to try the fortune of one Battel: Wherein either his own desire should be accomplished, or his cares ended. To this conclusion the Carthaginians were no less prone, than Matho: as being weary of these long troubles, and insupportable expences; confident in the valour of their own men, which had approved it self in many tryals; and well assured of Amilcar his great worth, whereunto the enemy hath not what to suppose. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making provision: Inviting their friends to help; and drawing forth into the Field, all that lay in Garrison.

The issue of this Battel might have been foretold, without help of witchcraft. Matho and his followers, had nothing whereon to presume, save their daring Spirits, which had been well cooled by the many late skirmishes, wherein they had learned how to run away. The Carthaginians had reason to dare, as having been often victorious: And in all points else they had the better of their enemies; especially (which is worth all the rest) they had such a Commander, as was not easily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely that the desire of liberty should work so much, in men accustomed to servitude; as the honour of their State would, in Citizens, whose future and present good lay all at once ingaged in that adventure. So the Carthaginians wan a great Victory, wherein most of the Africans their enemies were slain; the rest fled into a Town, which was not to be defended, and therefore they all yielded; and Matho himself was taken alive. Immediately upon this Victory, all the Africans that had rebelled, made submission to their old Masters: Utica only, and Hippagreta stood out, as knowing how little they deserved of favour. But they were soon forced to take what conditions best pleased the Victours. Matho and his fellows were led to Carthage in triumph; where they suffered all Torments that could be devised, in recompence of the mischiefs which they had wrought in this War. The War had lasted three years, and about four months, when it came to this good end: Which the Carthaginians, whose Subjects did not love them, should with less expence, by contenting their Mercenaries, have prevented in the beginning.

SECT. IV.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: And were afterwards driven out by the Ilanders. The faithleſs dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia, contrary to the peace.

WHilſt Matho and Spendius were making terrible combuſtion in Africk; other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire in Sardinia: Where murdering Boſtar the Governour, and other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Iſland to their own uſe. Againſt theſe, one Hanno was ſent with a ſmall Army (ſuch as could be ſpared in that buſie time) conſiſting likewiſe of Mercenaries, levied on the ſudden. But theſe Companies that followed Hanno, finding it more for their ſafety, and preſent profit, to joyn themſelves with thoſe that were already revolted, than to endanger themſelves by Battel, for the good of that Common-weal, of which they had no care; began to enter into practice with the Sardinian Rebels, offering to run one courſe of fortune with them in their enterpriſe. This their offer was kindly taken; but their faith was ſuſpected. Wherefore to take away all jealouſie and diſtruſt, they reſolved to hang up their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A common practice it hath been in all Ages, with thoſe that have undertaken the quarrel of an unjuſt War, to enjoyn the performance of ſome notorious and villainous act, to thoſe that come into them as ſeconds, with offer to partake, and to aſſiſt the impious purpoſes which they have in hand. It is indeed the beſt pawn, that deſperate men can deliver to each other, to perform ſome ſuch actions, as are equally unpardonable to all.

By ſuch a kind of cruelty did the ungrateful Mantineans murder a Garriſon of Achaians, ſent unto them for their defence againſt the Lacedæmonians, by Aratus; who, when he had formerly poſſeſt himſelf of their City, by right of War, did not only ſpare the ſack and ſpoil thereof, but gave them equal fredom, with the reſt of the Cities united. Theſe revolts are alſo common in our Court-wars; where, in the Conqueſt of new fortunes, and making of new parties, and factions, without the depreſſion or deſtruction of old friends, we cannot be received and truſted by old enemies. Ceſont les coups de vieille eſcrime. Theſe (ſay the French) be the blows of the old Art of fencing.

Theſe Mercenaries in Sardinia were no whit leſs violent in their purpoſe, than were Spendius, and his aſſociates: Only they wanted a Matho among them, to negotiate with the inhabitants of the Province. The Iſlanders were no leſs glad, than the Souldiers, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Country: But they could not agree about the profit of the victory. The Sardinians thought it was enough, if they rewarded the Souldiers for their pains taken. Contrariwiſe, the Souldiers were of opinion, that the title of the Carthaginians to that Iſle, was devolved unto themſelves, by right of Conqueſt. The ſame quarrel would (in likelihood) have riſen between Spendius with his Mercenaris, and their African friends; if the common deſire of both had once taken effect: Unleſs the riches of Carthage had ſerved to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than poſſeſſion and rule of the Country; the matter was not eaſily taken up. So they fell to blows; which how they were dealt, I know not; but finally the Mercenaries were driven out, and compelled to ſave themſelves in Italy. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had invited the Romans into it; with as good right, as the Mamertines had called them into Sicil. Yet this offer was refuſed, upon reaſons that follow.

Some Italian Merchants had relieved Matho and Spendius with Corn: Of whom the Carthaginians took almoſt five Hundred, and held them in Priſon. Hereof was made a great complaint: So that the Romans ſent Embaſſadours to Carthage, requiring ſatisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to diſpute: They quietly yielded to releaſe them all. This was ſo kindly taken, that they forbade all their Merchants to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admoniſhing them to carry all proviſions to Carthage. And upon the ſame reaſon did they forbear to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the City of Utica, offering it ſelf unto their ſubjection. This might have ſerved as a notable example of the Romans Faith, to all poſterity: Had not the iſſue proved, that it was mear regard of greater profit, which kept them ſo temperate, no longer than the hope laſted of thriving better thereby, than they ſhould have done by open breach of Faith. The whole eſtate of Carthage depended at that time, upon the vertue of Amilcar: Who, had he been overthrown by Spendius or Matho, in one main Battel, that mighty City muſt either have fallen into the barbarous hands of mercileſs Villains, or have humbled her ſelf under protection of the Romans, with whom ſhe had lately ſtriven for ſuperiority. That extreme neceſſity, whereinto Matho reduced the City, by the fortune of one ſally made out of Tunis, is enough to prove, that Carthage was not far from ſuch a miſerable choice. Wherefore it was not unwiſely done of the Romans, to make ſuch demonſtration of kindneſs, and honourable dealing, as might invite a rich, but ſinking Ship, to run her ſelf aground upon their ſhore. But when all was well ended in Africk, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recovery of Sardinia; then did Ambition put off her goodly vizor. The Romans perceiving that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recovered her feet again; began to ſtrike at her head. They entertained the proffer of thoſe Mercenaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denounced War againſt this enfeebled and impoveriſhed City, under a ſhameleſs pretence, that the preparations made for Sardinia, were made indeed againſt Rome it ſelf. The Carthaginians knew themſelves unable to reſiſt, and therefore yielded to the Romans demand; renouncing unto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would have twelve Hundred Talents, in recompence belike (for I ſee not what reaſon they could alledge) of the great fear which they had endured, of an invaſion from Carthage. It is indeed plain, that they impudently ſought occaſion of War. But neceſſity taught the Carthaginians patience; and the mony was payed, how hardly ſoever it was raiſed. From this time forward, let not Rome complain of the Punick faith, in breach of Covenants: She her ſelf hath broken the peace already, which Amilcar purpoſeth to make her dearly repent; but what Amilcar lives not to perform, ſhall be accompliſhed by Hannibal his renowned Son.

SECT.

SECT. V.

How the affairs of Carthage went, between the African Rebellion, and the second Punick War.

THE injurious dealings of the Romans, expressing their desire to pick a quarrel; served to instruct the Carthaginians in a necessary lesson; that either they must make themselves the stronger, or else resolve to be obedient unto those that were more mighty. In a City long accustomed to rule, the braver determination easily took place: And the best means were thought upon, for the increase of Puissance and Empire. The strength, and the jealousie of the Romans, forbad all attempts upon the Mediterranean Sea; but the riches of Spain, that lay upon the Ocean, were unknown to Rome: Therefore that Province might serve both to exercise the Carthaginians in War, and to repair their decayed forces, with all needful supplies. Of the Spanish Expedition, the charge and soveraign trust was committed unto Amilcar: Upon whom his Country did wholly repose it self; in hope to recover strength by his means, that had saved it from ruine.

Hanno, with some other envious men that were of his faction, took little pleasure in the general love and honour, which daily increased towards Amilcar and his friends. Yet could they not deny him to be the most worthy of command in all the City: Only they commended peace and quietness; advising men to beware of provoking the Romans, in whose amity they said, that the felicity of Carthage did consist. By such discourses, harsh to the ears of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Common-weal, they got none other reputation, than of singularity: Which the ignorant sort suspected to be wisdom.

But the glory of Amilcar was continually upheld and enlarged, by many notable services that he did, to the singular benefit of his Country. He passed the straights of Hercules (now called the straights of Gibralter) and landed on the Western Coasts of Spain; in which Country, during nine years that he lived there, he subjected unto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Provinces. But finally in a Battel that he fought with a Nation in Portugal, called the Vettones (defending himself a long time with an admirable resolution) he was invironed and slain: Carrying with him to the grave the same great honour and fame, by which in many signal Victories, he had acquired the name of a second Mars.

After the death of Amilcar, Asdrubal his Son-in-law was made General of the Carthaginian Forces in Spain. This was a good man of War; but far better in practice and cunning than in deeds of arms. By his notable dexterity in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: Adding so many subjects and confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to grow jealous again of this hasty increase. He built a goodly City upon a commodious Haven, in the Kingdom of Granado, opposite to that of Oran in Africa, and gave it the name of New Carthage, which to this day it nearly retaineth, being called now * Carthagena. With this success of the Carthaginians in Spain, the Romans were not a little troubled; but began to accuse their own negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much pains to beat them out of the Isle of Sicil, as suspecting their neighborhood there; they had now, by cumbering themselves in a War of far less importance, (whereof I shall speak anon) given them leisure without interruption, to recover upon their own Continent, a Dominion by far exceeding both in the Bodies of men, and in revenue, that which the Romans had taken from them. But now to help this, at the present they know not; for they dayly expected to be invaded by the Gawles, their ancient enemies, and nearest neighbours to the West. But he needeth little help of force, that knoweth himself to be feared: It is enough if he request, since his request, shall have the vertue of a command.

Yet were the Romans utterly destitute of all good colour, that might help them to intermeddle in Spain. The Spaniards were then unacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probability) they scarce had heard the name: So that there were no Mamertines, nor other such Rebels, to call in Roman succours; but in the enterprise of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might also serve their turn in Spain. For though it were apparent, that the Spanish affairs had no relation to the peace between these two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Asdrubal had any purpose to extend his Victories unto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: Yet (as if some such matter had been suspected) they sent unto him, requiring that he should forbear to proceed any further, than to the River of Iberus. In addressing their messengers, rather to Asdrubal, than to the City of Carthage; they seem to have hoped, that howsoever the generality of the Carthaginians had sweetly swallowed many bitter pills, to avoid all occasion of War with Rome, yet the bravery of one man might prove more fastidious, and resenting the injury, return such answer, as would intangle his whole Country in the quarrel, that they so much desired; and might embrace at leisure, when once they had found apparent cause. But Asdrubal finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of dislike at all: And whereas they would have this insolent covenant inserted into the Articles of peace; he took upon him to do it of his own power, with such appearance of conformity to their will, that they went their wayes contented, and sought no further.

If it had been so, that the State of Carthage, thereunto passed by the Romans, for fear of present War, had ratified this new composition made by Asdrubal; yet should it not have stood bound in honour, to observe the same carefully, unless an oath had also been extorted, to make all sure. But since all passed quietly, under the bare authority of Asdrubal, this Capitulation was none other in effect than a second breach of peace; whereof the Romans might be accused more justly, than they could accuse the Carthaginians of perjury (as they after did) for refusing to stand to it.

By this Treaty with Asdrubal, the Romans wan some reputation in Spain. For when it was once conceived by the Spaniards, that the City which would needs be Mistress over them, stood in fear her self of receiving blows from a stouter Dame; there were soon found some, that by offering themselves to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-servants with Carthage. But the Carthaginians will shortly teach them another lesson. The Saguntines, a people on the South-side of Iberus, entred into confederacy with the Romans, and were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawful unto the Romans to admit the Saguntines, or any other

* The Spaniards have since built a City of the same name in the West-Indies: which being peopled by them in the year 1232. was sackt by the English in the year 1585.

* The Spaniards have since built a City of the same name in other people (neither ſubject, nor open enemy in War to the Carthaginians) into their ſociety: And unlawful it was unto the Carthaginians, to uſe violence towards any that ſhould thus once become confederate with Rome. Nevertheleſs, if we conſider the late agreement made with Aſdrubal, we ſhall find that the Romans could have none other honeſt colour of requiring it, than an implicit Covenant of making the River Iberus a bound, over which they themſelves would not paſs, in any Diſcovery or Conqueſt by them intended to be made upon Spain: In which regard, they might have ſome honeſt pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome, as yet, had no foot on the one ſide of Iberus, whereas Carthage on the other ſide of that River, held almoſt all the Country. Howſoever it were, this indignity was not ſo eaſily digeſted, as former injuries had been. For it was a matter of ill conſequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginian, ſhould behold Saguntum reſting ſecurely among them, upon confidence of help from a more mighty City. Wherefore either in this reſpect, or for that the ſence is moſt feeling, of the lateſt injuries; or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to do themſelves right: War againſt Saguntum was generally thought upon, let the Romans take it how they liſt. In ſuch terms were the Carthaginians, when Aſdrubal dyed, after he had commanded in Spain eight years (being ſlain by a Slave, whoſe Maſter he had put to death) and the great Hannibal, Son of the great Amilcar, was choſen General in his ſtead.

SECT. VI.

The eſtate of Greece from the death of Pyrrhus, to the reign of Philip the Son of Demetrius in Macedon.

IN the long term of the firſt Punick War, and the vacation following, between it and the ſecond; the eſtate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was grown ſomewhat like unto that, wherein Philip of Macedon had found it; though far weaker, as the after-ſpring. The whole Country had recovered by degrees, a form of liberty: In petty Tyrannies (bred of thoſe inferiour Captains, which in the time of general combuſtion, had ſeiſed each upon ſuch Towns as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated, and reformed; and ſome States were riſen to ſuch greatneſs, as not only ſerved to defend themſelves, but to give protection to others. This converſion to the better, proceeded from the like diſſentions and tumults in Macedon, as had been in Greece, when Philip firſt began to encroach upon it. For after many quarrels and great Wars, about the Kingdom of Macedon, between Antigonus the elder, Caſſander, Demetrius, Lyſimachus, Seleucus, Pyrrhus, and the Gaules: Antigonus the Son of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning ſix and thirty years; yet ſo, that he was divers times thence expelled, not only by the Gaules, and by Pyrrhus, as hath been already ſhewed, but by Alexander the Son of Pyrrhus the Epirot, from whoſe father he had hardly won it. This happened unto him, by the revolt of his Souldiers, even at ſuch time, as having overthrown with great ſlaughter an Army of the Gaules, he was converting his Forces againſt the Athenians, whom he compelled to receive his Garriſons. But his young Son Demetrius raiſed an Army, wherewith he chaſed Alexander, not only out of Macedon, but out of his own Epirus, and reſtored his Father to the Kingdom.

By the help of this young Prince Demetrius (though in another kind) Antigonus got into his poſſeſſion the Citadel of Corinth; which was juſtly termed the fetter of Greece. This Citadel called Acrocorinthus, ſtood upon a ſteep Rocky Hill on the North Side of the Town, and was by Nature and Art ſo ſtrong, that it ſeemed impregnable. It commanded the Town, which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Iſthmus, that running between the Ægean and Ionique Seas, joyneth Peloponneſus to the Main of Greece. Wherefore he that held poſſeſſion of this Caſtle was able to cut off all paſſage by land, from one half of Greece unto the other; beſides the commodity of the two Seas, upon both of which, this rich and goodly City had commodious Havens. Alexander, the Son of Polyſperchon; and after his death, Crateſipolis his Wife, had gotten Corinth in the great ſhuffling of Provinces and Towns, that was made between Alexanders Princes. Afterwards it paſſed from hand to hand, until it came, I know not how, to one Alexander; of whom I find nothing elſe, than that he was thought to be poiſned by this Antigonus, who deceived his Wife Nicæa thereof, and got it from her by a trick. The deviſe was this: Antigonus ſent his young Son Demetrius to Corinth, willing him to court Nicæa, and ſeek her marriage. The fooliſh old widow perceived not how unfit a match ſhe was for the young Prince, but entertained the fancy of marriage; whereto the old King was even as ready to conſent, as was his Son to deſire, and came thither in perſon to ſolemnize it. Hereupon all Corinth was filled with Sacrifices, Feaſts, Playes, and all ſorts of Games: In the midſt of which, Antigonus watched his time, and got into the Caſtle, beguiling the poor Lady, whoſe jealouſie had been exceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchaſe he was ſo glad, that he could not contain himſelf within the gravity beſeeming his old age. But as he had ſtollen it; ſo was it again ſtollen from him: Neither lived he to revenge the loſs of it, being already ſpent with age.

Demetrius, the Son of this Antigonus, ſucceeding unto his Father, Reigned ten years. He made greater proof of his vertue before he was King, than after. The Dardanians, Ætolians, and Achæans, held him continually buſied in War; wherein his fortune was variable, and for the moſt part ill. About theſe times the power of the Macedonians began to decay: And the Græcians to caſt off their yoke.

Philip, the only Son of Demetrius, was a young Child when his Father dyed; and therefore Antigonus, his Uncle, had the charge of the Kingdom, during the minority of the Prince; but he aſſumed the name and power of a King, though he reſpected Philip as his own Son, to whom he left the Crown at his death; this Antigonus, was called the Tutor, in regard of his Protectorſhip; and was alſo called Doſon, that is as much as, Will-give, becauſe he was ſlow in his liberality. He repreſſed the Dardanians and Theſſalians, which moleſted his Kingdom, in the beginning of his Reign. Upon confidence of this good ſervice, he took ſtate upon him, as one that rather were King in his own right, than only a Protector. Hereupon the people fell to mutiny; but were ſoon appeaſed by fair words, and a seeming unwillingness of his to meddle any more with the Government. The Achaians took from him the City of Athens, soon after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to have wrought him out of all, or most that he held in Greece, if their own estate had not been endangered by a nearer enemy. But civil dissention, which had overthrown the power of Greece, when it flourished most, overthrew it easily now again, when it had scarcely recovered strength after a long sickness; and gave to this Antigonus no less authority therein, than Philip the Father of Alexander, got by the like advantage.

These Achaians, from small beginnings, had increased in short time to great strength and fame: So that they grew the most redoubted Nation of all the Greeks. By the equality of their Laws, and by their clemency (notwithstanding that they were a long time held under by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not only draw all others by their love and alliance, but induced, through their example, the rest of the Cities of Peloponnesus, to be governed by one Law, and to use one and the same sort of weights, measure, and money.

Aratus, the Sicyonian, was the first that united them again; and gave them courage, after that they had been by the Macedonian Captains divided into many Principalities. In elder times they were governed by Kings, as most of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kind of rule they first subjected themselves, after the descent of the Heraclidæ, when Tisamenus the Son of Orestes possest the Territory of Achaia. In this estate they continued to the time of Gyges; after whom, when his Sons sought to change the Legal Government of their Predecessors unto Tyranny, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as seeming most equal. This form of Common-weal had continuance, with some small changes according to the diversity of times, till the Reign of Philip and Alexander, Kings of Macedon: Who tempest-like overturned all things in that part of the World. For those twelve Cities, called the Cities of Alliance (whereof, Helice, and Bura or Olenus, the Sea had eaten up a little before the Battel of Leuctres) were, by disturbance of the Macedonians, divided from each other, and trained into a War, no less foolish than cruel, among themselves. But in the one Hundred and four and twentieth Olympiad (in which, or near it, Ptolemy the Son of Lagus, Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolemy Ceraunus, left the World) two of ten remaining Cities and people, namely, the Patrenses and the Dimæi, united themselves, and laid the foundation of the general accord, and reunion, which after followed. For having been, some of them Partisans with sundry Macedonian Captains, and others having been governed by petty Kings; they began to fasten themselves in a strong league of amity, partly, in the Olympiad before spoken of, and partly, at such time as Pyrrhus made his first Voyage into Italy. Now after the uniting of the Patrenses and Dimæi, to whom also the Cities of Titrea, and Phara, joyned themselves; Ægira chased out her Garrisons: And the Burians, killing their Kings, entred with the Ceraunians into the same confederacy. These Cities, for twenty and five years, used the same form of Government with the Achaians; who by a Senatory and two Prætors, ordered all things in their Common-weal; and soon after by one Prætor, or Commander: Of which, Marcus Carynensis was the first, and Aratus the second.

This Aratus was a noble young Gentleman of Sicyon, who, living at Argos in exile, whilst his Country was oppressed by Tyrants, found means, through the help of other banished men, to enter their own City by night, with ladders; whence they chased the Tyrant, and restored the people to liberty. This was in the time of Antigonus Gonatas King of Macedon, a Prince more busie in watching what to get among the Greeks, than wise in looking to his own. For fear of Antigonus, the Sicyonians enter into the Achaian league: Which though at that time it received more increase by their accession than it added strength to them; yet the benefit of this conjunction served well enough against Antigonus, whose subtlety was somewhat greater than his valour. As the industry and counsel of Aratus delivered the Country from bondage, and fortified it by the Achaian league; so further, by his great liberality, with the exceeding great cost of 150. Talents, he pacified the inexplicable controversies, between the banished Sicyonians, which returned with him, and the other Citizens that had possession of these mens Lands; as also with the same money he drew many others to assist him in those enterprises following, that redounded to the singular good of all Achaia. The money he obtained of Ptolemy Euergetes King of Ægypt; who partly had a desire to hold some strong and sure friendship in Greece, partly was delighted with the conversation of Aratus himself, that made a dangerous Voyage to him into Ægypt, and fed his pleasure in goodly pictures, with the gift of many curious pieces, wherein the workmen of Sicyon excelled.

The first of Aratus his great attempts, was the surprize of the Acrocorinthus or Citadel of Corinth; which he wan by night, being thereinto guided by some Theeves that he had hired for the purpose, who living in the place, had practised to rob Antigonus his treasury, passing in and out by a secret path among the Rocks. Yet was he fain to fight for it, ere he could get it: Though indeed Antigonus his Souldiers were rather overcome by their own fear, than by any force of the assailants; as mistrusting least the Achaians were more in number, than in truth they were, and having lost the advantages of the place already, upon which they had presumed, before they were aware of any enemy.

In these kind of night-services, ambushments, surprises, and practices, Aratus was very cunning, adventurous, and valiant: In open Field, and plain Battail, he was as timorous. By this strange mixture of cowardize and courage, he ministred argument of disputation, to Philosophers and others; Whether a valiant man (as he was esteemed, and in some cases approved) might look pale and tremble, when he began to Battail; and whether the vertue of Fortitude were diversified, by the sundry natures of men, and in a manner confined unto several sorts of action. In resolving which doubts it may be said, that all vertue is perfected in men by exercise, wherein they are trained by occasion: Though a natural inclination standeth in need of little practice; whereas the defect hereof must be supplyed with much instruction, use, good success, and other help, yet hardly shall grow absolute in general. Such was Aratus in matter of War. In sincere affection to his Country he was unreproveable, and so acknowledged: As his following actions will truly testifie.

When Acrocorinthus was taken, and joyned unto the Common-wealth of Achaia, the Megarians revolted soon after from Antigonus, and entred into the the ſame Corporation. So did the Trazenians, and the Epidaurians: Whereby this new erected State grew ſo powerful, that it adventured to take Athens, from the Macedonians, and Argos and Megalopolis, from Tyrants that held them. The enterpriſe upon the Athenians was of none effect. For though Aratus waſted the Iſle of Salamis, to ſhew his ſtrength, and ſent home the Athenian Priſoners, without ranſome, to allure the City by ſhew of love; yet the Athenians ſtirred neither againſt him, nor for him, as being now grown honeſt Slaves to Macedonians. Upon Argos the adventure was carryed more ſtrongly. The Achaians came ſometimes to the Gates of the City, but the People ſtirred not; once they entered it, and might have won it, if the Citizens would have lent any help to the recovery of their own freedom; ſundry times, and with divers events, they fought with the Tyrants, (who roſe up one after another in Argos) in open field, and ſlew one of them in Battail; but all ſufficed not: Until at length Ariſtomachus the Tyrant was ſo terrified, perſwaded, and hired by Aratus, that he conſented to reſign his Eſtate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermione, and Cleonymus, that had oppreſſed the Phliaſians.

Whilſt this buſineſs with the Argives was on foot, Lyſiadas the Tyrant of Megalopolis, was ſo well handled by Aratus, that, without compulſion, he have liberty to his City, and annexed it to the Council of Achaia: Whereby he got ſuch credit, that he was choſen General of their Forces (which was a Yearly Office, and might not be held two Years together by one man:) every Second Year, for a certain while, he and Aratus ſucceeded one another by turns. But thoſe late Tyrants, and new Citizens, Lyſiadas and Ariſtomachus, were were carried with private paſſion from care of the general good; in which courſes they oppoſed Aratus, to the great hurt of Achaia, as ſhall appear in due time.

The Achæans having obtained ſo much puiſſance and reputation, that Ptolemy King of Egypt was become Patron of their Alliance, and (in title of honour) General of their Forces by Sea and Land; made open War upon Demetrius the Son of Antigonus Gonatus, for the liberty of Athens. It is ſtrange and worthy of noting, That when Aratus in this quarrel had loſt a Battail, the Athenians wore Garlands, in ſign of joy, to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had won the Victory. Such were now the Athenians become; in whom the rule was verified, that holds true in general of the Multitude, Aut humiliter ſervit, aut ſuperbe dominatur; It is either baſe in ſervice, or inſolent in command. Nevertheleſs when Demetrius was dead, Aratus performed that by Mony, which he could not by force: and corrupting the Captain of the Macedonian Garriſon, purchaſed liberty to the Athenians, who thenceforth held good correſpondence with the Achæans, loving them, and ſpeaking well of them, which was all that they could do: but into their Corporation they entred not, ſcorning it belike, in regard of their own outworn glory.

Now as the Common-wealth of Achaia daily increaſed with in Peloponneſus, by juſtice and honeſty; ſo did the Ætolians, in the utter part of Greece, yea and within Peloponneſus it ſelf, wax very powerful, by ſturdineſs of Body, and rude courage in fight, without help of any other vertue. They had ſtoutly defended themſelves againſt Antipater and Craterus; partly by daring to do and ſuffer much, partly by the Natural ſtrength and faſtneſs of their Country; but eſpecially by the benefit of the time, which called away theſe famous Caprains to other buſineſs, as hath been related. They had moleſted Caſſander, in favour of Antigonus, and were themſelves as much plauged by him, and by the Acarnanians, a little, but a ſtout Nation, that took his part. Afterwards they had to do with Demetrius, the Son of the Firſt Antigonus, and more or leſs with all the Kings of Macedon ſucceeding him. They likewiſe held often War with the Acarnanians, Athamanians, Epirots, and many Cities in Peloponneſus: So that they were hardened with a perpetual Travail; ſeldom putting off their Armour. But their hardineſs ill deſerved the name of valour, ſeeing they had no regard of honeſty or friendſhip, meaſuring all things by their own inſolent wills, and thinking all People baſe-minded, that were not as fierce and outragious as themſelves.

Theſe Ætolians had lately made great ſpoils in Peloponneſus, and occupied a good part of the Countrey. They had invaded the friends of the Achæans; taken and ſacked Pallene; where, although they were ſoundly beaten by Aratus, yet their deſire of gain made them make a new Voyage thither, as to a Countrey wherein ſomewhat was to be gotten. But they were forced to look another way, by Demetrius the Son of Antigonus Gonatus: Who preſſed them ſo hardly, that they were driven to ſeek help of the Achæans; which they obtained. The War which the Achæans made upon Demetrius, without Peloponneſus, in Attica, though it tended to expelling the Macedons out of Greece, yet the benefit thereof redounded chiefly unto the Ætolians, at whoſe inſtance it was ſet on foot: For thereby were the Macedonian Forces diverted from them. Neither was this good turn unacknowledged, though very baſely the Ætolians, giving thanks in words, deviſed how to requite the benefit with ſome great miſchief. They ſaw that the Achæans were deſirous to bring all Peloponneſus into their Alliance and Coporation: Of which intent, the Lacedæmonians were very jealous. Wherefore theſe Ætolians laboured earneſtly to ſet the Lacedæmonianss and Achæans together by the ears: hoping that if this might come to paſs, themſelves ſhould be called in to help (it skilled not on whatſide) and ſo get no ſmall ſhare, both in booty and Territory. Neither did they forbear to communicate this their device unto Antigonus; offering to make him partaker of their gain, whom they knew to be offended with the many loſſes, that this Kingdom hath ſuſtained by the Achæans. Of this plot Aratus was aware: who therefore determined to ſuffer many indignities, rather than to give the Lacedæmonians cauſe to take Arms. But this reſolution was taken ſomewhat too late: and not altogether in his own power to hold. He had been medling with the Arcadians, that were dependants of Lacedæmon: And thereby had provoked the Lacedæmonians to look about them; ſeeing that all Peloponneſus, excepting themſelves, the Eleans, and a few Arcadians their friends (who alſo were attempted) was already become Achæan.

The City of Sparta was in ill caſe about theſe times; and ſubject to the injuries of any ſtronger neighbour. Pyrrhus had greatly weakned it; The Ætolians entering Liconia with an Army, had carried away Fifty Thouſand Slaves; and, which was worſe, their diſcipline was corrupted, Avarice and Luxury reigned among them, the poor was oppreſſed by the rich, and the generoſity of Spirit, that that had sometime been their general vertue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them. There was left in Sparta no more than Seven Hundred natural Citizens; of whom not above one Hundred had Lands: All the rest were needy People, and desirous of innovation. Hereupon followed intestine sedition; which endangered the City most of all. Agis a good King, who sought to reform the disorders of the State, exhorted the People to a strict Observation of Lycurgus his Laws. To which purpose he caused them to pass an Act, for the abolishing all debts, and equal division of Lands. All the younger, and poorer sort were glad of this: But the rich men opposed it. These had recourse unto Leonidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings) who took their part: being himself a dissolute man, as one trained up in the Court of Syria, whence also he had his Wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the City, and a new King chosen in his stead. But Agis his friends and Counsellors in this enterprize, abused his good meaning to their own private commodity. They were hasty to take away all debts, and cancel all Bonds, for they themselves were deeply indebted: But the division of Lands they afterwards hindred, because their own possessions were great. Hence arose a Tumult in Sparta, which these men increased by their foul oppression of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine, Leonidas was brought home, and restored to his Kingdom, and the Two adverse Kings driven to take Sanctuary; out of which Cleombrotus, the late-made King, was dismissed into exile: But Agis was trained forth, drawn into Prison, and there by his Enemies condemned and strangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grand-Mother. The like to this was never known in Sparta: And (which is the more odious) this cruelty proceeded from the Ephori, Magistrates that should have given Patronage to the Laws, using their power, and more power than to them belonged, against a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the City as the Law required.

The death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens, and served to establish the impotent rule of a few Tyrannical Oppressors. In which case Aratus might well hope to adjoyn Lacedæmon to the Achæans Common-wealth: though it were great injustice to take such advantage; and attempt by force, that which would have redounded to the general good of Peloponnesus, and to the benefit of Sparta it self, if it could have been wrought by perswasion.

But the same man who redressed the disorders of Sparta, and revenged the death of Agis, did also requite the unjust attempts of the Achæans, even in their own kind: Obtruding upon them by force an union of all Peloponnesus, though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedæmonians and their King, should have been the principal; not they and their Prætor. Leonidas having thus caused Agis to be slain, took his Wife that was very rich and beautiful, and gave her in Marriage (perforce) to his own Son Cleomenes. This young Prince fell greatly inamoured on his Wife, and sought to win her affection, as well as he had her person. He discoursed much with her about the purpose of her former Husband Agis, and by pitying his misfortune, began to entertain a desire of accomplishing that, wherein Agis had failed. So coming himself to be King, whilst he was very young, he gladly embraced all occasions of War: For that he hoped by strong hand to effect that, which Agis by proceeding formally in so corrupt an estate of the City, had attempted to his own ruine. Therefore when the Ephori gave him in charge, to take and fortifie Athenæum, a Temple on the marches of Liconia, to which both they and the Magalopolitans pretended Title, he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but sought to take by surprize Tegea and Orchomenus, Cities then Confederate with the Lacedæmonians: wherein, his intelligence failing, he lost the labour of a painful Night travel, and discovered his enmity to Sparta; of which Cleomenes was nothing sorry. By these degrees the War began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had discovered the Ætolian practice, and therefore would have stayed the quarrel from proceeding too far. But Lysiadas and Aristomachus would needs fight, and he could do none other than be ruled by them; especially seeing Cleomenes was so urgent. Aristomachus was at that time General of the Achæans, (he and Lysiadas being of great account, since they had abandoned their Tyranny) who sent unto Aratus, lying then in Athens, and required his assistance in a journey to be made into Laconia. No disswasions of Aratus would serve, therefore he came in person, and took part of a business, little pleasing him in the present, and less in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, he durst not fight; but opposed himself again Aristomachus, who desired to give Battel. Yet had the Achæans Twenty Thousand Foot, and One Thousand Horse, in their Army: Whereas Cleomenes had no more than Five Thousand in all. This gave reputation to the Lacedæmonian, and raised an ill report upon Aratus; which Lysiadas helped to make worse, by accusing his cowardize. Nevertheless the Achæans would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but chose him their General the year following; against Lysiadas his accuser that sued for the place. Being General himself, it behoved him to confute with deeds, the slandrous words of Lysiadas. Therefore he purposed to set upon the Eleans: But was met withal on the way, near unto the Mount Lycæus, by Cleomenes, who vanquished him in a great Battel, and drave him to hide himself all Night for fear, so that he was thought to have been slain. This misadventure Aratus recompenced by a trick of his own more natural occupation: Performing with his broken Army, that which could hardly have been expected, had he been Victorious. For whilst there was no suspicion of any great matter that he could undertake, he suddenly wrought with some of the Mantinæans, who did let him into their City. These Mantinæans, (whom he had thus brought to his purpose) had once before joyned themselves with the Achaians; but shortly upon fear, or some other passion, they gave themselves to the Ætolians; and from the Ætolians, presently after this Victory, to Cleomenes, from whom immediately they were thus won. For this their levity they were not punished, but freely admitted now again into the Achæan Society. As this good success repaired the credit of Aratus; so another Battel almost ruined it. Cleomenes and he encountred near unto Megalopolis; where the Achæans had somewhat the better at the first, but their General durst not follow his advantage. Thereupon Lysiadas, of whom we spake before, grew somewhat impatient with anger; and taking with him all the Horse, brake upon the Lacedæmonians whom he routed at the beginning, but pursuing them too far into places of hard passage, he was slain by them; and his followers driven back upon their own Companions; in such sort, that finally all the Army was disordered and put to flight. This was a great loss; and incensed the Achæans againſt Aratus: Yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refuſed to make any longer contribution, towards the pay of thoſe Mercenaries which he had waged. This Aratus took patiently, and followed the War nevertheleſs; wherein though Cleomenes wan ſome Towns, and Aratus got the better in one ſmall fight, yet little of importance was done; the Achæans being weary, and the Spartan King intentive to another buſineſs.

Cleomenes having led into the Field all that were like to hinder his purpoſe, and tired them with painful journeys, forſook the Achæan War on a ſudden, and came unexpected home to Sparta, where he ſlew the Ephori, and reſtored by force the ancient Diſcipline of Lycurgus. Then he gave an account of his doings; and ſhewing by what degrees the Ephori had incroached upon the power of Kings, and many diſorders had grown in the City; he juſtified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equal diviſion of the Lands, reducing all to the firſt inſtitution. He alſo ſupplied the defect of Citizens, by chuſing new, out of ſuch as were freinds to the State, and valiant men: So that henceforth his Countrey might not altogether ſtand in need of Mercenary help, as it lately had done, to ſave it ſelf from the Ætolians, Illyrians, and ſuch other Enemies. All this was diſpatched in great haſte; the Spartans well ſatisfied, and Cleomenes himſelf ready in the Field, ere his Enemies could take any advantage of theſe his domeſtical troubles.

The Achæans hearing of this great alteration in in Sparta, thought that it would be long ere Cleomenes durſt iſſue forth of the City, for fear of ſome Rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard, that he had waſted all the Countrey of Megalopolis; had ranged over all Arcadia at his pleaſure; and was admitted into Mantinæa; and ready to take other places, even of Achaia. Theſe new diſpleaſed them not a little: But they muſt patiently endure to hear worſe. For when Cleomenes had ſhaken off the power of the Ephori, that curbed his Authority, he proceeded more roundly in his work, being better obeyed, and by better men. His Lacedæmonians reſumed their ancient courage; and he himſelf had the heart to demand the Principality of Greece. He did not therefore henceforth contend about the poſſeſſion of a few Towns: but adventured to win or loſe all. The Ætolians, in favour of his attempt, declared themſelves on his ſide: And whereas he had gotten Mantinæa, Tegea, and other places; to which they had ſome Title, they willingly renounced all their intereſt unto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Country, and ſaw that Antigonus, with the Ætolians, or perhaps without them, would ſhortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begun. Therefore he adviſed how to provide againſt the worſt, and either to repair all, or (if it could not be) to ſave all from utter ruine. The office of General, when it was next put upon him, he refus'd; fearing to be ſo far preſt, as to hazard in one Battel all the force of his Countrey, to which as he had never any affection, nor perchance courage, ſo was his manner of Warfare otherwiſe. For he commonly attempted by ſurpriſe, and defended upon the advantage of place, after the manner of the Iriſh, and of all other Nations, overcharged with numbers of men. Yet did he not forſake the care of the Weal-publick, though in aiming at the general good, it ſeems that private paſſion drew him into an ill courſe. He ſaw that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazard of Battel; that Mantinæa had not only opened her Gates unto Cleomenes, but ſlain the Achæan Garriſon that lay therein; that other Towns had yield unto him, without compulſion; and that Ariſtomachus, once Tyrant of Argos, and ſince General of the Achæans, was now revolted unto the Enemy following the fortune of Cleomenes. Ptolomy was too far off to help; and the nearneſs of Antigonus was very dangerous; yet might be uſefull, if this King would (as Polybius ſaith) like others, be friend or enemy, as ſhould beſt agree with his own profit. To make trial hereof, Aratus practiſed with ſome of Megalopolis, whom he found apt unto his purpoſe; and inſtructed them how to deal with Antigonus, and the Achæans.

The City of Megalopolis had been well affected to the Macedonians, ever ſince the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it unto him by ſome ſpecial benefits. At this time it lay neareſt unto the danger; was very faithful, and therefore deſerved ſuccour; yet could not well be relieved by the Achæans, with their own proper ſtrength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embaſſadours ſhould be ſent unto the General Council of Achaia, requeſting leave and good allowance to try the favour of Antigonus, in their neceſſity. This was granted for lack of what elſe to anſwer: and the ſame Embaſſadours diſpatched away to Antigonus. They did their own errant briefly; telling him of the good will and reſpect which their City had of long time born unto him and his Predeceſſors; of their preſent need; and how it would agree with his honour to give them aid. But when they delivered the more general matter, wherein Aratus had given them inſtruction; ſhewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Ætolians, might redound to his own great loſs or danger, if the one and the other were not in time prevented; how Aratus himſelf did ſtand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Achæans under the Patronage of Macedon: then began Antigonus to lend a more attentive ear to their diſcourſe. He embraced the motion: And to give it the more life, he wrote unto the Megalopolitans, that his help ſhould not be wanting, ſo far forth as might ſtand with the Achæans good-liking. Particularly he commended himſelf by theſe Meſſengers to Aratus, aſſuring them, that he thought himſelf highly bound to this honourable man, whoſe former actions he now perceived not to have been grounded upon any hatred to the Macedonians, but only upon a juſt and worthy love to his own Nation. With this anſwer they returned to Megalopolis: And are preſently ſent away to the Council of Achaia; there to make ſome ſpeedy concluſion, as the neceſſity of the time required. The Achæans were glad to hear, that Antigonus was ſo inclinable to their deſire; and therefore were ready to entertain his favour, with all good correſpondence. Hereunto Aratus gave his conſent; and praiſed the wiſdom of the Countrimen, that ſo well diſcerned the beſt and likelieſt means of their common ſafety: adding nevertheleſs, that it were not amiſs, firſt of all to try their own ability; which if it failed, then ſhould they do well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus he ſhewed himſelf moderate; in that which himſelf of all others did moſt wiſh: to the end, that he might not afterward ſuſtain the common reprehenſion, if any thing fell out amiſs; ſince it might appear, that he had not been Author of this Decree, but only followed, and that leiſurably, the general conſent.

Never

Nevertheleſs, in true eſtimation, this fineneſs of Aratus might have been uſed, with his greater commendation, in a contrary courſe. For it had been more honourable to make an end of the War, by yielding unto Cleomenes that power which they gave unto Antigonus: Since thereby he ſhould both have freed this Country from all further trouble; and withal, ſhould have reſtored unto the univerſal ſtate of Greece, that honourable condition, whereof the Macedonians had bereft it. But it is commonly found (which is great pity) that Vertue, having riſen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it ſelf (as it were) in the ſeat of principality, by length of time, and ſucceſs of many actions, can ill endure the haſty growth of any others reputation, wherewith it ſees it ſelf likely to be overtopped. Other cauſe to deſpiſe the Lacedæmonians there was none, than that they lately had been in dangerous caſe: Neither could any reaſon be found, why Aratus ſhould prefer Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that he had ſtood in doubt of the one, when he thought himſelf more mighty than the other. Wherefore he was juſtly plagued, when he ſaw his own honours reverſed by the inſolent Macedonians: and inſtead of living as a companion with Cleomenes, that was deſcended of a long race of Kings, the poſterity of Hercules, was fain to do ſacrifice unto Antigonus, as unto a God, and was finally poyſoned by Philip, whoſe Nobility was but of five deſcents, and whom perhaps he might have ſeen his fellows, if he had not made them his Lords. But by this inclination to the Macedonians, the love of Ptolemy was loſt: Who forthwith took part with Cleomenes, though he did not ſupply him with ſuch liberality, as he had uſed to the Achæans; being warned, as may ſeem, by their example, to be more wary both in truſting and disburſting. Cleomenes himſelf, whilſt this buſineſs with Antigonus was a-foot, paſſed through Arcadia with an Army, and laboured by all means to draw the Achæans to Battel. At the City of Dymes in Achaia were aſſembled all the remaining Forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded to make tryal; whether perhaps they might amend their eſtate, without ſeeking help of the Macedonian. Thither went Cleomenes, and there fought with them; where he had ſo great a Victory, that the Enemy was no longer able to keep the open Field. The calamity was ſuch, that Aratus himſelf durſt not take upon him to be their General, when his turn came in the next election. Wherefore the Achæans were compelled to ſue for peace; which was granted upon this eaſie condition: That they ſhould not arrogate unto themſelves the command of Peloponneſus, but ſuffer the Lacedæmonians (as in former ages) to be their Leader in War. Hereunto if they would condeſcend, he promiſed unto them, that he would preſently reſtore all places taken from them, and all his Priſoners ranſom-free: Alſo that they ſhould enjoy their own Laws and Liberties without moleſtation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleaſing to the Achæans: Who deſired him to come to the City of Lerna, where a Parliament ſhould be held, for the concluſion of the War.

Now ſeeming the affairs of Greece likely to be ſetled in better order, than they had ever been ſince the beginning of the Peloponneſian Wars, yea, or ſince the Perſian invaſion: When God, who had otherwiſe diſpoſed of theſe matters, hindred all with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes drank in great heat, and thereupon fell extream ſick, and ſo could not be preſent at Lerna, but cauſed the Parliament to be deferred to another time. Nevertheleſs he ſent home the chief of his Priſoners, to ſhew that he meant none other than good faith. By this fair dealing he confirmed the Achæans in their deſire of his friendſhip; who aſſembled again at Argos, there to eſtabliſh the League. But Aratus was violently bent againſt it, and ſought by great words, and terrible threats, to make his Country-men afraid of reſolving. When all would not ſerve turn, he betook himſelf to his cunning; and ſent word to Cleomenes, that he ſhould do well to leave his Army behind him, and come alone into Argos, receiving hoſtages for ſafety of his perſon. Cleomenes, was already far on his way, when he met with this advertiſement; and took it in ill part, that he ſhould be thus deluded. For it had been an eaſie matter, to have told him ſo much at the firſt, and not have made him come ſo far with an Army, which afterwards he muſt diſmiſs. Yet that which chiefly ſeems to have troubled him, was the drift of his oppugners; who ſought thereby, either to make him wait without the gates, and deal only with themſelves and their Meſſengers, or if he would adventure himſelf into the City, then to deprive him of all Royal ſhew, that might breed reſpect of him in the multitude. This was that indeed which Aratus feared, and for which he ſought to hinder his coming thither in perſon; leaſt the people, hearing the promiſes of Cleomenes ratified by his own mouth, ſhould preſently be won with his gentle words, and finiſh the bargain without more ado. Therefore Cleomenes wrote unto the whole Councel, bitterly complaining againſt theſe juggling tricks: And Aratus was not far behind with him in as bitter an Oration. So between fear of the one, and reverence of the other, the Aſſembly knew not how to proceed, but abruptly brake up, leaving all, as it were to fortune. Cleomenes took his advantage of their preſent weakneſs, and renewed the War. Many Cities yielded unto him willingly; many he forced; and partly by force, partly by terror, he wan Argos, which never King of Sparta before him could do. In this caſe Aratus ſent his own Son to Antigonus, intreating him to defer no time, but come preſently to relieve the diſtreſſed Achæans. Antigonus gave good words as could be wiſhed: Saving that he utterly refuſed to do any thing, unleſs he might firſt have Acrocorinthus put into his hands. This demand was ſomewhat like unto that of the Hunter, who promiſed to help the Horſe againſt his Enemy the Stagg: But with condition, that the Horſe ſhould ſuffer him to be ſaddled and bridled. Aratus was herewithal contented, but wanting all honeſt colour to do it: Seeing the Corinthians had no way deſerved to be thus given away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occaſion was found; for that the Corinthians, perceiving what he intended, were minded to arreſt him. So he withdrew himſelf out of their City, and ſent word to Antigonus, that their Caſtle ſhould be ready to let him in. The Corinthians on the other ſide ran to Cleomenes; who loſt no time, but made haſt with them to Corinth, where he ſought how to get poſſeſſion of their Caſtle, or at leaſt to ſave it from Antigonus, by ſurrounding it within Trenches, that none might iſſue nor enter without his leave. Whilſt this was doing, he took ſpecial order, that Aratus his Houſe and Goods, within the Town, ſhould be kept for the Owner; to whom he ſent Meſſenger after Meſſenger, deſiring him to come to agreement, and not to bring in the barbarous Macedonians, and Illyrians, to Peloponneſus; promiſing, that if he would hearken to theſe perſwaſions, then would he give him double the ſame penſion, which he had been wont to receive of King Ptolemy. As for the Caſtle of Corinth, which was the gate of Peloponneſus, and without which none could hold aſſured ſoveraignty of the Country; he deſired that it might not be committed unto his own diſpoſition, but be joyntly kept by the Lacedæmonians and Achæans. All this entreaty ſerved to no purpoſe. For Aratus, rejecting utterly the motion, ſent his own Son as an Hoſtage to Antigonus; and laboured with the Achæans, to put Acrocorinthus into his hands. Which when Cleomenes underſtood, he ſeiſed upon the goods of Aratus in Corinth, and waſted all the Country of Sicyon, whereof this his Adverſary was native.

Antigonus in the mean time drew near to the Iſthmus; having paſſed with his Army through Eubœa, becauſe the Ætolians held the ſtraights of Thermopylæ againſt him. This they did, either in favour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatneſs, whereunto the Macedonians might attain by the good ſucceſs of this journey. At his coming thither, he found the Lacedæmonians ready to forbid his entrance: And that with ſufficient ſtrength; yet with no purpoſe to hazard Battel, but rather to weary him thence with hunger; againſt which he came not well provided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force; but he was not able ſo to do: He ſecretly got into the Corinthian Haven; but was violently driven out again, with great loſs of men; finally he reſolved to turn aſide, and ſeek a paſſage over the gulf of Corinth, to Sicyon, or ſome other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not eaſily made.

In this perplexity, news from Argos came by Sea, that greatly comforted Antigonus, and no leſs troubled his enemies. The Achæans were gotten into that City; and the Garriſon which Cleomenes had left therein, though it was not driven out of the Citadel, yet was hardly diſtreſſed, and ſtood in need of preſent help. Argos had always been enemy to Sparta, and well affected to the King of Macedon. When Cleomenes took it, he forbare to chaſe out thoſe whom he moſt ſuſpected; partly, at the entreaty of friends, and partly, for that they all made ſhew to be glad of his proſperity. They were glad indeed of Cleomenes his Victories, both in Argos and elſewhere, as many as hoped that he would cauſe all Debters to be diſcharged from their Creditors, as he had lately done in Sparta. But that which Cleomenes had done in Sparta was agreeable to the Spartan inſtitution: In other places, where it would have been Tyrannical, he did not. Thereupon, ſuch as were diſappointed of their unjuſt hopes, began to turn good Common-wealths men; and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, becauſe he would not do the like abroad. So they took their time, invited the Achæans, aſſailed his Garriſon, cut in pieces the reſcue that he ſent, and compelled him at length to forſake the defence of Corinth, and look unto the Enemies that were behind his back. For when he underſtood by continual meſſengers, that his men which held the Citadel of Argos were almoſt loſt: He began to fear leaſt his labour in guarding the entry ſhould grow frivolous; the Achæans in the mean while ſpoiling all that lay within. Therefore he forſook his cuſtody of the Iſthmus, and made all haſte towards Argos: Which if he could ſave, he meant to truſt fortune with the reſt. And ſo far he prevailed at his coming to Argos, that both Argives and Achæans were glad to houſe themſelves, leaving him Maſter of the ſtreets; when the horſemen of Antigonus were diſcovered afar off, haſting to relieve the Citizens; and Antigonus himſelf (to whom Corinth was yielded, as ſoon as the Spartan had turned his back) following apace with the body of his Army, Cleomenes therefore had no more to do, then to make a ſafe retreat. This he did, and got him home into Laconia: Loſing in ſhort ſpace all, or moſt of that which he had been long in getting.

Antigonus having ſhewed himſelf at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Arcadia; where he wan ſuch Caſtles as were held for Cleomenes, and reſtored them to the old Poſſeſſors. This doing, he took his way to Ægium, where was held a Parliament by the Achæans; to whom he declared the cauſe of his coming, and ſpake brave words, that filled them with hope. The Achæans were not behind with him; but made him Captain-General over them and their Confederates: And further entred into Covenant with him, that they would not deal with any Prince or State, either by writing, or Embaſſadour, without his conſent. All this while and ſomewhat longer Aratus was the only man, that ſeemed to rule the Kings heart: Carrying him to Sicyon his own Town (for Winter was come on) where he not only feaſted him as a great Prince, but ſuffered more than humane honours, as Sacrifices and the like, to be done unto him. This example of Aratus and his Sicyonians, was followed by the reſt of Achaia: Which had made (forſooth) a very wiſe bargain, if inſtead of Cleomenes that would have been a King, it had obtained the protection of a God. But this god was poor, and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, impoſed the burthen upon the Achæans. This was hardly taken: Yet worſe muſt be indured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himſelf over-carefully reſpected; when the ſtatues of thoſe Tyrants, which he had thrown down in Argos, were again erected by Antigonus; or when the ſtatues which he had erected, of thoſe that had taken Acrocorinthus with him, were all thrown down by the ſame King, and one only left unto himſelf at his earneſt intreaty. It might therefore appear, that this god was alſo ſpiteful. Nevertheleſs in taking revenge upon thoſe that offended him, Aratus did ſatisfie his own paſſion by the aid of theſe Macedonians. For with extream Torments he did put Ariſtomachus to death, who had been once Tyrant of Argos, afterwards General of the Achæans, and from them revolting unto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like ſort handled he (though not as yet) the Mantineans, for their ingratitude and cruelty ſhewed to the Achæans. For he ſlew all the principal Citizens, and ſold the reſt, Men, Women and Children, all for bond-ſlaves: Dividing the ſpoil; two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Achæans. The Town it ſelf was given by Antigonus to the Argives, who peopled it with a Colony of their own; and Aratus having charge of this buſineſs, cauſed it be new named Antigonia. Surely of this cruelty there can be no better excuſe, than even the flattery which Aratus was driven to uſe to Antigonus: Foraſmuch as it was a token of ſervility, whereinto they had urged and brought him; whom he, as in revenge thereof, did thus requite. But leaving to ſpeak of this change, which the coming in of the Macedonian wrought in the Civil State of the Achæans, let us return unto this War againſt the Lacedæmonian.

The next Summer Antigonus wan Tegea, Mantinea, Orchomenus, Herea, and Telpuſſa: Mantinea

tinæa he dispeopled, as was said before; in Orchomenus he placed a Garrison of his Macedonians; the rest he restored to the Achæans, with whom he wintred at Ægeum, where they held a Parliament. Once only Cleomenes had met him this year; and that was on the borders of Laconia, where he lay ready to defend his own Territory. The reason why he stirred no further, nor followed Antigonus to Mantinæa, and to those other Towns that he wan, was this: He had few Souldiers, and had not money enough to wage more. Ptolemy the Egyptian promised much, but would perform nothing, unless he might have Cleomenes his own Mother, and his Children in pledge. These were sent unto Egypt, yet the aid came not. For Ptolemy was slow; as dealing in the business of Greece, rather for his minds sake, than upon any apprehension of necessity. Cleomenes therefore provided for himself, as well as his own ability would serve. He manumised all the Heilotes which were the Lacedæmonian Slaves: Taking money for their liberty, and arming two Thousand of them after the Macedonian fashion. Having thus increased his Forces, he came on the sudden to Megalopolis, that lay secure, as having defended it self in more dangerous times, and having now Antigonus near at hand in Ægium. The Town he wan: But after he was entred, all that were fit to bear Arms rose hastily against him; and though they could not drive him out, yet saved the multitude, to whom they gave a Port free for their escape. He sent after the Citizens, offering their Town and Goods to them again; if they would be of his party. But they bravely refused his offer: Wherefore he sacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Sparta a great booty that he found therein. These news astonished the Achæans at Ægium: Who thereupon brake up their Parliament. Antigonus sent hastily for his Macedonians, out of their wintering-places: But they were so long in coming, that Cleomenes was safely gone home. Therefore he returned them back to their lodgings, and went himself to Argos, there to pass the rest of his unlucky winter, somewhat further from the eyes of the grieved Achæans. When he had lain a while at Argos, Cleomenes was at the gates, with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him. The Argives perceiving that their Country would be spoiled, if Antigonus did not issue into the Field, were very earnest with him to go forth and fight. But he was wiser than to be moved with their clamors, and suffered them to see their Villages burnt; to bid him resign his Office of Protector unto some that were more valiant; and to satisfie their passions with foolish words, rather than he would be overcome in fight, and thereby lose more honour than could easily be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his desire, in weakning the reputation of his Enemy: Though he hereby added neither followers, nor other strength unto Lacedæmon.

Afterwards, when the season was more fit for War, Antigonus gathered together all his Troops; meaning to requite these bravadoes of his Enemy, with the Conquest of Sparta. Cleomenes, on the other side laboured to keep the War from his own gates; and therefore entred upon the Country of Argos, where he made such a havock, as drew Antigonus thither; from his intended invasion of Laconia. Many great affronts the Macedonian was fain to endure, in coasting of the Spartan King; that ranging over the Country of the Argives, Phliasians, and Orchomenians, drave a Garrison of his out of Oligyrtis; and did sacrifice, as it were before his face, in the suburbs of Argos, without the Temple of Juno, that was shut up; sending to him in scorn, to borrow the keys. These were light things; yet served to dis-hearten the Achæan side, and to fill the Enemy with courage, which was no matter of light importance. Therefore he concluded to lay apart all other regard of things abroad, and to put all to hazard; by setting up his rest, without any more delay, upon Sparta it self. He had in his Army eight and twenty Thousand Foot, and twelve Hundred Horse, collected out of sundry Nations, as Macedonians, Illyrians, Gaules, Epirots, Bœotians, Acarnanians, and others; together with the Achæans; and their friends of Peloponnesus. Cleomenes had of all sorts twenty Thousand, with which he lay at Selasia: Fortifying slightly the other passages into Laconia, through which the Macedonians were not likely to seek entrance. Antigonus coming unto Selasia, found his Enemy so strongly encamped, upon and between the Hills of Eva and Olympus, that he was constrained to spend much time there, before he could advance any one foot: Neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blows, which he greatly desired, without the hazard of his whole Army, in assailing their well defended Camp. But at length (as it happens, when men are weary both of their hopes and fears) both Kings being resolved to make an end one way or other; Antigonus attempted with his Illyrians, to force that part which lay on the Hill Eva. But his Illyrians were so ill seconded by the Achæan Foot, that the Spartan Horse, and light-armed Foot, incamped in the straight valley between those Hills, issuing forth, fell upon their skirts, and not only disordered them, but were like to have endangered all the rest. If Cleomenes himself had stood in that part of the Battel, he would have made great use of such a fair beginning. But Euclydas, his Brother, a more valiant than skilful Souldier, commanded in that wing: Who neither followed this advantage, nor took such benefit as the ground afforded, whereon he lay. Philopœmen the Arcadian of Megalopolis, who afterwards proved a famous Captain, served then on Horse, as a private young man, among the Achæans. He seeing that all was like to go to rout, if their Illyrians were driven to fall back upon the Army following them; perswaded the Captains of the Achæan Horse, to break upon the Spartan Mercenaries. But they would not: Partly despising his youth and want of charge; partly, for that Antigonus had given order, that they should keep their places, until they received a sign from him, which was not as yet. Philopœmen perceiving them to be more orderly than well advised, intreated some of his own Country-men to follow him, gave a charge on the Spartans, and forced them, not only to leave the Illyrians, but seek how to save themselves. Being so far advanced, he found the place which the Illyrians had attempted, like enough to be won, through the unskilfulness of him that held it. Wherefore he alighted, and perswaded the men at Arms his Companions to do the like: The folly of Euclydas being manifest, who kept the top of the Hill, and stirred not to hinder those that ascended, but waited for them in a Plain, where they might fight upon even terms. So he recovered the Hill-top; where, though he was sore hurt, yet he made good the place that he had gotten, until the whole Army came up to him; by which the Lacedæmonians were beaten from it, with great slaughter of them in their descent. This overthrow, and death of Euclydas, made Cleomenes lose the day: Who fighting bravely on the other side, upon Olympus, againſt Antigonus himſelf, was like to have been ſurrounded and loſt, if he had not withdrawn himſelf with an extraordiry ſpeed. In this Battel ended the glory of Lacedæmon, which, as a light ready to go out, had with a great, but not long blaze, ſhined more brightly of late, than in many ages paſt.

Cleomenes fled unto Sparta; where he had no deſire to ſtay; finding only two Hundred left, of ſix Thouſand Spartans that he had led unto this Battel, and moſt of his hired Souldiers dead, or gone away. So he perſwaded his people to yield themſelves unto Antigonus; and promiſing to do all that ſhould at any time lye in his own power, for their good, he haſted away to the Sea-ſide (where he had ſhipping long before provided againſt all that might happen) and imbarked himſelf for Egypt. He was lovingly entertained by Ptolemy Euergetes; who undertook to reſtore him to his Kingdom, and (perhaps) meant no leſs, as being much delighted with his gallant behaviour, and qualities. In the mean ſeaſon, he had a Penſion allowed him, of four and twenty Talents, yearly. But this Ptolemy died; and his Son Ptolemy Philopater ſucceeded him: a vicious young Prince, wholly governed by lewd Women, and baſe Men, unmindful of all vertue, and hating any in whom it was found. When therefore Cleomenes was deſirous to return into Greece, whither the troubles in Peloponneſus did ſeem to invite him; Ptolomy and his Minions, would neither give him aid; nor yet dared to diſmiſs him (as he deſired) to try his own friends in Greece, becauſe he was too well acquainted with the weakneſs of Egypt: nor well knew how to detain him againſt his will. At length they deviſed matter againſt him, and made him Priſoner: the laſt act of him was, that with thirty of his Country-men, he undertook a deſperate enterprize: Breaking out of the Priſon, and provoking the Alexandrians to rebell and ſeek their liberty. In which attempt he ſlew ſome Enemies of his that he met; and having walked up and down the ſtreets without reſiſtance (no man offering to take his part, or, which is very ſtrange, to fight againſt him on the Kings behalf) he, and his Companions, agreed together to be miniſters of their own death. Upon his dead body Ptolemy was bold to ſhew his indignation: And Slew his Mother and Children, that had been ſent thither, as Hoſtages, together with the Wives of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending upon the old Queen. Such was the end of Cleomenes, a generous Prince, but Son of Leonidas, who had cauſed Agis, with his Mother and Grand-mother, to come to ſuch a bloody end, as now befell his own Wife, Son, and Grand children.

After the Victory at Sellaſia: Antigonus without reſiſtance entred Sparta: Whereinto never the force of any Enemy, before him, could make way. He kindly intreated the Citizens, and left them to their own Laws and Government: Tarrying there no longer than two or three dayes: After which he haſtened out of Peloponneſus, and never returned. The cauſe of this ſpeedyd eparture was an advertiſement that he received out of Macedon; how the Illyrians over-ran and deſtroyed the Country. Had theſe news come a little ſooner, or had Cleomenes either deferred the fight, a few dayes longer, or at leaſt-wiſe tarried a few dayes after the fight, in Sparta; the Kingdom of Lacedæmon would have ſtood, and perhaps have extended it ſelf over all Greece. But God had otherwiſe determined.

Antigonus fought a great Battail with the Illyrians, and overcame them. Yet therein he caught his bane: Not by any wound, but by over-ſtraining his voice; wherewith he brake a vein that bled inwardly, and in ſhort ſpace finiſhed his life, who was troubled before with a Conſumption of the Lungs. His Kingdom deſcended unto Philip the Son of Demetrius, being then a Boy: As alſo about the ſame time it was, that Antiochus, ſurnamed (I know not why) the Great; and Ptolomy Philopater, began to Reign in Aſia and Egypt; Boyes all. Of theſe, Ptolomy, though old enough to love Harlots, when he firſt was King, yet continued a Boy all the ſeventeen years of his Reign. The unripe age of Philip and Antiochus, bred ſuch inteſtine inconvenience to their Kingdoms, as is uſual in the minority of Princes: But their elder years brought them acquainted with the Romans; upon which occaſion, when it comes, we ſhall more ſeaſonably ſpeak of them, and of their Kingdoms, more at large.

SECT. VII.

How the Illyrians infeſted the Coaſt of Geece; and how they were ſubdued by the Romans.

WHilſt things thus paſſed in Greece, and whilſt the Carthaginians were buſie in their Conqueſt of Spain; the Romans had found themſelves work among the Sardinians and Corſicans, that were eaſily ſubdued at firſt, and eaſily vanquiſhed again, when they rebelled. They made alſo War with the Illyrians, wherein they got much honour with little pain. With the Gaules they had much ado, that laſted not long; being rather, as Livy ſaith, a Tumult than a War. So that by all theſe light exerciſes their valour was hardly kept from ruſt. How they got the Iſlands in the Mediterranean Sea, it hath been ſhewed before: Of their dealings with the Illyrians and Gaules, it is not meet to be utterly ſilent. Liv. lib.21.

The Illyrians inhabited the Country now called Slavonia, a troubleſome Nation, impatient of reſt, and continually making War for gain, without either regard of friend or foe. They were invited by Demetrius, King of Macedon, to help the Mydionians his friends, that were beſieged by the Ætolians, for that they refuſed to be of their ſociety. Before the Illyrian ſuccours came, the Mydionians were ſo far ſpent, that the Ætolians contended about the booty: The old Prætor, or chief Magiſtrate of their Nation, who was going out of his office, claiming to have the honour of the Victory, and the diviſion of the ſpoil to be referred unto him; for that he had in a manner brought the ſiege to an end, and won the Town: Others, that were in hope to be choſen into the Office, contradicting this, and deſiring that old Orders might be kept. It was a petty ſtrife, and ſomewhat like to that of the French in latter ages, who thought upon dividing the prey, before they had won the Victories, which anon they loſt, as Poitiers and Agincourt. The Ætolians wiſely compounded the difference, ordering it thus, that the old and the new Prætor ſhould be joyntly, ly intituled in the victory, and have equal authority in distributing of the gettings. But the Illyrians finished the strife much more elegantly, and after another fashion. They arrived and landed ere any was aware of them; they fell upon the Ætolians, and though good resistance was made, yet got the victory, partly by force of their multitude, partly by the help of the Mydionians, that were not idle in their own business, but stoutly sallied out of the Town. Many of the Ætolians were slain, more were taken, their Camp and all their Baggage was lost: The Illyrians took the spoil, and went their way; the Mydionians erected a Trophie, inscribing the names both of their old and new Magistrates (for they also chose new Officers at the same time) as the Ætolians had directed them by example.

The success of this Voyage highly pleased Agron King of the Illyrians: Not only in regard of the money, wherewith Demetrius had hired his assistance; or of the booty that was gotten, but for that having vanquished the stoutest of the Greeks, he found it not uneasie to enrich himself by setting upon the less Warlike. For joy of this he feasted, and drank so immoderately, that he fell into a Pleurisie, which in few dayes ended his life. His Kingdom, together with his great hopes, he left unto Teuta his Wife.

Teuta gave her people free liberty to Rob all sorts at Sea, making no difference between friend and foe; as if she had been sole Mistress of the salt Waters. She Armed a Fleet and sent it into Greece; willing her Captains to make War where they found advantage, without any further respect. These fell on the Western Coast of Peloponnesus; where they invaded the Eleans, and Messenians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirus, and stayed at the City of Phœnice, to take in victuals and other necessaries. There lay in Phœnice eight Hundred Gaules, that having been Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, first Agrigentum, then Eryx, to the Romans; but failing to do either, they nevertheless revolted, and were for their misdeeds disarmed and sent to Sea by the Romans, yet entertained by these Epirots, and trusted to lye in Garrison within their Town. The Gaules were soon grown acquainted with the Illyrians, to whom they betrayed Phœnice; which deserved none other, in trusting them. All Epirus was presently in Arms, and hastned to drive out these unwelcome guests. But whilst the Epirots lay before the Town, there came news into their Camp, of another Illyrian Army, that was marching thitherward by the Land, under one Scerdilaidas, whom Queen Tuta had sent to help his fellows. Upon this advertisement, a part of them is sent away towards Antigonia, to make good that Town, and the straights adjoyning, by which these new comers must enter into their Country; another part of them remains at Phœnice, to continue the Siege. Neither the one nor the other speed well in their business. For Scerdilaidas found means to joyn with his fellows; and they that were besieged within Phœnice, sallied out of the Town, and gave such an overthrow to the Epirots, as made them despair of saving their Country, without great and speedy help from abroad. Wherefore Embassadours were sent to the Achæans and Ætolians: Craving their help, with very pitiful terms of intreaty. They obtained their suit: neither was it long, before an Army, sent by these two Nations, was ready in Epirus to present Battel unto Scerdilaidas. But Scerdilaidas was called home by letters from Tuta the Queen, that signified a rebellion of some Illyrians against her: So that he had no mind to put his Forces to hazard, but offered composition, which was accepted. The agreement was, that the Epirots might ransome their Town, and all their people that were prisoners; and that the Illyrians should quietly depart with all their booty and Slaves. Having made this profitable and honourable bargain, the Illyrians returned into their own Country by Land, sending their booty away by Sea.

At their coming home, they found no such great trouble, as that which they brought, or had occasioned in this Voyage. For, in fulfilling the commandment of their Queen, they had taken many Italian Merchants, whilst they lay at Phœnice, and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints made unto the Roman Senate, were so frequent, that Embassadours were sent to require of Teuta, that she should abstain from doing such injuries. These Embassadours found her very jolly; both for the riches which her Fleet had brought in; and for that she had, in a short space, tamed her Rebels, and brought all to good order, save only the Town Issa, which her Forces held straightly besieged. Swelling with this prosperity, she could hardly afford a good look to the Romans, that found fault with her doings, and, calling them by a true name, Piracy, required amends. Yet when their speech was ended, she vouchsafed to tell them, that injury in publick she would do them none: As for private matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the manner of Kings to forbid their Subjects to get commodity, how they best could by Sea. But (said the younger of the two Embassadours) we Romans have a manner, and a very laudable one, to take revenge in publick, of those private wrongs that are born out by publick Authority: Therefore we shall teach you, God willing, to reform your Kingly manners, and learn better of us. These words the Queen took so impatiently, that no revenge could satisfie her, but the death of him that had spoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the common Law of Nations, she caused him to be Slain: As if that had been the way to set her heart at rest; which was indeed the mean to disquiet and afflict it ever after.

The Romans, provoked by this outrage, prepare two great Armies; the one by Sea, consisting of two Hundred sail, commanded by C. Fulvius; the other by Land, led by A. Posthumus. They trouble not themselves any more with requiring satisfaction: For this injury is of such nature, as must be required with mortal War. It is indeed contrary to all humane Law, to use violence towards Embassadours: The reason and ground whereof, seems to be this; that since without mediation, there would never be an end of War and Destruction, therefore it was equally received by all Nations, as a lesson taught by Nature, that Embassadours should pass freely, and in safety, between Enemies. Nevertheless, as I take it, this general Law is not without limitation. For if any King or State lay hold upon Embassadours sent by their Enemies, not unto themselves, but unto some third, whom they should draw into the quarrel; then it is as lawful to use violence to those Embassadours (thus employed to make the War more terrible) as it is to kill the men of War, and Subjects of an Enemy. And so might the Athenians have answered it when they slew the Lacedæmonian Embassadours, that were sent to Xerxes, to draw him into a War upon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadours, which practise against the person of that Prince, in whose Countries they reside, warranted by any

Law

Law whatſoever. For whereas the true office of an Embaſſadour reſiding, is the maintenance of amity; if it be not lawful for one Prince to practice againſt the life of another; much leſs may an Embaſſadour do it without incurring juſtly the ſame danger of puniſhment, with other Traitors; in which caſe, his place gives him no priviledge at all. But we will leave this diſpute to the Civilians; and go on with the revenge, taken by the Romans, for the ſlaughter of their Embaſſadour Coruncanus.

The Illyrian Queen was ſecure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to ſtir againſt her. She was indeed in an errour, that hath undone many of all ſorts, greater and leſs than ſhe, both before and ſince: Having more regard unto fame, than unto the ſubſtance of things. The Greeks were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Ætolians and Epirots had the name of the moſt Warlike People in Greece; theſe had ſhe eaſily vanquiſhed, and therefore thought, that with the Romans ſhe ſhould be little troubled. Had ſhe conſidered that her whole Army, which wrought ſuch wonders in Greece, was not much greater than of Ten Thouſand men, and that neverleſs, it prevailed as much by odds of number, as by valour, or skill in Arms; ſhe would have continued to uſe her advantage againſt thoſe that were of more fame than ſtrength, with ſuch good caution, that ſhe ſhould not have needed to oppoſe her late-gotten reputation, againſt thoſe that were more mighty than her ſelf. But ſhe was a Woman, and did what ſhe liſted. She ſent forth a greater Fleet than before, under Demetrius of Pharos; with the like ample commiſſion to take all that could be gotten. This Fleet divided it ſelf, and one part of it fell with (a) Dyrrachium, the other with Corcyra. Dyrrachium was almoſt ſurpriſed by the Illyrians; yet was it reſcued by the ſtout Citizens. In (b) Corcyra the Illyrians landed, waſted the Iſle, and beſieged the Town. Hereupon the Ætolians and Achæans were called in to help; who came, and were beaten in a fight at Sea: Loſing, beſides others of leſs note, Marcus Carynenſis, the Firſt Prætor of Achaia, whom Aratus ſucceeded. The Town of Corcyra, diſmayed with this overthrow, opened the Gates unto Demetrius Pharius, who took poſſeſſion of it with an Illyrian Garriſon: Sending the reſt of his Forces to Beſiege Dyrrachium. In the mean ſeaſon, Teuta was angry with her Captain Demetrius: I know not why; but ſo, as he reſolved to try any other courſe, rather than to truſt her.

The Romans were even ready to put to Sea, though uncertain which way to take, when advertiſment was brought to C. Fulvius the Conſul, of Demetrius his fear and diſcontent. Likely it was that ſuch an occaſion might greatly help to advance the buſineſs in hand. Wherefore the Conſul ſailed thither; where he found the Town of Corcyra ſo well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not only received him willingly, but delivered into his power the Illyrian Garriſon, and ſubmitted it ſelf unto the Roman protection.

After this good beginning, the Conſul ſailed along the Coaſt to (c) Apollonia; accompanied with Demetrius, whom he uſed henceforth as his Councellor and Guide. To Apollonia came alſo Poſthumus, the other Conſul, with the Land-Army, numbred at Twenty Thouſand Foot, and Two Thouſand Horſe. Thence they haſtened towards Dyrrachium, which the Illyrians had Beſieged; but upon news of the Roman Army they diſperſe themſelves. From thence the Romans enter Illyria, and take Parthenia; beat the Illyrians by Sea, take Twenty of their Ships, and enforce the Queen Teuta to forſake the Coaſt, and to cover her ſelf in Riſon far within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans haſte them homeward, and leave the beſt places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; another part ſtayes behind, and proſecutes the War, in ſuch ſort, that Teuta was forced to beg Peace; which ſhe obtained upon miſerable conditions; to wit, That ſhe ſhould quit the better part of Illyria, and pay Tribute for the reſt; and from thenceforth never ſend any of her Ships of War towards the Coaſts of Greece, beyond the Iſland of Liſſa: except it were ſome one or two Veſſels unarmed, and by way of Trade.

After this Illyrian War, the Romans ſent Embaſſadours into divers parts of Greece, ſignifying their love to their Country, and how, for good will thereunto, they had made War with good ſucceſs upon Teuta, and her People. They hoped, belike, that ſome diſtreſſed Cities would take this occaſion, to deſire their Patronage: Which if it hapned, they were wiſe enough to play their own games. But no ſuch matter fell out. The Embaſſadours were only rewarded with thanks, and a Decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforth might be partakers of the Iſthmian paſtimes. This was an idle courteſie, but well meant by the vain Greeks, and therefore well taken by the Romans: Who by this Illyrian expedition got nothing in Greece, ſave a little acquaintance, that ſhall be more hereafter.

SECT VIII.

Of the War between the Romans and Gauls, ſomewhat before the coming of Hannibal into Italy.

THe Gauls that dwelt in Lombardy were the next, againſt whom the Romans took Arms. Theſe were a populous Nation, and often moleſted Rome; ſomtimes with their own Forces, and ſometimes with the aſſiſtance of thoſe that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good, when they took Rome and burnt it: Though the iſſue of that War proved not anſwerable to the beginning, if we may give credit unto Roman Hiſtorians. In following times their ſucceſs was variable, and commonly bad. Many overthrows they received; and if they got any victory, it yielded them no profit, but was ſoon extorted out of their hands. They were indeed more fierce than well adviſed: lightly ſtirred up to War, and lightly giving over. At the firſt brunt, they were ſaid to be more then Men; but when that was paſt, leſs than Woman. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience, and knew how to handle them: Yet gave alwayes careful heed to their approach, were it only bruited. For the danger of them was ſudden, and uncertain; by reaſon of their neighbourhood and want of intelligence among them. Few of their attempts upon Rome were were called Wars, but Tumultus Gallici, Tumults of the Gauls: And rightly. For they gave many alarums to Italy, and used to rise with great Armies; but after a few days March, and sometimes before their setting forth, any small occasion served to disperse them. Having received an overthrow, they would rest Ten or Twelve Years, sometimes Twenty or Thirty: Till they were stirred up again, by younger heads, unacquainted with the danger. Whilst they rested, the State of Rome, that against these made only defensive War, had leisure to grow, by setting upon others. Herein God provided well for that Monarchy, which he intended to raise: That the Gauls never fell upon Italy with a mighty power, in the time of any other great and dangerous War. Had they attempted to Conquer it, whilst Pyrrhus was travelling in the same enterprize; or in either of the two former Punick Wars: It may be doubted what would have become of this Imperious City. But it seems that the Gauls had no better intelligence in the affairs of Italy, than strangers had in Gaule. At least, they knew not how to use their times: And were therefore like to smart, whensoever the Enemies, whom they had much provoked, and little hurt, should find leisure to visit them at their own home: which was now after the first Punick War. Once before this, the Romans had been bold, to set upon the Gauls in their own Countrey: And that was Three Years before the coming of Pyrrhus into Italy. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gauls, invading Hetruria, and Besieging Aretium, had won a great Battle, and slain L. Cælius, with the most of his Army. Manius Curius the new Consul, sent Embassadours to them, to treat about Ransom of Prisoners. But these Embassadours they slew. Therefore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it so well, that they expelled their Senones out of their Country, and sent a Colony of their own to inhabit it. This caused the (a) Boji, another People of Gaul, to fear the like measure: Who thereupon took Arms, and drew the Hetrurians to their side. But the Romans overthrew them in two great Battels; and thereby made them sue for Peace, which lasted until the end of this Illyrian War.

(a) There were divers Nations of the Boji, as in Pannonia, Illyria in Germany, in Bourbonois, in France, and in Aquitain; but these Boji were of French race, and dwelt at this time about the mouth of the River Po.

It vexed the Gauls to see a Roman Colony planted in their Countrey; who had been accustomed to enlarge their bounds, by driving out their Neighbours perforce. Wherefore they laboured with the Transalpines (so the Romans called those in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes, though to us they were neerer; like as they called Cisalpines, or by-hither the Alpes, those who dwelt between them and the Mountains) to draw them to their party: Reasonably presuming, that as their disjunction had caused their loss, so their union might recompence it, with large amends. But the business was so foolishly carryed, that the Cisalpines and Transalpines fell together by the ears, putting the Romans only to a Tumult, without further trouble of War. Soon after they were urged by a greater indignity to go more substantially to work. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome proposed a Decree, which was ratified by the People; That, besides one Colony already planted in the Territory of the Senones, as many more should be carried thither, as would serve to People the whole Countrey between Ancona and Ariminum: Exterminating utterly those Gauls. Such an offer were it made in England, concerning either Virginia, or Guiana it self, would not over-joy the Multitude. But the Commonalty of Rome took this in so good part, notwithstanding all danger joyned with the benefit, that Flaminius had ever after their good will.

This dreadful President extreamly displeased the Boji; who being neighbours to Ariminum, feared the like displantation. And because the rest of the Gauls had reason to resolve, that themselves also should be rooted out by degrees; the great Nation of the Insubrians, which inhabited the Dutchy of Milan, joyned with the Boji, and upon a common Purse entertained the Gessates, Nations about Rhodanus, wageable as the Switzers in these times. The Gessates having received a great impress, come to the Field under the conduct of their Kings Concolitanus and Anoroestus: Who with the Boji, and Insubrians, compound an Army of Fifty Thousand Foot, and Twenty Thousand Horse, and those of the best men, and best appointed, that ever invaded the Roman Territory; to whom the Senogalli, that had been beaten out of their possessions, gave a great increase of strength. On the contrary side, the Venetians, and the (b) Cenomanni, adhered to the Romans: As better believing in their prosperity and rising fortune. For fear of whose incursions therefore, the Gauls were forced to leave a good part of their Army, on the frontier of Milan: With the rest of their Forces they entred into Tuscane. The Romans hearing of this danger, send Æmilius to Rimine to stop their passage; and in the place of C. Atilius their other Consul, who then was in Sardinia, they imploy one of their Prætors, for the defence of Tuscane.

(b) Cenomanni are the People about Bergamo, on the North side of the River Po in Italy. There were also of these Cenomanni in France, and inhabited the Countrey of Main.

Being at this time greatly troubled with the consideration of this powerful Army, which the Gauls had assembled, they cause a view to be taken, as well of their own Forces, as those of their Allies: Who were no less willing than themselves, to oppose the incursions of the barbarous People; fearing, as they had cause, that their own destruction could not be prevented otherwise, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, found in this Muster, deserve to be recorded: Because they sent out the power of the Romans in those dayes. With the Consuls they sent forth to the War Four Legions of their own: Every Legion consisting of Five Thousand Two Hundred Foot, and Three Hundred Horse; and of their Allies Thirteen Thousand Foot, and Two Hundred Horse. There were also appointed for supplies (if any misadventure came to these) of the Sabines and Hetrurians Fifty Thousand Foot, and Four Thousand Horse, which Army was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria. Of the Umbri and Sarsinates, which inhabited the Apenines, there were Twenty Thousand; and of the Venetians and Cenomans, other Twenty Thousand: which latter Armies were directed to invade the Boji, that forcing them to defend their own Territories, the General Army of the Gauls should be thereby greatly diminished. There were besides these; to be ready against all uncertain chances of War, Thirty Thousand Foot, and Fifteen Hundred Horse, Garrison'd in Rome it self, of their own People; and of their Allies, Thirty Thousand Foot, and Two Thousand Horse. Over and above these great Troops; in the Roll of the Latines, that was sent unto the Senate, there were numbred Fourscore Thousand Foot, and Five Thousand Horse; in that of the Samnites, Seventy Thousand Foot, and of Horse Seven Thousand; in that of the (g) Japyges and Messapyges, Fifty Thousand Foot, and Sixteen Thousand Horse; the Lucans sent a List of Thirty Thousand foot, and Three Thousand Horse; the (h) Marsi, (i) Marusini, (k) Ferrentani, and the Vestini, of Twenty Thousand Foot, and Four Thousand Horse. The Romans had also Two Legions in Sicil, and about Tarentum, containing Eight Thousand Four Hundred Foot, and Four Hundred Horse. So as of the Romans Campanes joyntly, reckoning men Armed, and fit to bear Arms, there were Registered Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand Foot; and of Horse Three and Twenty Thousand: Of which, reckoning the Romans apart, there were an Hundred and Fifty Thousand Foot, and about Six Thousand Horse. Casting up the whole Forces of all the Provinces in Italy, both of the Romans and their Confederates, it amounted to Seven Hundred Thousand Foot, and Seventy Thousand Horse. But the number is somewhat mis-cast by Polybius; not with a purpose to inrich himself by the dead Payes; for where he reckons Nine Hundred Horse too many, he falls short Nine Thousand Two Hundred of the Foot.

How great soever this Muster was, it seems to have been like unto that, which Lodowick Sforza made, when Lewis the Twelfth invaded Milan: At what time, the better to encourage himself and his Subjects he took a Roll of all Persons able to bear Arms, within the Dutchy, though indeed he were never able to bring a Tenth part of them into the Field. Certain it is, that the Battels of Trebia, Thrasymene, and Cannæ, did not consume any such proportion, as was answerable to this large accompt. Yet were the Romans fain to Arm their Slaves, even for want of other Souldiers, after their overthrow at Canna. Wherefore the marvel is not great, that the Carthaginians and others were little terrified with report of such a Multitude. For all heads are not fit for Helmets: Though the Roman Citizens were, in general, as good fighting men, as elsewhere might be found.

Notwithstanding all these counter preparations, the Gauls keep on their way: And entring into Tuscane, destroy, and put to fire and Sword, all that lay before them. From thence they march directly towards Rome; hoping to find the Romans rather in deliberation, than in the Field. But their intelligence fails them. For the Roman Army, sent into Tuscane, having taken some other way than they did, and finding that it had missed of them, came again fast after them, to arrest them in their journey. Hereof when they heard the rumour, fearing to be charged on their backs, they turned head: And in the same evening discovered the Roman Army, by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of apparent necessity, that fight they must. Wherefore they helped themselves with a stratagem, that shewed no great fineness of Wit, but such as well beseemed those that had none other occupation than War; and stood them in good stead at the present. In the dead of the Night, they cause their Foot to march away, but not far, leaving their Horse in Guard; to whom they give order to come off at the first light of day, with such a speed, as might rather argue a running away, than a retreat; as if they had not dared to abide Battel. The Romans, interpreting this their hasty departure, as the Gauls desired they should, follow them in disorder. The Gauls return, charge them, and kill Six Thousand upon the place; the rest take a piece of ground of advantage, and defend themselves, till L. Æmilius, being at Ariminum, comes to their succour. Upon the coming of the Consul, the Gauls consult, whether they should give the Romans Battel, or forbear. In which dispute, Aneoreστus, one of their Kings, perswades them, rather to return into their own Countreys; where, after they had disposed of the great spoils and riches which they had gotten, they should then renew the War, being without carriage, pester or other impediment. This advice they all embrace; for, seeing they that were Mercenaries, had obtained what they came for, to wit, the spoils of their Enemies, they thought it wisdom, to hazard neither it, nor themselves any further.

This indeed had been a good resolution, if they had taken it, before the Enemy had been in sight. But as well in the Wars of these later Ages, as in former times, it hath ever been found extream dangerous to make a retreat in the Head of an Enemies Army. For although they that retire, do often turn head; yet in always going on from the pursuing Enemy, they find within few Miles, either Straight, Hedge, or Ditch, or place of disadvantage, which they are inforced to pass in disorder. In such cases, the Souldier knows it as well as the Captain, that he which forsakes the Field, perceives and fears some advantage of the Enemies. Fear, which is the betrayer of those succours that reason offereth, when it hath once possest the heart of man, it casteth thence both courage and understanding. They that make retreat, are alwayes in fear to be abandoned; they that lead the way, fear to be ingaged: And so the hindmost treads on his heels that is foremost, and consequently, all disband, run, and perish, if those that favour the retrait be not held to it by men of great courage. The miserable overthrow that the French received in Naples, in the Year 1503, upon a retreat made by the Marquess of Sal, doth testifie no less. For although a great Troop of French Horse sustained the pursuing Enemy a long time, and gave the Foot leasure to trot away; yet being retarded by often turnings, the Spanish Foot overtook and defeated them utterly. During the Wars between the Imperials and the French, Baisi and Mont were lost at Brignolles, who in a bravery would needs see the Enemy, before they left the Field. So was Strosi overthrown by the Marquess Marignan, because he could not be perswaded to dislodge the Night before the Marquess his arrival. Therefore did the French King Francis the First wisely: When without respect of point of honour, he dislodged from before Landersey, by Night, as many other the most advised Captains (not finding themselves in case to give Battel) have done. Je ne trouve point (saith the Marshal Monluc) aut fait des armes chose si difficile, qu'une retraitte; I find nothing in the Art of War so difficult as to make a safe retreat. A sure rule it is that there is less dishonour to dislodge in the dark, than to be beaten in the light. And hereof M. de la Noue gives this judgment of a days retreat, made in France, presently before the Battel at Moncountour. For (saith he) staying upon our reputation, in shew,

(g) Japyges and Messapyges seem to be one Nation; who are also called Salentines, Peuzecians, Apulians, and Calabrians. The Countrey is now Apulia, containing the Northermost head-land of Calabria.

(h) A people of the Kingdom of Naples.

(i) Ptolomy calls them a people of Italy.

not to dislodge by Night; we lost our reputation indeed, by dislodging by day: Whereby we were forced to fight upon our disadvantage, and to our ruine. And yet did that worthy Gentleman Count Lodowick of Nassau, Brother to the late famous Prince of Orange, make the retreat at Moncountour with so great resolution, as he saved the one half of the Protestant Army, then broken and disbanded; of which my self was an eye-witness, and was one of them that had cause to thank him for it.

Now the Gauls, embracing the safe advice (as they take it) of one of their Kings, turn their backs to the Enemy, and their faces homeward. Æmilius follows them as near as he can, without ingaging himself, attending his advantage. In the mean while, C. Atilius the other Consul, with the Legions of Sardinia, lands at Pisa; so as the Gauls inclosed between to Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally strengthen their Rear and Front. To sustain Æmilius, they appoint the Gessates, and the Milanois; in the Front they range the Piemontois, and the rest of the Gauls inhabiting upon the River of Po. The manner of the fight Polybius describeth at large: Which was well fought of all hands. But in the end the Gauls fell; and so did Atilius the Consul: Who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gauls, Concolitanus and Aneroestus; with Forty Thousand of their Vassals.

After this fatal overthrow, the Gauls lost courage; and, ere long, all that they held in Italy. For they were invaded the Year following this overthrow, by the new Consuls, Fulvius and Manlius. The Romans knew well how to use their Victory: They gave not Ten, Twenty, or Thirty Years time to the Gauls, to repair their Forces, as the Gauls had done to them. These new Consuls beat the Boji; but by reason of the great Rains that fell, and the great Pestilence that reigned, they were compelled for that present to surcease. In the Second Year, Furius and Flaminius invade the Milanois; and prevail very far, being strongly assisted by the Cenomanni and the Venetians. Nevertheless these Consuls were revoked out of their Province, by the Senate of Rome, and compelled to resign their Office; because the Augures, or Soothsayers, had found, that some token or other of the Birds (in which, and all sorts of their divination, the Romans were extreamly superstitious) had not only foreshewed little good, when they were chosen, but had also nullified the election. C. Flaminius, receiving Letters of this revocation from the Senate, and being otherwise advertised of the contents, was not hasty to open them: But first gave Battle unto the Enemies, vanquisht them, and spoiled their Countrey; then perused the Letters; and returning home obtained a Triumph, sore against the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the People, who yet bear him out, for that he sided in faction with the Commonalty, though a man of great Nobility.

This was that Flaminius, who had propounded the Decree, for dividing the Countrey of the Senones among the People of Rome. He was the first, or one of the first, that understanding the Majesty of Rome to be indeed wholly in the People, and no otherwise in the Senate, than by a way of Delegacy, or grand Commission; did not stand highly upon his Birth and Degree, but courted the Multitude, and taught them to know and use their power, over himself and his fellow Senators, in reforming their disorders. For this, the Commons highly esteemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the surer side, and found imitators, that rose by the same Art, which in process of time, grew the only or chief way to preferment.

Flaminius and his Colleague, being disposed, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio, were chosen Consuls, for the rest of that Year. The Gauls about this time desired Peace; and were like to have obtained it: Though the new Consuls were against it, as fearing to want work. But when Thirty Thousand of the Gessates following their King Britomarus, were come over the Alpes, and joyned with the Insubrians: All other discourse, than of present War, was at an end. So the Consuls hasted into their Province, where they Besieged Acerræ, a Town not far from Navarro (so far had the Romans pierced already in the Dutchy of Milan.) To divert them from this Siege, Britomarus sat down before Clastidium, a Town in the same Tract, with a great part of his Forces: Leaving the rest, with the Insubrians, to attend upon the Consuls at Acerræ; and to look to the defence of Milan. But this would not suffice, to make the Romans break up their Siege. Marcellus, taking with him the greatest part of the Horse, and Six Hundred Foot lightly Armed, thought to deal well enough with those at Clastidium. Britomarus heard of the Consuls coming, and met him upon the way: So suddenly, that the Romans had no leisure to rest themselves after their journey, but were compelled instantly to fight: Herein Britomarus had done well, if he had not forthwith, in a rash bravery, lost his Game at a cast. He had advantage enough in number; both of Horse and foot: But he thought so well of his own personal valour, that he rode out single before his Army, provoking any one to fight with him. Marcellus was no less daring, than the barbarous King: Whether more wise in this action, I will not dispute; he was more fortunate, and that sufficed to commend him. He slew and disarmed Britomarus, in the presence of both Armies: Whereby his own men took such courage, and his Enemies were so dismayed, that without much trouble of fight the Romans obtained a great Victory.

This was the Third and last time, that ever any Roman General slew the General of the Enemies, with his own hand. To this kind of Victory, belonged a peculiar Triumph; whereof only Romulus, Cossus, and this Marcellus, had the honour: Yet I dare say, that the Two Scipio's, and divers of the Roman Captains, especially Cæsar, were better men of War than any of these Three; though they never offered up to Jupiter, Opima spolia, The Armour of a General slain by themselves, when they were Generals, nor perhaps affected so to do.

After this Victory, Acerræ was yielded to the Romans; and Milan soon after: With all that belonged to the Cisalpines, or Gauls, that dwelt in Lombardie. Thus was that valiant and mighty Nation, that had so many Years vexed the State of Rome, and in former times taken the City it self, brought to nothing in a short time; their pleasant and fertile Territory possest by the Romans; and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting Italy, so many as would not subject their necks to the Roman yoke, either forced to abandon don their Countreys, or to hide themſelves in the cold and barren Mountains, like Outlawes and Thieves. And thus did the Romans ſpend the Three and Twenty Years following the Peace made with Carthage. In part of which time, they were at ſuch leiſure, that they cloſed up the Temple of Janus: Which they never did before, (it ſtanding alwayes open, when they had any War) ſave once in the Reign of Numa; nor in long time after, until the Reign of Auguſtus. But this their preſent happineſs was not to laſt long: A dangerous War, and perhaps the greateſt that had ever been, was to come unto their Gates; which being well ended, they might boldly undertake, to extend their Monarchy as far as their ambition could reach.

CHAP. III.

Of the Second Punick War.

SECT. I.

The Wars of Hannibal in Spain. Quarrels between the Romans and Carthaginians. Hannibal Beſiegeth and taketh Saguntum, whilſt the Romans are buſied with the Illyrians. War proclaimed between Rome and Carthage.

HANNIBAL, the Son of Amilcar, was about Six and Twenty Years old, when he was choſen General of the Carthaginian Forces in Spain. He was elected by the Army, as ſoon as Aſdrubal was dead: And the Election was ratified by the State of Carthage; wherewith Hanno and his Complices were nothing pleaſed. This was now the Third of the Barchine Family (ſo called of Amilcar, whoſe ſurname was Barcas) that had command in chief, over the men of War. Which honour would perhaps have been leſs envied by theſe Domeſtical Enemies, if the Allies and Friends of the Bachine Houſe, had not alſo born the whole ſway in Government, and been the only men regarded, both by the Senate and the People. This general good will, as it was firſt purchaſed by the moſt worthy deſerts of Amilcar in ſaving his Countrey from imminent ruine, inlarging the Dominion thereof, and inriching it with treaſures and great revenues; ſo was it retained, by the ſame good Arts, among his friends and followers. Hanno therefore, and his Partiſans, being neither able to tax the vertue of their Enemies, that was unreprovable; nor to perform the like ſervices unto the Common-weal; had nothing left whereby to value themſelves, excepting the general reprehenſion of War, and cautelous advice of not provoking the Romans. This they ſeaſoned other-whiles with detraction; ſaying, that the Barchine faction went about to oppreſs the liberty of the City. But their malicious words were unregarded; and if it were factious, to bear ill-will to Rome, then were all the Citizens (very few excepted) no leſs Barchine, than Hannibal himſelf. For it was long ſince apparent, that the Oath of the Romans, to the Articles of Peace, afforded no ſecurity to Carthage, were ſhe never ſo quiet, and officious; unleſs ſhe ſhould yield to become their ſubject. Since therefore the Peace was like to hold no longer, than until the Romans could find ſome good advantage, to renew the War: It was rather deſired by the Carthaginians, that whilſt their own eſtate was in good caſe, the War ſhould begin; than that in ſome unhappy time of Famin or Peſtilence, or after ſome great loſs of Army or Fleet, they ſhould be driven to yield unto the impudent demands of their Enemies; and to give away baſely their Lands and Treaſures, as they had lately done; or miſerably fight, upon terms of diſadvantage.

This diſpoſition of his Country-men, Hannibal well underſtood. Neither was he ignorant (for his Father, and other Friends, had long time deviſed of this buſineſs) that in making War with the Romans, it was no ſmall advantage to get the ſtart of them. If once he could bring an Army into Italy, without moleſtation; there was good hope that he ſhould find friends and aſſiſtance, even of thoſe People, that helped to increaſe the Roman Armies in foreign Wars. But this could never be effected, if the matter were openly diſputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginians, how glad ſoever they would be, to hear that he had ſet the War on foot, would nevertheleſs be ſlow and timorous, as commonly men are in the beginning of great enterpriſes, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which if it ſhould happen, then were the Romans like to be made acquainted, not only with the generalities of his purpoſe, but with ſuch particulars as muſt be diſcourſed of, in procuring allowance to his deſign. This might ſuffice to diſorder the whole Project. Wherefore, he reſolved to lay Siege unto Saguntum, which might ſeem not greatly to concern the Romans, and would highly pleaſe the Carthaginians, that had freſh in mind the indignity of that Spaniſh Towns alliance with her half Friends. So ſhould he aſſay both the patience of his Enemies, and the diſpoſition of his own Citizens.

Having

Having thus concluded, he nevertheleſs went fair and orderly to work: and beginning with thoſe that lay next in his way, approaching unto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (ſaith Livie) to give ſome colour to his proceedings: as if he had not principally intended the war againſt Saguntum, but had been drawn thither by courſe of buſineſs. Yet reaſon teacheth plainly, that without regard of ſuch formalities, it was needful to finiſh the conqueſt of the reſt, before he did any thing that ſhould provoke the Romans. Firſt therefore he entred upon the Territory of the [a] Olcades; and having beſieged Althæa (Livie called it Carteia) their chief City, he became, in a few days, Maſter not only thereof, but of all the other Towns of their Country. This Nation which he firſt undertook, being ſubdued, and the winter at hand, he reſted his Army in new Carthage, or Carthagena; and imparted liberally to the Souldiers, the ſpoils he had gotten in his late Conqueſt.

In the Spring following, he purſued the war againſt the [b] Vaccæi; and without any great difficulty, wan firſt Salmantica, now called Salamanca; and after it, [c] Arbucala, by aſſault: though not without a long ſiege, and great difficulty. But in his return, he was put to the height, both of his courage, and of his Martial Judgment. For all ſuch of the Vaccæi, as were able to bear arms, being made deſperate by the ſpoil of their Country, with thoſe of Salamanca, and of the Olcades, that had eſcaped in the late overthrow, joyning themſelves with the Toletans; compounded an Army of an hundred thouſand able men: and ſtayed Hannibal on the banks of the River Tagus, which runneth to the Sea by Lisbon in Portugal. Theſe four Nations, having had experience of Hannibals invincible courage, and that he never ſaw an enemy, upon whom he durſt not give charge; were throughly reſolved, that his natural valour would at this time no leſs neglect the cold advice of diſcretion, than at other times it had ſeemed to do, when the like great occaſion perſwaded him to uſe it. But he that makes himſelf a body of Cryſtal, that all men may look thorow him, and diſcern all the parts of his diſpoſition, makes himſelf (withal) an Aſs: and thereby teacheth others, either how to ride, or drive him. Wiſe men, though they have ſingle hearts in all that is juſt and vertuous; yet they are like Coffers with double bottoms: which when others look into, being opened, they ſee not all that they hold, on the ſudden, and at once. It is true, that this ſubtle Carthaginian, when he ſerved under Aſdrubal, was, of all the men of mark in the Army, the moſt adventurous: but that which may beſeem a Captain, or inferiour Commander, doth not always become a Chief; though it hath ſometime ſucceeded well with ſuch great-ones, as have been found more fortunate than wiſe. At this time, our great Man of war knew as well how to diſſemble his courage, as at other times to make it good. For he with-drew himſelf from the River-ſide, as if fearful to foord it; thereby to draw over that great multitude from their banks of advantage. The Spaniards, apprehending this in ſuch ſort, as Hannibal deſired that they ſhould thruſt themſelves in fury and diſorder, into the ſwift ſtream, with a purpoſe to charge the Charthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for fear) the defences on the contrary ſide. But when Hannibal ſaw them in their way, and well-near over; he turned back his Elephants to entertain them at their landing, and thruſt his Horſe-men, both above and beneath them, into the River. Theſe carrying a kind of Lance [illegible], ſharp at both ends, which they held in the midſt of the [illegible], had ſuch an advantage over the foot, that were in the River, under their ſtrokes, clattered together, and unable to move or ſhift their bodies, as on firm ground, that they ſlew all thoſe (in a manner) without reſiſtance, which were already entered into the water; and purſued the reſt, that fled like men amazed; with ſo great a ſlaughter, as from that day forward, there was not any Spaniard, on that ſide the River of Iberus, (the Saguntines excepted) that had the daring to lift up their hands againſt the Carthaginians.

The Saguntines perceiving the danger towards them, cryed before they were hurt. They ſent Embaſſadours to Rome, and bemoaned themſelves, as likely to ſuffer that, which afterwards they ſuffered indeed; only becauſe of their alliance and friendſhip with this honourable City, which the Carthaginians hated. This tale moved the Senate, but much more a report, that Saguntum was already beſieged. Hereupon ſome cry out, that War ſhould be proclaimed by Land and Sea; as alſo that the two Conſuls ſhould be ſent with Armies, the one into Spain, the other into Africk. But others went more Roman-like to work, and carried it. So it was only concluded; that Embaſſadours ſhould be ſent into Spain, to view the ſtate of their confederates: which were indeed none other than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended war againſt Rome, it was likely that he ſhould give them, ere it were long, a more plauſible occaſion to take Arms againſt him: if he had no ſuch purpoſe, yet would it be in their power to determine what they liſted themſelves, upon the report of theſe Embaſſadours; and this their gravity, in being not too raſh at firſt, would ſerve to countenance their following Decree. Of theſe Embaſſadours Livie reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum, but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage, where alſo they were not regarded, nor heard. But Polybius an Hiſtorian of ſincerity leſs queſtionable, tells, that they found him at Carthagena, and had conference with him, though ſuch as left them doubtful. This is more agreeable to the reſt of Hannibal his whole courſe. And ſurely we might wonder, why the Carthaginians ſhould afterwards admit a more peremptory Embaſſage (as Livie confeſſeth) and fall to diſputation about the covenants of Peace; if they had rejected that which was ſent, upon none other pretence than prevention of war.

Whileſt the Embaſſadours paſſed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not only his forces, but ſome Roman pretences, againſt Saguntum. He found out Mamertines, or people that ſhould do as the Mamertines in Sicily had done for the Romans; and implore his help againſt the Saguntines. Theſe were the Turdetani, a Nation adjoyning to Saguntum, and having many quarrels with them (as happens commonly among neighbours) of which, Hannibal himſelf hatched ſome. Finding therefore ſuch an occaſion, whatſoever it was, as made him able to ſay, that the Saguntines had firſt provoked him ere he medled with them; he made no more ado, but ſate down with his whole power before their Town. He was now more ſecure, than he had formerly been of his own Citizens: for that they had not entertained the Roman Embaſſadours, with any trembling reverence, as of late years they had been wont. Nevertheleſs, he was glad of any handſome colour, to ſhadow his actions:

[a] A people (ſaith Stephanus) near the River of Ibro, but in the old deſcription of Spain in Ortelius, they are found near Tagus, and by Suidas, not far from New Carthage.
[b] A people on Caſtile the Old.
[c] Albucala, or Albricala, an in-land City of the Vaccæi in Aragon.

not only becauſe the War, which he ſo much deſired, was not proclaimed; but that he might not be checked in his courſe, as an open enemy, before he could ſet foot in Italy. The Romans had the like, though contrary deſire. They were glad of the quarrel; as hoping that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, ſhould thereby in ſhort ſpace become their own. Yet were they not haſty to threaten, before they were ready to ſtrike; but meant to temporize, until they had an Army in readineſs to be ſent into Spain, where they thought to make Saguntum, the ſeat of the War.

In the mean while, Demetrius Pharius, whom the Romans had made King over a great part of Illyria, rebelled againſt them: either for that he found himſelf over-ſtraitly tyed up by them, with hard conditions; or rather becauſe he was of an unthankful diſpoſition. The commotion of the Gauls, and afterward the fame of the Carthaginian war, emboldened him to deſpiſe his Benefactors and Patrons: whom he ought to have defended and aided, in all perils, even with the hazard of his whole eſtate, which he had received of their gift. But he was a Traitor to his own Queen; and therefore dealt according to his kind, with thoſe that had rewarded him for being ſuch. Firſt, he built ſhips, and ſpoiled the Iſles of Greece; againſt the covenants to which he was bound. Then he adventured further, and ſeized upon ſome places, that the Romans kept in their own hands. If he had begun ſooner, or rather if he had ſtayed ſomewhat longer, he might have ſped better. For the buſineſs with the Gauls was ended; with Hannibal, not throughly begun, when he declared himſelf by his doings, an enemy, and was vanquiſhed. The Roman Conſul, Æmilius, was ſent againſt him: who in ſeven daies wan the ſtrong Town of Dimalum; and thereby brought ſuch terrour upon the Country round about, that Embaſſadours were ſent from all places, to yield themſelves, without putting him to further paine. Only the City of Pharus, in which Demetrius lay, prepared to reſiſt: which he might have done long, if the hot-headed Rebel had not been too fooliſh. Æmilius Landed a great part of his Army in the Iſle of Pharus, by night; and beſtowed them in covert, preſenting himſelf the next morning with twenty ſhips before the Town, and offering to force the Haven. Demetrius with all his power iſſued out againſt the Conſul, and was ſoon intercluded from the Town, by thoſe that lay in ambuſh. Wherefore he fled away through by-paths to a Greek, where he had ſhipping ready for him, and imbarqued himſelf: leaving all his eſtate unto them, of whoſe liberality he firſt had it.

This buſineſs, though it were ſoon diſpatched, yet prevented it not the ſiege of Saguntum; before which Hannibal ſate down, ere Æmilius was Landed in Illyria. In the beginning of the ſiege, the Carthaginians were much diſcouraged, by reaſon of the brave ſallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their General received a dangerous wound in the thigh, that cauſed him to lie many daies unable to move. Nevertheleſs, he was not unmindful of his work in the mean while; but gave order to raiſe certain movable Towers, that might equal thoſe which were built on the walls of the City; and to prepare to batter the curtains, and make a breach. Theſe being finiſhed and applied, had ſoon wrought their effect. A great and large breach was made, by the fall of divers Towers, and a great length of wall; whereat an hot aſſault was given: but it was ſo well ſuſtained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not only beaten from the breach, and out of ſome ground within the Town, which upon the firſt fury they had won; but they were purſued even to their own trenches and camp. Nevertheleſs the Carthaginian Army, wherein were about an hundred and fifty thouſand men, did ſo weary the Townſ-men with continual travel, that at length it got within the walls; and was only hindred from taking full poſſeſſion of the City, by ſome counter-works of the Saguntines, that were alſo ready to be won. In this extremity, there was one Alcon a Saguntine, that conveyed himſelf out of the Town, to treat with Hannibal for ſome accord. But the conditions which the Carthaginian offered were ſo ſevere, and without all compaſs of honour, as Alcon durſt not return to propound them to his Country-men. For Hannibal demanded all that they had, gold, ſilver, plate, and other riches within the City: yea, the City it ſelf to be abandoned by the Citizens; promiſing, that he would aſſign ſome other place for their habitation: not allowing them to carry out with them any other thing, wherewith to ſuſtain themſelves, than the cloaths on their backs; or other arms, to defend them, than their nails and teeth. Yet might they far better have ſubmitted themſelves unto this miſerable appointment, (ſeeing thereby they might have enjoyed their lives, and ſaved the honour of their wives and daughters) than to have reſted at the diſcretion of the Conquerour, as ſoon after they did: by whom their wives and daughters were deflowred before their own faces; and all put to the ſword, that were above fourteen years of age. For it was a poor comfort, which a great number of them took; when not daring to fight, and ſell their blood at the deareſt rate, they ſhut themſelves up like moſt wretched creatures in their own houſes, and therein burnt themſelves with all that they had: ſo dying unrevenged. The treaſures found in Saguntum, which were very great, Hannibal kept wherewith to pay his Army: the ſlaves and other booty, he divided among his Souldiers, reſerving ſome things of choice, wherewith to preſent his friends at Carthage, and to animate them unto the War.

Theſe tydings exceedingly vexed the Romans, who had good cauſe to be angry at their own ſlowneſs, in ſorbearing to ſend help unto the Saguntines, that held out eight months, looking ſtill for ſuccour, but in vain. Wherefore they determined to repair their honour, by taking ſharp revenge. To this end they ſent Embaſſadours again to Carthage: demanding only, Whether it were by general conſent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that Hannibal had made war upon Saguntum: which if they granted (as it ſeemed they would) then to give them defiance. Hereunto anſwer was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect; That this their ſecond Embaſſage, howſoever qualified with mild words, was indeed more inſolent than the former. For in that, they only required juſtice againſt Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Common-Wealth of Carthage, was urged to plead guilty, or not guilty. But (ſaid the Carthaginian ſpeaker) whether the General of our Army in Spain, in beſieging Saguntum, have only followed his own counſel; or whether he did it, by direction from us: it is not the queſtion which the Romans ought to ask us. That which is indeed worthy examination or diſpute, is; Whether it were lawful or unlawful for Hannibal to do as he hath done. For it belong to us, to call our own Commanders in queſtion, and to puniſh them according to their faults and errours; to you, to challenge us, if we have done any thing contrary to our late League and contract. It is true, that in our negotiation with Luctatius the Conſul, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended: but the Saguntines were not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no diſpute. As touching the laſt agreement between you and Aſdrubal, wherein you will ſay that the Saguntines were comprehended by name; it is you that have taught us how to anſwer that particular. For whatſoever you found in the Treaty between us and Luctatius, to your own diſadvantage, you caſt it upon your Conſuls preſumption as promiſing thoſe things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and people of Rome. If then it be lawful for the Romans, to diſavow the actions of their Conſuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punctual and preciſe warrant; the ſame liberty may we alſo aſſume, and hold our ſelves no way bound in honour to perform thoſe bargains which Aſdrubal hath made for us, without our commandment and conſent.

This was an impertinent anſwer, and little better than a meer cavil. For Luctatius the Conſul, in his Treaty of Peace with the Carthaginians, had expreſly referred the allowance thereof to the people of Rome. It had been therefore much better to have dealt plainly, and to have alledged, That after this League was made and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the Iſle of Sardinia, and withal of twelve hundred talents: which perjury the State of Carthage, being now grown able, would revenge with open War. As for the Saguntines, it little skilled that the Romans had admitted them into confederacy, and forthwith inſerted their names into the Treaty of Peace with Aſdrubal: ſeeing that the Treaty with Aſdrubal, and all other buſineſs between Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of Peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better than Roman injuries, as implying this commination, Do whatſoever we require; elſe will we make War, without regard of our Oath, which we have already broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alledge, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polybius takes it) the beſt of their Plea. Yet ſince Livie himſelf doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the ſpirit of Amilcar with deſire of revenge: we may reaſonably think, that the mention of this injury was omitted, not ſo much upon forgetfulneſs, as for that it was not thought convenient, by ripping up ſuch ancient matter of quarrel, to ſhew that the war, now towards, had long been thought upon, and like to be made with extraordinary force, in other manner than heretofore. In concluſion, the Carthaginian Senate moved the Roman Embaſſadours, to deliver unto them in plain terms the purpoſes of thoſe that ſent them, and the worſt of that, which they had long determinated againſt them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iberus; thoſe were but their pretences. Whereupon Q. Fabius gathering up the skirt of his Gown, as if ſomewhat had been laid in the hollow thereof, made this ſhort reply: I have here (quoth he) in my Gown-skirt both Peace and War: make you (my Maſters of the Senate) election of theſe two, which of them you like beſt, and purpoſe to embrace. Hereat all cryed out at once; Even which of them you your ſelf have a fancy to offer us. Marry then (quoth Fabius) take the War, and ſhare it among you: Which the aſſembly willingly accepted.

This was plain dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had reſolved to make War, it was meerly frivolous. For all theſe diſputes of breach of Peace, have ever been maintained by the party unwilling, or unable to ſuſtain the War. The ruſty ſword, and the empty purſe, do alwaies plead performance of Covenants. There have been few Kings or States in the World, that have otherwiſe underſtood the obligation of a Treaty, than with the condition of their own advantage: and commonly (ſeeing Peace between ambitious Princes and States, is but a kind of breathing) the beſt adviſed have rather begun with the ſword, than with the trumpet. So dealt the Arragonois with the French in Naples; Henry the ſecond of France, with the Imperials, when he wrote to Briſac, to ſurpriſe as many places as he could, ere the War brake out; Don John, with the Netherlands; and Philip the ſecond of Spain, with the Engliſh, when in the great Imbarge he took all our ſhips and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, beſides the preſent ſtrength of Carthage, and the common feeling of injuries received from theſe enemies, had another private and hereditary deſire, that violently carried him againſt the Romans. His Father Amilcar, at what time he did ſacrifice, being ready to take his journey into Spain, had ſolemnly bound him by Oath, to purſue them with immortal hatred, and to work them all poſſible miſchief, as ſoon as he ſhould be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine years old, when his Father cauſed him to lay his hand upon the Altar, and make this vow: ſo that it was no marvel if the impreſſion were ſtrong in him.

That it is inhumane, to bequeath hatred in this ſort, as it were by Legacy, it cannot be denyed. Yet for mine own part, I do not much doubt, but that ſome of thoſe Kings, with whom we are now in peace, have received the like charge of their Predeceſſors, that as ſoon as their Coffers ſhall be full, they ſhall declare themſelves enemies to the people of England.

SECT. II.

Hannibal takes order for the defence of Spain, and Africk. His Journey into Italy.

WAR being thus proclaimed, Hannibal reſolved not to put up his ſword which he had drawn againſt the Saguntines, until he had therewith opened his paſſage unto the gates of Rome. So began the ſecond Punick War; ſecond to none that ever the Senate and people of Rome ſuſtained. Hannibal wintred at Carthagena; where he licenſed his Spaniſh Souldiers to viſit their friends, and refreſh themſelves againſt the Spring. In the mean while he gave inſtructions to his Brother Aſdrubal for the Government of Spain in his abſence. He alſo took order, to ſend a great many Troops of Spaniards into Africk, to equal the number of Africans formerly drawn thence into Spain; to the end, that ſo the one Nation might remain as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, he tranſported into Africk thirteen thouſand, eight hundred and fifty foot, and twelve hundred horſe; alſo eight hundred ſlingers of the [a] Beleares. Beſides theſe, he ſelected four thouſand foot, all young men, and of quality, out of the beſt Cities of Spain; which he appointed to be gariſoned in Carthage it ſelf, not ſo much in regard of their forces, as that they might ſerve for hoſtages: for among thoſe four thouſand, the beſt of the Spaniſh Citizens, and thoſe that ſwayed moſt in their ſeveral States, had their Sons or Kinſmen. He alſo left with his Brother, to guard the Coaſts and Ports, fifty and ſeven Gallies; whereof thirty ſeven were preſently armed, and appointed for the war. Of Africans and other Nations, ſtrangers, he left with him above twelve thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe, beſides one and twenty Elephants.

[a] Majorca, & Minorca.

Having in this ſort taken order for the defence of Spain and Africk; he ſent diſcoverers before him, to view the Paſſages of the Pyrenæan Mountains, and of the Alps. He alſo ſent Embaſſadours to the Mountainers of the Pyrenes, and to the Gauls, to obtain a quiet paſſage: that he might bring his Army entire into Italy, and not be compelled to diminiſh his force, by any War in the way, till he came to encounter the Romans. His Embaſſadours and Diſcoverers being returned with good ſatisfaction; in the beginning of the Spring, he paſt over the River of Iberus, with an Army conſiſting of fourſcore and ten thouſand foot, and twelve thouſand horſe. All thoſe parts of Spain into which he had not entred before, he now ſubdued: and appointed Hanno (not that old enemy of his houſe, who ſate ſtill at Carthage) to govern Spain on the Eaſt ſide of Iberus; to whom he left an Army of ten thouſand foot, and one thouſand horſe. Being arrived at the borders of Spain, ſome of his Spaniſh Souldiers returned home without asking leave, which that others might not alſo do, or attempt, he courteouſly diſmiſſed many more that ſeemed willing to be gone. Hereby it came to paſs, that the Journey ſeemed the leſs tedious unto thoſe that accompanied him, as being not enforced by compulſion. With the reſt of his Army, conſiſting now but of fifty thouſand foot, and nine thouſand horſe, he paſt the Pyrenes, and entred into Gaul. He found the Gauls that bordered upon Spain, ready in Arms to forbid his entrance into their Countrey; but won them with gentle ſpeech, and rich preſents that he beſtowed upon their Leaders, to favour his Expedition. So without any moleſtation, he came to the bank of Rhodanus; where dwelt, on each ſide of the River a people called Volcæ, Theſe were unacquainted with the cauſe of his coming; and therefore ſought to keep him from paſſing over the water. But he was greatly aſſiſted by ſome of thoſe Gauls, that inhabited on the Weſt ſide of Rhodanus, to wit, by thoſe of Vivaretz and Lyonnois. For although many of them had tranſported themſelves and their goods, into the Countrey of Dauphiné, thinking to defend the further bank againſt him: yet ſuch as remained, being very deſirous to free their Countrey of ſo many ill gueſts, were better pleaſed to have their Countrey-men well beaten, which had abandoned them, than to have their own ſtore of corn and cattel waſted, by the long ſtay of ſo great an Army, as lay upon them. For which reaſon, they helped him to make boats; informed him of another more eaſie paſſage, higher up the River; and lent him Guides. When the Veſſels for tranſportation of his Army were in readineſs; he ſent Hanno, the ſon of Bomilcar, up the River; himſelf in the mean while making countenance to enter the Foord below. The end of this labour, was, that Hanno charging the Gauls unawares upon their own ſide, and Hannibal, at the ſame time, paſſing the River in their faces, the further bank was won, though with ſome difficulty; and the enemies diſperſed. Yet was he greatly troubled in conveying over his Elephants; who marvellouſly feared the water. He was therefore driven to make raffs of trees, and cover them with Earth and Turf; whereof he faſtened one to each bank, that might ſerve as a bridge, to and from another of the ſame ſort, but looſe, upon which the beaſts were towed over.

Having paſt this firſt brunt, and overcome both the rage of the River, and of thoſe that defended it, he was viſited by the Princes of the Gauls Ciſalpines, that inhabited Piemont and Milan, who lately had revolted from the Romans. Theſe informed him of the paſſages of the Alps; that they were not ſo difficult, as common report made them; and from theſe he received Guides, with many other encouragements. All which notwithſtanding, he found himſelf extreamly incumbred by the Savoyans; and loſt, both of his carriages, and of his Carthaginians, more than willingly he would, or had formerly thought that he ſhould. For he was twice mainly aſſailed by them, before he could recover the plain Countreys on the other ſide. And whereas his Journey over the Mountains coſt him fifteen days travel, he was every day, more or leſs, not only charged by thoſe Mountainers, but withal extreamly beaten with grievous weather and ſnow: it being the beginning of Winter, when he began, and overcame this paſſage. But the fair and fertile Plains, which were now ready to receive them; with the aſſiſtance and conduct of the Ciſalpine Gauls who by their proper forces had ſo often invaded the Roman Teritory; gave them great comfort and encouragement to go on: having nothing elſe of difficulty remaining, but that which from the beginning they made accompt to overcome, by their proper valour and reſolution; namely, the Roman Armies, and reſiſtance.

SECT. III.

How the Romans in vain ſolicited the Spaniards and Gauls to take their part. The Rebellion of the Ciſalpine-Gauls againſt the Romans.

THE Countries of Spain and Gaul, through which the Carthaginians marched thus far, had been ſolicited before, by the ſame Roman Embaſſadours, who had denounced the war at Carthage. Theſe, as they were inſtructed by the Senate, took Spain in their way, home-ward from Carthage, with a purpoſe to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at leaſt to diſſwade them from contracting any friendſhip with the Carthaginians. The firſt which they attempted were the Volcians, a people in Spain from whom, in open aſſembly, they received by one that ſpake for the reſt, this uncomfortable anſwer: With what face (ſaith he) can ye Romans perſwade us to value your Alliance, or to prefer it before the friendſhip of the Carthaginians; ſeeing we are taught by the example of the Saguntines, to be more wiſe than ſo? For they, relying on your faith and promiſed aſſiſtance, have have been utterly rooted out, and destroyed by the Carthaginians; whom they might else have held their assured friends, and good neighbours, as we, and other the people of Spain have found them. Ye may therefore be gone, with this resolution from us, That for our parts (and so I think, I may answer for the rest of our Country-men) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindness at our hands; who are resolved, never to make account of their protection, nor amity. From the Volcians, the Embassadours took their way towards the Gauls; using their best arguments to perswade them not to suffer the Carthaginians to pass into Italy thorow their Territory: and withal greatly glorifying themselves, their strength, and large Dominion. But the Gauls laught them to scorn, and had hardly the patience to hear them speak. For shall we (said one of their Princes) by resisting Hannibals passage into Italy, entertain a war which is not meant to be made against us? Shall we hold the war among our selves, and in our own Territory, by force which marcheth with a speedy pace from us, toward our ancient enemies? Have the Romans deserved so well of us, and the Carthaginians so ill, that we should set fire on our own houses, to save theirs from burning? No, we know it well, that the Romans have already forced some Nations of ours, out of their proper Territory and inheritance: and constrained others, as free as themselves, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthaginians our enemies, who have no way as yet offended us, nor we them.

With this unpleasing answer the Embassadours returned home, carrying no good news, of friends likely to help them; but rather some assurance from the people of Massilia, which were confederates with Rome, that the Gauls were determined to take part with their enemy. Of this inclination, the Cisalpine-Gauls gave hasty proof. For when the news was brought into Italy, that the Carthaginians had passed Iberus, and were on the way towards Rome; this alone sufficed to stir up the Boji, and Insubrians, against the Romans. These people were lately offended at the plantation of new Roman Colonies, at Cremona, and Placentia, within their Territories. Relying therefore upon the Carthaginian succour, which they supposed to be now at hand; they laid aside all regard of those hostages, which they had given to the Romans, and fell upon the new Colonies. The Towns it seems they could not win; for Hannibal shortly after failed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commissioners (who belike were abroad in the Country) to fly to Modena: where they besieged them. The siege of Modena had continued some small time; when the Gauls, having little skill in assaulting Cities, waxed weary, and seemed desirous to have peace, and to come to some good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpose, to draw on some meeting; that they might therein lay hand upon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeem their Hostages in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their wish. For the Romans sent out Embassadours to treat with them, and to conclude a Peace; whom they detained. Manlius the Prætor, who lay in these quarters with an Army, hearing this outrage, marched in all haste, to the relief of the besieged. But the Gauls, having laid a strong ambush in a wood joyning to the way, fell upon he Prætor soopportunely, as he was utterly overthrown, and all his followers left dead in the place, a few excepted, that recovered by fast running to a little village, but defensible; upon the River of Po. When this was heard at Rome, C. Atilius, another of the Prætors, was hastily sent to relieve the besieged with a Legion, and five thousand of the Roman associates: which forces were taken out of the Consuls Army, and supplyed by a new levy.

As the Gauls were too rash and hasty, so were the Romans too slow, and indeed too ill-advised, in the beginning of this war. They were not perswaded that Carthage, which had almost servilely endured so many indignities in time of the late peace; would be so brave and couragious, on the sudden, as to attempt the conquest of Italy it self. Wherefore they appointed one of their Consuls to make war in Spain, the other in Africk: resting secure of all danger at home. Titus Sempronius took his way toward Africk, with an hundred and sixty Quinqueremes, or Gallies of five to an Oar, which preparation may seem to threaten even the City of Carthage, to which it shall not come near. P. Cornelius Scipio, the other Consul, made all possible haste, by the way of Genoa, into Provence; and used such diligence, having the wind also favourable, as in five days he recovered Massilia. There he was advertised of Hannibal his having passed the River of Rhodanus, whom he thought to have found busie yet a while in Spain. Hannibal had also news of the Consuls arrival: whereof he was neither, glad nor sorry, as not meaning to have to do with him. Each of them sent forth Scouts to discover the others number and doings: Hannibal, about five hundred Numidians; Scipio, three hundred of his better appointed Roman horse. These met and fought, and the Numidians were beaten: yet could not the Romans greatly brag, having slain only two hundred, and lost of their own, one hundred and forty. But when Scipio drew near, to have met with the Carthaginians; he found, that they were gone three days before; and that (as he then found assuredly true) with an intent to look upon the walls of Rome. This interrupted his intended Voyage into Spain. Nevertheless he sent away thither his Brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greatest part of his Fleet and Army, to try what might be done against Asdrubal, and the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in the Country. He himself, taking with him a few choice bands, returned by Sea, to Pisa; and so passing thorow Tuscane into Lombardie, drew together the broken troops of Manlius and Atilius that lately had been beaten by the Gauls: with which forces he made head against the enemy, thinking to find him over-laboured, with travel of his painful Journey.

SECT. IV.

Scipio the Roman Consul overcome by Hannibal at Ticinum. Both of the Roman Consuls beaten by Hannibal, in a great battel at Trebia.

FIve Months Hannibal had spent in his tedious Journey from Carthagena; what great muster he could make, when he had passed the Alps, it is not easily found. Some reckon his foot, at an hundred thousand, and his horse at twenty thousand; others report them to have been only twenty thousand foot and six hundred horse. Hannibal himself in his monument which he raised, in the Temple

Temple of Juno Lacinia, agreeth with the latter ſumm. Yet the Gaules, Ligurians, and others that joyned with him, are likely to have mightily increaſed his Army, in ſhort ſpace. But when he marched Eaſtward from the Banks of Rhodanus, he had with him eight and thirty thouſand foot, and eight thouſand horſe; of which, all ſave thoſe remembred by himſelf in the Inſcription of his Altar in Juno's Temple, are like to have periſhed by diſeaſes, enemies, Rivers and Mountains; which miſchiefs had devoured, each their ſeveral ſhares.

Having newly paſſed the Alpes, and ſcarce refreſhed his wearied Army in the Country of Piemont; he ſought to win the friendſhip of the [a] Taurini, who lay next in his way. But the Taurini held war at that time with the Inſubrians, which were his good friends; and refuſed (perhaps for the ſame cauſe) his amity. Wherefore he aſſaulted their Town; and wan it by force in three daies. Their ſpoil ſerved well to hearten his Army; and their calamity, to terrifie the Neighbour places. So the Gauls, without more ado, fell unto his ſide: many for fear, many alſo for good-will, according to their former inclination. This diſpoſition ran thorow the whole Country: which joyned, or was all in readineſs to joyn with the Carthaginians; when the news of Scipio the Conſul his arrival, made ſome to be more adviſed than the reſt. The name of the Romans was terrible in thoſe quarters; what was in the Carthaginians, experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Roman Conſul was already gotten throrow the moſt defenſible paſſages, ere any ſpeech had been heard of his approach; many ſate ſtill for very fear, who elſe would fain have concluded a League with theſe newcome friends; and ſome, for greater fear, offered their ſervice againſt the Carthaginians, whom nevertheleſs they had wiſhed well to ſpeed.

[a] Theſe dwelt about Turine, a goodly City, now ſubject unto the Duke of Savoy: which from them took the name of Auguſta Taurinorum.

This wavering affection of the Provinces, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generals haſten to the tryal of a battel. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Pavia; where each of them wondred at the others expedition: Hannibal thinking it ſtrange that the Conſul, whom he had left behind him on the other ſide of the Alpes, could meet him in the face, before he had well warmed himſelf in the Plains; Scipio admiring the ſtrange adventure of paſſing thoſe Mountains, and the great ſpirit of his Enemy. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed at Hannibals ſucceſs, and ſudden arrival. Wherefore they diſpatched a Meſſenger in all haſt unto Sempronius, the other Conſul, that was then in Sicily, giving him to underſtand hereof: and letting him further know, that whereas he had been directed to make the war in Africa, it was now their pleaſure that he ſhould forbear to proſecute any ſuch attempt, but that he ſhould return the Army under his charge, with all poſſible ſpeed, to ſave Italy it ſelf. According to this order, Sempronius ſent off his Fleet from Lilybæum; with direction to Land the Army at Ariminum, a Port Town not far from Ravenna: quite another way from Carthage, whither he was making haſt. In the mean while, Scipio and Hannibal were come ſo near, that fight they muſt, ere they could part aſunder. Hereupon both of them prepared the minds of their Souldiers, by the beſt arguments they had: unto which Hannibal added the Rhetorick of a preſent example, that he ſhewed upon certain priſoners of the Savoians, which he brought along with him, fitted for the purpoſe, into Italy. For theſe, having been no leſs miſerably fettered and chained, than ſparingly fed; and withal ſo often ſcourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their deſire, than to be delivered from their miſeries by any kind of preſent death, were brought into the middle of the Army: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with ſome other of his Companions, till the one of them were ſlain, with condition, being the Victor, to receive his liberty, and ſome ſmall reward. This was no ſooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cauſe lots to be caſt, which of them ſhould enter the Liſt, with ſuch weapons, as the Chieftains of the Gauls were wont to uſe in ſingle combats. Every one of thoſe unhappy men wiſhed, that his own lot might ſpeed; whereby it ſhould at leaſt be his good fortune, to end his miſeries by death, if not to get a reward by Victory. That couple, whoſe good hap it was to be choſen, fought reſolvedly: as rather deſiring, than fearing death; and having none other hope, than in vanquiſhing. Thus were ſome few couples matched, it skilled not how equally: for all theſe poor creatures were willing, upon whatſoever uneven terms, to rid themſelves out of ſlavery. The ſame affection that was in theſe Combatants, and in their fellows which beheld them, wrought alſo upon the Carthaginians, for whom the ſpectacle was ordained. For they deemed happy, not only him, that by winning the Victory had gotten his liberty, together with an horſe and armour: but even him alſo, who being ſlain in fight, had eſcaped that miſerable condition, unto which his Companions were returned. Their General perceiving what impreſſion this dumb ſhew had wrought in them, began to admoniſh them of their own condition, ſpeaking to this effect: That he had laid before them an example of their own eſtates: ſeeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to run the ſame fortune, that theſe ſlaves had done; all to live victorious and rich; or all to die, or (which theſe priſoners eſteemed far more grievous) to live in a perpetual ſlavery: That none of them all, in whom was common ſenſe, could promiſe to himſelf any hope of life by flight; ſince the Mountains, the Rivers, the great diſtance from their own Countries, and the purſuit of mercileſs Enemies, muſt needs retrench all ſuch impotent imaginations. He therefore prayed them to remember, that they, who had even now praiſed the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquiſhed, would make it their own caſe; ſeeing that there was never any in the world, appointed with ſuch a reſolution, that had ever been broken, or beaten by their enemies. On the contrary, he told them that the Romans, who were to fight upon their own ſoil, and in view of their own Towns; who knew as many waies to ſave themſelves by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight withal, could no way entertain ſuch a reſolution as theirs: ſeeing the ſame Neceſſity, (to which nothing ſeems impoſſible) did no way preſs them, or conſtrain them. In this ſort did Hannibal, with one ſubſtantial Argument, That there was no mean between Victory and Death, encourage his Companions. For (ſaith a great Captain of France) La commodite de la retraitte advance la fuite; The commodity of a retrait, doth greatly advance a flat running away.

Scipio on the other ſide, after that he had given order for the laying of a bridge over the River of Ticinus, did not neglect to uſe the beſt arguments and reaſons he could, to encourage the Army he led: putting them in mind of the great conqueſts and and victories of their Anceſtors; againſt how many Nations they had prevailed; and over how many Princes, their Enemies, they had triumphed. As for this Army commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late war they had ſo often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet he prayed them withal to conſider, that at this time it was not only ſo diminiſhed in numbers, as it rather ſeemed a Troop of Brigants and Thieves, than an Army likely to encounter the Romans, but ſo weather-beaten, and ſtarved, as neither the men, nor horſes, had ſtrength or courage to ſuſtain the firſt charge that ſhould be given upon them. Nay (ſaid he) ye your ſelves may make judgement what daring they have now remaining, after ſo many travels and miſeries; ſeeing when they were in their beſt ſtrength, after they had paſt the Roan, their horſemen were not only beaten by ours, and driven back to the very Trenches of their Camp, but Hannibal himſelf, fearing our approach, ran headlong towards the Alps: thinking it a leſs diſhonour, to die there by froſt, famine, and precipitation, than by the ſharp ſwords of the Romans, which had ſo often cut down his people, both in Africa, and in Sicily. It was not long after this, ere the two Generals met: each being ſan advanced before the groſs of his Army, with his Horſe; and the Roman having alſo with him ſome light-armed foot, to view the ground, and the enemies countenance. When they diſcovered the approach one of the other; Scipio ſent before him his horſe-men of the Gauls, to begin the fight, and beſtowing his Darters in the void ground between their Troops, to aſſiſt them: himſelf with his Roman men at arms, followed ſoftly in good order. The Gauls (whether deſirous to try the metal of the Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get favour of the Romans) behaved themſelves couragiouſly, and were as couragiouſly oppoſed. Yet their foot that ſhould have aided them, ſhrank at the firſt brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without caſting a Dart; for fear of being trodden down by the enemies horſe. This notwithſtanding, the Gauls maintained the fight. and did more hurt than they received; as preſuming that they were well backt. Neither was the Conſul unmindful to relieve them: their hardineſs deſerving his aid; and the haſty flight of thoſe that ſhould have ſtood by them, admoniſhing him that it was needful. Wherefore he adventured himſelf ſo far, that he received a dangerous wound; and had been left in the place, if his Son (afterward ſurnamed Africanus) had not brought him off: though others give the honour of this reſcue to a Ligurian ſlave. Whilſt the Romans were buſied in helping their Conſul; an unexpected ſtorm came driving at their backs, and made them look about how to help themſelves. Hannibal had appointed his Numidian light-horſe, to give upon the Romans in flank, and to compaſs them about, whilſt he with his men at Arms ſuſtained their charge, and met them in the face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in pieces the ſcattered foot, that ran away at the firſt encounter; and then falling on the backs of thoſe, whoſe looks were faſtened upon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impreſſion, the Romans were ſhuffled together, and routed: ſo that they all betook them to their ſpeed, and left unto their enemies the honour of the day.

When Scipio ſaw his horſe-men thus beaten, and the reſt of his Army thereby greatly diſcouraged; he thought it a point of wiſdom, having loſt ſo many of his Fleet upon the firſt puff of the wind, to take Port with the reſt, before the extremeſt of the tempeſt overtook him. For he ſaw by the lowring morning what manner of day it was like to prove. Therefore his battel of foot being yet unboken, he in a manner ſtole the retrait; and recovered the Bridge over Ticinus, which he had formerly built. But notwithſtanding all the haſte that he made, he left ſix hundred of his Rear behind him: who were the laſt that ſhould have paſſed, and ſtaid to break the Bridge. Herein he followed this rule of a good man of War, Si certamen quandoq; dubium videatur, tacitam miles arripiat fugam: fuga enim aliquando laudanda: which muſt be underſtood in this ſort: If a General of an Army, by ſome unproſperous beginnings doubt the ſucceſs; or find his Army fearful or wavering, it is more profitable to ſteal a ſafe retrait, than to abide the uncertain event of battel.

It was two daies after, ere Hannibal could paſs the River; Scipio the whileſt refreſhing his men, and eaſing himſelf of his wound in Placentia. But as ſoon as Hannibal preſented his Army before the Town, offering battel to the Romans, who durſt not accept it, nor iſſue forth of their Camp; the Gauls, that hitherto had followed Scipio for fear, gathered out of his fear, courage to forſake him. They thought that now the long-deſired time was come, in which better Chieftains and Souldiers, than Ancroeſtus, Britomarus, and Geſſates, were come to help them: if they had the hearts to help themſelves. Wherefore the ſame night they fell upon the Roman Camp; wounded and ſlew many, eſpecially of thoſe guards that kept watch at the gate; with whoſe heads in their hands, they fled over to the Carthaginians, and preſented their ſervice. Hannibal received them exceeding courteouſly, and diſmiſt them to their own places: as men likely to be of more uſe to him, in perſwading the reſt of their Nation to become his Confederates, than in any other ſervice at the preſent.

About the fourth watch of the night following, the Conſul ſtole a retrait, as he had done before; but not with the like eaſe and ſecurity. Hannibal had a good eye upon him, and ere he could get far, ſent the Numidians after him: following himſelf with all his Army. That night the Romans had received a great blow, if the Numidians, greedy of ſpoil, had not ſtaid to ranſack their Camp: and thereby given time to all (ſave ſome few in Rear, that were ſlain or taken) to paſs the River of Trebia, and ſave themſelves. Scipio, being both unable to travel by reaſon of his wound, and withal, finding it expedient to attend the coming of his fellow-Conſul; incamps himſelf ſtrongly upon the banks of Trebia. Neceſſity required that he ſhould ſo do; yet this diminiſhed his reputation. For every day more and more of the Gauls fell to the Carthaginian ſide; among whom came in the Boji, that brought with them the Roman Commiſſioners, which they had taken in the late Inſurrection. They had hitherto kept them as pledges, to redeem their own hoſtages: but now they deliver them up to Hannibal, as tokens and pledges of their affections towards him; by whoſe help they conceived better hope of recovering their own men and lands. In the mean while, Hannibal, being in great ſcarcity of victuals, attempted the taking of Claſtidium, a Town wherein the Romans had laid up all their ſtore and munition. But there needed no force; a Brunduſian, whom the Romans had truſted with keeping it, ſold it for a little money.

The

The news of these disasters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and people, rather with a desire of hasty revenge, than any great sorrow for their loss received; seeing that in a manner, all their Foot, wherein their strength and hope consisted, were as yet entire. They therefore hasted away Sempronius, that was newly arrived, towards Ariminum, where the Army, by him sent out of Sicily, awaited his coming. He therefore hasted thither; and from thence he marched speedily towards his Colleague: who attended him upon the banks of Trebia. Both the Armies being joyned in one, the Consuls devised about that which remained to be done: Sempronius received from Scipio the relation of what had passed since Hannibals arrival; the fortune of the late fight; and by what errour or misadventure the Romans were therein foiled, which Scipio chiefly laid on the revolt and treason of the Gauls.

Sempronius, having received from Scipio the state of the affairs in those parts; sought by all means to try his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recovered of his wounds, that thereby he might purchase to himself the sole glory of the victory, which he had already in his imagination, certainly obtained. He also feared the Election of the new Consuls: his own time being well-near expired. But Scipio perswaded the contrary; objecting the unskilfulness of the new-come Souldiers: and withall, gave him good reason, to assure him that the Gauls, naturally unconstant, were upon terms of abandoning the party of the Carthaginians; those of them inhabiting between the rivers of Trebia and Po, being already revolted. Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made haste to find out the dishonour which he might otherwise easily have avoided. This resolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleasing to Hannibal: who feared nothing so much as delay and loss of time. For the strength of his Army, consisting in strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gauls; he no less feared the change of affection in the one, than the impatience of the other: who being far from their own home, had many passions moving them to turn their faces towards it. To further the desire of Sempronius, it fell out so, that about the same time, the Gauls, inhabiting near unto Trebia, complained of injuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not supply Hannibal with necessaries, as he supposed that they might have done; although he daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their sakes, and to set them at liberty, he had undertaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his words, he was bold to be his own Carver; and took from them by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Hereupon they fly to the Romans for help: and, to make their tale the better, say that this wrong is done them, because they refused to joyn with Hannibal. Scipio cared not much for this: he suspected their falshood, and was assured of their mutability. But Sempronius affirmed, that it stood with the honour of Rome, to preserve their Confederates from suffering injury: and that hereby might be won the friendship of all the Gauls. Therefore he sent out a thousand Horse: which coming unlooked for upon Hannibal his forragers, and finding them heavy loaden, cut many of them in pieces, and chased the rest even into their own Camp. This indignity made the Carthaginians sally out against them, who caused them to retire faster than they came. Sempronius was ready to back his own men; and repelled the enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length all the Roman Army was drawn forth; and a battel ready to be fought, if the Carthaginian had not refused it.

This victory (for so the Consul would have it called) made the Romans in general desirous to try the main chance in open field: all the perswasions of Scipio to the contrary notwithstanding. Of this disposition Hannibal was advertised by the Gauls, his Spies, that were in the Roman Camp. Therefore he bethought himself how to help forward the victory by adding some stratagem to his forces: he found in the hollow of a water-course, over-grown with high reed, a fit trench to cover an ambush. Therein he cast his brother Mago with a thousand choice Horse, and as many foot. The rest of his Army, after they had well warmed, and well fed themselves in their Camp, he led into the field, and marched towards the Consul. Early in the morning he had sent over Trebia some companies of Numidian light-horse, to brave the enemy, and to draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his fast. Sempronius was ready to take any opportunity to fight: and therefore not only issued out of his Camp, but foorded the River of Trebia, in a most cold and miserable day; his foot being wet almost to the arm-holes: which, together with the want of food, did so enfeeble and cool their courages, as they wanted force to handle the arms they bare. Strong they were in foot, as well of their own Nation, as of the Latines: having of the one sixteen, of the other twenty thousand. The mass of these they ranged in a gross Battalion, guarded on the flanks with three thousand horse; thrusting their Light-armed, and Darters, in loose troops in the head of the rest, in the nature of a Vantguard. The Carthaginian numbers of foot were in a manner equal to their enemies; in horse they had by far the better, both in number and goodness. When therefore the Roman horse ranged on the flanks of their foot, were broken by the Numidians; when their foot, were charged both in front and flank, by the Spaniards, Gauls and Elephants; when finally the whole Army was unawares prest in the Rear, by Mago and his two thousand, that rose out of their place of ambush; then fell the Romans, by heaps, under the enemies swords: and being beaten down, as well fighting in disorder, as flying towards the River, by the Horsemen that pursued them, there escaped no more of six and thirty thousand, than ten thousand of all sorts, Horse and Foot.

Three great errours Sempronius committed, of which every one deserved to be recompenced with the loss that followed. The first was, that he fought with Hannibal in a Champain, being by far inferiour in Horse and withal, thereby subject to the African Elephants, which in inclosed or uneven grounds and wood-lands, would have been of no use. His second errour was, that he made no discovery of the place upon which he fought; whereby he was grosly over-reacht, and insnared, by the ambush which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that he drencht his foot-men with empty stomachs, in the River of Trebia, even in a most cold and frosty day, whereby, in effect, they lost the use of their limbs. For, as one saith well, There is nothing more inconvenient and perilous, than to present an Army tyred with travel, to an enemy fresh and fed; since where the strength of body faileth, the generosity of mind is but as an unprofitable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Army, was collected by Scipio, who got therewith into Placentia; stealing away the same night, which was exceeding exceeding rainy, from the Carthaginians, who either perceived him not, because of the showrs; or would not perceive him, because they were overwearied. Sempronius escaped with extream danger, flying through the Country that was over-run by the enemies horse. He was attended by more than were requisite in a secret flight; yet by fewer than could have made resistance, if the enemy had met with him. Nevertheless he got away, and came to Rome; where he did his office in chusing new Consuls for the year following: and then returned into his Province, with a fresh supply against Hannibal.

SECT. V.

The departure of Hannibal from the Cisalpine Gauls into Hetruria. Flaminius the Roman Consul slain, and his Army destroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Thrasymene.

THE Winter growing on a-pace, was very sharp, and unfit for service: to the great contentment of the Romans, who being not able to keep the field, lay warm in Placentia, and Cremona. Yet Hannibal did not suffer them to rest very quiet; but vexed them with continual Alarms: assailed divers places, and taking some; beating the Gauls their adherents, and winning the Ligurians to his party, who presented him, in token of their faithful love, with two Roman Questors, or Treasurers, two Colonels, and five Gentlemen, the Sons of Senators, which they had intercepted. These, and in general all such prisoners as he had of the Romans, he held in straight places, loaden with Irons, and miserably fed: those of their followers he not only well intreated, but sent them to their Countries without ransom; with the protestation, That he therefore undertook the War in Italy, to free them from the oppression of the Romans. By these means he hoped, and not in vain, to draw many of them to his party and assistance. But the Gauls were not capable of such perswasions. They stood in fear, lest he should make their Country the seat of War, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieved than reason willed them, at his feeding upon them, and wasting their territory. Wherefore some of them conspired against his life; others admonished him of the danger: and these that gave him the advice, were ready soon after to practise against him; but were in like sort detected. He was therefore glad to use Periwigs of hair, and false beards of divers colours; to the end that he might not be descryed, nor known, to those that should undertake to make him away. Fain he would have passed the Appennines, upon the first appearance of Spring; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarry among the Gauls, till he had seen more swallows than one. At length, when the year was somewhat better opened, he resolved to take his leave of these giddy companions, and bring the war nearer to the gate of Rome. So away he went, having his Army greatly increased with Ligurians and Gauls; more serviceable friends abroad, than in their own Country. That the passage of the Appennine Mountains was troublesome, I hold it needless to make any doubt: Yet since the Roman Armies found no memorable impediment, in their marches that way: the great vexation which fell upon Hannibal, when he was travelling thorow and over them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the extremity of winter, that makes all waies foul, than to any intolerable difficulty in that journey. Nevertheless, to avoid the length of war, together with the resistance and fortifications which may not improbably be thought to have been erected upon the ordinary passages towards Rome: he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to travel thorow the Fens and rotten grounds of Tuscane. In those Marishes and bogs, he lost all his Elephants, save one, together with the use of one of his eyes; by the moistness of the air, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading thorow deep mire and water. In brief, after he had, with much ado, recovered the firm and fertile Plains, he lodged about Aretium; where he somewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard news of the Roman Consuls.

C. Flaminius, and Cn. Servilius had of late been chosen Consuls for this year: Servilius a tractable man, and wholly governed by advice of the Senate; Flaminius an hot-headed popular Orator; who having once been robbed (as he thought) of his Consulship, by a device of the Senators, was afraid to be served so again, unless he quickly finished the war. This jealous Consul thought it not best for him to be at Rome, when he entred into his Office, lest his adversaries, by feigning some religious impediment, should detain him within the City, or find other business for him at home, to disappoint him of the honour that he hoped to get in the war. Wherefore he departed secretly out of the Town, and meant to take possession of his Office when the day came at Ariminum. The Fathers (so the Senators were called) highly displeased with this, revoked him by Embassadours: but he neglected their injunction; and hastening to meet with the Carthaginians, took his way to Aretium, where he shortly found them.

The fiery disposition of this Consul, promised unto Hannibal great assurance of victory. Therefore he provoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman; hoping thereby to draw him unto fight, ere Servilius came with the rest of the Army. All the Country between Fesule and Aretium, he put to fire and sword, even under the Consuls nose; which was enough to make him stir, that would not have sitten still, though Hannibal had been quiet. It is true that a great Captain of France hath said; Pays gaste n'est pas perdu; A wasted Country is not thereby lost; But by this waste of the Country, Flaminius thought his own honour to be much impaired; and therefore advanced towards the Enemy. Many advised him (which had indeed been best) to have patience a while, and stay for his Colleague. But of this he could not abide to hear; saying, that he came not to defend Aretium, whilst the Carthaginians went burning down all Italy before them, to the gates of Rome. Therefore he took horse, and commanded the Army to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Ensigns stuck so fast in the ground, as it could not be plucked up by the Ensign-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or false, Tully makes a jest, saying, That the cowardly knave did faintly pull at it (as going now to fight) having hardly pitched it into the earth. Neither was the answer of Flaminius (if it were true) disagreeable hereto: for he commanded that it should be digged up, if fear had made the hands too weak to lift it: asking withal, whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this their jealousie, both he and the Senate that did give him cause, are likely to repent.

All the Territory of Cortona, as far as to the Lake of Thraſymene, was on a light fire; which while the Conſul thought to quench with his enemies blood, he purſued Hannibal ſo unadviſedly, that he fell with his whole Army into an ambuſh cunningly laid for him between the Mountains of Cortona and the Lake. There was he charged unawares, on all ſides, (ſave only where that great Lake of Peruſia, permitted neither his enemies to come at him, nor him to fly from them) knowing not which way to turn, or make reſiſtance. So was he ſlain in the place, accompanied with fifteen thouſand dead carkaſſes of his Country-men. About ſix thouſand of his men, that had the Vaunt-guard, took courage, as for the moſt part it happens, out of deſperation: and breaking thorow the enemies, that ſtood in their way, recovered the tops of the Mountains. If theſe had returned, and given charge upon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might have greatly amended, if not wholly altered the fortune of the day. But that violence of their fear, which, kindled by neceſſity had wrought the effects of hardineſs, was well aſſwaged, when they ceaſed to deſpair of ſaving their lives by flight. They ſtood ſtill, in a cold ſweat, upon the Hill-top, hearing under them a terrible noiſe, but not any way diſcovering how things went, becauſe of the great fogg that held all that morning. When it grew toward noon, the Air was cleared, and they might plainly diſcern the lamentable ſlaughter of their fellows. But they ſtaid not to lament it; for it was high time they thought, to be gone ere they were deſcryed and attached by the enemies horſe. This they ſhould have thought upon ſooner, ſince they had no mind to return into the fight. For, deſcryed they were, and Maharbal ſent after them, who overtook them by night in a Village, which he ſurrounded with his horſe: and ſo they yielded the next day, rendring up their arms, upon his promiſe of their lives and liberties.

This accord Hannibal refuſed to confirm; ſaying, that it was made by Maharbal without ſufficient warrant, as wanting his authority to make it good. Herein he taught them (yet little to his own honour) what it was to keep no faith: and fitted them with a trick of their own. For if it were lawful unto the Romans, to alter covenants, or add unto them what they liſted; if the Carthaginians muſt be fain to pay certain hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talents, beſides their firſt bargains; as alſo to renounce their intereſt in Sardinia, and be limited in their Spaniſh Conqueſts, according to the good pleaſure of the Romans, whoſe preſent advantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded Peace: then can Hannibal be as Roman, as themſelves; and make them know, that perfidiouſneſs gaineth no more in proſperity, than it loſeth in the change of fortune. Fifteen thouſand Italian priſoners, or thereabout, he had in his hands: of which, all that were not Romans, he ſet free without ranſom; proteſting, as he had done before, that it was for their ſakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyranny, that he had undertaken this war. But the Romans he kept in ſtraight priſon, and in fetters, making them learn to eat hard meat. This was a good way to breed in the people of Italy, if not a love of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this war had not concerned the general ſafety, but only the preſerving of her own neck from the yoke of ſlavery, which her over-ſtrong enemies would thruſt upon her in revenge of her oppreſſions. But an antient reputation confirmed by ſucceſs of many ages, is not loſt in one or two battles. Wherefore more is to be done, ere the Carthaginians can get any Italian Partiſans.

Preſently after the battle of Thraſymene, C. Centronius, with four thouſand Roman horſe, drew near unto the Camp of Hannibal. He was ſent from Ariminum by Servilius the other Conſul, to increaſe the ſtrength of Flaminius: but, coming two late, he increaſed only the miſadventure. Maharbal was employed by Hannibal, to intercept this company; who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great overthrow, charged them, and brake them: and killing almoſt half of them, drave the reſt unto a high piece of ground, where they came down, and ſimply yielded to mercy the next day. Servilius himſelf was in the mean time skirmiſhing with the Gauls; againſt whom he had wrought no matter of importance, when the news was brought him of his Colleagues overthrow and death in Hetruria; that made him haſten back to the defence of Rome.

In theſe paſſages, it is eaſie to diſcern the fruits of popular jealouſie, which perſwaded the Romans to the yearly change of their Commanders in the wars; which greatly endangered, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certain it is, that all men are far better taught by their own errours, than by the examples of their foregoers. Flaminius had heard in what a trap Sempronius had been taken up but the year before, by this ſubtile Carthaginian; yet ſuffered he himſelf to be caught ſoon after in the ſame manner. He had alſo belike forgotten how Sempronius, fearing to be prevented by a new Conſul, and ambitious of the ſole honour of beating Hannibal in battle, without help of his companion Scipio, had been rewarded with ſhame and loſs; elſe would he not, contrary to all good advice, have been ſo haſty to fight, before the arrival of Servilius. If Sempronius had been continued in his charge, it is probable that he would have taken his companion with him the ſecond time, and have ſearched all ſuſpected places, proper to have ſhadowed an ambuſh: both which this new Conſul Flaminius neglected. We may boldly avow it, that by being continued in his Government of France ten years, Caſar brought that mighty Nation, together with the Helvetians and many of the Germans, under the Roman yoke; into which parts had there been every year a new Lieutenant ſent, they would hardly, if ever, have been ſubdued. For it is more than the beſt wit in the world can do, to inform it ſelf, within one years compaſs, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions, of the Places, Rivers, and of all good helps, whereby to proſecute a War to the beſt effect. Our Princes have commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three years; whence by reaſon of the ſhortneſs of that their time, many of them have returned as wiſe as they went out; others have profited more, and yet when they began but to know the firſt rudiments of War, and Government, fitting the Country, they have been called home, and new Apprentices ſent in their places, to the great prejudice both of this and that Eſtate. But it hath ever been the old courſe of the World rather to follow the errours, than to examine them: and of Princes and Governours to uphold their ſlothful ignorance, by the old examples and policy of other ages and people; though neither likeneſs of time, of occaſion, or of any other circumſtance, have perſwaded the imitation.

SECT.

SECT. VI.

How Q. Fabius the Roman Dictator, sought to consume the force of Hannibal, by lingring war. Minutius the Master of the Horse, honoured and advanced by the People, for bold and successful attempting; adventures rashly upon Hannibal, and is like to perish with his Army, and rescued by Fabius.

GReatly were the Romans amazed at this their ill success, and at the danger apparent; which threatned them in more terrible manner, than ever did war since Rome it self was taken. They were good Souldiers, and so little accustomed to receive an overthrow, that when Pyrrhus had beaten them, once and again, in open field, all Italy was strangely affected with his success, and held him in admiration, as one that could work wonders. But Pyrrhus his quarrel was not grounded upon hate: he only sought honour, and fought (as it were) upon a bravery; demeaning himself like a courteous enemy. This Carthaginian detested the whole Roman name; against which he burned with desire of revenge. Ticinum, Trebia, and Thrasymene, witnessed his purpose, and his ability; which to understand, they fled unto a remedy that had long been out of use, and created a Dictator. The Dictators power was greater than the Consuls, and scarcely subject unto controll of the whole City. Wherefore this Officer was seldom chosen, but upon some extremity, and for no longer time than six months. He was to be named by one of the Consuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were so, that the Consul (if he stood upon his prerogative) might name whom he pleased. At this time the one Consul being dead, and the other too far off, the people took upon them, as having supreme authority, to give the Dignity by their election, to Q. Fabius Maximus; the best reputed man of War in the City. Novum factum novum consilium expetit, contrary winds, contrary courses. Q. Fabius chose M. Minutius Rufus Master of the horse: which Officer was customarily as the Dictators Lieutenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more upon him.

The first act of Fabius, was the reformation of somewhat amiss in matters of Religion: a good beginning and commendable, had the Religion been also good. But if it were true (as Livie reports it) that the Books of Sibyl were consulted, and gave direction in this business of devotion; then must we believe that those Books of Sibyl, preserved in Rome, were dictated by an evil spirit. For it was ordained, that some Vow, made in the beginning of this war to Mars, should be made anew, and amplified, as having not been rightly made before: also that great Plaies should be vowed unto Jupiter, and a Temple to Venus; with such other Trumpery. This vehemency of superstition, proceeds alwaies from vehemency of fear. And surely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly distempered with passion; whereof that memorable accident, of two women that suddenly died, when they saw their Sons return alive from Thrasymene, may serve to bear witness, though it be more properly an example of motherly love. The Walls and Towers of the City were now repaired and fortified; the Bridges upon Rivers were broken down, and all care taken for defence of Rome it self. In this tumult, when the Dictator was newly set forth against Hannibal, word was brought that the Carthaginian Fleet had intercepted all the supply, that was going to Cn. Scipio in Spain. Against these Carthaginians, Fabius commanded Servilius the Consul to put to Sea; and taking up all the ships about Rome and Ostia, to pursue them: whilst he, with the Legions, attended upon Hannibal. Four Legions he had levyed in haste: and from Ariminum he received the Army which Servilius the Consul had conducted thither.

Liv. lib. 22.

With these forthwith he followed apace after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what advantage the Numidian horse had over the Romans, he alwaies lodged himself on high grounds, and of hard access. Hannibal in the mean while, pursuing his victory, had ranged over all the Country, and used all manner of cruelty towards the inhabitants; especially to those of the Roman Nation, of whom he did put to the sword all that were able to bear arms. Passing by Spoletum and Ancona, he encamped upon the Adriatick shores; refreshed his diseased, and over-travelled Companies, armed his Africans after the manner of the Romans, and made his dispatches from Carthage; presenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the spoils that he had gotten. Having refreshed his Army, fed his horses, cured his wounded Souldiers, and (as Polybius hath it) healed his horses heels of the scratches, by washing their pasterns in old wine: he followed the coast of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia a Northern Province of the Kingdom of Naples, spoiling the Murrucini, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he over-ran, he had not taken any one City: only he had assailed Spoletum a Colony of the Romans; and finding it well defended, presently gave it over. The malice of a great Army is broken, and the force of it spent in a great siege. This the Protestant Army found true at Poictiers, a little before the battel of Moncountour; and their victorious enemies, anon after at S. Jean d' Angely. But Hannibal was more wise. He would not engage himself in any such enterprise, as should detain him, and give the Romans leave to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in force and reputation: knowing, that when once he was absolute Master of the field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their gates, without expecting any engine of battery. To this end he presented Fabius with battle, as soon as he saw him; and provoked him with all manner of bravadoes. But Fabius would not bite. He knew well the differences between souldiers bred up, ever since they were boyes, in war and in blood, trained and hardened in Spain, made proud and adventurous by many victories there, and of late by some notable acts against the Romans; and such, as had no other seen the enemy, than been vanquished by him. Therefore he attended the Carthaginian so near, as he kept him from stragling too far; and preserved the Country from utter spoil. He inured his men by little and little, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees, and he brought them first to look on the Lyon afar off, that in the end he might fit on his tail.

Now Minutius had a contrary disposition, and was as fiery as Flaminius: taxing Fabius with cowardize and fear. But all stirred not this well-advised Commander. For wise men are no more moved with such noise, than with wind bruised out of a bladder. There is nothing of more in-discretion and danger, than to pursue misfortune: it wasteth it self sooner by sufferance, than by opposition. It is the invading Army that desires battel: and this of Hannibal, was both the invading and victorious. Fabius therefore suffered Hannibal to cross the Appenines, and to fall upon the most rich and pleasant Territory of Campania; neither could he by any arguments be perswaded, to adventure the Roman Army in battel: but being far too weak in horse, he alwaies kept the Hills and fast grounds. When Hannibal saw he could by no means draw this wary Dictator to fight, that the Winter came on, and that the Towns stood firm for the Romans, whose Legions were in sight, though afar off; he resolved to rest his Army, that was loaden with spoil, in some plentiful and assured place, till the following spring. But ere this can be done he must pass along by the Dictators Camp, that hung over his head upon the hills of Collicula, and Casilinum: for other way there was none, by which he might issue out of that goodly garden-countrey, which he had already wasted, into places more abundant of provision for his wintering. It was by meer errour of his guide, that he first entred within these streights. For he would have been directed unto Cassinum, whence he might both slay the fair City of Capua, which had made him friendly promises under-hand, and hinder the Romans from coming near it to prevent him. But his guide mis-understood the Carthaginian pronunciation, and conducted him awry another way, from Cassinum to Casilinum, whence Fabius hoped that he should not easily escape. Now began the wisdom of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap, and won the victory without blows. But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himself, by a sleight invention, yet serving the turn as well as a better. In driving the country, he had gotten about two thousand Kine, whose horns he dressed with dry faggots, and setting fire to them in the dark night, caused them to be driven up the hills. The spectacle was strange, and therefore terrible; especially to those that knew it to be a work of a terrible enemy. What it should mean, Fabius could not tell; but thought it a device to circumvent him, and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the hill tops were horribly afraid, when some of these fiery Monsters were gotten beyond them; and ran therefore hastily away, thinking the enemies were behind their backs; and fell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no less afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Army recovered sure ground without molestation: where he staid till the next morning, and then brought off his light footmen, with some slaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in skirmish. After this, Hannibal made semblance of taking his journey towards Rome: and the Dictator coasted him in the wonted manner; keeping still on high grounds, between him and the City, whilest the Carthaginian wasted all the Plains. The Carthaginian took Geryon, an old ruinous Town in Apulia, forsaken by the Inhabitants, which he turned into Barns and Store-houses for winter, and incamped under the broken wall. Other matter of importance he did none: but the time passed idly, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about some business of Religion, and left the Army in charge with Minutius the Master of the horse.

Minutius was glad of this good occasion to shew his own sufficiency. He was fully perswaded, that his Romans, in plain field would be too hard for the Africans and Spaniards: by whom if they had been foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by subtilty and ambush, which he thought himself wise enough to prevent. All the Army was of his opinion; and that so earnestly, as he was preferred, by judgement of the Souldiers, in worthiness to command, before the cold and wary Fabius. In this jollity of conceit, he determined to fight, Yet had he been peremptorily forbidden so to do, by the Dictator; the breach of whose command was extream peril of death. But the honor of the victory, which he held undoubtedly his own; and the love of the Army, and the friends that he had at home bearing office in Rome, were enought to save him from the Dictators rods and axes, took he the matter never so hainously. Hannibal on the other side was no less glad, that he should play with a more adventurous Gamester. Therefore he drew near, and to provoke the Romans, sent forth the third part of his Army to waste the Countrey. This was boldly done, seeing that Minutius incamped hard by him: but it seems, that he now despised those whom he had so often vanquished. There was a piece of high ground between the two Camps; which because it would be commodious to him that could occupy it, the Carthaginians seized upon by night with two thousand of their light armed. But Minutius, by plain force, wan it from them the next day; and intrenching himself thereupon, became their nearer neighbour.

The main business of Hannibal at this time was, to provide abundantly, not only for his men, but for his Horses, which he knew to be the chief of his strength; that he might keep them in good heart against the next Summer: if besides this he could give the Romans another blow, it would increase his reputation, incourage his own men, terrifie his enemies, and give him leave to forrage the Country at will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many daies issue forth of his Camp, the Carthaginian sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in harvest. This advantage Minutius wisely espied, and took. For he led forth his Army, and setting it in order, presented battel to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, even at his own Trenches. His horses, and all his light Armature, divided into many companies, he sent abroad against the forragers; who being dispersed over all the fields, and loaden with booty, could make no resistance. This angred Hannibal, that was not able to help them; but worse did it anger him, when the Romans took heart to assail his Trenches. They perceived that it was meer weakness, which held him within his Camp, and therefore were bold to despise his great name, that could not resist their present strength. But in the heat of the business, Asdrubal came from Geryon with four thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horse. This imboldened Hannibal to issue forth against the Romans; to whom nevertheless he did not so much hurt, as he had received.

For this piece of service Minutius was highly esteemed by the Army, and more highly by the people at Rome, to whom he sent the news, with somewhat greater boast than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Army had recovered spirit, so far forth that it dared to set upon Hannibal in his own Camp; and that in so doing, it came off with the better. Every man therefore praised the Master of the Horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as far out of liking with Fabius and his timerous proceedings, thinking that he had not done any thing wiſely, in all his Dictatorſhip: ſaving that he choſe ſuch a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeed in no other thing he had ſo greatly erred. But the Dictator was not ſo joyful of a little good luck, as angry with the breach of diſcipline; and fearful of greater danger, thereon likely to enſue. He ſaid that he knew his own place, and what was to be done: that he would teach the Maſter of the Horſe to do ſo likewiſe; and make him give account of what he had done, if he were Dictator: ſpeaking it openly, That good ſucceſs iſſuing from bad counſel, was more to be feared, than calamity; for as much as the one bred a fooliſh confidence, the other taught men to be wary. Againſt theſe Sermons every one cryed out, eſpecially Metellus, a Tribune of the people: which office warranted him to ſpeak, and do what he liſt, without fear of the Dictator. Is it not enough (ſaid he) that this our only Man, choſen to be General, and Lord of the Town, in our greateſt neceſſity, hath done no manner of good, but ſuffered all Italy to be waſted before his eyes, to the utter ſhame of our State; unleſs he alſo hinder others, from doing better than himſelf can, or dares? It were good to conſider what he means by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius he hath not choſen any new Conſul all this while; Servilius is ſent away to Sea, I know not why; Hannibal and he, have as it were taken Truce; Hannibal ſparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indeed forborn to ſpoil ſome grounds of Fabius, that ſo he might bring him into envy and ſuſpicion) and the Dictator giving him leave to ſpoil all others, without impeachment. Surely his drift is even this: he would have the War to laſt long, that he himſelf might be long in office, and have the ſole Government both of our City and Armies. But this muſt not be ſo. It were better, that the Commonalty of Rome, which gave him this authority, ſhould again take it from him and conferr it upon one more worthy. But leſt, in moving the people hereto, I ſhould ſeem to do him injury; thus far forth I will regard his honour: I will only propound, That the Maſter of the Horſe may be joined in equal authority with the Dictator; a thing not more new, nor leſs neceſſary, than was the election of this Dictator, by the people.

Though all men, even the Senators, were ill perſwaded of the courſe which Fabius had taken againſt Hannibal, as being neither plauſible, nor ſeeming beneficial at the preſent; yet was there none ſo injurious, as to think that his general intent, and care of the Weal-publique, was leſs than very honourable. Whereas therefore it was the manner, in paſſing of any act, that ſome man of credit and authority, beſides the propounder, ſhould ſtand up, and formally deliver his approbation, not one of the principal Citizens was found ſo impudent, as to offer that open diſgrace, both unto a worthy Perſonage, and (therewithal) unto that dignity, whoſe great power had freed the State at ſeveral times, from the greateſt dangers. Only C. Terentius Varro, who the year before had been Prætor, was glad of ſuch an opportunity, to win the favour of the Multitude. This fellow was the ſon of a Butcher, afterwards became a Shop-keeper; and being of a contentious ſpirit, grew by often brabling, to take upon him as a Pleader, dealing in poor mens cauſes. Thus by little and little he got into Office; and roſe by degrees, being advanced by thoſe, who in hatred of the Nobility favoured his very baſeneſs. And now he thought the time was come, for him to give a hard puſh at the Conſulſhip; by doing that, which none of the great men, fearing or favouring one another, either durſt or would. So he made an hot invective, not only againſt Fabius, but againſt all the Nobility; ſaying, That it grieved them to ſee the people do well, and take upon them what belonged unto them, in matter of Government; That they ſought to humble the Commons by poverty, and to impoveriſh them by War; eſpecially by War at their own doors, which would ſoon conſume every poor mans living, and find him other work to think upon, than matter of State. Therefore he bade them to be wiſe; and ſince they had found one (this worthy Maſter of the Horſe) that was better affected unto them and his Country, to reward him according to his good deſerts; and give him authority, according as was propounded by the Tribune, that ſo he might be encouraged and enabled to proceed as he had begun. So the Act paſſed.

Before this buſie day of contention, Fabius had diſpatched the election of new Conſul, which was M. Atilius Regulus, in the room of C. Flaminius: and, having finiſhed all requiſite buſineſs, went out of Town, perceiving well, that he ſhould not be able to withſtand the multitude in hindering the decree. The news of Minutius his advancement, was at the Camp as ſoon as Fabius: ſo that his old Lieutenant, and new Colleague, began to treat with him as a Companion; aſking him at the firſt, in what ſort he thought it beſt to divide their authority: whether that one, one day; and the other, the next; or each of them ſucceſſively, for ſome longer time, ſhould command in chief. Fabius briefly told him, That it was the pleaſure of the Citizens, to make the Maſter of the Horſe equal to the Dictator, but that he ſhould never be his ſuperiour: He would therefore divide the Legions with him by lot, according to the cuſtom. Minutius was not herewith greatly pleaſed; for that with half of the Army he could not work ſuch wonders as otherwiſe he hoped to accompliſh. Nevertheleſs he meant to do his beſt, and ſo taking his part of the Army, incamped about a mile and a half from the Dictator. Needful it was (though Livy ſeems to tax him for it) that he ſhould ſo do. For where two ſeveral Commanders are not ſubordinate one unto another, nor joined in Commiſſion, but have each intire and abſolute charge of his own followers, there are the forces (though belonging to one Prince or State) not one, but two diſtinct Armies: in which regard, one Camp ſhall not hold them both without great inconvenience. Polybius neither finds fault with this diſtinction, nor yet reports, that Fabius was unwilling to command in chief ſucceſſively (as the two Conſuls uſed) with Minutius, by turns. He ſaith that Minutius was very refractory, and ſo proud of his advancement, that continually he oppoſed the Dictator: who thereupon referred it to his choice, either to divide the forces between them, as is ſaid before, or elſe to have command over all by courſe. This is likely to be true. For Natures impatient of ſubjection, when once they have broken looſe from the rigour of authority, love nothing more, than to conteſt with it; as if herein conſiſted the proof and aſſurance of their liberty.

It behoved the Maſter of the horſe to make good the opinion which had thus advanced him. Therefore he was no leſs careful of getting occaſion to fight, than was Fabius of avoiding the neceſſity. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally deſired, fired, could not long be wanting. The Country lying between them was open and bare, yet as fit for ambush, as could be wished: for that the sides of a naked valley adjoyning, had many and spacious caves; able some one of them, to hide two or three hundred men. In these lurking places Hannibal bestowed five hundred horse, and five thousand foot; thrusting them so close together, that they could not be discovered. But lest by any misadventure they should be found out, and buried in their holes; he made offer betimes in the morning, to seize upon a piece of ground that lay on the other hand: whereby he drew the eyes and the thoughts of the Romans, from their more needful care, to business little concerning them. Like unto this was the occasion, which not long before had provoked Minutius to adventure upon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to encrease his honour, in like sort as he got it; he sent first his light armature, then his horse, and at length (seeing that Hannibal seconded his own Troops with fresh companies) he followed in person with the Legions. He was soon caught, and so hotly charged on all sides, that he knew neither how to make resistance, nor any safe retrait. In this dangerous case, whilst the Romans defended themselves losing many, and those of their best men: Fabius drew near in very good order to relieve them. For this old Captain, perceiving afar off, into what extremity his new Colleague had rashly thrown himself and his followers, did the Office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Country, than the disgrace which he had wrongfully sustained, sought rather to improve himself by hasting to do good, than by suffering his enemy to feel the reward of doing ill. Upon Fabius his approach, Hannibal retired: fearing to be well wetted with a showre, from the cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung so long on the Hill-tops. Minutius forthwith submitted himself to Fabius; by whose benefit he confessed his life to have been saved. So from this time forwards the war proceeded coldly, as the Dictator would have it; both whilst his Office lasted which was not long, and likewise afterwards, when he delivered up his charge unto the Consuls, that followed his instructions.

Servilius the Consul had pursued in vain a Carthaginian fleet, to which he came never within kenning. He ran along all the coast of Italy; took hostages of the Sardinians and Corsicans; passed over into Africk; and there negligently falling to spoil the Country, was shamefully beaten aboard his ships, with the loss of 1000. men. Weighing anchor therefore in all haste, he returned home by Sicily; and (being so required by the Dictators letters) repaired to the Camp, with his fellow-Consul, where they took charge of the Army.

SECT. VII.

The Roman people, desirous to finish the war quickly, choose a rash and unworthy Consul. Great forces levied against Hannibal. Hannibal taketh the Romans provisions in the Castle of Cannæ. The new Consuls set forth against Hannibal.

WIth little pleasure did they of the poorer sort in Rome hear the great commendations that were given to Fabius by the principal Citizens. He had indeed preserved them from receiving a great overthrow; but had neither finished the war, nor done any thing in appearance thereto tending. Rather it might seem that the reputation of this his one worthy act, was likely to countenance the slow proceedings or perhaps the cowardize (if it were no worse) of those that followed him, in protracting the work to a great length. Else, what meant the Consuls to sit idle the whole winter, contrary to all former custom; since it was never heard before, that any Roman General had willingly suffered the time of his command to run away without any performance: as if it were honourable to do just nothing? Thus they suspected they knew not what; and were ready every man to discharge the grief and anger of his own private loss, upon the ill administration of the publick.

This affection of the people, was very helpful to C. Terentius Varro, in his suit for the Consulship. It behoved him to strike, whilst the Iron was hot: his own worth being little or none; and his credit over-weak, to make way into that high Dignity. But the Commonalty were then in such a mood, as abundantly supplyed all his defects. Wherein to help, he had a kinsman, Bibius Herennius, then Tribune of the People; who spared not to use the liberty of his place, in saying what he listed, without all regard of truth, or modesty. This bold Orator stuck not to affirm, that Hannibal was drawn into Italy, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen; That Minutius indeed with his two Legions, was likely to have been overthrown, and was rescued by Fabius with the other two: but, had all been joyned together, what they might have done, it was apparent, by the victory of Minutius when he commanded over all as Master of the horse; That without a Plebeian Consul, the war would never be brought to an end; That such of the Plebeians as had long since been advanced to honour by the people, were grown as proud as the old Nobility, and contemned the meaner sort, ever since themselves were freed from contempt of the more mighty; That therefore it was needful to choose a Consul, who should be altogether a Plebeian, a meer new man, one that could boast of nothing but the Peoples love, nor could wish more, than to keep it, by well deserving of them. By such perswasions the Multitude was won, to be wholly for Terentius: to the great vexation of the Nobles, who could not endure to see a man raised for none other vertue, than his detracting from their honour; and therefore opposed him with all their might. To hinder the desire of the People, it fell out, or at least was alledged, that neither of the two present Consuls could well be spared from attending upon Hannibal, to hold the Election. Wherefore a Dictator was named for that purpose; and he again deposed either (as was pretended) for some religious impediment, or because the Fathers desired an Inter-regnum, wherein they might better hope to prevail in choice of the new Consuls. This Inter-regnum took name and being in Rome, at the death of Romulus: and was in use at the death of other Kings. The order of it was this. All the Fathers, or Senators, who at the first were an hundred, parted themselves into Tens or Decuries; and governed successively, by the space of five daies, one Decurie after another in order: yet so, that the Lictors, or Virgers, carrying the Fasces, or bundles of rods and axes, waited only upon the chief of them with those Ensigns of power. This custom was retained in times of the Consuls; and put in use, when by death, or any casualty, there wanted ordinary Magistrates of the old year, to substitute new for the year following. The advantage of the Fathers herein was, that if the election were not like to go as they would have it, there needed no more, than to slip five days, and then was all to begin anew: by which interruption, the heat of the multitude was commonly well asswaged. Upon such change of those, that were Presidents of the election, it was also lawful unto new Petitioners, to sue for the Magistracies that lay void: which otherwise was not allowed: but a time limited, wherein they should publickly declare themseves to seek those offices. But no device would serve against the general favour born unto Terentius. One Inter-regnum passed over, and the malice of the Fathers, against the vertue (as it was believed) of this mean, but worthy man, seemed so manifest, that when the People had urged the business to dispatch, only Terentius was chosen Consul: in whose hand it was left, to hold the election of his Colleague. Hereupon all the former Petitioners gave over. For whereas men of ordinary mark had stood for the place before, it was now thought meet, that, both to supply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this unexpert, and hot-heated man, one of great sufficiency and reputation, should be joyned with him, as both Companion and Opposite. So L. Æmilius Paulus, he who a few years had since overcome the Illyrians, and chased Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdom, was urged by the Nobility to stand for the place; which he easily obtained, having no Competitor. It was not the desire of this honourable man, to trouble himself any more in such great business of the Common-wealth. For, notwithstanding his late good service, He, and M. Livius that had been his companion in office, were afterwards injuriously vexed by the people, and called unto judgment: wherein Livius was condemned, and Æmilius hardly escaped. But of this injustice they shall put the Romans well in mind each of them in his second Consulship wherein they shall honourably approve their worth; the one of them nobly dying, in the most grievous loss; the other bravely winning, in the most happy victory that ever befell that Common-wealth.

These new Consuls, Varro and Paulus omitted no part of their diligence in preparing for the war; wherein though Varro made the greater noise, by telling what wonders he would work, and that he would ask no more, than once to have a sight of Hannibal, whom he promised to vanquish the very first day: yet the providence and care of Paulus travelleth more earnestly toward the accomplishment of that, whereof his fellow vainly boasted. He wrote unto the two old Consuls Servilius and Atilius, desiring them to abstain from hazard of the main chance; but nevertheless, to ply the Carthaginians with daily skirmish, and weaken them by degrees: that when he and his Colleague should take the field, with the great Army which they were now levying, they might find the four old Legions well accustomed to the enemy, and the enemy well weakned to their hands. He was also very strict in his Musters; wherein the whole Senate assist him so carefully, as if in this action they meant to refute the slanders, with which Terentius and his adherents had burdened them. What number of men they raised, it is uncertain. Fourscore thousand foot, at the least, and six thousand horse, they were strong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had so greatly desired, of looking upon Hannibal.

Hiero the old King of Syracuse, as he had relieved the Carthaginians, when they were distressed by their own Mercenaries; so did he now send help to Rome, a thousand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantity of Wheat, Barly, and other provisions: fearing nothing more, than that one of these two mighty Cities should destroy the other, whereby his own estate would fall to ruine, that stood upright, by having them somewhat evenly ballanced. He gave them also counsel, to send forces into Africa; if (perhaps) by that means they might divert the war from home. His gifts, and good advice were lovingly accepted; and instructions were given to Titus Octacilius the Prætor, which was to go into Sicily, that he should accordingly pass over into Africk, if he found it expedient.

The great Levies, which the Romans made at this time, do much more serve to declare their puissance, than any, though larger accompt by Poll, of such as were not easily drawn into the field, and fitted for service. For, besides these Armies of the Consuls, and that which went into Sicily, twenty five thousand, with L. Posthumius Albinus, another of the Prætors, went against the Gauls, to reclaim that Province which the passage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their present strength might well embolden them to do as they did. They sent Embassadours to Philip, the Son of Demetrius, King of Macedon, requiring him to deliver into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who, having been their subject, and rebel, was fled into his Kingdom. They also sent to the Illyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payment was already past. What answer they received, it is not known: only this is known, that Demetrius Pharius was not sent unto them; and that Philip henceforth began to have an eye upon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian money, by the shifts that they were driven soon after to make, it will appear, that the one half of it (how little soever) would have been welcom to Rome, and accepted, without any cavil about forfeiture for non-payment of the whole.

Whilest the City was busied in these cares, the old Consuls lay as near unto Hannibal as possibly they could without incurring the necessity of a battel. Many skirmishes they had with him; wherein their success, for the most part, was rather good than great. Yet one mischance not only blemished the honour of their other services, but was indeed the occasion to draw on the misery following. Hannibal for the most part of that time, made his abode at Geryon; where lay all his store for the Winter. The Romans to be near him lodged about Cannusium; and, that they might not be driven to turn aside for all necessaries, to the loss of good opportunities, they bestowed much of their provisions in the Castle of Cannæ: for the Town was razed the year before. This place Hannibal wan, and thereby not only furnished himself, but compelled his enemies to want many needful things, unless they would be troubled with far carriage. Besides this, and more to his advantage, he enabled himself to abide in that open Country, fit for the service of his Horse, longer than the Romans, having so many mouths to feed, could well endure to tarry; without offering battel, which he most desired. Of this mishap when Servilius had informed the Senate, letting them understand how this Piece taken by Hannibal, would serve him to command no small part of the Country adjacent; it then seemed needful, even unto the Fathers themselves, to adventure a battel with the Carthaginian, rather than suffer him thus to take root in the ground of Italy. Nevertheleſs anſwer was returned unto Servilius, that he ſhould have patience yet awile: for that the Conſuls would ſhortly be there, with a Power ſufficient to do as need required.

When all things were ready in the City, and the ſeaſon of the year commodious to take the field, the two Conſuls, with their Army, ſet forth againſt Hannibal. This was always done with great ſolemnity: eſpecially, whenſoever they went forth to war againſt any noble or redoubted enemy. For Sacrifices, and ſolemn Vows, were made unto Jupiter, and the reſt of their gods, for good ſucceſs and Victory: which being performed, the Generals in warlike attire, with an honourable train of the principal men, (not only ſuch as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the war, as Voluntaries, for love, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home,) were accompanied on their way, and diſmiſſed with friendly leave-taking, and good wiſhes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobility, waited upon Æmilius Paulus, as the only Man, whom they thought either worthy of this honour, or likely to do his Country remarkable ſervice. Terentius his Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens; a troop no leſs in greatneſs, than the other was in dignity. At the parting, Fabius the late Dictator, is ſaid to have exhorted the Conſul Paulus, with many grave words, to ſhew his magnanimity, not only in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which he thought harder) in bridling the outragious folly of his fellow-Conſul. The anſwer of Paulus, was, That he meant not again to run into danger of condemnation by offending the multitude; that he would do his beſt for his Country, but if he ſaw his beſt were likely to be ill taken, he would think it leſs raſhneſs to adventure upon the Enemies ſword, than upon the malice of his own Citizens.

SECT. VIII.

Diſſention between the two Roman Conſuls. Whether it be likely, that Hannibal was upon point of flying out of Italy, when the Romans preſſed him to fight. The great battel of Cannæ.

THeſe new Generals, arriving at the Camp, diſmiſſed M. Atilius, one of the laſt years Conſuls, requeſting it becauſe of his age and weakneſs: Servilius they retained with them, as their aſſiſtant. The firſt thing that Æmilius thought neceſſary, was, to hearten his Souldiers with good words; who out of their bad ſucceſs hitherto, had gathered, more cauſe of fear, than of courage. He willed them to conſider not only now, their victories in time paſt againſt the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but even their own great numbers: which were no leſs than all that Rome at the preſent was able to ſet forth. He told them in what danger their Country ſtood; how the ſtate and ſafety thereof reſted upon their hands; uſing ſome ſuch other common matter of perſwaſion. But the moſt effectual part of this Oration, was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Army, had not yet obtained one victory by plain force and valour: but that only by deceit and ambuſh he had ſtoln the honour, which he had gotten at Trebia and Thraſymene. Herewithal he taxed the inconſiderate raſhneſs of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one ſaw not his enemies, untill he was ſurrounded by them, the other ſcarce ſaw them, when they ſtruck off his head, by reaſon of the thick miſt, through the darkneſs whereof he went groping (as it were blind-fold) into their ſnares. Finally declaring what advantages they had againſt the Enemy; and how deſtitute the Enemy was of thoſe helps, by which he had hitherto prevailed againſt them; he exhorted them to play the men, and do their beſt. They were eaſily perſwaded: for the contemplation of their own multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of Arms, gave them cauſe to think, that under a Captain ſo well experienced, and every way ſufficient, as Æmilius was known to be, they ſhould eaſily prevail againſt the Carthaginians, that came ſhort of them in all things elſe, ſave craft; which would not alwaies thrive. But in one thing they miſtook the meaning of their General. It was his deſire that they ſhould have heart to fight; not that they ſhould loſe the patience of awaiting a convenient ſeaſon. But they, having preconceived a victory, thought all delaies to be impediments: and thereby ſought to rob themſelves of their beſt helr; which was, Good conduct. They remembred what talk they had heard at Rome: and were themſelves affected with the vulgar deſire, of ending the war quickly, wherein ſince Æmilius had acknowledged, that the advantage was theirs, why did he make them forbear to uſe it? Thus thought the common Souldier: and thus alſo thought the Conſul Terentius; who was no leſs popular in the Camp, than he had been in the City. Expectation is alwaies tedious; and never more, than when the Event is of moſt importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Army, to be freed from the doubtful paſſions of Hope and Fear: therefore Terentius, who haſtened their deſire to effect, was likely to win more thanks, than ſhould his Colleague, though greater in performance.

Thus while the Romans think themſelves to have the better of their enemies, they fall into an inconvenience, than which few are more danger ous; Diſſention of their chief Commanders. Varro would fight: Æmilus would ſo too, but ſaid that it was not yet time; why? becauſe the enemy muſt ſhortly diſlodge, and remove hence, into places leſs fit for his horſe. But ſhall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, having eaten up his laſt years proviſions, return into Campania to gather a ſecond Harveſt? This would (ſaid Varro) favour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haſte (ſaid Paulus) doth favour no leſs of C. Flaminius. Their deeds were like their words: for they commanded by turns interchangeably every day. Æmilius lodged ſix miles from Hanibal, where the ground was ſomewhat uneven. Thither if the Carthaginians would take pains to come, he doubted not to ſend them away in ſuch haſte, as they ſhould not leave running till they were out of Italy. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day deſcended into the Plains; his Colleague holding him, and beſeeching him to ſtay. Nevertheleſs, he ſate down cloſe by Hannibal; who, as and unbidden gueſt, gave him but a rude welcom and entertainment. The Carthaginian Horſe, and light armature, fell upon the Roman Vant-courrers; and put the whole Army in tumult, whileſt it was yet in march: but they were beaten off, not without loſs, for that the Romans had among their Velites, ſome ſome troops weightily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Æmilius, who could not handſomely withdraw the Army out of that level ground, incamped upon the River Aufidus; ſending a third part of his forces over the water, to lye upon the Eaſtern bank, where they entrenched themſelves. He never was more unwilling to fight than at this preſent; becauſe the ground ſerved wholly for the advantage of his enemy; with whom he meant to deal, when occaſion ſhould draw him to more equal terms. Therefore he ſtirred not out of his Trenches, but fortified himſelf, expecting when Hannibal ſhould diſlodge, and remove towards Geryon, Cannæ, or ſome other place, where his ſtore lay, for want of neceſſaries: whereof an Army forraging the Countrey, was not likely to carry about with it ſufficient quantity, for any long time.

Here it would not be paſſed over with ſilence, That Livie differeth much in his relation from Polybius; telling many ſtrange tales, of the miſery into which Hannibal had been driven; and of baſe courſes that he deviſed to take, if the Romans could have retained their patience a little longer. He had (ſaith Livie) but ten daies proviſion of meat. He had not money to pay his ſouldiers. They were an unruly Rabble, gathered out of ſeveral Nations, ſo that he knew not how to keep them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, firſt, about their Pay, and Provant, and afterwards for very famine. Eſpecially the Spaniards were ready to forſake him, and run over to the Romans ſide. Yea Hannibal himſelf was once upon the point, to have ſtoln away into Gaul with all his horſe, and left his foot unto their miſerable deſtinies. At length for lack of all other counſel, he reſolved to get him as far as he could from the Romans, into the Southermoſt pars of Apulia; to the end, that both his unfaithful Souldiers might find the more difficulty in running from him; and that his hunger might be relieved with the more early harveſt. But whileſt he was about to put this device in execution, the Romans preſſed him ſo hard, that they even forced him to that, which he moſt deſired, even to fight a battel upon open Champain ground; wherein he was victorious. It was not uncommendable in Livie, to ſpeak the beſt of his own Citizens; and, where they did ill, to ſay, That, without their own great folly, they had done paſſing well. Further alſo he may be excuſed; as writing only by report. For thus he ſaith, Hannibal de fuga in Galliam [dicitur] agitaſſe; Hannibal [is ſaid] to have bethought himſelf of flying into Gaul: where he makes it no more than a matter of hearſay; as perhaps was all the reſt of this Relation. As for the proceſs it ſelf, it is cry incredible. For if Hannibal, coming out of Gaul, thorow the Mariſhes and Bogs of Hetruria, could find victuals enough, and all things needful unto his Army, the Summer fore going: what ſhould hinder him to do the like this year; eſpecially ſince he had plaid the careful Husband in making a great harveſt; ſince he had long been Maſter of the open field; and beſides, had gotten, by ſurpriſe, no ſmall part of the Romans proviſions? Suitable hereunto is all the reſt. If Hannibal had taken nothing but Corn and Cattel, his Souldiers might perhaps have fallen into mutiny for pay. But he brought gold with him into Italy: and had ſo well increaſed his ſtock, ſince he came into that Country, that he had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like, and loaded his followers with ſpoil: having left wherewith to redeem as many of his own, as were taken by the enemy; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not eaſie to do the like. In this point therefore we are to attend the general agreement of Hiſtorians; who give it as a principal commendation unto Hannibal, That he always kept his Army free from ſedition, though it were compoſed of ſundry Nations, no leſs different in manners, Religion, and almoſt in Nature, than they were in languages: and well might he ſo do, having not only pronounced, That which of his men ſoever fought bravely with an enemy was thereby a Carthaginian; but ſolemnly proteſted and ſwore, (beſides other rewards) to make as many of them as ſhould deſerve and ſeek it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaul, was a ſenſeleſs device. Hannibal being there with his whole Army, took ſo little pleaſure in the Country and people, that he made all haſte to get him out of it. And what ſhould he now do there with his horſe? or could he be truſted, either there, or elſewhere? yea, how could he deſire to live, having betrayed all his Army, and relinquiſhed his miſerable foot to the butchery of their enemies? This tale therefore Plutarch omitteth, who in writing the life of Hannibal, takes in a manner all his directions from Livie. But of this and the like it is enough to ſay, That all Hiſtorians love to extol their own Country-men; and where a loſs cannot be diſſembled, nor the honour of the victory taken from the enemy, and given unto blind Fortune, there to lay all the blame on ſome ſtrange miſ-government of their own forces: as if they might eaſily have won all, but loſt all through ſuch folly, as no Enemy can hope to find in them another time.

Now let us return back to the two Armies, where they lye incamped on the River Aufidus. Varro was perſwaded, that it concerned him in honour to make good his word unto the people of Rome: and ſince he had thus long waited in vain to get the conſent of Paulus, now at length to uſe his own authority; and, without any more diſputing of the matter, to fight when his own day came. When therefore it was his turn to command; at the firſt break of the day he began to paſs the River, without ſtaying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him, and ſought, as in former times, to have diſſwaded him from putting the eſtate of his Countrey to a needleſs hazard. Againſt thoſe words and ſubſtantial arguments, Terentius could alledge none other than point of honour. Hannibal had preſented them battel at their Trenches: ſhould they endure this Bravado? He had ſent his Numidians over the River but even the day before; who fell upon the Romans that were fetching water to the leſſer Camp; and drave them ſhamefully to run within their defences; which alſo they made offer to aſſail: Muſt this alſo be ſuffered? He would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the ſpirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was lively, and full of ſuch courage, as promiſed aſſured victory. When Æmilius perceived that he could not hinder the obſtinate reſolution of his Companion, he took all care, that what he ſaw muſt be done, might be done well. Ten thouſand Roman foot he cauſed to be left behind, in the greater Camp oppoſite unto the Carthaginian, to the intent, that either Hannibal might be compelled to leave behind him ſome anſwerable number, for defence of his Trenches (which out of his paucity he was leſs able to ſpare from the battel, than were the Romans) or that theſe ten thouſand, falling upon the Carthaginian Camp, when the fight began, and taking it with all the wealth therein, might thereby (as commonly do ſuch accidents) terrifie and diſtract the enemies in the heat of fight. This done, the two Conſuls went over the water with their Army to the leſſer Camp, whence alſo they drew forth their men, and raged them in order of battel: the ground on the Eaſt part of the River, ſeeming perhaps more fit for marſhalling of their Army. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cauſe; and without any delay, paſſed likewiſe over, ſomewhat higher up the ſtream, which ran from the South; leaving in his own Camp ſo many, as he thought would ſerve to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men; he bade them look about them, and view the ground well, upon which they were to fight. They did ſo. And could you (ſaid he) pray for any greater fortune, than to joyn battel with the Romans upon ſuch a level ground, where the ſtronger in horſe are ſure to prevail? They all aſſented to him; and ſhewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (ſaid he further) ye are firſt of all to thank the gods, that have brought them hither; and then Us, that have trained them along, and drawn them into neceſſity of playing for their lives, where they are ſure to loſe them. As for theſe Romans, I was fain to encourage you againſt them, when ye met them firſt: but now ye may even encourage your ſelves, by calling to mind that they are the men, whom ye have as often beaten as ſeen. Of one thing only I will put you in mind: That whereas hitherto you fought for other reſpects, as, to drive them before you out of Gaul; and to win the open Country, and fields of Italy; both of which ye have obtained: now are ye to fight for the Towns themſelves, and all the riches within them; which this victory ſhall make yours. Therefore play the ſtout Souldiers: and ere many hours paſs, ye ſhall be Lords of all that the Romans hold.

When he had ſaid this; his Brother Mago came to him, whom he had ſent to view the countenance of the enemy. Hannibal asked him, what news; and what work they were likely to have with theſe Romans? Work enough (anſwered Mago) for they are an horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replied) I tell thee, Brother, that among them all, ſearch them never ſo diligently, thou ſhalt not find one man, whoſe name is Mago. With that he fell a laughing, and ſo did all that ſtood about him; which gladded the Souldiers, who thought their General would not be ſo merry, without great aſſurance. Whether it were ſo, that Hannibal, in the pride of his victories already gotten, valued one Mago above many thouſand Romans; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no leſs troubled with thinking upon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether he meant only to correct the ſad mood of his Brother with a jeſt, and ſhew himſelf merry unto the Souldiers: this his anſwer was more manly, than was the relation of his diſcoverer. But if Hannibal himſelf had been ſent forth by Mago, to view the Romans, he could not have returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captain Gam, before the battel of Agincourt, made unto our King Henry the fifth: ſaying, That of the Frenchmen, there were enow to be killed; enow to be taken priſoners; and enow to run away. Even ſuch words as theſe, or ſuch pleaſant jeſts as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but ſerve many times, when battel is in hand, to work upon ſuch paſſions, as muſt govern more of the buſineſs: eſpecially, where other needful care is not wanting; without which they are but vain boaſts.

In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himſelf, expreſſing no leſs perfection of his military skill, than was greatneſs in his ſpirit and undertakings. For to omit the commodiouſneſs of the place, into which he had long before conceived the means to draw his enemies to battel; he marſhalled his Army in ſuch convenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where every one might do his beſt ſervice. His Darters, and Slingers of the Baleares, he ſent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velites. Theſe were looſe Troops, anſwerable in a manner to thoſe, which we call now by a French name, Enfans Perdues; but when we uſe our own terms, the forlorn-hope. The groſs of his Army following them, he ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman manner, with the ſpoils which they had gotten at Trebia, Thraſymene, or elſewhere; and well trained in the uſe of thoſe weapons that were of more advantage, than thoſe wherewith they had formerly ſerved; made the two wings very deep in File. Between theſe he ranged his Gauls and Spaniards, armed each after their own Country manner; their ſhields alike; but the Gauls uſing long broad ſwords, that were forcible in a down-right ſtroak; the Spaniards, ſhort and well pointed blades, either to ſtrike or thruſt; the Gauls, naked from their navel upwards, as confident in their own fierceneſs: the Spaniards, wearing white Caſſocks embroidered with Purple. This medley of two Nations, differing as well in habit and furniture, as in quality, made a gallant ſhew, and terrible, becauſe ſtrange. The Gauls were ſtrong of body, and furious in giving charge, but ſoon wearied, as accuſtomed to ſpend their violence at the firſt brunt, which diſpoſition all that come of them have inherited to this day. The Spaniards were leſs eager, but more wary; neither aſhamed to give ground, when they were over-preſſed; nor afraid to return, and renew the fight, upon any ſmall encouragement. As the roughneſs of the one, and patience of the other, ſerved mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firm temper; ſo the place which they held in this battel, added confidence joyntly unto them both. For they ſaw themſelves well and ſtrongly flanked with Carthaginians and other Africans; whoſe name was grown terrible in Spain, by their Conqueſts, and in Gaul, by this their preſent War. Since therefore it could not be feared, that any great calamity ſhould fall upon them, whilſt the wings on either ſide ſtood faſt: theſe Barbarians had no cauſe to ſhrink, or forbear to employ the uttermoſt of their hardineſs, as knowing that the enemy could not preſs far upon them, without further ingaging himſelf than diſcretion would allow. Hereunto may be added that great advantage, which the Carthaginian had in horſe; by which he was able, if the worſt had happened, to make a good retrait. The effect of contraries is many times alike. Deſperation begetteth courage; but no greater, nor ſo lively, as doth aſſured Confidence. Hannibal therefore cauſed the Gauls and Spaniards to advance, leaving void the place wherein they had ſtood, and into which they might fall back, when they ſhould be over-hardly preſſed. So, caſting them them into the form of a Creſcent, He made them as it were his Vantguard: the two points of this great half Moon, that looked toward the empty ſpace from which he had drawn it, being narrow and thin, as ſerving only to guide it orderly back, when need ſhould require; the foremoſt part of the Ring, ſwelling out toward the enemies, being well ſtrengthened and thickned againſt all impreſſion. The circle hereof ſeemeth to have been ſo great, that it ſhadowed the Africans, who ſtood behind it: though ſuch figures, cut in braſs, as I have ſeen of this Battle, preſent it more narrow; with little reaſon, as ſhall anon appear: as alſo in the ſame figures it is omitted, That any Companies of Africans, or others, were left in the Rear, to ſecond the Gauls and Spaniards when they were driven to retrait; though it be manifeſt, that Hannibal in perſon ſtood between the laſt ranks of his long Battalions, and in the head of his Rear, doubtleſs well accompanied with the choice of his own Nation. Between the left Battalion and the River Auſidus, were the Gauls and Spaniſh horſe, under the command of Aſdrubal: On the right wing, toward the wide Plains, was Hanno (Livie ſaith Maharbal) with the Numidian light-horſe. Hannibal himſelf, with his brother Mago, and the leading of the Rear. The whole ſumm of Hannibals Army in the field this day, was ten thouſand horſe, and forty thouſand foot, his enemies having two to one againſt him in foot; and He, five to three againſt them in horſe.

The Roman Army was marſhalled in the uſual form: but ſomewhat more narrow, and deep than was accuſtomed; perhaps, becauſe this had been found convenient againſt the Carthaginians, in the former war. It was indeed no bad way of reſiſtance againſt Elephants, to make the Ranks thick and ſhort, but the Files long; as alſo to ſtrengthen well the Rear, that it might ſtand faſt compacted as a wall, under ſhelter whereof the diſordered troops might re-ally themſelves. Thus much it ſeems, that Terentius had learned of ſome old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battels accordingly, as meaning to ſhew more skill, than was in his underſtanding. But the Carthaginians had here no Elephants with them in the field: their advantage was in Horſe; againſt which this manner of imbattailing was very unprofitable, foraſmuch as their charge is better ſuſtained in front, than upon a long flank. As for Æmilius, it was not his day of command: He was but an Aſſiſtant; and in ſuch caſes it happens often, that wiſe men yield for very wearineſs unto the more contentious. Upon the right hand, and toward the River, were the Roman horſemen, under the Conſul Paulus: On the left wing, was C. Terentius Varro the other Conſul, with the reſt of the horſe, which were of the Latines, and other aſſociates: Cn. Servilius the former years Conſul, had the leading of the battel. The Sun was newly riſen, and offended neither part; the Carthaginians having their faces Northward, the Romans toward the South.

After ſome light skirmiſh, between the Roman Velites, and Hannibal his Darters and Slingers of the Baleares; Aſdrubal brake upon the Conſul Paulus, and was roughly encountred: not after the manner of ſervice on horſe-back, uſed in thoſe times, wheeling about Alman-like; but each giving on in a right line, Pouldron to Pouldron, as having the River on the one hand, and the ſhoulder of the foot on the other hand; ſo that there was no way left, but to pierce and break thorow. Wherefore they not only uſed their Lances and Swords; but ruſhing violently amongſt the Enemies, graſped one another: and ſo their horſes running from under them, fell many to the ground; where ſtarting up again, they began to deal blows like foot-men. In concluſion, the Roman horſe were over-born, and driven by plain force to a ſtaggering recoil. This the Conſul Paulus could not remedy. For Aſdrubal, with his boiſterous Gauls and Spaniards, were not to be reſiſted by theſe Roman Gentleman, unequal both in number, and in horſemanſhip. When the battels came to joyning, the Roman Legionaries found work enough, and ſomewhat more than enough, to break that great Creſcent, upon which they firſt fell: ſo ſtrongly for the while, did the Gauls and Spaniſh foot make reſiſtance. Wherefore the two points of their battel drew towards the midſt; by whoſe aid, theſe oppoſites were forced to disband, and fly back to their firſt place. This they did in great haſte and fear: and were with no leſs haſte, and folly purſued. Upon the Africans that ſtood behind them, they needed not to fall foul; both for that there was void room enough; and for as much as the Rear, or Horns of this Moon, pointed into the ſafe retrait, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was ready to re-enforce them, when time ſhould require. In this haſty retrait, or flight of the Gauls and Spaniards, it hapned, as was neceſſary, that they who had ſtood in the limb or utter compaſs of the half Moon, made the innermoſt or concave ſurface thereof (diſordered and broken though it were) when it was forced to turn the inſide outward: the horns or points thereof, as yet, untouched, only turning round, and recoyling very little. So the Romans, in purſuing them, were incloſed in an half circle; which they ſhould not have needed greatly to regard, (for that the ſides of it were exceeding thin and broken; and the bottom of it, none other than a throng of men routed, and ſeeming unable to make reſiſtance) had all the enemies foot been caſt into this one great body, that was in a manner diſſolved. But whileſt the Legions, following their ſuppoſed victory, ruſhed on upon thoſe that ſtood before them, and thereby unwittingly engaged themſelves deeply within the principal ſtrength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either ſide advanced ſo far, that getting beyond the Rear of them, they encloſed them, in a manner, behind: and forward they could not paſs far, without removing Hannibal and Mago; which made that way the leaſt eaſie. Hereby it is apparent, That the great Creſcent, before ſpoken of, was of ſuch extent, as covered the Africans, who lay behind it undiſcerned, until now. For it is agreed, that the Romans were thus empaled unawares; and that they behaved themſelves, as men that thought upon no other work, than what was found them by the Gauls. Neither is it credible, that they would have been ſo mad, as to run head-long, with the whole bulk of their Army, into the throat of ſlaughter; had they ſeen thoſe weapons bent againſt them at the firſt, which when they did ſee, they had little hope to eſcape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and raſhneſs of inferiour Captains: but ſince the Conſul Paulus, a man ſo expert in war, being vanquiſhed in horſe, had put himſelf among the Legions; it cannot be ſuppoſed, that he and they did willfully thus engage themſelves. Aſdrubal, having broken the Troops of Roman horſe, that were led by the Conſul Paulus, followed upon them along the River ſide, beating down and killing, as many as he could, (which were almoſt all of them) without regard of taking prisoners. The Consul himself was either driven upon his own Legions, or willingly did cast himself among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithstanding the defeat of his horse. But he failed of this his expectation. Nevertheless he cheared up his men as well as he could, both with comfortable words, and with the example of his own stout behaviour: beating down and killing many of the enemies with his own hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the battle; and with better success. For the Consul received a blow from a sling, that did him great hurt: and though a Troop of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to save him from further harm; yet was he so hardly laid at, that he was compelled, by wounds and weakness, to forsake his horse. Hereupon all his company alighted, thinking that the Consul had given order so to do: as in many battels, the Roman men at arms had left their horses, to help their foot in distress. When Hannibal (for he was near at hand) perceived this, and understood that the Consul had willed his horsemen to dismount; He was very glad of it, and pleasantly said, I had rather he would have delivered them unto me, bound hand and foot: meaning that he had them now almost as safe, as if they were so bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with the horse of his associates, in the left wing, was marvellously troubled by Hanno (or Maharbal) and the Numidians: who beating up and down about that great sandy Plain, raised a foul dust; which a strong South wind, blowing there accustomarily, drave into the eyes and mouthes of the Romans. These, using their advantage both of number and of lightness, wearied the Consul and his followers exceedingly: neither giving, nor sustaining any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at the first they seemed to promise him an happy day of it. For when the battels were even ready to joyn; five hundred of these Numidians came pricking away from their fellows, with their shields cast behind their backs, (as was the manner of those which yielded) and throwing down their arms, rendred themselves. This was good luck to begin withal, if there had been good meaning. Varro had not leisure to examine them; but caused them, unweaponed as they were, to get them behind the Army, where he bade them rest quietly till all was done. These crafty adventurers did as he bade them, for a while; till they found opportunity to put in execution the purpose, for which they had thus yielded. Under their Jackets they had short swords and poniards; besides which, they found other scattered weapons about the field of such as were slain, and therewithal flew upon the hindmost of the Romans, whilest all eyes and thoughts were bent another way: so that they did great mischief, and raised yet a greater terrour. Thus Hannibal, in a plain level ground, found means to lay an ambush at the back of his enemies. The last blow, that ended all fight and resistance, was given by the same hand which gave the first. Asdrubal (having in short space broken the Roman Troops of horse, and cut in pieces all, save the Company of Æmilius that rushed into the gross of his foot, and a very few besides, that recovered some narrow passage, between the River and their own Battalions) did not stay to charge upon the face of the Legions, but fell back behind the Rear of his own, and fetching about, came up to the Numidians: with whom he joyned, and gave upon Terentius.

This fearful Cloud, as it shewed at the first appearance what weather it had left behind it, on the other side: so did it prognosticate a dismal storm unto those upon whom it was ready now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, having wearied themselves much in doing little, and seeing more work toward, than they could hope to sustain; thought it the best way, to avoid the danger by present flight. The Consul was no less wise than they, in apprehending the greatness of his own peril: nor more desperate, in striving to work impossibilities: it being impossible, when so many shrank from him, to sustain the impression alone, which he could not have indured with their assistance. Now he found that it was one thing to talk of Hannibal at Rome; and another, to incounter him. But of this, or of ought else, excepting hasty flight, his present leisure would not serve him to consider. Close at the heels of him and his flying Troops, followed the light Numidians, appointed by Asdrubal unto the pursuit, as fittest for that service. Asdrubal himself, with the Gauls and Spanish horse, compassing about, fell upon the backs of the Romans; that were ere this hardly distressed, and in a manner surrounded on all parts else: He brake them easily; who before made ill resistance, being inclosed, and laid at on every side, not knowing which way to turn. Here began a pitiful slaughter: the vanquished multitude thronging up and down, they knew not whither or which way, whileſt every one sought to avoid those enemies, whom he saw nearest. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Æmilius, got up to horse, and saved themselves: which though it is hardly understood how they could do; yet I will rather believe it, than suppose that Livie so reporteth, to grace thereby his History with this following Tale: Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, galloping along by a place where he saw the Consul sitting all blooddied upon a stone, intreated him to rise and save himself; offering him his assistance and horse. But Paulus refused it; willing Lentulus to shift for himself, and not to lose time: saying, That it was not his purpose to be brought again into judgment by the People, either as an accuser of his Colleague, or as guilty himself of that daies loss. Further, he willed Lentulus to commend him to the Senate, and in particular to Fabius: willing them to fortifie Rome, as fast as well they could; and telling Fabius, that he lived and died mindful of his wholesome counsel. These words (peradventure) or some to like purpose, the Consul uttered to Lentulus, either when against his will he was drawn to that battel, or when he beheld the first defeat of his horse; at what time he put himself in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannibal knew what he said a good while before this; when he thought the Consul and his Troop, in little better case than if they had been bound. The whole Gross of the Romans, was inclosed indeed as within a sack; whereof the African Battalions made the sides; the Spaniards, Gauls, and Hannibal with his Carthaginians, the bottom; and Asdrubal with his horse, closed up the mouth: in which part, they first of all were shuffled together, and began the Rout, wherein all the rest followed. Æmilius therefore, who could not sit his horse, whileſt the battel yet lasted, and whileſt the spaces were somewhat open, by which he might have withdrawn himself; was now (had he never so well been mounted) unable to fly, having in his way so close a throng of his own miserable rable followers, and so many heaps of bodies, as fell apace in that great Carnage. It sufficeth unto his honour, That in the Battel he fought no less valiantly, than he had warily before, both abstained himself, and disswaded his fellow-Consul, from fighting at all. If, when the day was utterly lost, it had lien in his power to save his own life unto the good of his Country, never more needing it; I should think, that he either too much disesteemed himself; or being too faintly minded, was weary of the World, and his unthankful Citizens. But if such a resolution were praise-worthy in Æmilius, as proceeding out of Roman valour; then was the English vertue of the Lord John Talbot, Viscount Lisle, son to that famous Earl of Shrewsbury, who died in the Battel of Chastillon, more highly to be honoured. For Æmilius was old, grievously, if not mortally wounded, and accomptable for the overthrow received: Talbot was in the flowre of his youth, unhurt, easily able to have escaped, and not answerable for that dayes misfortune, when he refused to forsake his Father; who foreseeing the loss of the battel, and not meaning to stain his actions past by flying in his old age, exhorted this his noble son to be gone and leave him.

In this terrible overthrow died all the Roman foot, save two or three thousand, who (as Livie saith) escaped into the lesser Camp; whence the same night, about six hundred of them brake forth, and joyning with such of those in the greater Camp, as were willing to try their fortune, conveyed themselves away ere morning, about four thousand foot, and two hundred horse, partly in whole troops, partly dispersed into Cannusium: the next day the Roman Camps, both less and greater, were yielded unto Hannibal by those that remained in them. Polybius hath no mention of this escape: only he reports, that the ten thousand, whom Æmilius had left on the West side of Ausidus (as was shewed before) to set upon the Camp of Hannibal, did as they were appointed; but ere they could effect their desire, which they had well-near done, the battel was lost: and Hannibal, coming over the water to them, drave them into their own Camp; which they quickly yielded, having lost two thousand of their number. Like enough it is, that at the first sight of Hannibal, coming upon them with his victorious Army, a greater number of these did fly, and thereby escaped, whilest their fellows, making defence in vain, retired into their Camp, and held the enemy busied. For about two Legions they were (perhaps not half full, but made up by addition of others, whose fault or fortune was like) that having served at Cannæ, were afterwards extremely disgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their companions fighting. Of the Roman horse what numbers escaped, it is uncertain: but very few they were that saved themselves in the first charge, by getting behind the River; and Terentius the Consul recovered Venusia, with threescore and ten at the most in his company. That he was so ill attended, it is no marvel; for Venusia lay many miles off to the Southward; so that his neareſt way thither, had been through the midst of Hannibals Army, if the passage had been open. Therefore it must needs be, that when once he got out of sight, he turned up some by-way; so disappointing the Numidians that hunted contre. Of such as could not hold pace with the Consul, but took other ways, and were scattered over the fields, 2000 or there about, were gathered up by the Numidians, and made prisoners: the rest were slain, all save 300, who dispersed themselves in flight, as chance led them, and got into sundry Towns. There died in this great Battel of Cannæ, besides L. Æmilius Paulus the Consul, two of the Roman Quæstors or Treasurers, and 21 Colonels or Tribunes of the Souldiers, 80 Senators, or such as had born office, out of which they were to be chosen into the Senate. Many of these were of special mark, as having been Ædiles, Prætors or Consuls: among whom was Cn. Servilius, the last years Consul, and Minutius, late Master of the horse. The number of prisoners, taken in this battel, Livie makes no greater than 3000 foot, and 300 horse: too few to have defended for the space of one half hour, both the Roman Camps, which yet the same Livie saith, to have been over-cowardly yielded up. We may therefore do better, to give credit unto one of the prisoners, whom the same Historian shortly after introduceth, speaking in the Senate, and saying, That they were no less than 8000. It may therefore be, that these 3000 were only such as the Enemy spared, when the fury of Execution was past: but to these must be added about 5000 more, who yielded in the greater Camp, when their company were either slain or fled. So the reckoning falls out right: which the Romans, especially the Consul Varro, had before cast up (as we say) without their Host; nothing so chargeable, as now they find it. On the side of Hannibal there died some 4000 Gauls, 1500 Spaniards and Africans, and 200 Horse, or thereabouts: a loss not sensible, in the joy of so great a victory; which if he had pursued, as Maharbal advised him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome; it is little doubted, but that the war had presently been at an end. But he believed not so far in his own prosperity; and was therefore told, That he knew how to get, not how to use a victory.

SECT. IX.

Of things following the Battel at Cannæ.

NOt without good cause doth Polybius reprehend those two Historians, Fabius the Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian; who, regarding more the pleasure of them unto whose honour they consecrated their travels, than the truth of things, and information of posterity, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quirites and Fathers conscript. No man of sound judgement will condemn this liberty of censure, which Polybius hath used. For, to recompence his juniority (such as it was) he produceth substantial arguments, to justifie his own Relation; and confuteth the vanity of those former Authors, out of their own writings, by conference of places ill cohering: which pains is to be suspected, that he would not have taken, had he been born in either of these two Cities, but have spared some part of his diligence, and been contented to have all men think better and more honourably than he deserved, of his own Country. The like disease it is to be feared, that we shall hereafter find in others; and shall have some cause to wish, that either they were somewhat less Roman, or else, that some works of their opposite Writers were extant, that so we might at least hear both sides speak: being henceforth destitute of Polybius his help, that was a man indifferent. But since this cannot be, we must be sometimes bold, to observe the coherence of things; and believe so much only to be true, as dependeth upon good reason, or (at least) fair probability. This attentive tive circumſpection is needful at the preſent: ſuch is the repugnancy, or forgetfulneſs, which we find in the beſt narration of things following the Battel of Cannæ. For it is ſaid, that four thouſand foot and horſe gathered together about the Conſul Terentius at Venuſia; that others to the number of ten thouſand got into Cannuſium, chuſing for their Captains, young P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudius; yet that the Conſul Terentius Varro, joyning his company unto thoſe of Scipio at Cannuſium, wrote unto the Senate, that he had now well near ten thouſand men about him; that theſe letters of the Conſul were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly riſen, that had been taking order for pacifying thoſe tumults in the City, which grew upon the firſt bruit of the overthrow; and yet, that Embaſſadours from Capua (after ſome conſultation, whether it were meet to ſend any, or without further circumſtance, to ſide with Hannibal) were ſent unto Terentius, and found him at Venuſia, a pretty while before he wrote thoſe letters, which overtook (in a manner) at Rome the firſt news of the overthrow. Among ſuch incoherences, I hold it the beſt way, to omit ſo much as hath not ſome particular connexion with matter enſuing: mutual dependency in things of this nature, being no ſmall argument of truth.

When Hannibal had ſacked the Roman Camp, and truſſed up the ſpoils, forthwith he diſlodged, and marched away into Samnium; finding a diſpoſition in the Hirpines, and many other people thereabout, to forſake the Roman party, and make alliance with Carthage. The firſt Town that opened the gates unto him, was Coſſa, where he laid up his baggage: and leaving his Brother Mago to take in other places, he haſted into Campania. The general affection of the multitude, in all the Cities of Italy, was inclinable unto him; not only in regard of their grievous loſſes ſuſtained abroad in the fields, which the Romans themſelves, who could not hinder him from ſpoiling the Countrey, eſpecially the poorer ſort of them, did hardly indure; but in a loving reſpect unto that great courteſie (as it ſeemed) which he uſed unto ſuch of them as became his priſoners. For as at other times, ſo now after this great victory at Cannæ, he had lovingly diſmiſſed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands; rebuking them gently for being ſo obſtinate againſt him that had ſought to deliver them from bondage. Neither ſpared he to win their love by gifts, pretending to admire their valour; but ſeeking indeed, by all wayes and means, to make them his, whileſt all other motives were concurrent. At this time alſo he began to deal kindly (though againſt his nature) with the Roman priſoners; telling them that he bore no mortal hatred unto their Eſtate; but being provoked by injuries, ſought to right himſelf and his Countrey; and fought with them, to try which of theſe two Cities, Rome or Carthage ſhould bear ſoveraign Rule, not which of them ſhould be deſtroyed. So he gave them leave to chuſe ten of their number, that ſhould be ſent home to treat with the Fathers about their ranſome: and together with theſe he ſent Carthalo a Nobleman of Carthage, and General of his Horſe, to feel the diſpoſition of the Senate, whether it were bowed as yet by ſo much adverſity, and could ſtoop unto deſire of peace. But with the Romans theſe Arts prevailed not, as ſhall be ſhewed in due place. The people of Italy, all, or moſt of them, ſave the Roman Colonies, or the Latines, were not only weary of their loſſes paſt, but entertained a deceivable hope, of changing their old Society for a better. Wherefore not only the Samnites, Lucans, Brutians, and Apulians, ancient enemies of Rome, and not until the former Generation utterly ſubdued, began to re-aſſume their wonted ſpirits: but the Campans, a Nation of all in Italy moſt bound unto the State of Rome, and by many mutual affinities therewith as ſtraightly conjoyned, as were any ſave the Latines, changed on a ſudden their love into hatred, without any other cauſe found, than change of fortune.

Campania is the moſt goodly and fruitful Province of Italy, if not (as ſome then thought) of all the Earth: and the City of Capua, anſwerable unto the Countrey, whereof it was Head; ſo great, fair, and wealthy, that it ſeemed no leſs convenient a ſeat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage. But of all qualities, Bravery is the leaſt requiſite unto ſoveraign command. The Campans were luxurious, idle, and proud: and valuing themſelves like Jayes by their feathers, deſpiſed the unfortunate vertue of the Romans their Patrons and Benefactors. Yet were there ſome of the principal among them, as in other Cities, that bore eſpecial regard unto the Majeſty of Rome, and could not indure to hear of Innovation. But the Plebeian faction had lately ſo prevailed within Capua, that all was governed by the pleaſure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Pacuvius Calavius an ambitious Noble-man, whoſe credit grew, and was upheld by furthering all popular deſires; whereof, the conjunction with Hannibal was not the leaſt. Some of the Capuans had offered their City to the Carthaginians ſhortly after the battel of Thraſymene: whereupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his journey into Campania: the Dictatour Fabius waiting upon him. At that time, either the nearneſs of the Roman Army, or ſome other fear of the Capuans hindred them from breaking into actual rebellion. They had indeed no leiſure to treat about any article of new Confederacy: or, had leiſure ſerved, yet were the multitude (whoſe inconſtant love Hannibal had won from the Romans, by gentle uſage, and free diſmiſſing of ſome priſoners in good account among them) unable to hold any ſuch negotiation, without advice of the Senate, which mainly impugned it. So they that had promiſed to yield up their Town to Hannibal, and meet him on the way, with ſome of their Nobility that ſhould aſſure him of all faithful meaning, were driven to ſit ſtill in a great perplexity: as having failed to let in this their new friend, yet ſufficiently diſcovered themſelves to draw upon them the hatred of the Romans. In this caſe were no ſmall number of the Citizens; who thereupon grew the more incenſed againſt their Senate, on whom they caſt all the blame, eaſily pardoning their own cowardize. The people holding ſo tender a regard of liberty, that even the lawful government of Magiſtrates grieved them, with an imaginary oppreſſion; had now good cauſe to fear leſt the Senators would become the Lords indeed, and by help of the Romans bring them under a more ſtraight ſubjection, than ever they had endured. This fear being ready to break into ſome outrage, Pacuvius made uſe of, to ſerve his own ambition. He diſcourſed unto the Senate, as they ſate in Council, about thoſe motions troubling the City: and ſaid, That he himſelf had both married a Roman Lady, and given his Daughter in marriage to a Roman: but, that the danger of forſaking of the Roman party was not now the greateſt: for that the people were violently bent to murder all the Senate, and after to joyn themſelves with Hannibal, who ſhould countenance the fact, and ſave them harmleſs. This he ſpake as a man well known to be beloved himſelf by the people, and privy unto their deſigns. Having throughly terrified the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging over them: he promiſed nevertheleſs to deliver them all, and to ſet things in quiet, if they would freely put themſelves into his hands; offering his oath, or any other aſſurance that they ſhould demand for his faithful meaning. They all agreed. Then ſhutting up the Court, and placing a guard of his own followers about it, that none might enter, nor iſſue forth, without his leave; he called the people to aſſembly: and ſpeaking as much ill of the Senate, as he knew they would be glad to hear, he told them, that theſe wicked Governours were ſurpriſed by his policy, and all faſt, ready to abide what ſentence they would lay upon them. Only thus much he adviſed them, as a thing which neceſſity required, That they ſhould chuſe a new Senate, before they ſatisfied their anger upon the old. So rehearſing unto them the names of one or two Senators; he asked what the judgement was of thoſe. All cryed out, That they were worthy of death. Chuſe then (ſaid he) firſt of all ſome new ones into their places. Hereat the multitude, unprovided for ſuch an election, was ſilent, until at laſt ſome one or other adventured to name whom he thought fit. The men ſo nominated, were utterly diſliked by the whole Aſſembly; either for ſome known fault, baſeneſs and inſufficiency; or elſe even becauſe they were unknown, and therefore held unworthy. This difficulty in the new Election appearing more and more, whileſt more were to be choſen; (the fitteſt man to be ſubſtituted, having been named among the firſt, and not thought fit enough) Pacuvius intreated, and eaſily prevail'd with the people, that the preſent Senate might for this time be ſpared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtleſs) they would make, having thus obtained pardon of all offences paſt. Henceforth, not only the people, as in former times, honoured Pacuvius, and eſteemed him their Patron; but the Senators alſo were governed by him, to whom they acknowledged themſelves indebted, for ſaving all their lives. Neither did the Senate fail after this by all obſequiouſneſs, to court the people, giving the reins unto their lawleſs Will, who elſe were likely to caſt them down. All the City being thus of one mind; only fear of the Romans kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battel at Canna, this impediment was removed; and few there were that would open their mouths to ſpeak againſt the rebellion. Yet forasmuch as three hundred principal Gentlemen of the Campans, did then ſerve the Romans in the Iſle of Sicily: the Parents and Kinſmen of theſe prevailed ſo far, that Embaſſadours were ſent unto Terentius the Conſul, to ſee his preſent caſe, and what it could miniſter of Hope or Fear. Theſe, whereſoever they found him, found him weakly attended, and as weak in ſpirit, as in followers. Yet they offered him formally the ſervice of their State; and deſired to know what he would command them. But he moſt baſely lamented unto them the greatneſs of the Romans misfortune: ſaying, That all was loſt; and that the Campans muſt now not help the Romans, who had nothing left wherewith to help themſelves, but make war in their defence againſt the Carthaginians; as the Romans had ſometimes done for the Campans againſt the Samnites. Hereunto he is ſaid to have added a fooliſh Invective againſt Hannibal and his Carthaginians: telling, how he had taught them to make bridges of ſlaughtered carkaſſes, and to feed upon mans fleſh, with ſuch other ſtuff, as only bewrayed his own fear. As for the Campans themſelves, he put them in mind of their preſent ſtrength: they having thirty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe; with money, and all proviſions, in abundance. Thus he diſmiſſed them prouder than they came; and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordſhip; whereas before they were ſomewhat timorous in adventuring to ſeek their own liberty. Having reported this at Capua; the ſame Embaſſadors were diſpatched away to Hannibal, with whom they eaſily made alliance, upon theſe conditions, that the Campans ſhould be abſolutely free, and ruled by their own Laws; That no Citizens of theirs ſhould be ſubject unto any Carthaginian Magiſtrate, in what caſe ſoever, whether in War or Peace; and that Hannibal ſhould deliver unto the Campans three hundred Roman priſoners, ſuch as themſelves would chuſe, whom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which were in Sicily.

Againſt all this Negotiation, Decius Magius, an honourable Citizen, oppoſed himſelf earneſtly; uſing, in vain, many perſwaſions, to the wilful and head-ſtrong Multitude; whom he put in mind of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, wiſhing them not to change old friends for new acquaintance. This did he, when they were ſending Embaſſadors to Hannibal; and this alſo did he, when the new alliance was concluded; but moſt earneſtly, when a Carthaginian Garriſon was entring the Town: at which time he gave advice, either to keep it out, or to fall upon it, and to cut it in pieces, that by ſuch a notable piece of ſervice, they might make amends unto the Romans, whom they had forſaken.

Advertiſement hereof was given to Hannibal: who lying about Naples not far off, ſent for Magius to come ſpeak with him in the Camp. This Magius refuſed: alledging, that he was by the late concluded Articles, free from ſubjection unto any Carthaginians; and therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon haſted himſelf towards Capua; forbearing to attempt any further upon Naples, which he thought to have taken in his way by Scalado, but found the walls too high, and was not well provided to lay ſiege unto it. At Capua he was entertained with great ſolemnity and pomp: all the people iſſuing forth of the Town, to behold the great Commander, which had won ſo many noble victories. Having taken his pleaſure in the ſight of that goodly City, and paſſed over his firſt entertainments, he came into their Senate, wher he commended their reſolution, in ſhaking off the Roman yoke; promiſing, that ere long all Italy and Rome it ſelf, ſhould be driven to acknowledge Capua as chief, and receive Law from thence. As for Decius Magius, who openly took part with the Romans their enemies; he prayed them, that they would not uſe him as a Campan, but a Traitor to the State, and uſe him accordingly, giving ſentence out of hand upon him, as he deſerved. This was granted: and Magius delivered unto Hannibal; who unwilling to offend the Capuans, at his firſt coming, by putting ſo great a man to death, yet fearing that they might ſue for his liberty, if he kept him alive, thought it beſt to ſend him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal ſettled his friendſhip with the Campanes: among whom, only this Decius Magius had openly dared to ſpeak againſt him; being aſſiſted by Perolla the Son of Pacuvius. This Perolla would have murdered Hannibal, whileſt he was at ſupper, the firſt night of his coming, had not his Fathers authority kept him from attempting any ſuch attempt. All the Town (beſides)

were so earnest in the love of their new Society, that they are said to have murdered all the Romans, upon whom at the present they could lay hand; or (which is all one) to have smothered them to death in an hot Bath.

The same course of fortune, with those of Capua, ran some other Towns thereabouts which depended on this, as their Mother City. Nola, Nuceria, Naples, Casiline, and Acerræ, where the Cities next adjoyning, that stood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to find them weakly manned; as they were indeed, though stoutly defended.

The Romans at this time were not in case, to put Garrisons into all their walled Towns; but were fain to leave all places, except a few of the most suspected, unto the faith and courage of the inhabitants. Rome it self was in extream fear of Hannibals coming, at the first report of the overthrow at Cannæ: and the grief of that loss was so general, and immoderate, that it much disturbed the provision against apparent danger. It was hard to judge, whether the loss already received, or the fear of destruction presently threatning, were the more terrible. All the Senators found work enough, to stint the noise and lamentable bewailings, whereof the streets were full. Courriers were sent forth, to bring assured tidings how all went: whereof when Letters from the Consul Varro had throughly informed them, they were so amazed, that they ran into barbarous superstition; and taking direction (as was said) from their fatal books, buried alive two men and women, Gaules and Greeks, in their Oxe-market. If the books of Sibyl gave them such instructions, we may justly think that Sibyl her self was instructed by the Devil. Yet it is not improbable, that extremity of fear caused them to hearken to wicked South-sayers; whose detestable counsels they afterwards for their own honour (as ashamed of such Authors) imputed to the books of Sibyl. An Embassadour was sent to Delphi, to consult with the oracle of Apollo; and enquire with what prayers and supplications they might pacifie the gods, and obtain an end of these calamities. This is enough to discover the greatness of their fear; though not serving to give remedy. At that time came Letters out of Sicily, from the Prætor of Otacilius; whom the Senate had appointed, if he found it meet, to pass over into Africk. In these were contained news of one Carthaginian fleet that wasted the Kingdom of Hieron their good friend and confederate; and of another fleet, riding among the Isles Agateis, which was in readiness to set upon Lilybæum, and the rest of the Roman Province, if the Prætor stirred aside to the rescue of Hieron.

In the midst of these extremities, it was thought needful to call home Terentius the Consul, that he might name a Dictator, to take soveraign charge of the Weal-publick, with absolute power, as necessity required. It must needs seem strange, that all sorts of people went forth to meet the Consul, and bid him welcome home, giving him thanks for that he had not despaired of the Weal-publick. But this was done (as may seem) by order from the Senate: which therein (doubtless) provided wisely for upholding the general reputation. If this coming into the City had renewed the lamentations and outcries of the people: what else would have followed, than a contempt of their wretchedness, among those that were subject unto their Dominion? Now in finding this occasion (though indeed he gave it not) of bestowing upon him their welcome, and thanks; they noised abroad a fame, which came perhaps unto the ears of Hannibal, of their Magnanimity and Confidence: that might seem grounded on their remaining strength. This therefore was wisely done. But whereas Livie would have us think, that it was done generously, and out of great spirit; let me be pardoned, if I believe him not. It was done fearfully, and to cover their grief: had they dared to shew their indignation, they would have struck off his head; as in few years after, Cn. Fulvius had his life brought into question, and was banished by them, being less blameworthy, for a smaller offence. M. Junius, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator; and T. Sempronius, Master of the horse. These fell presently to mustering of Souldiers, of whom they raised four new Legions, and one thousand horse: though with much difficulty; as being fain to take up some that were very boyes. These four Legions are elsewhere forgotten in account of the forces levied by this Dictator; and two Legions only set down, that had been enrolled in the beginning of the year for the custody of the City. So it may be, that these two Legions being drawn into the field; four new ones of Prætextati, or striplings were left in their places. In such raw Souldiers, and so few, little confidence was to be reposed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding unto them eight thousand sturdy slaves, that were put in hope of liberty, if they should deserve it by manful service. This not sufficing, the Dictator proclaimed, that whosoever ought money and could not pay it, or had committed any capital offence, should forthwith be discharged of his debt or punishment, if he would serve in the War. To arm these Companies, they were fain to take down out of their Temples and Porches, the spoils of their enemies that had been there set up: among which, were 6000 Armours of the Gauls, that had been carried in the Triumph of C. Flaminius, a little before the beginning of this War. To such mockery had God brought the pride of the Romans, as a due reward of their insolent oppressions, that they were fain to issue forth of their own gates, in the habit of strangers, when Hannibal was ready to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman-like.

About the same time it was that Carthalo with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Cannæ, came to Rome. Carthalo was not admitted into the City, but commanded, whil'st he was on the way, to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territory. To the messengers of the captives audience was given by the Senate. They made earnest Petition to be ransomed at the publick charge; not only the tears and lamentation of their poor kinsfolk but the great need, wherein the City then stood, of able Souldiers, commending their suit; which yet they obtained not. Besides the general custom of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and strengthened by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was overthrown, and taken prisoner in the former War) not to be too tender of such as had yielded to the enemy, much was alledged against those who now craved ransom: but the special point was, that they were wilfully lost, since they might have saved themselves, as others did. It sufficed not unto these poor men, to say, that their offence was no greater than the Consuls; they were told, that this was great presumption. The truth was, the State wanted money; and therefore could not want excuses; whereby to avoid the disbursement: whether it were so, or not, that any such Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as we find recorded. Neither must we regard it, that the slaves which were armed for the war, are said to have cost more, than the summ did amount unto, that would have ransomed these prisoners. For this is but a tale, devised to countenance tenance the Roman proceedings, as if they had been ſevere; when as indeed they were ſuitable to the preſent fortune, poor and ſomewhat beggerly. Hereof it is no little proof, That Hannibal valued thoſe Roman ſlaves, whom he had taken in the Camp among their Maſters, at no more, than every one the third part of a common Souldiers ranſom: and likely it is, that he offered them at the price, whereat he thought them current. But if we ſhould ſuppoſe, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargain for ſlaves might have been made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with private men; yet muſt we withal conſider, that theſe private men did only lend theſe ſlaves for a while unto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forbear the price of them (when by order of the Senate they were enfranchiſed) until the war ſhould be ended. If Hannibal would have given ſuch long day of payment, it is likely that the Romans would have been his Chapmen: but, ſeeing he dealt only for ready money, they choſe ratherto ſay, We will not give, than, We cannot. The like auſteritity, upon the ſame reaſon, but contrary pretence, was uſed toward the Souldiers that eſcaped from that great battel. Theſe were charged for having fled: as the priſoners were for not flying, when they might have done ſo. True it is, that in ſuch caſes (if ever) that which they call Raggione del Stato, may ſerve for an excuſe: when the Common-wealth, being driven to a miſerable exigent, is fain to help it ſelf, by doing injuries to private men. And ſo dealt the Romans now: condemning all thoſe that had ſerved at Cannæ, to be tranſported into Sicily; and there to ſerve, not as others did, until they had fulfilled twenty years in the Wars, or elſe were fifty years of age, but until this War ſhould be ended, how long ſoever it laſted, and that without reward. The ſame thrifty cenſure was afterwards laid upon others, for their miſ-behaviour: but never upon any man of quality, ſave only (a good while after this, at better leiſure) upon Cecilius Metellus, and a few other hare-brain'd fools his companions; who, being frighted out of their wits, with the terrour of ſo great a loſs, were deviſing, after the battel, which way to run out of Italy, when Hannibal as yet had ſcarce one Town within it. The inequality of this rigour grew ſhortly diſtaſteful to the Commonalty: and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the people; nevertheleſs it was quietly digeſted, the excuſe being no leſs apparent than the fault.

M. Junius the Dictator, having diſpatched all needful buſineſs within the City, took the field with five and twenty thouſand men. What he did with this Army, I cannot find: nor more of him than this, That he ſpent the time about Campania; where (as may be preſumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be aſcribed, that Hannibal did no greater evil: for of any evil done to Hannibal, by the Romans, in this their weak eſtate, only Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Oſtia, with a Fleet ready to ſet ſail for Sicily, having one Legion aboord his ſhips; and fifteen hundred other Souldiers newly taken up: with which forces he was to defend that Iſland, and do what harm he could in Africk. But hearing of the overthrow at Cannæ, he ſent theſe of his new Levy to Rome, for defence of the City; and marched haſtily with his Legion toward Cannuſium: delivering the Fleet, empty of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magiſtrates. and chief Citizens of Nola, to help them: who were like to be forced by the multitude (affected, as were the reſt of the Campanes) to let in the Carthaginian; and knew not how to avoid this otherwiſe, than by ſeeming to deliberate about the articles of this new confederacy. Wherefore he made great journeys thitherward; and arrived even time enough to prevent the Enemy. Many idle walks Hannibal made betwixt Nola and Naples: aſſaying by fair words and terrible threats the one and the other City. Naples was ſtrong, and not infected with any the leaſt touch of diſloyalty: had alſo a ſure Haven, whereby it ſtood in the leſs fear of ſuſtaining much inconvenience, by ſpoil of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Country. But at Nola it was thought a valuable conſideration, That Hannibal was Maſter of the field: which if he laid waſte, all the poor people were utterly undone. So thought the Multitude: and ſuch talk uſed ſome, that had little fear of their own private want or poverty, but a great deſire to gratifie the Carthaginian. Of theſe, one L. Bantius was chief; a ſtout young Gentleman, and Souldier of eſpecial mark, well beloved in the City, and one that had done good ſervice to the Romans; but was found by Hannibal half dead at Cannæ; and after much gentle uſage, good attendance, and cure of his wounds, friendly diſmiſſed with liberal gifts. He therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to return the greateſt thanks he could unto ſo courteous an enemy. Marcellus perceiving this, wrought upon the ſame eaſie nature of the Gentleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had been by chance, ſeemed to wonder, why one that had ſo well deſerved of the Roman State, had not repaired unto him the Prætor, who deſired nothing more than ſuch acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and loving entertainment, being himſelf alſo a man highly reputed for his perſonal valour, he made this Bantius ſo far in love with him, that no thing could be attempted within Nola, againſt the Romans, whereof he had not preſently advertiſment. At the coming of Marcellus, Hannibal removed from about Nola; and aſſayed, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans: but they had lately taken in a Roman Garriſon; upon confidence whereof they gave him a peremptory anſwer, to his diſcontent. Thence went he to Nuceria, which he took by compoſition; and ſo returned back again to Nola. He was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore unto him: who altuogh they durſt not ſtir in his quarrel, being over-awed by the Roman Garriſon; yet if they ſaw Marcellus hardly beſtead, and forced to turn his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies aſſailing him without, like enough it ſeemed, that they would not be wanting unto the accompliſhment of their own deſires. He therefore brought his Army cloſe to the Town, and skirmiſhed often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to do much good, but only to make ſhew of a meaning to force the Town; which he ſought in the mean while to take by inteligence. In the night time there paſſed meſſages between him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if once Marcellus, with all his forces, could be trained into the field, the multitude within the Town ſhould preſently riſe; and ſeizing upon the gates, exclude him as an Enemy. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was advertiſed: and fearing leſt the Conſpirators would ſhortly adventure, even to find him buſied, within the City, whileſt the Carthaginans ſhould ſcale the walls; he thought it the ſureſt way to

were so earnest in the love of their new Society, that they are said to have murdered all the Romans, upon whom at the present they could lay hand; or (which is all one) to have smothered them to death in an hot Bath.

For this is but a tale, devised to countenance

tenance the Roman proceedings, as if they had been ſevere; when as indeed they were ſuitable to the preſent fortune, poor and ſomewhat beggerly. Hereof it is no little proof, That Hannibal valued thoſe Roman ſlaves, whom he had taken in the Camp among their Maſters, at no more, than every one the third part of a common Souldiers ranſom: and likely it is, that he offered them at the price, whereat he thought them current. But if we ſhould ſuppoſe, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargain for ſlaves might have been made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with private men; yet muſt we withal conſider, that theſe private men did only lend theſe ſlaves for a while unto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forbear the price of them (when by order of the Senate they were enfranchiſed) until the war ſhould be ended. If Hannibal would have given ſuch long day of payment, it is likely that the Romans would have been his Chapmen: but, ſeeing he dealt only for ready money, they choſe rather to ſay, We will not give, than, We cannot. The like auſteritity, upon the ſame reaſon, but contrary pretence, was uſed toward the Souldiers that eſcaped from that great battel. Theſe were charged for having fled: as the priſoners were for not flying, when they might have done ſo. True it is, that in ſuch caſes (if ever) that which they call Raggione del Stato, may ſerve for an excuſe: when the Common-wealth, being driven to a miſerable exigent, is fain to help it ſelf, by doing injuries to private men. And ſo dealt the Romans now: condemning all thoſe that had ſerved at Cannæ, to be tranſported into Sicily; and there to ſerve, not as others did, until they had fulfilled twenty years in the Wars, or elſe were fifty years of age, but until this War ſhould be ended, how long ſoever it laſted, and that without reward. The ſame thrifty cenſure was afterwards laid upon others, for their miſ-behaviour: but never upon any man of quality, ſave only (a good while after this, at better leiſure) upon Cecilius Metellus, and a few other hare-brain'd fools his companions; who, being frighted out of their wits, with the terrour of ſo great a loſs, were deviſing, after the battel, which way to run out of Italy, when Hannibal as yet had ſcarce one Town within it. The inequality of this rigour grew ſhortly diſtaſteful to the Commonalty: and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the people; nevertheleſs it was quietly digeſted, the excuſe being no leſs apparent than the fault.

Liv. lib. 25.

M. Junius the Dictator, having diſpatched all needful buſineſs within the City, took the field with five and twenty thouſand men. What he did with this Army, I cannot find: nor more of him than this, That he ſpent the time about Campania; where (as may be preſumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be aſcribed, that Hannibal did no greater evil: for of any evil done to Hannibal, by the Romans, in this their weak eſtate, only Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Oſtia, with a Fleet ready to ſet ſail for Sicily, having one Legion aboord his ſhips; and fifteen hundred other Souldiers newly taken up: with which forces he was to defend that Iſland, and do what harm he could in Africk. But hearing of the overthrow at Cannæ, he ſent theſe of his new Levy to Rome, for defence of the City; and marched haſtily with his Legion toward Cannuſium: delivering the Fleet, empty of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magiſtrates, and chief Citizens of Nola, to help them: who were like to be forced by the multitude (affected, as were the reſt of the Campanes) to let in the Carthaginian; and knew not how to avoid this otherwiſe, than by ſeeming to deliberate about the articles of this new confederacy. Wherefore he made great journeys thitherward; and arrived even time enough to prevent the Enemy. Many idle walks Hannibal made betwixt Nola and Naples: aſſaying by fair words and terrible threats the one and the other City. Naples was ſtrong, and not infected with any the leaſt touch of diſloyalty: had alſo a ſure Haven, whereby it ſtood in the leſs fear of ſuſtaining much inconvenience, by ſpoil of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Country. But at Nola it was thought a valuable conſideration, That Hannibal was Maſter of the field: which if he laid waſte, all the poor people were utterly undone. So thought the Multitude: and ſuch talk uſed ſome, that had little fear of their own private want or poverty, but a great deſire to gratifie the Carthaginian. Of theſe, one L. Bantius was chief; a ſtout young Gentleman, and Souldier of eſpecial mark, well beloved in the City, and one that had done good ſervice to the Romans; but was found by Hannibal half dead at Cannæ; and after much gentle uſage, good attendance, and cure of his wounds, friendly diſmiſſed with liberal gifts. He therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to return the greateſt thanks he could unto ſo courteous an enemy. Marcellus perceiving this, wrought upon the ſame eaſie nature of the Gentleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had been by chance, ſeemed to wonder, why one that had ſo well deſerved of the Roman State, had not repaired unto him the Prætor, who deſired nothing more than ſuch acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and loving entertainment, being himſelf alſo a man highly reputed for his perſonal valour, he made this Bantius ſo far in love with him, that no thing could be attempted within Nola, againſt the Romans, whereof he had not preſently advertiſment. At the coming of Marcellus, Hannibal removed from about Nola; and aſſayed, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans: but they had lately taken in a Roman Garriſon; upon confidence whereof they gave him a peremptory anſwer, to his diſcontent. Thence went he to Nuceria, which he took by compoſition; and ſo returned back again to Nola. He was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore unto him: who altnogh they durſt not ſtir in his quarrel, being over-awed by the Roman Garriſon; yet if they ſaw Marcellus hardly beſtead, and forced to turn his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies aſſailing him without, like enough it ſeemed, that they would not be wanting unto the accompliſhment of their own deſires. He therefore brought his Army cloſe to the Town, and skirmiſhed often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to do much good, but only to make ſhew of a meaning to force the Town; which he ſought in the mean while to take by inteligence. In the night time there paſſed meſſages between him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if once Marcellus, with all his forces, could be trained into the field, the multitude within the Town ſhould preſently riſe; and ſeizing upon the gates, exclude him as an Enemy. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was advertiſed: and fearing leſt the Conſpirators would ſhortly adventure, even to find him buſied, within the City, whileſt the Carthaginans ſhould ſcale the walls; he thought it the ſureſt way to cut off the Enemies hope, and ſend him away betimes. Wherefore ordering his men in three companies, within three ſeveral gates, looking towards the enemy: he gave a ſtraight command, that all the Citizens ſhould keep their houſes. Thus he lay cloſe a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder, againſt whom he had cuſtomarily iſſued forth before more early, every day, to skirmiſh. But when it was further noted, that the walls were bare, and not a man appearing on them; then thought Hannibal, that ſurely all was diſcovered, and Marcellus now buſied with the Citizens. Whereupon he bad his men bring ladders, and make ready for the aſſault: which was done in all haſte. But when the Carthaginians were at the very walls, and thought nothing leſs, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: ſuddenly the middle gate was opened, whereat Marcellus, with the beſt and oldeſt of his Souldiers, brake forth upon them, with a great noiſe, to make his unexpected ſally the more terrible. Whileſt the Carthaginians, much out of order, were ſome of them flying before Marcellus, the reſt making head againſt him: the other two gates opened, whereat in like ſort iſſued they of the new levied Companies, upon the enemies backs. The ſudden terrour was more available unto the Romans, than their force; yet the Execution was ſo great, that this was accounted as a victory, and reputed one of the braveſt Acts performed in all that War, foraſmuch as hereby it was firſt proved, that Hannibal might be overcome. After this, Marcellus being freed from his enemies that were departed, took a ſtrict account of the Citizens of Nola; condemning above threeſcore and ten of high Treaſon, whoſe heads he ſtruck off; and ſo leaving the Town in quiet obedience unto their Senate, went and incamped hard by about Sueſſula. Hannibal in the mean ſeaſon was gone to Acerræ: where being excluded; he thought it no wiſdom to loſe time in perſwaſions, but laid ſiege unto it, and began on all ſides to cloſe it up. This terrified the People, who knew themſelves unable to hold out. Therefore before his Works were finiſhed, and they quite ſurrounded; they ſtole out by night, and left him the Town empty: which he ſacked and burnt. Then hearing news of the Dictator, that he was about Caſiline, thither went Hannibal; as being unwilling that an enemy ſo near ſhould diſquiet him at Capua; where he meant to Winter. It ſeems, or rather indeed it is plain, that the late victory of Marcellus had nothing abated the ſpirit of the Carthaginian: who durſt with a ſmall part of his Army ſeek out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman ſtrength. Wherefore the joy of his Enemies, upon ſo ſlight an occaſion as the death of ſome two thouſand of his men, at the moſt, and thoſe not ſlain in plain battel, but by a ſudden eruption; witneſſeth chiefly, in what great fear they ſtood of Hannibal, and how Creſt-fallen they were: that having three years ſince demanded at Carthage the body of Hannibal, to be delivered unto their pleaſure, by his own Citizens; could now pleaſe themſelves, as with good news, to hear, That in a skirmiſh not far from Rome, he appeared to be a man, and not reſiſtleſs. At Caſilinum the Dictator was not: but many Companies of Italians, Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the Town, and held it. Five hundred of the Præneſtines there were, and about four hundred of Peruſia, with ſome of the Latines. All theſe had the good hap, to come too late to the battel at Cannæ, being ſent by their ſeveral States to the Camp: whither whileſt they were marching, the tidings of that great misfortune encountred them, and ſent them back ſorrowful; for they loved well their Lords the Romans, under whoſe government they lived happily. So came they all, one after another to Caſiline, where they met and ſtayed. Neither had they ſtayed there long, ere they heard news from Capua, How that great City became the Ring-leader of all the Campanes into rebellion. The people of Caſiline were effected as they of Capua: and therefore ſought how to rid their hands of thoſe Præneſtines and their fellows; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many trains laid one for another, at laſt they ſlew all the Townſmen in a night, and fortified the Weſtern part of the Town (for it was divided by the River Vulturnus) againſt the Enemy. If they had run away with the goods, and pretended, that theſe of Caſiline were as the reſt of the Campanes, all Traitors; they themſelves might have been reputed, as no better than the Mamertines, But their conſtancy in defence of the place witneſſeth, upon what honeſt reaſons they ſurpriſed it. Hannibal came thither, thinking to have encountred with greater forces: but theſe few found him more work than he expected. Divers aſſaults he gave, but was ſtill repelled with loſs: and many ſallies they made, with variable event. The Enemy mined; and they countermined: oppoſing ſo much induſtry to his force, that he was driven to cloſe them up, and ſeek to win them by famine. T. Sempronius Gracchus, that was Maſter of the Horſe, lay with the Roman Army higher up the River: who fain would have relieved Caſiline, but that the Dictator being gone to Rome about ſome matters of Religion, had given him an expreſs charge not to fight till his return. Marcellus from Sueſſula could not come: his way being ſtopped by the over-flowings of Vulturnus; the Nolans alſo beſeeching him not to leave them, who were in danger of the Campanes, if he departed. Thus it is reported: but if the water ſtayed his journey, ſuch intreaties were needleſs. Neither is it like that the Dictator tarried at Rome ſo long, as till extreme famine had conſumed the Garriſon in Caſiline. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Town was loſt, becauſe the Romans durſt not adventure to raiſe the ſiege. Barrels of Corn were ſent by night, floating down the River; and when ſome of theſe, being carried awry by an Eddie of water, ſtuck among the Willows on the bank, whereby this manner of relief was diſcovered and prevented; Gracchus caſt a great quantity of Nuts into the ſtream, which faintly ſuſtained the poor beſieged men. At length when all food was ſpent, and whatſoever grew green under the Walls was gathered for Sallets, the Carthaginians ploughed up the ground; whereon the beſieged preſently ſowed Rapeſeed. Hannibal ſeeing this, admired their patience; and ſaid, That he meant not to ſtay at Caſiline until the Rapes were grown. Wherefore though hitherto he had refuſed to hearken unto any Compoſition, as intending to make them an example to all others, by puniſhing their obſtinacy; yet now he was content, to grant them their lives at an indifferent ranſom; which when they had paid, he quietly diſmiſſed them, according to his promiſe. Seven hundred Carthaginians he placed in Caſiline, as a Garriſon for defence of the Campanes; unto whom he reſtored it. To the Præneſtine Souldiers great thanks were given, and loving rewards; among which they had offer, in regard of their vertue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But thier preſent condition pleaſed them ſo well, that they choſe rather to continue, as they were in Præneſte: which is no weak proof, of the good estate wherein the Cities flourished, that were subject to the Roman Government. This siege of Casiline was not a little beneficial to the Romans; as having long detained Hannibal, and consumed much of his time, that might otherwise have been better spent. For winter overtook him long before he could dispatch the business: which how to quit with his honor he knew not, when he was once engaged. Therefore he wintered at Capua: where he refreshed his Army, or rather corrupted it, as all Historians report, and made it effeminate; though effeminate as it was, He therewithal did often beat the Romans in following times, as shall appear hereafter.

SECT. X.

Of the great supply that was decreed at Carthage, to be sent to Hannibal into Italy. How by the malice of Hanno, and sloth or parsimony of the Carthaginians, the supply was too long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faster, than of the Romans. Of Fabius and other old Romans Historians, how partial they were in their writings.

WHen Mago, the son of Amilcar had spent some time about the taking in such Italians, as fell from the Romans after the battel at Canne; his brother Hannibal sent for him to Capua, and thence dispatched him away to Carthage, with the joyful message of Victory. He told the Carthaginian Senate with how many Roman Generals his brother had fought, what Consuls he had chased, wounded or slain; how the stout Romans, that in the former war never shunned any occasion of fight, were now grown so calm, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the only good Captain, because he never durst adventure to come to battel; That not without reason their spirits were thus abated, since Hannibal had slain of them above 200000. and taken above fifty thousand prisoners. He further told them of the Brutians, Apulians, Samnites, Lucans, and other people of Italy, that followed the fortune of those great victories, and revolted unto the Carthaginians. Among the rest he magnified Capua, as a goodly City, and fit to be not only (as already it was) Head of all the Capuans, but the chief seat of their Dominion in Italy: and there he informed them, how lovingly his brother had been entertained, where he meant to rest that winter attending their supply. As for the war, He said it was even at an end, if they would now pursue it closely, and not give the Romans any breathing time, wherein to re-collect themselves, and repair their broken forces. He willed them to consider, that the war was far from home, in the Enemies Country: that so many battels had much diminished his brothers Army: that the Souldiers, who had so well deserved, ought to be considered with liberal rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with exactions of money, Corn, and other necessaries; but that these things must be sent from Carthage; which the victory would requite with large amends. Finally, he caused the golden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were slain, to be poured out openly in the Court: which being measured, filled (as some say) three bushels; or (as others would rather have it) no more than one; adding, that by this might appear the greatness of the Roman calamity, forasmuch as none but the * principal of that order, were accustomed to wear that ornament.

* Thus Livy reports it; and credible it is, that while Rome was poor, the bravery of private men was not altogether so great, as the Law would have permitted, though otherwise Jus Annuli, The wearing of the Ring, was the general priviledge of the Roman Equites.

Who so considers the former Punick War, may easily find, that the State of Carthage never did receive, in all the durance thereof, any such hopeful advertisements from their Captains abroad. Wherefore it is no marvel, if the errand of Mago found extraordinary welcom. In the vehemency of this joy, Himilco, a Senator adverse to the faction of Hanno, is said to have demanded of that great perswader unto peace with Rome, Whether he were still of opinion, that Hannibal should be yielded up unto the Romans; or whether he would forbid them to give thanks unto the gods, for this their good success. Hereunto though it be not likely that Hanno made the same formal answer, which Livie puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Senators Patres Conscripti, by a term proper to the Romans; and putting them in mind of his own shameful overthrow received at the Islands Ægateis: yet the summ of his speech appears to have been no less malicious than is set down, forasmuch as Hannibal himself, at his departure out of Italy, exclaimed against the wickedness of this Hanno; saying, that his hatred against the Barchines, had oppressed their Family, when otherwise it could not, with the ruine of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made such a jest of these victories, as is reported: saying, It ill beseemed him, who had vanquished the Romans, to call for more help as if he had been beaten; or him, that had taken their Camp, filled forsooth with spoil, to make requeest for meat and money. To these cavils, if answer were needful, it might be said, That other booty than of horses and slaves, little was to be found in the Roman Camp: the best of the Souldiers carrying no other wealth into the field, than a few * silver studs in the bridles and trappings of their horses. If Hannibal had taken any main convoy of money and provisions, going to supply all wants of a great Army in some other Province, (as the two Scipio's are afterwards said to have done, when they wan the Camp of Asdrubal, that carryed along with him all the wealth of Spain, in his journey towards Italy) then might such an objection more justly have been made unto his demand of a supply. But the most likely part of Hanno his Oration, and wherein he best might hope to prevail, contained a perswasion to use their fortune with moderation; and now to seek peace, whilst they had so much the better in war.

* Liv. l. 22.

What would have been the issue of this counsel, if it had been followed, it were not easie to say. For though it be likely, that the Roman pride would have brooked much indignity, in freeing Italy from the danger of war; yet it is not likely that the faith, so often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would have been kept entire, when any opinion of good advantage had called for revenge of so many shameful overthrows; since after this war ended, and a new league concluded, no submissive behaviour could preserve Carthage from ruine, longer, than until such time as Rome was at leisure from all other wars. This counsel therefore of Hanno, though it might seem temperate, was indeed very pestilent; and served only to hinder the performance of a noble resolution. For it was concluded by a main consent of the Senate, that forty thousand Numidians, forty Elephants, and great abundance of ſilver, ſhould be ſent over to Hannibal: and that, beſides theſe, twenty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, ſhould be levied in Spain; not only to ſupply, as need ſhould require, the Armies in their Provincce, but to be tranſported into Italy.

This great Aid, had it been as carefully ſent, as it was readily decreed; the Roman Hiſtorians would not have found cauſe, to tax the retchleſs improvidence of Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Canna to Rome, or in refreſhing his Army among the delights of Capua: the next years work would have finiſhed the buſineſs, with leſs dangerous adventure; and the pleaſures, which his men enjoyed among the Campanes, would have been commended, as rewards by him well thought upon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that were to be employed in the following War. But either the too much careleſneſs of thoſe, that were loth to make haſte in laying out their money, before extreme neceſſity required it; or the crafty malice of Hanno, and his fellows, working upon the private humours of men, that had more feeling of their own commodity, than ſenſe of the publick need; utterly perverted, and made unprofitable in the performance, the order that had been ſo well ſet down. The * Elephants were ſent: and ſome money peradventure, uncertain it is how long after. But thoſe great forces of threeſcore thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, came not into Italy, till much was loſt of that which already had been gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Army, was firſt conſumed by time, and ſundry accidents of war. Only ſome ſmall numbers, no way anſwering unto the proportion decreed, were ſent into Spain; and the journey of Aſdrubal thence through France into Italy much talked of, but he not enabled thereunto, till many years were paſt, and the Romans had recovered their ſtrength.

Here we may note, what great riches the Carthaginians drew into their City, both by the Tributes received from their ſubjects, and by their wealthy Trade of Merchandize. For it is not long, ſince the War of the Mercenaries, and the perfidious tyranny of the Romans, extorting in time of greateſt neceſſity twelve hundred talents; had exceedingly impoveriſhed Carthage: which was before brought into great want, even by the expence of ſo much money, as was to be diſburſed for redeeming of peace, after the loſs of Ægateis. Yet we ſee, what great Armies of Numidians, and Spaniards, beſides thoſe already on foot, are appointed to the ſervice in Italy, and how little the Carthaginians fear the want of money in theſe chargeable undertakings: whereas the Romans on the other ſide, having three or four years together been forced to ſome extraordinary coſt, are fain to go upon credit; even for the price of thoſe ſlaves, which they bought of their own Citizens to arm for their defence. Such advantage in means to enrich their Treaſury, had the wealthy Merchants of Carthage, trading in all parts of the Mediterranean Sea, even from Tyrus their Mother-City in the bottom of the Streights unto the great Ocean, above the Romans: who lived on the fruits of their ground, and received their Tributes from people following the ſame courſe of life. When the time therefore was come, that the hatred of Rome found leiſure to ſhew it ſelf, in the deſtruction of Carthage; the impudence of Roman falſhood, in ſeeking an honeſt colour wherewith to ſhadow the intended breach of Faith, diſcovered plainly whence the jealouſie was bred, that this mighty City would again rebell. For the Carthaginians, having given up hoſtages, even before the Roman Army did ſet forth, to perform whatſoever ſhould be enjoyned them, with condition, that their City might not be deſtroyed; and having accordingly, when they were ſo required, yielded up all their weapons, and engines of War; the Romans told them plainly, That the City of Carthage, which was the body of the Citizens, ſhould be friendly dealt withal, but the Town muſt needs be demoliſhed, and removed into ſome other place, that ſhould be twelve miles diſtant from the Sea. For (ſaid the Romans) This Trade of Merchandiſe, by which ye now live, is not fit for peaceable men, ſuch as ye promiſe to become hereafter, as is the Trade of Huſbandry; an wholſom kind of life, and enduing men with many laudable qualities which enable their bodies, and make them very apt for converſation. This villanous dealing of the Romans, though ſugred with gloſing words, plainly ſhews, what good obſervations the elder Cato had made of the haſty growth of Carthage in riches. For, when being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter whatſoever it were, he added ſtill this concluſion, Thus I think, and that Carthage ſhould be deſtroyed; He may ſeem, not only to have had regard unto that preſent wealth, which at his being there he had found in the City, but much more unto theſe times, and the great height whereunto it roſe, even ſuddenly as we ſee, out of many calamities, whileſt the Romans thought, that it had not been in caſe to dare ſo terrible a War.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering wealth, were more induſtrious and skilful than the Romans; ſo came they far ſhort of them in the honourable care of the publick good: having every one, or moſt of them, a more principal regard of his own private benefit. This made them (beſides the negligence commonly found in victors) when the firſt heat of their affection (wherein they concluded to purſue the war ſtrongly) was over-paſt, go more leiſurely to work, than had been requiſite, in the execution. It was eaſie for Hanno to perſwade covetous men, that they ſhould firſt of all defend their own in Spain. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Province was ſecured, they might ſend an Army into Italy; ſo going to work orderly by degrees. For it were no wiſdom to commit all the ſtrength of the Common-wealth to one hazard of fortune, againſt the enemies, or (which perhaps were worſe) to the government of an ambitious man, and his brethren; who having once (if they could do ſo) finiſhed the war, might eaſily make * Hannibal a King, and ſubdue Carthage, with the forces that they had given him to the conqueſt of Rome.

* Of ſuch ambition Hanno directly accuſed Hannibal, ſaying, that he made war, that ſo he might live compaſſed with Legions, as knowing no other way to make himſelf a King.

By ſuch malicious working of Hanno, and by their own ſlackneſs, incredulity, dullneſs, or niggardize, the Carthaginians were perſwaded rather to make ſmall diſburſments in Spain, than to ſet up all their reſt at once in Italy. Yet was it indeed impoſſible to hold a Country of ſo large extent, and ſo open a coaſt as that of Spain, free from all incurſion of the Enemy: eſpecially the affection of the Naturals being (as in a new conqueſt) ill eſtabliſhed. A better way therefore it had been, to make a running War, by which the Romans might have been found occupied, even with the ordinary Carthaginian Garriſons or ſome little addition thereunto. For if it were thought meet, to defer the proſecution of their main intendment againſt Rome it ſelf, until ſuch time as every little thorn were pulled out of the ſides of ſo great a Province, then muſt Emporia have been beſieged and forced: which, by reaſon of alliance with with the Massilians, gave unto the Romans, at all times when they pleased, a ready and secure Harbour. But the Town of Emporiæ, was too strong to be won in haste: it had long defended it self against the Barbarians; having not above four hundred paces of wall to the main Land, and exceedingly well fortified: a great Spanish Town of the same name, lying without it, that was three miles in compass, very strong likewise, and friend unto the Gracians, though not over-much trusted. Wherefore to force this Town of Emporiæ, that was, besides the proper strength, like to be so well assisted by the Massilians, Romans, and some Spaniards, would have been a work of little less difficulty, than was the Romans war (in appearance) after the battel at Cannæ: yea, it had been in effect none other, than to alter the seat of the war; which Hannibal had already fixed, with better judgement, near unto the gates of Rome. The difficulty of this attempt, being such as caused it altogether to be forborn; great folly it was to be much troubled about expelling the Romans utterly out of Spain: whom they might more easily have diverted thence, and drawn home to their own doors, by making strong war upon their City. For even so the Romans afterwards removed Hannibal into Africk, by sending an Army to Carthage; and by taking the like course, they now endeavoured to change the seat of the war transferring it out of Italy into Spain. But the private affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwise, than as it is accessary to their own purposes, did make them easily wink at opportunities, and hope that somewhat would fall out well of it self, though they set not to their helping hands. Hanno was a malicious wretch: yet they that thought him so, were well enough contented to hearken unto his discourses, as long as they were plausible, and tended to keep the purse full. In the mean while they suffered Hannibal, and all the noble house of Amilcar, to weary themselves in travel for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in general highly commended, but weakly assisted; as if the industry of these Barchines had been somewhat more than needful. Surely the Carthaginians, in general, were far less honourable than the people of Rome: not only in government of their subject Provinces, but in administration of their own estate; few of them preferring the respect of the Weal-publick above their private interest. But as they thrived little in the end, by their parsimony used toward their own Mercenaries, when the former Roman war was finished: so the conclusion of this war present, will make them complain, with feeling sighs, of their negligence in supplying Hannibal, after the victory at Cannæ; when gladly they would give all their Treasures, to redeem the opportunity, that now they let pass, as if it were cost enough to send a few handfuls into Spain.

That both the Spanish business, and the state of Africk it self, depended wholly, or for the most part, upon success of things in Italy, the course of actions following will make manifest. Particularly, how matters were ordered in Spain by the Carthaginian Governours, it is very hard and almost impossible to set down. For, though we must not reprehend, in that worthy Historian Livy, the tender love of his own Country, which made him give credit unto Fabius and others; yet must we not, for his sake, believe those lies, which the unpartial judgement of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers that gave them original. It were needless to rehearse all that may be found in Polybius, concerning the untruth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One example may suffice. He saith of Amilcar and his men at Eryx, in the former war, That, having clean spent their strength, and being even broken with many miseries, they were glad to submit themselves unto the Romans. Contrary hereunto we find in the life of Amilcar, set down by Æmilius Probus; That Eryx was in such sort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to be in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not been any war. These words, being referred to the brave resolution of the Carthaginian souldiers, and the singular vertue of their General, infusing such spirit into them, may be taken as not over liberal. For in the treaty of peace between Amilcar and Catulus, when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay down their arms and forsake Sicily, theatning, that otherwise he would not talk of any composition: Amilcar boldly bade him chuse, whether he would talk of it or no; for that the Arms which his Country had put into his hands to use against her enemies, it was not his purpose to yield up unto them. Now since the Romans, contrary to their custom upon like advantages, were content to let Amilcar have his will, and not to stand with him upon point of honour, whilst otherwise they might quietly rid their hands of him; plain enough it is, that they were far from thinking him a man consumed with miseries, as Fabius would have him seem. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who flatly, and by name, chargeth Fabius with untruth; saying, That howsoever Amilcar and his Souldiers had endured all extremity, yet they behaved themselves as men that had no sense thereof; and were as far from being either vanquished or tyred, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference between Fabius (as also perhaps between other old Writers of the Roman story) and those that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mighty City of Rome: we must take it in good part, that howsoever Livie introduceth Hanno, in one place, joyning very foolishly his own shameful overthrow at the Islands * Ægateis, with the great services of Amilcar at Eryx, as if both of them had had a like event; yet † elsewhere he forbeareth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his own unhappy conduct) into the same Hanno his mouth, making him say, That the affairs of Carthage went never better, than a little before the loss of their Fleet in that battel at Sea; wherein himself was General. Now, concerning the doings of the Scipio's in Spain, there is cause to wish, that this Fabius, with Val. Antias, and others of the like stamp, had either written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the tender affection of Livie to his Rome, had not caused him to think too well of thier relations; which are such as follow.

SECT. XI.

Strange reports of the Rom. victories in Spain, before Asdrubal the Son of Amilcar followed thence his Brother Hannibal into Italy.

IT hath been shewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Consul returning from Gaul into Italy, to encounter with Hannibal at his descent from the Alps, sent before him his Brother Cneus, with part of his Fleet and Army, into Spain. Two Roman Legions, with 14000. foot of the Confederates, and 1200. horse, had been allotted unto the Consul, therewith to make war in Spain against Hannibal; who, since he was marching into Italy with with the ſtrength of his Army, P. Scipio believed, that a good part of theſe his own forces might well be ſpared from the Spaniſh Expedition; and therefore made bold to carry ſome of the number back with him, ſending on his brother with the reſt, as his Lieutenant. Publius himſelf remained in Italy all the time of his Conſulſhip; which being expired, he was ſent Proconſul into Spain by the Senate, with an Army of 8000. men, and a Fleet of thirty Gallies.

The Acts of theſe two Brethren in their Province, were very great; and, as they are reported, ſomewhat marvellous. For they continually prevailed in Spain againſt the Carthaginians; whom they vanquiſhed in ſo many battels, and withdrew from their Alliance ſo many of the Spaniards their Confederates, that we have cauſe to wonder how the enemy could ſo often find means to repair his forces, and return ſtrong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliver the Country from the tyranny of Carthage, might eaſily win unto their Confederacy, as many as were galled with the African yoke, and durſt adventure to break it: ſo the ancient reputation of the firſt Conquerours might ſerve to arm the Naturals againſt theſe Invaders, and to reclaim thoſe that had revolted unto the Romans, were it only by the memory of ſuch ill ſucceſs, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian Treaſure; which eaſily raiſed Souldiers, among thoſe valiant (but in that Age) poor, and gold-thirſty Nations. Neither was it of ſmall importance, that ſo many of the Spaniards had their children, kinſmen, and friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Italian Wars; or ſerving the Carthaginians in Africk. And peradventure, if we durſt be bold to ſay it; the victories of the Scipio's were neither ſo many, nor ſo great as they are ſet out by Livie. This we may be bold to ſay, that the great Captain Fabius, or Livie in his perſon, maketh an objection unto Scipio, which neither Scipio, nor Livie for him, doth anſwer. That if Aſdrubal were vanquiſhed, as Scipio would ſay by him in Spain*: ſtrange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had been extreamly dangerous to* Rome, that the ſame vanquiſhed man ſhould invade Italy. And it is indeed an incredible narration, That Aſdrubal, being encloſed on all ſides, and not knowing how to eſcape out of battel, ſave only by the ſteep deſcent of Rocks, over a great River that lay at his back, ran away with all his money, Elephants and broken Troops, over Tagus, directly towards the Pyrenees, and ſo toward Italy; upon which he fell with more than threeſcore thouſand armed Souldiers. Neither do I ſee, how it hangs well together, That he choſe a piece of ground very defenſible, but moſt incommodious for his retrait, if he ſhould happen to be vanquiſhed; and yet, that he ſent all his money and Elephants away before him, as not intending to abide the enemy: Or how it could be true, that theſe his Elephants being ſo ſent before, could hinder the Romans (for ſo are they ſaid to have done in the laſt battel between him and Scipio) from breaking into his Camp. Wherefore we can no more than be ſorry, that all Carthaginian records of this War, and Spaniſh, (if there were any) being utterly loſt, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleaſed the Romans to tell us; unto whom it were no wiſdom to give too much credit. In this regard, I will ſummarily run over the doings of the Scipio's in Spain, not greatly inſiſting on particulars, whereof there is no great certainty.

Cn. Cornelius landed at Emporiæ, an Haven Town, not far within the Pyrenees, retaining ſtill the ſame name with little inflexion. That by the flame of his clemency he allured many Nations to become ſubject unto Rome, as the ſtory begins of him, I could eaſily believe, if I underſtood by what occaſion they had need to uſe his clemency, or he to give ſuch famous example thereof, being a meer ſtranger, and having no juriſdiction in the Country. Yet it is certain, that he was a man very courteous, and one that could well inſinuate himſelf into the love of the Barbarians, among whom, his dexterity in practice had the better ſucceſs, for that he ſeemed to have none other errand than ſetting them at liberty. This pretext availed with ſome: others were to be hired with money: and ſome he compelled to yield by force or fear; eſpecially when he had won a battel againſt Hanno. Into all Treaties of Accord, made with theſe people, likely it is, that he remembred to inſert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances never forgat, unleſs in long times paſt, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Superiours; Majeſtatem Pop. Rom. comiter conſervent, which is, as Tully interprets it, That they ſhould gently (or kindly) uphold the Majeſty of the people of Rome. This was in apppearance nothing troubleſome; yet implyedit indeed an obſcure covenant of ſubjection. And in this reſpect it may be true, That the Spaniards became ditionis Romanæ, of the Roman juriſdiction; though hereafter they will ſay, they had no ſuch meaning. That part of the Country wherein Scipio landed, was newly ſubdued by Hannibal in his paſſage toward Italy; and therefore the more eaſily ſhaken out of obedience, particularly in the Bargutians; Hannibal had found at his coming among them ſuch an apprehenſion of the Roman greatneſs, as made him ſuſpect, that any light occaſion would make them ſtart from the Carthaginians. Wherefore he not only appointed Hanno Governour over them, as over the reſt of the Province between Iberus and the Pyrenees, but made him alſo their Lord; that is, (as I conceive it; for I do not think he gave the Principality of their Country unto Hanno and his Heirs) he made him not only Lieutenant-General over them, in matters of War, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but took from them all inferiour Officers of their own, leaving them to be governed by Hanno at his diſcretion. Theſe therefore had good cauſe to rejoyce at the coming of Scipio; with whom, others alſo (no doubt) found reaſons to joyn, it being the cuſtom of all conquered Nations in hatred of their preſent Lords, to throw themſelves indiſcreetly into the protection of others, that many times prove worſe than the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milanois, in the age of our Grand-fathers, weary by turns of the Spaniards and French; as more ſenſible ſtill of the preſent evil which they felt, than regardful of the greater miſchief, whereinto they ran by ſeeking to avoid it. This bad affection of this Province, would not ſuffer Hanno to temporize. Ten thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, Hannibal had left unto him: beſides which, it is like, that ſome forces he was able to raiſe out of his Province. Therefore he adventured a battel with Scipio, wherein he was overthrown and taken. Following this victory, Scipio beſieged Stiſſum, a Town hard by, and won it. But Aſdrubal having paſſed Iberus, and coming too late to the relief of Hanno, with eight thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, fell upon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not far from Tarracon, whom he found careleſs, as after a victory, roving abroad in the Country; and with great ſlaughter drave them aboard their ſhips.

ſhips. This done, he ran up into the Country, where he withdrew the Ilergetes from the Roman party, though they had given Hoſtages to Scipio. Scipio in the mean ſeaſon was gone to viſit and aid his Fleet; where having ſet things in order, he returned back, and made towards Aſdrubal; who durſt not abide his coming, but withdr ew himſelf again over Iberus. So the Ilergetes were compelled by force, having loſt Athanagia their chief City, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increaſe the number of their Hoſtages. The Auſetani likewiſe Confederates of the Carthaginians, were beſieged in their chief Town; which they defended thirty daies hoping in vain, that the ſharp Winter and great abundance of Snow that fell, would have made the Romans to diſlodge. But they were fain at length to yield; and for this their obſtinacy, they were amerced twenty talents of ſilver. During the ſiege, the Lacetani came to help their diſtreſſed neighbours; and were beaten home by Scipio, leaving twelve thouſand of their Company dead behind them. I cannot but wonder how theſe Lacetani, that are ſaid to be the firſt which embraced the friendſhip of Scipio, ſhould, without any cauſe remembred, become Carthaginian on the ſudden, in the next news that we hear of them. As alſo it is ſtrange, that all the Sea-coaſt Northward of Iberus, having lately become voluntarily ditionis Romanæ, ſubject unto Rome, ſhould, in continuance of the Story, after a few lines, hold war againſt Scipio, without any reſiſtance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I believe, that Aſdrubal, as it were by a charm, ſtirred up the Ilergetes, making them lay aſide all care of their Hoſtages, and take Arms in his quarrel; whilſt himſelf had not the daring to ſtand againſt Scipio, but ran away, and ſaved himſelf beyond Iberus. Philinus perhaps or ſome Carthaginian Writer, would have told it thus: That Scipio adventuring too far into the Country, was beaten by Aſdrubal back to his ſhips, whence he durſt not ſtir until Winter came on: at what time the Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Province, leaving ſome few Garriſons to defend thoſe places, that after Scipio won, by returning upon them, unlooked for through a deep Snow. As for the Lacetani, Ilergetes, and the reſt, we may reaſonably think, that they ſought their own benefit; helping themſelves one while by the Romans againſt the Carthaginians; and contrariwiſe, upon ſenſe of injuries received, or apprehenſion of more grievous tyranny, under which theyſ eared to be brought by theſe new Maſters, hearkening again unto the comfortable promiſes of thoſe that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to live under their own Country Laws, and not under Governours ſent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may teſtifie: even from henceforth unto the daies of Auguſtus Ceſar, till when they were never thorowly conquered.

Liv. lib. 21.

The year following this, Cn. Scipio had a victory againſt the Carthaginians in fight at Sea; or rather came upon them unlooked for, while they rode at Ancor, moſt of their men being on ſhore. All their ſhips that ran not too far on ground, he took; and thereby grew Maſter of the whole Coaſt; landing at pleaſure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defenced. After this victory, above one hundred and twenty Nations, or petty eſtates in Spain, are ſaid to have ſubmitted themſelves unto the Romans, or given Hoſtages; whereby Aſdrubal was compelled to flye into the uttermoſt corners of the Land, and hide himſelf in Luſitania. Yet it follows, that the Ilergetes did again rebel; that Aſdrubal hereupon came over Iberus; and that Scipio (though having eaſily vanquiſhed the Ilergetes) went not forth to meet him, but ſtirred up againſt him the Celtiberians, that lately were become his ſubjects, and had given him Hoſtages. Theſe took from the Carthaginians three Towns, and vanquiſhed him in two battels; wherein they ſlew fifteen thouſand of his men, and took four thouſand priſoners. Then arrived P. Scipio, with the ſupply before mentioned: and henceforward the two Brethren joyntly adminiſtred the buſineſs in Spain.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celtiberian War, the two Scipio's did haud cunctanter, without both fear or doubt, paſs over Iberus, and beſieged Saguntum. Little cauſe of doubt had they, if Cn. had already ſubdued many Nations beyond it; and, among many other, the ſame Celtiberians, that with their proper forces were able to vanquiſh Aſdrubal. Boſtar, the Governor of Saguntum, a ſimple man, ſuffered himſelf to be perſwaded by one Acedux a Spaniard, that the only way to get the favour and hearty good will of the Country, was by freely reſtoring unto them thier Hoſtages; as reſting without any pledge, aſſured of their faith. But the crafty Spaniard, being truſted with this meſſage and reſtitution of the Hoſtages, carried them all to the Roman General; perſwaded them, as he had done Boſtar, to make the Liberality their own. Hereby the Romans purchaſed much love, if the tale were true; and if it were not rather true, as afterward, and ere this we find that all the Spaniſh Hoſtages were left in new Carthage. I am weary of rehearſing ſo many particularities, whereof I can believe ſo few. But ſince we find no better certainties, we muſt content our ſelves with theſe.

The year following was like unto this: Aſdrubal muſt be beaten again. The two Scipio's divide their forces: Cn. makes war by Land, P. by Sea. Aſdrubal, with much labour and entreaty, hath gotten four thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe out of Africk: He repairs his Fleet, and provides every way to make reſiſtance. But all his chief Sea-men, and Maſters of his Ships, revolt unto the Romans, becauſe they had been chidden the laſt year for their negligence, which had betrayed the Navy. The revolt of theſe ſhip-maſters animates to rebellion the Carpetians, or Carpetani, an Inland people about Toledo, in the very Center of Spain. Theſe do much miſchief, ſo that Aſdrubal is fain to make a journey to them. His ſudden coming cuts off ſome of them, that were found ſcattered abroad in the fields. But they, making a head, ſo valiantly aſſail him, that they drive him for very fear, to encamp himſelf ſtrongly on an high piece of ground; whence he dares not come forth to give them battel. So they take a Town by force, wherein he had laid up all his proviſions; and ſhortly make themſelves Maſters of the Country round about. This good ſucceſs breeds negligence; for which they dearly pay. Aſdrubal comes upon them, takes them unprepared, beats them, kills the moſt of them, and diſperſeth the reſt; ſo that the whole Nation yieldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage, that Aſdrubal ſhould lead his Army forth into Italy; which we may wonder why the Carthaginians would appoint him to do, if they had been informed by his letters in what hard caſe he was; and had ſo weakly ſupplyed him, as is ſhewed before. But thus we find it reported; and that upon the very rumour of this his journey, almoſt all Spain was ready to fall to the Romans. Aſdrubal therefore preſently ſends word to Carthage, That this muſt not be ſo: or, if they will needs have it it ſo, that then they muſt ſend him a ſucceſſor, and well attended with a ſtrong Army, which to employ they ſhould find work more than enough; ſuch notable men were the Roman Generals. But the Senate of Carthage is not much moved with this excuſe; Aſdrubal muſt needs be gone: Himilco, with ſuch forces as are thought expedient for that ſervice, both by Land and Sea, is ſent to take the charge of Spain. Wherefore Aſdrubal hath now no more to do, than to furniſh himſelf with ſtore of mony, that he might have wherewithal to win the friendſhip of the Gauls; through whoſe Countries he muſt paſs, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly to blame, for not remembring to eaſe him of his care. But ſince it can be no better, he lays great impoſitions upon all the Spaniards his ſubjects: and having gotten together as much treaſure as he could, onward he marcheth toward Iberus. The Scipio's hearing theſe news, are careful how to arreſt him on the way. They beſiege Ibera (ſo called of the Rivers name running by it) the richeſt Town in all thoſe quarters, that was confederate with Aſdrubal; who thereupon ſteps aſide to relieve it. The Romans meet him, and fight a battel with him; which they win the more eaſily, for that the Spaniards, his followers had rather be vanquiſhed at home, than get the victory, and afterwards be haled into Italy. Great numbers are ſlain; and few ſhould have eſcaped, but that the Spaniards ran away ere the battels were fully joyned. Their Camp the Romans take and ſpoil; whereby (queſtionleſs) they are marvellouſly enriched; all the money that could be raked together in Spain being carried along in this Italian Expedition. This days event joyns all Spain to the Romans, if any part of the Country ſtood in doubt before; and puts Aſdrubal ſo far from all thought of traveling into Italy, that it leaves him ſmall hope of keeping himſelf ſafe in Spain. Of theſe exploits advertiſement is ſent to Rome, and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are, That they have neither mony, apparel, nor bread, wherewith to ſuſtain their Army and Fleet; that all is wanting: ſo as unleſs they may be ſupplied from Rome, they can neither hold their forces together, nor tarry any longer in the Province. Theſe Letters come to Rome in an evil ſeaſon; the State being ſcarcely able, after the loſs at Canna, to help it ſelf at home. Yet relief is ſent; how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that love and care, which the private Citizens of Rome bare unto the common-wealth, ſhall be inſerted elſewhere into the relation of things, whereof the truth is leſs queſtionable. At the coming of this ſupply, the two Scipio's purſue Aſdrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. What elſe can we think, that remember the laſt news of him, and how fearfully he miſtruſted his own ſafety? They find him, and Mago and Amilcar the Son of Bomilcar, with an Army of threeſcore thouſand men, beſieging Illiturgi: (which the learned Ortelius, and others probably conjecture to have ſtood, where Carrinnena is now in the Kingdom of Aragon; for there was Illiturgis, afterwards called Forum Julii, quite another way) a Town of the Illergetes their neareſt Neighbours, for having revolted unto the Romans. The Town is greatly diſtreſſed; but moſt of all, for want of victuals. The Romans therefore break through between the Enemies Camps, with terrible ſlaughter of all that reſiſted them: and having victualled the place, encourage Townſmen to defend their walls as ſtoutly, as they ſhould anon behold them fighting manfully with the beſiegers, in their behalf. So Liv. lib. 23.

they iſſue forth, about ſixteen thouſand againſt threeſcore thouſand: and killing more of the enemies, than themſelves were in number, drave all the three Carthaginian Commanders, every one out of his quarter; and took that day, beſides priſoners and other booty, fifty and eight Enſigns. Liv. lib. 23.

The Carthaginian Army, being thus beaten from Illiturgi, fall upon Incibili, that ſtood a little Southward from the mouth of Iberus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedy of earning money by war, for thus re-inforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondred, whence the Carthaginians had money to pay them: ſince Aſdrubal was lately driven to poll the Country, wanting money of his own; and being beaten in his Journey, had loſt his wealthy carriages when his Camp was taken after the battel by Iberus. Howſoever it hapens, the Carthaginians (according to their cuſtom) are beaten again at Incibili: where there were of them above thirteen thouſand ſlain, and above three thouſand taken; beſides two and forty Enſigns, and nine Elephants. Liv. ibid. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spain fell from them unto the Romans. Thus could Fabius, Valerius, Antius, or ſome other Hiſtorian, to whom Livy gave credit, conquer all Spain twice in one year, by winning famous victories; whereof theſe good Captains, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

The Romans notwithſtanding this large acceſs of Dominion, winter on their own ſide of Iberus. In the beginning of the next year, great Armies of the Spaniards riſe againſt Aſdrubal; and are overthrown by him. P. Scipio, to help theſe his friends, is forced to make great haſte over the River. At Caſtrum Altum, a place in the mid-way between new Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilcar, Publius Scipio incampeth: and ſtores the place with victuals, being ſtrong and defenſible; as intending to make it his ſeat for a while. But the Country round about it is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian horſe have charged the Romans in their march, and are gone off clear; falling alſo upon ſome ſtraglers, or ſuch as lagged behind their fellows in march, they have cut off two thouſand of them. Hereupon it is thought behoveful, to retire unto ſome place more aſſured. So Publius withdraws himſelf unto Mons victoria: that riſing ſomewhat Eaſtward from Incibili, overlooketh the Southern Out-let of Iberus. Thither the Carthaginians purſue him: His brother Cn. repairs unto him; and Aſdrubal the ſon of Gaſco, with a full Army, arrives to help his Companions. As they lye thus near incamped together, P. Scipio with ſome light-armed, going cloſely to view the places thereabouts, is diſcoverd by the enemies: who are like to take him, but that he withdraws himſelf to an high piece of ground; where they beſiege him, until his brother Cn. fetcht him off. After this (but I know not why) Caſtulo, a great City of Spain, whence Hannibal had taken him a wife, joyneth with the Romans; though being far diſtant from them, and ſeated on the head of the River Bætis. Nevertheleſs the Carthaginians paſs over Iberus, to beſiege Illiturgi again, wherein lodgeth a Roman garriſon; hoping to win it by famine. We may juſtly wonder, what ſhould move them to neglect the rebellion of Caſtulo, yea and the Roman Army lying ſo cloſe by them, and to ſeek adventures further off, in that very place, wherein they had been ſo grievouſly beaten the year before. But thither they go: and thither follows them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Town by force, breaks out upon them them the next day, and in two battels kills above 12000, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with six and thirty Ensigns. This victory (doubtless) is remarkable: considering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than five thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians besiege Bigarra: but that siege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remove to Manda; where the Romans are soon at their heels. There is a great battel fought, that lasted four hours, wherein the Romans get a notable victory: and a more notable would they have gotten, had not Cn. Scipio been wounded. Thirty and nine Elephants are killed, and twelve thousand men; three thousand prisoners taken, and seven and fifty Ensigns. The Charthaginians flye to Auringes; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carried into the field, and vanquished the Carthaginians again; but kills not half so many of them, as before; good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these overthows, the Spaniards, a people framed even by nature to set war on foot, quickly fill up the broken troops of Asdrubal, who having also hired some of the Gauls, adventures once more to try his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten again; and loseth eight thousand of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensigns, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, the Romans are even ashamed to leave Saguntum enthralled unto the Carthaginians; since, in behalf of that City, they had at first entred into this war. And well may we think it strange, that they had not recovered it long before, since we may remember, that long before this they had won all the Country once and again. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now besieged Saguntum; and were fain (as appears) to go their way without it: so as they need not to blush, for having so long forborn to do that which ere now they had attempted, but were unable to perform. At the present they won Saguntum: and restored the possession thereof unto such of the poor dispersed Citizens as they can find out. They also waste and destroy the Country of the Turdetani, that had ministred unto Hannibal matter of quarrel against the Saguntines. This last action (questionless) was much to their honour; and wherein we may be assured, that the Carthaginians would have disturbed them if they had been able.

But overlooking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Romans have gotten in Spain, other print or token of all their brave exploits, we can perceive none, than this recovery of Saguntum: excepting the stopping of Asdrubals journy; which was indeed of greatest importance, but appertaining to their own defence. For they have landed at Emporiæ, an Haven Town, built and peopled by a Colony of the Phocæans, kin to the Massilians, friends to the Romans; They have easily won to their party, lost, recovered, and lost again, some petty bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by perswasion, other-whiles by force, and sometimes by their own unsettled passions; and now finally they have won a Town, whereof the Carthaginians held entire possession, who had rooted out the old inhabitants. Wherefore we may easily believe, that when they took Saguntum (if they took it not by surprize; which is to be suspected, since in this Action we find no particulars remembred, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in some notable fight. In like sort also must we think, that all those battels lately remembred, after every one of which Asdrubal sate down before some place, that had rebelled, or seemed ready to rebel, were prosperous unto the Carthaginians. For it is not the custom of Armies vanquished, to carry to war from Town to Town, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortifie themselves within their own places of strength, and therein to attend the levy and arrival of new supplies. And surely, if the Romans had been absolute Masters of the field, when they won Saguntum, they would not have consumed a whole year following, in practising only with the Celtiberians the next adjoyning people. Yet made they this, little less than two years business. Of these Celtiberians we heard before, That they had yielded up themselves unto the Romans; for security of their faith, given Hostages to Scipio; and, at his appointment, made war against the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and not without express condition of a great summ, hired to serve in the Roman Camp. How this may hold together, I cannot perceive; unless perhaps in those days it were the Roman custom, or rather the custom of some bad Author whom Livy follows, to call every messenger, or stragler, that entred that Camp, an Hostage of that people from whom he came.

The Celtiberians at length, hired with great rewards, send an Army of thirty thousand to help the Romans: out of which, 300. of the fittest men are chosen, and carried into Italy, there to deal with their Country-men that follow Hannibal in his wars. But if any of these three hundred return back into Spain, it is to be feared, that he brings with him such news of the riches and welfare of Hannibals men, that all his fellows at home are the less unwilling to follow Asdrubal, when he shall next have a desire to lead them into Italy. Hereof we find more than probability, when these mercenary Celtiberians meet the Carthaginian Army in the field. The two Scipio's presuming on this access of strength, divide their forces, and seek out the Enemies, who lye not far off with three Armies. Asdrubal the son of Amilcar, is nearest at hand; even among the Celtiberians, at Anitorgis. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order: but the fear is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being destroyed; Mago the Son of Gesco, hearing the news, will make use of their distance, which is five days march, and by running into the furthest part of the Country save themselves from being overtaken. Publius therefore must make the more haste, and take with him the better Souldiers, that is, two parts of the old Roman Army, leaving the third part, and all the Celtiberians, to his Brother. He that hath the longer journy to make, comes somewhat the sooner to his lives end. Mago and Asdrubal the Son of Gesco, are not studying how to run away: they find no such necessity. They joyn their forces together, meet with Publius Scipio, and lay at him so hardly, that he is driven to keep himself close within his Trenches; wherein he thinks himself not well assured. Especially he is vexed by Masanissa, Prince of the Massesyli, Numidians, bordering upon Mauritania, in the Region called now Tremizen: to whom the chief honour of this service is ascribed, for that he becomes afterward Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous case, P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Indibilis a Spanish Prince, is coming with seven thousand and five hundred of the Suessetani, to joyn with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be ſtrait ſhut up, and beſieged, he iſſues forth by night, to meet with Indibilis upon the way, leaving T. Fonteius his Lieutenant, with a ſmall company to defend the Camp. He meets with Indibilis; but is not able, according to his hope, to defeat him at the firſt encounter. The fight continues ſo long, that the Numidian horſe appear (whom he thought to have been ignorant of his departure) and fall upon the Romans on all ſides; neither are the Carthaginians far behind; but come ſo faſt upon him in a Rear, that P. Scipio, uncertain which way to turn, yet fighting and animating his men, where need moſt requireth, is ſtruck thorow with a lance, and ſlain: very few of his Army eſcaping the ſame deſtiny, through benefit of the dark night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twenty days after. At his meeting with Aſdrubal, the Celtiberian Mercenaries all forſake him, pretending that they had war in their own Country. If Anitorgis, where Aſdrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Bueterus takes it, a Celtiberian Town; this was no vain pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may juſtly believe, that they were won by Aſdrubal, and eaſily perſwaded to take as much mony for not fighting, as they ſhould have had for hazarding their lives. C. Scipio therefore being unable to ſtay them, and no leſs unable, without their help either to reſiſt the enemy, or to joyn with his Brother, maketh a very violent retrait; herein only differing from plain flight, that he keeps his men together. Aſdrubal preſſeth har dupon him: and Mago with Aſdrubal the Son of Geſco, having made an end of Publius, haſten to diſpatch his Brother after him. Scipio ſteals from them all by night, but is overtaken the next day by their horſe, and arreſted, in an open place of harh ſtony ground, where grows not ſo much as a ſhrub, unfit for defence of his Legions againſt ſuch enemies. Yet a little Hill he finds of eaſie aſcent on every ſide; which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with pack-ſaddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Palliſado. Theſe weak defences the Carthaginians ſoon tear in ſunder: and, breaking in on all hands, leave very few of them alive; that ſaving themſelves, I know not how, within ſome woods adjoyning, eſcape unto T. Fonteius, whom Publius had left in his Camp, as is before ſaid. It is a terrible overthrow, they ſay, out of which no man eſcapes. Yet, how they who were thus hemmed in on every ſide, in ſo bare a ground as afforded not a ſhrub to cover them, could break out, and ſhrowd themſelves within woods adjoyning, I ſhould much wonder; did not a greater miracle following call away mine attention. T. Fonteius is in P. Scipio's Camp, on the North ſide of Iberus, fearful (as may be ſuppoſed) of his own life; ſince his General, with two parts of the Roman Army, had little hope to remain long ſafe within it. Thither comes L. Martius, a young Roman Gentleman of a noble ſpirit; who having gathered together the ſcattered Souldiers, ann drawn ſome Companies out of their Garriſons, makes a pretty Army. The Souldiers, being to chuſe a General by moſt voices, prefer this L. Martius before Fonteius the Lieutenant, as well they may. For Aſdrubal the Son of Geſco coming upon them; this L. Martius ſo encourageth his men (fondly weeping when he led them forth, upon remembrance of their more honourable Generals lately ſlain) and admoniſheth them of their preſent neceſſity, that he beats the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable victory perhaps he might have gotten, but hat he wiſely ſounds the ratrait; reſerving the fury of his Souldiers to a greater occaſion. The Carthaginians are at firſt amazed, and wonder whence this new boldneſs grows, in enemies lately vanquiſhed, and now again little better thantaken: but when they ſee, that the Roman dares not follow his advantage, they return to their former ſecurity; and, utterly deſpiſing him, ſet neither Corps de garde nor Sentinel, but reſt ſecure, as if no enemy were near. Martius therefore animates his Souldiers with lively words; and tells them, That there is no adventure more ſafe, than that which is furtheſt from ſuſpicion of being undertaken. They are ſoon perſwaded to follow him, in any deſperate piece of ſervice. So he leads them forth by night, and ſteals upon the Camp of Aſdrubal; where, finding no guard, but the enemies faſt aſleep, or very drowſie, he enters without reſiſtance, fires their Cabbins, and gives a terrible alarm; ſo that all affrighted the Carthaginians run head-long one upon another, they know not which way. All paſſages out of their Camp, Martius hath prepoſſeſſed, ſo that there is no way to eſcape, ſave by leaping down the Rampart; which as many do, as can think upon it, and run away toward the Camp of Aſdrubal the Son of Amilcar, that lay ſix miles off. But Martius hath way-laid them. In a Valley between their two Camps he hath beſtowed a Roman cohort, and I know not what number of Horſe; ſo that into this Ambuſh they fall every one, and are cut in pieces. But leſt perchance any ſhould have eſcaped, and give the alarm before his coming; Martius haſtens to be there as ſoon as they. By which diligent ſpeed, he comes early in the morning upon this further Camp; which with no great difficulty he enters, and partly by apprehenſion of danger which the Enemies conceived, when they beheld the Roman ſhields, foul, and bloodied with their former execution, he drives head-long into flight, all that can ſave themſelves from the fury of the ſword. Thirty ſeven thouſand of the enemies periſh in this nights work; beſides a thouſand eight hundred and thirty, taken priſoners. Hereunto Valerius Antius adds, that the Camp of Mago was alſo taken, and ſeven thouſand ſlain; and that in another battel with Aſdrubal, there were ſlain ten thouſand more; beſides four thouſand three hundred and thirty, taken priſoners. Such is the power of ſome Hiſtorians. Livie therefore hath elſewhere well obſerved, That there is none ſo intemperate, as Valerius Antius, in multiplying the numbers that have fallen in battels. That whilſt Martius was making an Oration to his Souldiers, a flame of fire ſhone about his head, Livie reports as a common tale, not giving thereto any credit: and temperately concludeth, That this Captain Martius got a great name, which he might well do, if with ſo ſmall forces, and in ſuch diſtreſs, he could clearly get off from the Enemies, and give them any parting blow, though it were far leſs than that which is here ſet down.

Of theſe occurrents L. Martius ſent word to Rome, not forgetting his own good ſervice, whatſoever it was, but ſetting it out in ſuch wiſe, as the Senate might judge him worthy to hold the place of their Vice-gerent in Spain: which the better to intimate unto them, he ſtiled himſelf Proprætor. The Fathers were no leſs moved with the tydings than the caſe required; and therefore took ſuch careful order, for ſupplying their Forces in Spain, that although Hannibal came to the gates of Rome, ere the Companies levied to ſerve that Province could be ſent away; yet could they not ſtay a tyde for defence of the City it self, but shipped them in all haste for Spain. As for the title of Proprætor, which Martius had assumed, they thought it too great for him, and were offended at his presumption in usurping it: foreseeing well, that it was matter of ill consequence, to have the Souldiers abroad make choice among themselves, of those that should command Armies and Provinces. Therefore Claudius Nero was dispatched away with all convenient haste, into Spain: carrying with him about six thousand of the Roman foot, and as many of the Latines, with three hundred Roman horse, and of the Latines eight hundred.

It happened well that about these times, the affairs of Rome began to prosper in Italy, and offered means of sending abroad such a strong supply: otherwise the victories of Martius would ill have served, either to keep footing in Spain, or to stop the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Alps. For when Claudius, landing with his new forces, took charge of that remainder of the Army, which was under Martius and Fonteius; he found surer tokens of the overthrows received, than of those miraculous victories, whereof Martius had made his vaunts unto the Senate. The Roman party was forsaken by most of the Spanish friends; whom how to reclaim, it could not easily be devised. Yet Claudius advanced boldly towards Asdrubal the Brother of Hannibal; whom he found among the Ausetani, near enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lapides atri; out of which there was no issue, but only through a strait, whereon the Roman seized at the first coming. What should have tempted any man of understanding to incamp in such a place, I do not find; and as little reason can I find in that which followed. For it is said, that Asdrubal seeing himself thus lockt up, made offer to depart forthwith out of all Spain and quit the Province to the Romans, upon condition that he and his Army might be thence dismissed; That he spent many days, in entertaining parley with Claudius about this business; That night by night he conveyed his footmen (a few at a time) through very difficult passages out of the danger; and that finally taking advantage of a misty day, he stole away with all his Horse and Elephats, leaving his camp empty. If we consider, that there were at the same time, besides this Asdrubal, two other Carthaginian Generals in Spain; we shall find no less cause to wonder at the simplicity of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargain for so great a Country, with one of these three Chieftains, than at the strange nature of those passages, through which the footmen could hardly creep out by night; the Horse and Elephants easily following them in a dark misty day. Wherefore in giving belief to such a tale, it is needful that we suppose, both the danger wherein the Carthaginians were, and the conditions offered for their safe departure, to have been of far less value. Howsoever it was; neither this nor ought else that the Romans could do, served to purchase any new friends in Spain, or to recover the old which they had lost. Like enough it is, that the old Souldiers, which had chosen Martius their Proprætor, took it not well, that the Senate, regardless of their good deserts, had repealed their election, and sent a Proprætor whom they fancied not so well. Some such occasion may have moved them to desire a Proconsul, and (perhaps) young Scipio by name: as if a title of greater dignity were needful to work regard in the Barbarians; and the beloved memory of Cn. and Publius likely to do good, were it revived in one of the same family. Whether upon these, or upon other reasons, C. Claudius was recalled out of the Province; and Publius the Son of P. Scipio sent Proconsul into Spain.

This is that Scipio, who afterward transferred the war into Africk: where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Country. He was a man of goodly presence, and singularly well conditioned; especially he excelled in Temperance, Continency, Bounty, and other vertues that purchase love; of which qualities what great use he made, shall appear in the renour of his actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, savouring a little too much of the great Alexanders vanity; how he used to walk alone in the Capitol, as one that had some secret conference with Jupiter; how a Dragon (which must have been one of the gods; and, in likelyhood, Jupiter himself) was thought to have conversed with his Mother, entring her Chamber often, and vanishing away at the coming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtful answers; I hold them no better than fables, devised by Historians, who thought thereby to add unto the glory of Rome: that this Noble City might seem not only to have surpassed other Nations in vertue of the generality, but also in great worth of one single man. To this end nothing is left out, that might serve to adorn this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as matter of unquestionable truth, That when a Proconsul was to be chosen for Spain, there durst not any Captain of the principal Citizens offer himself as Petitioner for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the people of Rome were much astonished thereat; That when the day of election came, all the Princes of the City stood looking one another in the face, not one of them having the heart to adventure himself in such a desperate service; and finally, that this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about four and twenty years of age, getting up on a high place where he might be seen of all the multitude, requested and obtained, that the office might be conferred upon him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Martius no better than dreams: and either very unreasonable was the fear of all the Roman Captains who durst not follow Claudius Nero, that not long before was gone into Spain Proprætor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Province, which Asdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard even now, was ready to abandon. But upon these incoherences which I find in the two partial Roman Historians, I do not willingly insist.

P. Scipio was sent Proconsul into Spain; and with him was joyned M. Junius Syllanus, as Proprætor, and his Coadjutor. They carried with them ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, in thirty Quinquereme-Gallies, with these they landed at Emporiæ; and marched from thence to Tarracon alongst the Sea-coast. At the fame of Scipio's arrival, it is said, that Embassages came to him apace from all quarters of the Province; which he entertained with such a Majesty, as bred a wonderful opinion of him. As for the enemies, they were greatly afraid of him; and so much the greater was their fear, by how much the less they could give any reason of it. If we must believe this, then must we needs believe, that their fear was even as great as could be: for very little cause there was, to be terrified with the fame of so young a man, which had as yet performe dnothing. All the Winter following (or, as some think, all the next Year) he did nothing: but spent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His first enterprise was againſt new Carthage: upon which he came unexpected, with 25000 foot, and 2500. horſe; his Sea forces coaſting him, and moderating their courſe in ſuch wiſe, that they arrived there together with him. He aſſailed the Town by Land and Sea; and won it by aſſault the firſt day. The Carthaginians loſt it, by their too much confidence upon the ſtrength of it: which cauſed them to man it more ſlenderly, than was requiſite. Yet it might have been well enough defended, if ſome Fiſhermen of Tarracon had not diſcovered unto Scipio, a ſecret paſſage unto the Walls; whereof the Townſmen themſelves were either ignorant, or thought (at leaſt) that their enemies could have no notice. This City of new Carthage, reſembled the old and great Carthage in ſcituation; ſtanding upon a demy-Iſland, between an Haven and a great Lake. All the Weſtern ſide of the Walls, and ſomewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake: which the Fiſher-men of Tarracon had ſounded; and finding ſome part thereof a ſhelf, whereon at low water men might paſs knee-deep, or (at moſt) wading up to the Navil, Scipio thruſt thereinto ſome companies of his men; who recovered the top of the Walls without reſiſtance: the place being left without guard; as able to defend it ſelf by the natural ſtrength. Theſe falling ſuddenly upon the backs of the Carthaginians within the City, eaſily forced a gate, and gave free entrance to the Roman Army. What booty was found within the Town, Livie himſelf cannot certainly affirm; but is fain to ſay, that ſome Roman Hiſtorians told lies without meaſure, in way of amplification. By that ſmall proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treaſury, we may eaſily perceive how great a vanity it was to ſay, that all the wealth of Africk and Spain was heaped up in that one Town. But therein were beſtowed all the Spaniſh Hoſtages (or at leaſt of the adjoining Provinces) whom Scipio intreated with ſingular courteſie: reſtoring them unto their kindred and friends in ſuch gracious manner, as doubled the thanks, due to ſo great a benefit. Hereupon a Prince of the Celtiberians, and two petty Kings of the Ilergetes and Lecetani, neareſt Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North-ſide of Iberus, forſook the Carthaginian party, and joined with the Romans. The ſpeech of Indibilis, K. of the Ilergetes is much commended; for that he did not vaunt himſelf as commonly Fugitives uſe, of the pleaſure, which he did unto the Romans, in revolting from their enemies; but rather excuſing this his changing ſide, as being thereto compelled by injuries of the Carthaginians, and invited by the honourable dealing of Scipio. This temperate eſtimation of his new profeſſed friendſhip, was indeed no unſure token, that it ſhould be long-laſting. But if the Ilergetes had long ere this (as we have heard before) forſaken the Carthaginian party, and ſtoutly held themſelves as friends to Cn. Scipio: then could nothing have been deviſed more vain, than this Oration of Indibilis their King, excuſing as new, his taking part with the ſame, when he ſhould have rather craved pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Uncle. Moſt likely therefore it is, that howſoever the two elder Scipio's had gotten ſome few places among theſe their Neighbours, and held them by ſtrength; yet were the Romans never maſters of the Country, till this worthy Commander by recovering their Hoſtages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in ſending them home, won unto himſelf the aſſured love and aſſiſtance of theſe Princes. The Carthaginian Generals, when they heard of this loſs, were very ſorry: yet nevertheleſs they ſet a good face on the matter; ſaying, that a young man, having ſtoln a Town by ſurpriſe, was too far tranſported, and over-joyed, but that ſhortly they would meet with him, and put him in mind of his Father and Uncle; which would alter his mode, and bring him to a more convenient temper.

Now if I ſhould here interpoſe mine own conjecture; I ſhould be bold to ſay, that the Carthaginians were at this time buſie, in ſetting forth towards Italy; and that Scipio, to divert them undertook new Carthage, as his Father and Uncle, upon the like occaſion, ſate down before Ibera. And in this reſpect I would ſuppoſe that it had not been much amiſs, if the paſſage over the Lake had been undiſcovered, and the Town held out ſome longer while. For howſoever that particular Action was the more fortunate, in coming to ſuch good iſſue upon the firſt day: yet in the generality of the buſineſs between Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wiſhed, that Aſdrubal ſhould be ſtayed from going into Italy, than that half of Spain ſhould be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to do, that ſhould hinder his journey; Mago, and Aſdrubal the ſon of Geſco, were thought ſufficient to hold Scipio work, in that lingring War of taking and retaking Towns, whilſt the main of the Carthaginian forces, under Aſdrubal the ſon of Amilcar, went to a greater enterpriſe: even to fight in trial of the Empire. But the Roman Hiſtorians tell this after another faſhion; and ſay, That Aſdrubal was beaten into Italy: whither he ran for fear, as thinking himſelf ill aſſured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but hear the name of Scipio. Scipio, ſay they, coming upon Aſdrubal; his Vant-currers charged ſo luſtily the Carthaginian horſe, that they drave them into their Trenches: and made it apparent, even by that ſmall piece of ſervice, how full of ſpirit the Romans Army was, and how dejected the enemy. Aſdrubal therefore by night retired out of that even ground, and occupied an Hill, compaſſed on three ſides with the River, very ſteep of aſcent, and not eaſie of acceſs on the foreſide; by which himſelf got up, and was to be followed by the Romans. On the top of it there was a Plain, whereon he ſtrongly encamped himſelf: and in the mid-way between the top and root of the Hill, was alſo another Plain; into which he deſcended, more upon bravery, that he might not ſeem to hide himſelf within the Trenches, than for that he durſt adventure his Army to the hazzard of a battail, for which this was no equal ground. But ſuch advantage of place could not ſave him from the Romans. They climbed up the Hill to him; they recovered even footing with him; drove him out of this lower Plain, up into his Camp on the Hill top: whither although the aſcent were very difficult, and his Elephants beſtowed in the ſmootheſt places to hinder their approach; yet compaſſing about, and ſeeking paſſage where it was hardeſt to be found; but much more ſtrongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got up before them, they drave both men and Elephants headlong, I know not whither: for it is ſaid, that there was no way to flie. Out of ſuch a battel, wherein he had loſt eight thouſand men, Aſdrubal is ſaid to have eſcaped; and gathering together his diſperſed troops, to have marched toward the Pyrenees, having ſent away his Elephants ere the fight began. Nevertheleſs, Mago, and Aſdrubal the ſon of Geſco, are reported after this to have conſulted with him about this War; and finally to have concluded, that go he needs needs must, were it but to carry all the Spainiards as far as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to have been true, it shall appear at his coming into Italy; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affairs have too long detained us.

SECT. XII.

The great troubles that Hannibal raised in all quarters, to the City of Rome. Posthumius the Roman General, with his whole Army, is slain by the Gauls. Philip King of Macedon enters iuto a League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Romans joyning with the Æolians, make war upon Philip in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him, the better to intend their business against the Carthaginians.

WE left Hannibal wintering at Capua: where he and his new Confederates rejoyced (as may be thought) not a little, to hear the good news from Carthage of such mighty aid, as was decreed to be sent thence unto him. In former times he had found work enough, to carry the Romans corn into his own barns, and to drive away their Cattel to Geryon: his victories affording him little other profit, than sustenance for his Army; by making him master of the open field. He might perhaps have forced some walled Towns in like sort as he did Geryon, and the Castle of Cannæ: but had he spent much time, about the getting of any one place well defended; the hunger, that his Army must have endured the Winter and the Spring following, until corn were ripe, would have grievously punished him for such imployment of the Summer. This may have been the reason, why he forbore to adventure upon Rome, after his victory at Cannæ. For had he failed (as it was a matter of no certainty) to carry the City at his first coming; want of victuals would have compelled him to quit the enterprise. Yea many of the people that opened so hastily their gates unto him, upon the fresh bruit of his glorious success, would have taken time of deliberation, and waited perhaps the event of another battel; if being, either for want of means to force the City, or of necessaries to continue a siege before it, repelled (as might seem) from the walls of Rome, he had presented himself unto them with a lessened reputation, somewhat later in the year; when time to force their obedience was wanting, unless they would freely yield it. But this great part of the care and travel was past, when so many States of Italy were become his: the year following, the Samnites, and other old enemies to Rome, were like to receive a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay siege unto that proud City, which so long had held them in subjection. Thus the winter was passed over joyfully, saving that there came not any tydings of the preparations, to second the welcom report of those mighty forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring grew on: and of the promised supply there arrived no more than only the Elephants. How late it was that these came, I find not: only we find, that after this he had above thirty of them; whereas all, save one, that he brought over the Alps, had been lost in in his journey through the Marishes of Hetruria. Very bad excuse for this exceeding negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make unto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truly, what mischiefs the perswasion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Otherwise, they might perhaps inform him, that it was thought a safer, though a farther way about, to pass along through Spain and Gaul, as he himself had done; and increase the Army, by hyring the Barbarians in the Journey; than to commit the main strength of their City, to the hazzard of the Seas: especially wanting a commodious Haven, to receive the Fleet that should carry such a number of Men, Horses, and Elephants, with all needful provisions. With these allegations Hannibal must rest content; and seek, as well as he can, to satisfie his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the year served, he took the field: and having finished what rested to be done at Casilinum, sought to make himself Master of some good Haven-town thereabout; that might serve to entertain the Carthaginian Fleet, or take from his Enemies at home all excuse which they might pretend by want thereof. To the same purpose and to do what else was needful, he sent Himilco unto the Locrians, and Hanno to the Lucans: not forgetting at once to assay all quarters of Italy, yea, the Isles of Sicily and Sardinia, since the siege of Rome must needs be deferred unto another year. Hanno made an ill Journey, of it, being met, or overtaken, by T. Sempronius Longus; who slew above two thousand of his men; with the loss of fewer than three hundred Romans. But Himilco sped far better. By help of the Brutains, his good friends, he won Petellia, or Petilia, by force; after it had held out some months. He won likewise Consentia, and Croton, that was forsaken by the Inhabitants. Also the City of Locri, which was of great importance, yielded unto him: as did all other places thereabout; except only the Town of Rhegium, over against Sicily.

The great faith of the Petilians is worthy to be recorded, as a notable testimony of the good government under which the Roman subjects lived. As for the Samnites, Campanes, and others, whose earnestness in rebellion may seem to prove the contrary; we are to consider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Soveraignty, an were now transported with ambition: which reason can hardly moderate, or benefits allay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did send to Rome for help: where their messengers received answer from the Senate, That the publick misfortunes had not left means, to relieve their Associates that were so far distant. The Petilian Messengers (Embassadours they are termed; as well as others, publickly sent from Cities of the Roman subjection, that had a private jurisdiction within themselves) fell down to the ground, and humbly besought the Fathers, not to give them away: promising to do and suffer whatsoever was possible, in defence of their Town, against the Carthaginians. Hereupon the Senate fell to consultation again: and having throughly considered all their forces remaining plainly confessed, that it was not in their own power to give any relief. Wherefore these Embassadours were willed to return home, and to bid their Citizens provide hereafter for their own safety, as having already discharged their faith to the utmost. All this notwithstanding, the Petilians (as was said) held out some months: and having striven in vain to defend themselves, when there was no apparent possibility, gave to the Carthaginians a bloody victory over them; being vanquished as much by famine, as by any violence of the Assailants.

The Romans at this time were indeed in such ill case, that Hannibal with a little help from Carthage, might have reduced them unto terms of great extremity. For whereas in a great bravery, before their loſs at Cannæ, they had ſhewed their high minds, by entertaining the care of things far off, notwithſtanding the great war that lay upon them ſo near at hand: it now fell out miſerably all at once, that their fortune abroad was no whit better than at home. L. Poſthumius Albinus their Prætor they had ſent, with an Army of five and twenty thouſand, into Gaul: to the Illyrian King Pineus they had ſent for their tribute due, whereof the pay-day was paſt; willing him, if he deſired forbearance, to deliver Hoſtages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip King of Macedon they had ſent to require, that he ſhould deliver up unto them Demetrius Pharius their Subject and Rebel, whom he had received. But now from all quarters they hear tydings little ſuitable to their former glorious conceits. Poſthumius with all his Army was cut in pieces by the Gauls, in ſuch ſort, that ſcarce ten men eſcaped. The manner of his overthrow was very ſtrange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gauls, Litania; thorow which he was to paſs. Againſt his coming, the Enemies had ſawed the trees ſo far, that a little force would ſerve to caſt them down. When therefore Poſthumius, with his whole Army, was entred into this dangerous paſſage, the Gauls that lay about the Wood, began to caſt down the trees; which falling one againſt another, bore all down ſo faſt, that the Romans were overwhelmed, Men an Horſes; in ſuch wiſe, that no more eſcaped, than is ſaid before. How this tedious work of ſawing ſo many trees, could take deſired effect, and neither be perceived, nor made fruſtrate, either by ſome wind that might have blown all down before the Romans entred, or by ſome other of thoſe many accidents, where to the device was ſubject; I do not well conceive. Yet ſome ſuch thing may have been done, and what failed in the ſtratagem, ſupplied with the Enemies ſword. It is not perhaps worthy to be omitted, as a monument of the ſavage condition, wherewith Lombardy, a Country now ſo civil, was infected in elder times, that of Poſthumius his skull, being cleanſed and trimmed up with gold, a drinking cup was made, and conſecrated in their principal Temple, as an holy veſſel for the uſe of the Prieſt in their ſolemnities. Of this great overthrow, when word was brought to Rome, the amazement was no leſs than the calamity. But ſorrow could give no remedy to the miſchief: and anger was vain, where there wanted forces to revenge. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none; neither do I find that any was a ſecond time demanded; this we find, that with Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus, Illyrian Kings, as alſo with Gentius, who raigned within a few years following, the Romans dealt upon even terms; entreating their aſſiſtance againſt Philip and Perſeus; not commanding their duty, as Vaſſals. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For having aſſured his affairs in Greece, and enjoying leiſure to look into the doings abroad, he ſent Embaſſadours to Hannibal; with whom he made a league, upon theſe conditions; That the King in perſon ſhould come into Italy, and with all his forces, by Land and Sea, aſſiſt the Carthaginians in the Roman war, until it were finiſhed; That Rome, and all Italy, together with all the ſpoil therein to be gotten, ſhould be left intire unto the State of Carthage; and that afterwards Hannibal, with his Army ſhould paſs into Greece, and there aſſiſt Philip, until he had ſubdued all his enemies (which were the Etolians, Thracians, King Antiochus and others) leaving ſemblably unto him the full poſſeſſion of that Country, and the Iſles adjoining. But ſuch prediſpoſition of Kingdoms and Provinces, is lightly controlled by divine providence, which therein ſhews it ſelf; not (as Herodotus falſly terms it, and like an Atheiſt) envious or malicious, but very juſt and Majeſtical in upholding that unſpeakable greatneſs of Soveraignty, by which It rules the whole World, and all that therein is.

The firſt Embaſſadours that Philip ſent, fell into the Romans hands, in their journey towards Hannibal: and being examined what they were, adventured upon a bold lie, ſaying, That they were ſent from the King of Macedon to Rome, there to make a League with the Senate and people, and offer his help in this time of great neceſſity. Theſe news were ſo welcome, that the joy thereof took away all care of making better inquiry. So they were lovingly feaſted, and freely diſmiſſed with guides that ſhould lead them the way, and ſhew them how to avoid the Carthaginians. But they being thus inſtructed concerning their journey fell wilfully into the Camp of Hannibal; who entertained them after a better faſhion, and concluded the buſineſs about which they came, upon the points before remembred. In their return homeward they happened again unluckily to be deſcried by the Roman Fleet; which miſtruſting them to be of the Carthaginian party, gave them chaſe. They did their beſt to have eſcaped: but being overtaken, they ſuffered the Romans to come aboard; and truſting to the lie that once had ſerved them, ſaid it again, That having been ſent from King Philip to make a League with the people of Rome, they were not able by reaſon of the Carthaginians lying between, to get any further than to M. Valerius the Prætor, unto whom they had ſignified the good affection of the King their Maſter. The tale was now leſs credible than before: and (which marred all) Geſco, Boſtar, and Mago, with their followers, Carthaginians that were ſent with them from Hannibal to ratifie the agreement, being preſently detected, made the matter apparent. Wherefore a little inquiſition ſerved to find all out: ſo that at length Hannibals own letters to K. Philip were delivered up, and the whole buſineſs confeſſed. The Embaſſadours and their followers were ſent cloſe priſoners to Rome; where the chief of them were caſt into priſon, and the reſt ſold for bondſlaves. Yet one of their ſhips that eſcaped, carried word into Macedon of all that happened. Whereupon new Embaſſage was ſent, that went and returned with better ſpeed; concluding as was agreed before, only with ſome loſs of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed; thinking with what heavy weight this Macedonian war, in an evil hour, was likely to fall upon them, when their ſhoulders were over-burdened with the load of the Carthaginian. Yet they took a noble reſolution, and ſuitable unto that, whereby they kept off the ſtorm, that elſe would have beaten upon them from Spain. They judged it more eaſie with ſmall force to detain Philip in Greece, than with all their ſtrength to reſiſt him in Italy. And herein they were in the right. For, that the very reputation of a King of Macedon, joining with Hannibal in ſuch a time, would have ſufficed to ſhake the allegiance, not only of the Latines, and other, their moſt faithful ſubjects, but even of the Roman Colonies, that held all priviledges of the City, it will appear by the following ſucceſs of things. M. Valerius the Prætor, with twenty Quiquereme Gallies, was appointed to attend upon the Macedonian, and to ſet on foot ſome commotion in Greece; or to nouriſh the troubles already therein begun. Philip was buſie about the Sea Towns, that looked towards Italy, ſetting ſetting upon Apollonia; and thence falling upon Oricum, which he won, and ſo returned to Apollonia again. The Epirots craved help of M. Valerius; or rather accepted his kind offers; who had none other buſineſs to do. The Garriſon that Philip had left in Oricum, was ſtrong enough to hold the Townſ-men in good order, but not to keep out the Romans, of whoſe daring to attempt any thing againſt him, on that ſide the Sea, Philip as then had no ſuſpicion. Valerius therefore eaſily regained the Town, and ſent thence a thouſand men, under Nævius Criſpus, an undertaking and expert Captain, which got by night into Apollonia. Theſe made a notable ſally, and brake into Philip's Trenches with ſo great ſlaughter, that they forced him to forſake his Camp, and raiſe the ſiege. The King purpoſed (as it is ſaid) to have departed thence by Sea: but Valerius, coming with his Fleet from Oricum, ſtopped up the mouth of the River, ſo that he was fain to burn his ſhips (which belike were no better than long boats) and depart ill furniſhed of carriages by Land. After this Valerius dealt with the Ætolians, a Nation alwaies enemy to the Crown of Macedon; and eaſily perſwaded them (being ſo affected, as hath elſewhere been ſhewed) to make ſtrong war on Philip; wherein he promiſed them great aſſiſtance from the Romans. That which moſt moved the troubleſome ſpirits of the Ætolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania; after which they had gaped long, and whereof the Roman was as liberal in making promiſe, as if already it had been his own. So a league was made between them; and afterward ſolemnly publiſhed at Olympia, by the Ætolians, and by the Romans in their Capitol. The conditions were, that from Ætolia to Corcyra, in which ſpace Acarnania was contained, all the Country ſhould be ſubdued, and left unto the Ætolians, the pillage only to be given to the Romans. And that if the Ætolians made peace with Philip, it ſhould be with Proviſion, to hold no longer than whilſt he abſtained from doing injury to the Romans, or their Aſſociates. This was indeed the only point whereat Valerius aimed, who promiſed as much on the Romans behalf, That they ſhould not make peace with the Macedonian, unleſs it were with like condition of including the Ætolians. Into this league was place reſerved for the Lacedæmonians and Eleans, as to thoſe that had made or favoured the ſide of Cleomenes againſt the Macedonian, to enter at their pleaſure. The like regard was had of Attalus, Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus: the firſt of which reigned at Pergamus in Aſia the leſs, a Prince hereafter much to be ſpoken of; the other two held ſome part of Illyria, about which the Romans were ſo far from contending with them, that gladly they ſought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of theſe Aſſociates are thruſt into the Treaty rather to give it countenance than for any readineſs which they diſcloſe to enter thereinto. The Ætolians alone, and chiefly Scopas their Prætor, with Dorymachus and others, are yet awhile the only men, of whom the Roman Generals muſt make much; as the late French King, Henry the fourth, when he had only the title of Navarre, was ſaid to court the Majors of Rochel. Philip was not idle, when he heard whereunto the Ætolian tended. He repaired his Army, made a countenance of war upon the Illyrians, and other his borderers, that were wont in times of danger to infeſt the Kingdom of Macedon; waſted the Country about Oricum and Apollonia, and over-running the Pelagonians, Dardanians, and others, whom he held ſuſpected, came down into Theſſaly, whence he made ſhew as if he would invade Ætolia. By the fame of this Expedition, he thought to ſtir up all the Greeks adjoyning, againſt the Ætolians; whom they generally deteſted as a neſt of Robbers, troubleſome to all the Country. To which purpoſe, and to hinder the Ætolians from breaking into Greece he left Perſeus his Son and Heir, with four thouſand men, upon their borders: with the reſt of his Army, before greater buſineſs ſhould overtake and intangle him, he made a long journy into Thrace, againſt a people called the Medes, that were wont to fall upon Macedon, whenſoever the King was abſent. The Ætolians hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could againſt the Acarnaians; in hope to ſubdue thoſe their daily enemies, and win their little Country, ere he ſhould be able to return. Hereto it much availed, that the Romans had already taken Oeniadæ and Naxos, Acarnanian Towns, conveniently ſituated to let in an Army; and conſigned them unto the Ætolians according to the tenour of the contract lately made with them. But the ſtout reſolution of the Acarnanians to dye (as we ſay) every Mothers Son of them, in defence of their Country; together with the great haſte of the Macedonian (who laid aſide all other buſineſs) to ſuccour theſe his friends; cauſed the Ætolians to forſake their enterpriſe. When this Expedition was given over, the Romans and Ætolians fell upon Ancyræ, which they took: the Romans aſſailed by Sea, the Ætolians by Land. The Ætolians had the Town, and the Romans the ſpoil.

For theſe good ſervices M. Valerius was choſen Conſul at Rome; and P. Sulpitius ſent in his ſtead, to keep the war on foot in Greece. But beſides the Roman help, Attalus out of Aſia came over to aſſiſt the Ætolians. He was chiefly moved by his own jealouſie of Philips greatneſs; though ſomewhat alſo tickled with the vanity of being choſen by the Ætolians their principal Magiſtrate; which honour, though no better than titulary, he took in very loving part. 'Againſt the forces which Attalus and the Romans had ſent, being joyned with the main power of Ætolia, Philip tried the fortune of two battels; and was victorious in each of them. Hereupon, theſe his troubleſome neighbours deſired peace of him, and uſed their beſt means to get it. And when the day appointed for the concluſion thereof, was come: their Embaſſadours, inſtead of making ſubmiſſion, propoſed unto him ſuch intolerable conditions, as ill beſeemed vanquiſhed men to offer; and might therefore well teſtifie, that their minds were altered. It was not any love of peace, but fear of being beſieged in their own Towns, that had made them deſirous of compoſition. This fear being taken away, by the incouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as ever; and thruſt a Garriſon of their own, and ſome Roman friends into Elis; which threatned Achaia, wherein Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut over the Streight from Naupactus, waſted the Country in a terrible bravery; wherein Philip requited them, coming upon them in great haſte from the Nemean Games (which he was then celebrating) and ſending them faſter away, but nothing richer than they came.

In

In the heat of this contention, Prusius King of Bithynia, fearing the growth of Attalus, no less than Attalus held suspected the power of Philip, sent a Navy into Greece, to assist the Macedonian party. The like did the Carthaginians; and upon greater reason as being more interessed in the success of his affairs. Philip was too weak by Sea: and though he could man some two hundred ships, yet the vessels were such, as could not hold out against the Romans Quinqueremes. Wherefore it behoved him to use the help of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aid came somewhat too late; which might better at first have kept those Enemies from fastening upon any part of Greece, than afterward it could serve to drive them out, when they had pierced into the bowels of that Countrey. Ere Philip could attempt any thing by Sea, it was needful that he should correct the Eleans, bad neighbours to the Achaians his principal Confederates. But in assailing their Town, he was encountred by the Ætolian and Roman Garrison, which drave him back with some loss. In such cases, especially where God intendeth a great conversion of Empire, Fame is very powerful in working. The King had received no great detriment in his retrait from Elis: rather he had given testimony of his personal valour, in fighting well on foot, when his horse was slain under him. He had also soon after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of four thousand, with some twenty thousand head of Cattel which they had brought together in a place of safety, as they thought, when their Countrey was invaded. But it had happened, that in his pursuit of the Roman forragers about Sicyon, his horse running hastily under a low tree, had torn off one of the horns, which (after the fashion of those times) the King wore in his Crest. This was gathered up by an Ætolian, who carried it home, and shewed it as a token of Philip's death. The horn was well known, and the tale believed. All Macedon therefore was in an uproar; and not only the boderers, ready to fall upon the Countrey, but some Captains of Philip easily corrupted; who thinking to make themselves a fortune in that change of things, ran into such treason, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuse. Hereupon the King returned home, leaving not three thousand men to assist his friends the Achæans. He also took order, to have beacons erected, that might give him notice of the enemies doings, upon whom he meant shortly to return. The affairs of Macedon, his presence quickly established. But in Greece all went ill-favouredly; especially in the Isle of Eubœa, where one Plator betrayed to Attalus and the Romans, the Town of Oreum, ere Philip could arrive to help it: where also the strong City of Chalcis was likely to have been lost, if he had not come the sooner. He made such hasty marches, that he had almost taken Attalus in the City of Opus: this City, lying over against Eubœa, Attalus had won more through the cowardize of the people, than any great force that he had used: now because the Roman Souldiers had defrauded him in the sack of Oreum and taken all to themselves; it was agreed, that Attalus should make his best profit of the Opuntians, without admitting the Romans to be his sharers. But whilst he was busie, in drawing as much money as he could out of the Citizens: the sudden tydings of Philip's arrival, made him leave all behind him, and run away to the Sea-side, where he got aboard his ships, finding the Romans gone before, upon the like fear. Either the indignity of this misadventure, or tydings of Prusias to Bithynian his invasion upon the Kingdom of Pergamus; made Attalus return home, without staying to take leave of his friends. So Philip recovered Opus, won Torone, Tritonos, Drymus and many small Towns in those parts; performing likewise some actions, of more bravery than importance, against the Ætolians. In the mean season, Machanidas, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, had been busie in Peloponnesus; but hearing of Philip's arrival, was returned home.

The Lacedæmonians, hearing certain report of Cleomenes his death in Egypt, went about to chuse two new Kings, and to conform themselves to their old manner of government. But their estate was so far out of tune, that their hope of redressing things within the City, proved no less unfortunate, than had been their attempts of recovering a large dominion abroad. Lycurgus a Tyrant rose up among them: upon whom succeeded this Machanidas, and shortly after came Nabis, that was worse than both of them. They held on the Ætolian and Roman side, for fear of the Achæans, that were the chief Confederates of Philip, and hated extremely the name both of Tyrant and Lacedæmonian. But of these we shall speak more hereafter.

Philip entring into Achaia, and seeing his presence had brought the contentment of assurance to that Countrey; spake brave words to the Assembly of their States, saying, That he had to do with an Enemy that was very nimble, and made War by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Oreum, to Opus, and now into Achaia; but could no where find them, such haste they made, for fear of being overtaken. But flight, he said, was not alwaies prosperous: he should one day light upon them; as ere this he sundry times had done, and still to their loss. The Achaians were glad to hear these words; and much the more glad, in regard of his good deeds accompanying them. For he restored unto their Nation some Towns that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewise to the Megalopolitans their confederates, he rendred Aliphera. The Dymæans, that had been taken by the Romans, and sold for slaves, he sought out, ransomed, and put in quiet possession of their own City. Further, passing over the Corinthian Gulf, he fell upon the Ætolians; whom he drave into the Mountains and woods, or other their strongest holds, and wasted their Country. This done, he took leave of the Achæans, and returned home by Sea, visited the people that were his subjects, or dependants; and animated them so well, that they rested fearless of any threatening danger. Then had he leisure to make war upon the Dardanians, ill neighbours to Macedon: with whom nevertheless he was not so far occupied, but that he could go in hand with preparing a Fleet of an hundred Gallies, whereby to make himself Master of the Sea; the Romans (since the departure of Attalus) having not dared to meet or pursue him, when he lately ran along the coast of Greece, fast by them where they lay.

This good success added much reputation unto the Macedonian, and emboldened him to make strong war upon the Ætolians, at their own doors. As for the Romans, either some displeasure, conceived against againſt their Confederates, or ſome fear of danger at home, when Aſdrubal was ready to fall upon Italy; cauſed them to give over the care of things in Greece, and leave their friends there to their own fortunes. The Ætolians therefore being driven to great extremity, were fain to ſue for peace unto Philip; and accept it, upon what ever conditions it beſt pleaſed him. The agreement was no ſooner made, than P. Sempronius with 10000. foot, 1000. horſe, and 35. Gallies, came over in great haſte (though ſomewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Ætolia, he turned aſide to Dyrrhacchium and Apollonia, making a great noiſe, as if with theſe his own forces he would work wonders. But it was not long ere Philip came to viſit him, and found him tame enough. The K. preſented him battel, but he refuſed it: and ſuffering the Macedonians to waſte the Country round about, before his eyes, kept himſelf cloſe within the walls of Apollonia, making ſome overtures of peace: which cauſed Philip to return home quietly. The Romans had not ſo great cauſe to be diſpleaſed with the Ætolians, as had Philip to take in evil part the demeanor of the Carthaginians. For notwithſtanding the royal offer that he made them, to ſerve their turn in Italy, and aſſiſt them, in getting their hearts deſire, before he would expect any requital: they had not ſent any fleet, as in reaſon they ought, and as (conſidering his want of ſufficient ability by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to ſecure the tranſportation of his Army, or to free his coaſt from the Roman and Ætolian Piracies. Only once they came to his help, which was at his laſt journey into Achaia. But they were gone again before his arrival: having done nothing, and pretending fear of being taken by the Romans, even at ſuch time as Philip with his own Navy, durſt boldly paſs by Sea, and found none that durſt oppoſe him. This wretchleſs dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore ſeem to have been one of Hanno his tricks, whereof Hannibal ſo bitterly complained. For it could not but grieve this malicious man exceedingly to hear that ſo great a K. made offer to ſerve in perſon under Hannibal, and required the aſſiſtance of the ſame Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Monarchs, and alter the affairs of the world at pleaſure. Therefore he had reaſon, ſuch as envy could ſuggeſt, to perſwade the Carthaginians unto a ſafe and thrifty courſe: which was, not to admit into the fellowſhip of their Italian wars ſo mighty a Prince; whom change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire; or his much affection unto Hannibal, more dangerous to their liberty. Rather they ſhould do well to ſave charges, and feed the Macedonian with hopes; by making many promiſes of ſending a fleet and ſome other ſuccours. This would coſt nothing, yet would it ſerve to terrifie the Romans, and compel them to ſend part of their forces from home, that might find this Enemy work abroad. So ſhould the Roman Armies be leſſened in Italy; and Philip, when once he was engaged in the war, be urged unto the proſecution, by his own neceſſity: putting the Carthaginians to little or no charges: yea, ſcarce to the labor of giving him thanks. Now if it might come to paſs, as Hannibal every day did promiſe, that Rome, and all Italy ſhould within a while be at the devotion of Carthage: better it were, that the City ſhould be free, ſo as the troubleſome Greeks might addreſs their complaints unto the Carthaginians, as competent Judges between them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal, with the power of Africk, ſhould wait upon Philip, as his Executioner, to fulfill his will and pleaſure, in doing ſuch injuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hateful in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no leſs impudent, in fulfilling all requeſts of Hannibal. Whether the counſel of Hanno and his fellows were ſuch as this, or whether the Carthaginians, of their own diſpoſition, without his advice, were too ſparing, and careleſs, the matter (as far as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they did him no manner of good, but rather dodged with him, even in their little courteſie which they moſt pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reaſon, why he began the building 100. Gallies, as if he would let them and others know, whereto his proper ſtrength would have reached, had he not vainly given credit to faithleſs promiſes. When therefore the Ætolians had ſubmitted themſelves already: and when the Romans deſired his friendſhip, as might be thought, for very fear of him, with reputation enough, and not as a forſaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to have ſuccoured them in their neceſſity, he might give over the war, and, without reprehenſion, leave them to themſelves. For he had wilfully entred into trouble for their ſakes; but they deſpiſed him, as if the quarrel were meerly his own, and he unable to manage it.

The vanity of which their conceits would appear unto them, when they ſhould ſee, that with his proper ſtrength he had finiſhed the War, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the year following it was agreed, by the mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans ſhould retain three or four Towns of Illyria, which they had recovered by this War, being part of their old Illyrian Conqueſt: Places no way belonging to the Macedonian; and therefore perhaps inſerted into the Covenants, that ſomewhat might ſeem to have been gotten. On the other ſide, the Atintanes were appointed to return under the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Ortelius probably conjectures) the people of the Country about Apollonia, then did the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appears, that they did not give peace, as they would ſeem to have done, but accepted it, upon conditions ſomewhat to their loſs.

The Confederates and Dependants of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Pruſias K. of Bithynia, the Achæans, Bœotians, Theſſalians, Acarnanians and Epirots. On the Roman ſide were named, firſt, the people of Ilium, as an honourable remembrance of the Romans deſcent from Troy; then, Attalus K. of Pergamus; Plueratus an Illyrian Prince; and Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon; together with the Eleans, Meſſenians and Athenians. The Ætolians were omitted, belike, as having agreed for themſelves before. But the Eleans and Meſſenians, followers of the Ætolians, (and by them, as is moſt likely, compriſed in their league with Philip) were alſo inſerted by the Romans; that were never ſlow in offering their friendſhip to ſmall and feeble Nations. As for the Athenians; they ſtood much upon their old honour; and loved to bear a part, though they did nothing, in all great actions. Yet the ſetting down of their names in this Treaty, ſerved the Romans to good purpoſe: foraſmuch as they were a buſie people, and miniſtred occaſion to renew the War, when means did better ſerve to follow it.

SECT. XIII.

How the Romans began to recover their ſtrength by degrees. The noble affection of the Romans, in relieving the publick Neceſſities of their Common-weal.

IT was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing ſo many enterpriſes at once, they followed all by the halves; and wasted more men and money to no purpose, than would have served (if good order had been taken) to finish the whole War, in far shorter space; and make themselves Lords of all that the Romans held. This errour had become the less harmful, if their care of Italy had been sought as it ought. But they suffered Hannibal to weary himself with expectation of their promised supplies; which being still deferred from year to year, caused as great opportunities to be lost, as a Conquerour could have desired. The death of Posthumius, and destruction of this whole Army in Gaul; the begun rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of Hiero their friend in Syracuse; with great alterations much to their prejudice, in the whole Isle of Sicily; as also that War, of which we last spake threatned from Macedon, happening all at one time; and that so nearly after their terrible overthrow at Cannæ, among so many revolts of their Italian Confederates; would utterly have sunk the Roman State; had the Carthaginians, if not the first year, yet at least the second, sent over to Hannibal the forces that was decreed. It is not to be doubted, that even this diversity of great hopes, appearing from all parts, administred matter unto Hanno, or such as Hanno was, whereupon to work. For though it were in the power of Carthage, to perform all that was decreed for Italy; yet could not that prohibition hold, when so many new occurrences brought each along with them their new care; and required their several Armies. This had not been a very bad excuse, if any one of the many occasions offered had been throughly prosecuted: though it stood with best reason, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the prosperity of Hannibal in his Italian war, should have been strengthened; whatsoever had become of the rest. But the slender Troops, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the War in Spain; the lingring aid which they sent to uphold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was already well-near beaten down; their trifling with Philip; and (amongst all these their attempts) their hasty catching at Sicily: little deserved to be thought good reasons of neglecting the main point, whereto all the rest had reference. Rather every one of these Actions, considered a-part by it self, was no otherwise to be allowed, as discreetly undertaken, or substantially followed; than by making supposition, That the care of Italy made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things else. Yet if these allegations would not serve to content Hannibal, then must he patiently endure to know, that his own Citizens were jealous of his Greatness, and durst not trust him with so much power, as should enable him to wrong the state at home.

Whatsoever he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himself to necessity; to feed his Italian friends with hopes; and to trifle away the time about Nola, Naples, Cumæ, and other places: being loth to spend his Army in an hard siege, that was to be reserved for a work of more importance. Many offers he made upon Nola, but alwaies with bad success. Once Marcellus fought a battel with him there, yet under the very walls of the Town; having the assistance of the Citizens, that were grown better affected to the Roman side, since the Heads that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off. About a thousand men Hannibal in that fight lost: which was no great marvel; his forces being then divided, and imployed in sundry parts of Italy at once. Naples was even in those daies, a strong City: and required a years work to have taken it by force. Wherefore the earnest desire of Hannibal to get it, was alwaies frustrate. Upon the Town of Cumæ they of Capua had their plot, and were in hope to take it by cunning. They sent to the chief Magistrates of the Cumans, desiring them (as being also Campans) to be present at a solemn sacrifice of the Nation, where they would consult about their general good: promising to bring thither a sufficient guard, to assure the whole Assembly from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumans made shew to entertain; but privily sent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracchus, the Roman Consul.

Gracchus was a very good man of War, and happily chosen Consul in so dangerous a time. His Colleague should have been Posthumius Albinus, that was lately slain by the Gauls: after whose death Marcellus was chosen, as being judged the fittest man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found some religious impediment that nullified the election of Marcellus; or at least they feigned so to have done, because this was the first time, that ever two Plebeian Consuls were chosen together. Marcellus therefore gave over the place; and Q. Fabius Maximus, the late famous Dictator, was substituted in his room. But Fabius was detained in the City, about matters of Religion or Superstition: wherewith Rome was commonly, especially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracchus alone, with a Consular Army, waited upon Hannibal among the Campans: not able to meet the enemy in the field; yet intentive to all occasions, that should be presented. The Volones, or Slaves, that lately had been armed, were no small part of his followers. These, and the rest of his men, he continually trained; and had not a greater care to make his Army skilful in the exercises of war, than to keep it from quarrels, that might arise by upbraiding one another with their base conditions.

Whilst the Consul was thus busied at Linternum, the Senators of Cumæ sent him word of all that had passed between them and the Capuans. It was a good occasion to flesh his men, and make them confident against the Enemy; of whom hitherto they had bad experience. Gracchus therefore put himself into Cumæ: whence he issued at such time, as the Magistrates of that City were expected by the Campans. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hamæ, three miles from Cumæ. There lay Marius Alfius the chief Magistrate of Capua, with fourteen thousand men; not wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any danger that might interrupt it; but rather devising how to surprize others, than fearing himself to be assailed. The Consul therefore, suffering none to go forth of Cumæ, that might bear word of him to the enemies, issued out of the Town when it grew dark: his men being well refreshed with meat and sleep, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights service. So he came upon the Capuans unawares, and slew more than two thousand of them, together with their Commander, losing not above a hundred of his own men. Their Camp he took; but tarried not long to rifle it, for fear of Hannibal, who lay not far off. By this his providence, he escaped a greater loss, than he had brought upon the Enemies. For when Hannibal was informed how things went at Hamæ, forthwith he marched thither, hoping to find those young Souldiers, and Slaves, busied in making spoil, and loading themselves with the booty. But they were all gotten safe within Cumæ; which partly for anger, partly for desire of gaining it, and partly at the urgent entreaty of the Capuans, Hannibal assailed the next day. Much labour, and with ill success, the Carthaginians and their fellows spent about this Town. They raised a wooden Tower against it; which they brought close unto the Walls, thinking thereby to force an Entry. But the Defendants, on the inside of the Wall, raised against this an high Tower; whence they made resistance, and found means at length to consume with fire the work of their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were busie in quenching the fire, the Romans, sallying out of the Town at two Gates, charged them valiantly, and drave them to their Trenches, with the slaughter of about fourteen hundred. The Consul wisely sounded the Retreat, ere his men were too far engaged, and Hannibal in a readiness to requite their service. Neither would he in the pride of his good success, adventure forth against the Enemy; who presented him battel the day following, near unto the Walls. Hannibal therefore seeing no likelihood to prevail in that which he had taken in hand, brake up the siege, and returned to his old Camp at Tifata. About these times, and shortly after, when Fabius the other Consul had taken the field; some small Towns were recovered by the Romans, and the people severely punished for their revolt.

The

The Carthaginian Army was too ſmall, to fill with garriſons all places that had yielded; and withal to abide (as it muſt do) ſtrong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the ſupply from home, that ſhould enable him to ſtrike at Rome it ſelf, was driven in the mean time to alter his courſe of war: and inſtead of making (as formerly he had done) a general invaſion upon the whole Country, to paſs from place to place; and wait upon occaſions, that grew daily more commodious to the enemy, than to him. The Country of the Hirpines and Samnites was grievouſly waſted by Marcellus, in the abſence of Hannibal; as alſo was Campania, by Fabius the Conſul; when Hannibal having followed Marcellus to Nola, and received there the loſs before mentioned, was gone to winter in Apulia. Theſe people ſhewed not the like ſpirit in defending their Lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done, when they contended with the Romans, in their own behalf, to get the Soveraignty. They held it reaſon, that they ſhould be protected by ſuch as thought to have dominion over them: whereby at once they overburdened their new Lords; & gave unto their old, the more eaſie means to take revenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very intentive as neceſſity conſtrained them, to the work that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Conſulſhip: and joyned with him Marcus Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appointed unto that honour the year before. Of theſe two, Fabius was called the Shield: and Marcellus, the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and upon juſt reaſon, commended, That being himſelf Conſul, and holding the Election, he did not ſtand upon nice points of formality, or regard what men might think of his ambition, but cauſed himſelf to be choſen with Marcellus; knowing in what need the City ſtood of able Commanders. The great name of theſe Conſuls, and the great preparations which the Romans made, ſerved to put the Campans in fear, that Capua it ſelf ſhould be beſieged. To prevent this, Hannibal, at their earneſt entreaty, came from Arpi (where he lay, hearkening after news from Tarentum) and having with his preſence comforted theſe his friends, fell on the ſudden upon Puteoli, a Sea-town of Campania; about which he ſpent three daies in vain, hoping to have won it. The Garriſon in Puteoli was 6000. ſtrong: and did their duty ſo well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good ſucceſs, could only ſhew his anger upon the fields there, and about Naples; which having done, and once more (with as ill ſucceſs as before) aſſailed Nola, he bent his courſe to Tarentum: wherein he had very great intelligence. Whilſt he was in his progreſs thither; Hanno made a journey againſt Beneventum: and T. Gracchus, the laſt years Conſul, haſting from Nuceria, met him there and fought with him. Hanno had with him about 17000. foot, Brutians and Lucans for the moſt part: beſides 1200. horſe; very few of which were Italians, all the reſt Numidians and Moors. He held the Romans work four hours, ere it could be perceived to which ſide the victory would incline. But Gracchus his ſouldiers, which were all (in a manner) the late-armed ſlaves, had received from their General a peremptory denunciation, That this day or never they muſt purchaſe their liberty, bringing every man for price thereof, an enemies head. The ſweet reward of liberty was ſo greatly deſired, that none of them feared any danger in earning it: howbeit that vain labour impoſed by their General, of cutting off the ſlain enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly; and hindred the ſervice by imployment of ſo many hands in a work ſo little concerning the victory. Gracchus therefore finding his own errour, wiſely corrected it: proclaiming aloud, That they ſhould caſt away the heads, and ſpare the trouble of cutting off any more; for that all ſhould have liberty immediately after the battel, if they won the day. This encouragement made them run head-long upon the Enemy; whom their deſperate fury had ſoon overthrown, if the Roman horſe could have made their part good againſt the Numidian. But though Hanno did what he could, and preſſed ſo hard upon the Romans battel, that four thouſand of the ſlaves, (for fear either of them, or of the puniſhment which Gracchus had threatned before the battel unto thoſe that ſhould not valiantly behave themſelves) retired unto a ground of ſtrength; yet was he glad at length to ſave himſelf by flight, when the Groſs of his Army was broken; being unable to remedy the loſs. Leaving the field, he was accompanied by no more than two thouſand, moſt of which were horſe; all the reſt were either ſlain or taken. The Roman General gave unto all his Souldiers that reward of liberty which he had promiſed: but unto thoſe four thouſand, which had recoyled unto the Hill, he added this light puniſhment; That as long as they ſerved in the wars, they ſhould neither eat nor drink otherwiſe than ſtanding, unleſs ſickneſs forced them to break his order. So the victorious Army returned to Beneventum: where the newly enfranchiſed Souldiers were feaſted in publick by the Townſmen; ſome ſitting, ſome ſtanding, and all of them having their heads covered (as was the cuſtom of ſlaves manumiſed) with caps of white wool. The picture of this Feaſt (as a thing worthy of remembrance) was afterwards hung up in a Table by Gracchus, in the Temple of Liberty; which his Father had built and dedicated. This was indeed the firſt battel, worthy of great note, which the Carthaginians had loſt ſince the coming of Hannibal into Italy: the victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracchus before at Hama, being things of ſmall importance.

Thus the Romans, through induſtry, by little and little, repaired the great Breach in their Eſtate, which Hannibal had made at Canna. But all this while, and long after this, their Treaſury was ſo poor, that no induſtry nor art could ſerve to help it. The fruits of their grounds did only (and perhaps hardly) ſerve to feed their Towns and Armies, without any ſurpluſage, that might be exchanged for other needful commodities. Few they were in Italy that continued to pay them tribute; which alſo they could worſe do than before; as living upon the ſame trade, and ſubject to the ſame inconveniencies, which enfeeble Rome it ſelf. Sicily and Sardinia, that were wont to yield great profit, hardly now maintaining the Roman Armies, that lay in thoſe Provinces, to hold them ſafe, and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, every one of them ſuffered his part of the detriment, which the Common-wealth ſuſtained, and could now do leaſt for his Country, when moſt need was: as alſo the number of them was much decreaſed; ſo as if money ſhould be raiſed upon them by the Poll, yet muſt it be far leſs than in former times. The Senate therefore diligently conſidering the greatneſs of the war within the bowels of Italy, that could not be thence expelled, without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the peril, wherein Sicily and Sardinia ſtood, both of the Carthaginians, and of many among the Naturals, declining from the friendſhip or ſubjection of Rome; the threats of the Macedonian, ready to land in the Eaſtern parts of Italy, if they were not at the coſt to find him work at home; the greater threats of Aſdrubal, to follow his Brother over the Alps, as ſoon as he could rid himſelf of the Scipio's in Spain; and the poverty of the Common-wealth, which had not money for any one of theſe mortal dangers; were driven almoſt even to extreme want of counſel. But being urged by the violence of ſwift neceſſity, ſignified in the letters of the 2 Scipio's from Spain; they reſolved upon the only courſe, without w^ch the City could not have ſubſiſted.

They called the people to aſſembly; Wherein Quintus Fulvius the Prætor laid open the publick wants; and plainly ſaid, That in this exigent, there muſt be no taking of money for victuals, weapons, apparel, or the like things needful to the Souldiers; but that ſuch as had ſtuff, or were Artificers; muſt truſt the Common-weale with the Loan of their commodities and labors, until the war were ended. Hereunto he ſo effectually exhorted all men, eſpecially the Publicans or Cuſtomers, and thoſe which in former times had lived upon their dealing in the common Revenues, that the charge was undertaken by private men; and the Army in Spain, as well ſupplied, as if the Treaſury had been full. Shortly after this, Marcus Attilius Regulus, and Publius Furius Philus, the Roman Cenſors; taking in hand the redreſs of diſorders within the City, were chiefly intentive to the correction of thoſe, that had miſ-behaved themſelves in this preſent war. They began with L. Cecilius Metellus; who after the battel at Cannæ, had held diſcourſe with ſome of his Companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italy, had been no better than loſt. After him they took in hand thoſe, that having brought to Rome the meſſage of their fellows made priſoners at Cannæ, returned not back to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath; but thought themſelves thereof ſufficiently diſcharged, in that they had ſtepped once back into his Camp, with pretence of taking better notice of the Captives names. All theſe were now pronounced infamous by the Cenſors: as alſo were a great many more; even whoſoever had not ſerved in the wars, after the term which the Laws appointed: Neither was the note of the Cenſors at this time (as otherwiſe it had uſed to be) hurtful only in reputation: but greater weight was added thereunto, by this Decree of the Senate, following; That all ſuch as were noted with infamy by theſe Cenſors, ſhould be tranſported into Sicily, there to ſerve until the end of the War, under the ſame hard conditions, that were impoſed upon the Remainder of the Army beaten at Cannæ. The office of the Cenſors was, to take the Liſt and account of the Citizens; to chuſe or diſplace the Senators; and to ſet notes of diſgrace (without further puniſhment) upon thoſe whoſe unhoneſt or unſeemly behaviour fell not within the compaſs of the Law. They took alſo an account of the Roman Gentlemen: amongſt whom they diſtributed the publick Horſes of ſervice, unto ſuch as they thought meet; or took them away for their miſ-behaviour. Generally, they had the overſight of mens lives and manners: and their cenſure was much reverenced and feared; though it extended no further, than to putting men out of rank; or making them change their Tribe; or (which was the moſt that they could do) cauſing them to pay ſome Duties to the Treaſury, from which others were exempted. But, beſides the care of this general Tax, and matters of Morality, they had the charge of all publick Works; as mending of High-waies, Bridges, and Water-courſes; the reparations of Temples, Porches, and ſuch other buildings. If any man incroached upon the Streets, High-waies, or other places that ought to be common; the Cenſors compelled him to make amends. They had alſo the letting out of Lands, Cuſtoms, and other publick Revenues to farm: ſo that moſt of the Citizens of Rome were beholding to this office; as maintaining themſelves by ſome of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no ſmall help to conſerve the dignity of the Senate: the commonalty being obnoxious unto the Cenſors; which were alwaies of that Order, and careful to uphold the reputation thereof. But the Common-weal being now impoveriſhed by war, and having ſmall ſtore of Lands to lett, or of Cuſtoms that were worth the farming; Regulus and Philus troubled not themſelves much with peruſing the Temples, or other decayed places, that needed reparations: or, if they took a view of what was requiſite to be done in this kind; yet forbore they to ſet any thing in hand, becauſe they had not wherewith to pay. Herein again appeared a notable generoſity of the Romans. They that had been accuſtomed in more happy times, to undertake ſuch pieces of work, offered now themſelves as willingly as the Cenſors, as if there had been no ſuch want: promiſing liberally their coſt and travel; without expectation of any payment, before the end of the war. In like ſort, the Maſters of thoſe ſlaves, that lately had been infranchiſed by Gracchus, were very well contented to forbear the price of them, untill the City were in better caſe to pay. In this general inclination of the Multitude, to relieve, as far forth as every one was able, the common neceſſity; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widows living under Patronate, were brought into the Treaſury; and there the Queſtor kept a book of all that was laid out for the ſuſtenance of theſe Widows and Orphans: whilſt the whole ſtock was uſed by the City. This good example of thoſe which remained in the Town, prevailed with the Souldiers abroad: ſo that (the poorer ſort excepted) they refuſed to take pay; and called thoſe Mercenaries, that did accept it, when their Country was in ſo great want.

The 1200. Talents wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any injuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride, yielded half ſo much commodity, as might be laid in ballance againſt theſe miſeries, whereinto their Eſtate was now reduced. Nevertheleſs if we conſider things aright, the calamities of this War did rather enable Rome to deal with thoſe Enemies, whom ſhe forthwith undertook, than abate or ſlacked the growth of that large Dominion, whereto ſhe attained, ere the youngeſt of thoſe men was dead, whoſe names we have already mentioned. For by this hammering, the Roman metal grew more hard and ſolid: and by paring the branches of private fortunes, the Root and Heart of the Common-wealth was corroborated. So grew the City of Athens, when Xerxes had burnt the Town to aſhes, and taken from every particular Citizen, all hope of other felicity, than that which reſted in the common happineſs of the univerſality. Certain it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath judiciouſly obſerved) That a State, whoſe dimenſion or ſtem is ſmall, may aptly ſerve to be foundation of a great Monarchy, which chiefly comes to paſs, where all regard of domeſtical proſperity is laid aſide; and every mans care addreſſed to the benefit of his Country. Hereof I might ſay that our Age hath been a great example, in the united Provinces in the Netherlands; whoſe preſent riches and ſtrength grew chiefly from that ill aſſurance, which each of their Towns, or almoſt of their Families, perceived it ſelf to hold, whilſt the generality was oppreſſed

by

by the Duke of Alva; were it ſo, that the people had thereby grown as warlike, as, by extreme induſtry, and ſtraining themſelves to fill their publick Treaſury, they are all grown wealthy, ſtrong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their ſervices by Land. Wherefore if we value at ſuch a rate as we ought. the patient reſolution, conformity to good Order, obedience to Magiſtrates, with many other Vertues, and above all other, the great love of the Commonweal, which was found in Rome in theſe dangerous times: we may truly ſay, That the City was never in greater likelihood to proſper. Neither can it be deemed otherwiſe, than that if the ſame affections of the people had laſted, when their Empire, being grown more large and beautiful, ſhould in all reaſon have been more dear unto them; if the riches and delicacies of Aſia had not infected them with ſenſuality, and carryed their appetites mainly to thoſe pleaſures, wherein they thought their well-being to conſiſt; if all the Citizens and ſubjects of Rome could have believed their own intereſt to be as great, in thoſe wars which theſe latter Emperours made for their defence, as in theſe which were managed by the Conſuls: the Empire, founded upon ſo great vertue, could not have been thrown down by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they never ſo many. But unto all Dominions God hath ſet their periods: Who, though he hath given unto Man the knowledge of thoſe ways, by which Kingdoms riſe and fall; yet hath left him ſubject unto the affections, which draw on theſe fatal changes, in their times appointed.

SECT. XIV.

The Romans win ſome Towns back from Hannibal. Hannibal wins Tarentum. The ſiege of Capua. Two Victories of Hannibal. The Journey of Hannibal to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

AS the people of Rome ſtrained themſelves to the utmoſt, for maintaining the War: ſo their Generals abroad omitted no part of induſtry, in ſeeking to recover what had been loſt. The Town of Caſiline, Fabius beſieged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian Garriſon; and likely to have been relieved by thoſe of Capua, if Marcellus from Nola, had not come to the aſſiſtance of his Colleague. Nevertheleſs, the place held out ſo obſtinately, that Fabius was purpoſed to give it over: ſaying, that the enterpriſe was not great; yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrary opinion. He ſaid, that many ſuch things, as were not at firſt to have been undertaken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to be proſecuted unto the beſt effect. So the ſiege held on: and the Town was preſſed ſo hard, that the Campans dwelling therein, grew fearful, and craved parley; offering to give it up, ſo as all might have leave to depart in ſafety, whither they pleaſed. Whil'ſt they were thus treating of conditions: or whil'ſt they were iſſuing forth, according to the compoſition already made; (for it is diverſly reported) Marcellus ſeizing upon a Gate, entred with his Army, and put all to ſword that came in their way. Fifty of thoſe that were firſt gotten out, ran to Fabius the Conſul, who ſaved them, and ſent them to Capua in ſafety; all the reſt were either ſlain, or made priſoners. If Fabius deſerved Commendations, by holding his word good unto theſe fifty; I know not how the ſlaughter of the reſt, or impriſonment afterward of ſuch as eſcaped the heat of execution, could be excuſed by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himſelf after the Roman faſhion, with ſome equivocation, but he ſhall pay for it hereafter. In like ſort was Mount Marſam in Gaſcoin taken by the Marſhal Monluc, when I was a young man in France. For whil'ſt he entertained parley about compoſition: the beſieged ran all from their ſeveral guards, upon haſty deſire of being acquainted with the conditions propoſed. The Marſhal therefore diſcovering a part of the Walls unguarded, entred by Scalado, and put all ſave the Governour unto the ſword. Herein the Governour of Mount Marſam committed two groſs errours; the one, in that he gave no order for the Captains and Companies, to hold themſelves in their places; the other, in that he was content to parlee without Pledges for aſſurance given and received. Some ſuch overſight the Governour of Caſiline ſeemeth to have committed; yet neither the advantage taken by Marcellus, or by Monluc, was very honourable. When this Work was ended, many ſmall Towns of the Samnites, and ſome of the Lucans and Apulians, were recovered: wherein were taken or ſlain, about 25000 of the Enemies; and the Country grievouſly waſted by Fabius, Marcellus lying ſick at Nola.

Hannibal in the mean while was about Tarentum, waiting to hear from thoſe, that had promiſed to give up the Town. But M. Valerius the Roman Prætor had thruſt ſo many men into it, that the Traitors durſt not ſtir. Wherefore the Carthaginian was fain to depart, having wearied himſelf in vain with expectation. Yet he waſted not the Country, but contented himſelf with hope, that they would pleaſe him better in time following. So he departed thence towards Salapia, which he choſe for his wintring-place; and began to victual it when Summer was but half paſt. It is ſaid, that he was in love with a young Wench in that Town, in which regard if he began his Winter more timely than otherwiſe he required, he did not like the Romans; whom neceſſity inforced, to make their Summer laſt as long as they were able to travel up and down the Country.

About this time began great troubles in Sicily, whither Marcellus the Conſul was ſent, to take ſuch order for the Province, as need ſhould require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than the Conſulſhip, we will ſpeak hereafter.

The new Conſuls choſen at Rome, were Q. Fabius the Son of the preſent Conſul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the ſecond time. The Romans found it needful for the publick ſervice, to imploy oftentimes their beſt able men: and therefore made it lawful, during the war, to recontinue their Officers, and chuſe ſuch as had lately held their places before; without regarding any diſtance of time, which was otherwiſe required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant unto his Son: which was perhaps the reſpect, that moſt commended his Son unto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the Camp, and his Son rode forth to meet him: eleven of the twelve Lictors, which carried an Axe with a bundle of Rods before the Conſul, ſuffered him, in regard of due reverence, to paſs by them on horſe-back, which was againſt the cuſtom. But the Son perceiving this, commanded the laſt of his Lictors to note it: who thereupon bade the old Fabius alight, and come to the Conſul on his feet. The Father cheerfully did ſo; ſaying, It was my mind, Son, to make tryal, whether thou didſt underſtand thy ſelf to be Conſul. Caſſius Altinius a wealthy Citizen of Arpi, who after the battel at Canne, had holpen the Carthagini- an into that Town, ſeeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend, came privily to this Conſul Fabius, and offered to render it back unto him, if he might be therefore well rewarded. The Conſul purpoſed to follow old examples; and to make this Altinius a pattern to all Traitors; uſing him as Camillus and Fabricius had done thoſe that offered their faithful ſervice againſt the Faliſci, and King Pyrrhus. But Q. Fabius the Father, was of another opinion: and ſaid, it was a matter of dangerous conſequence, That it ſhould be thought more ſafe to revolt from the Romans, than to turn unto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that he ſhould be ſent to the Town of Cales, and there kept as priſoner; until they could better reſolve, what to do with him, or what uſe to make of him. Hannibal underſtanding that Altinius was gone, and among the Romans, took it not ſorrowfully; but thought this a good occaſion to ſeize upon all the mans riches, which were great. Yet that he might ſeem rather ſevere, than covetous, he ſent for the wife and children of Altinius into his Camp: where having examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitive, partly, and more ſtrictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, he condemned them as partakers of the treaſon, to be burnt alive; and took all their goods unto himſelf. Fabius the Conſul ſhortly after came to Arpi: which he won by Scalado, in a ſtormy and rainy night. 5000 of Hannibals Souldiers lay in the Town; and of the Arpines themſelves, there were about 3000. Theſe were thruſt foremoſt by the Carthaginian Garriſon; when it was underſtood, that the Romans had gotten over the Wall, and broken open a Gate. For the Souldiers held the Townſmen ſuſpected; and therefore thought it no wiſdom to truſt them at their backs. But after ſome little reſiſtance, the Arpines gave over fight, and entertained parley with the Romans: proteſting, they had been betrayed by their Princes; and were become ſubject to the Carthaginians, againſt their wills. In proceſs of this diſcourſe, the Arpine Prætor went unto the Roman Conſul: and receiving his faith for ſecurity of the Town, preſently made head againſt the Garriſon. This notwithſtanding, like it is that Hannibals men continued to make good reſiſtance. For when almoſt 1000 of them that were Spaniards, offered to leave their companions, and ſerve on the Romans ſide, it was yet covenanted, that the Carthaginians ſhould be ſuffered to paſs forth quietly, and return to Hannibal. This was performed: and ſo Arpi became Roman again, with little other loſs, than of him that had betrayed it. About the ſame time Cliternum was taken by Sempronius Tuditanus one of the Prætors: and unto Cneus Fulvius, another of the Prætors, 112 Gentlemen of Capua offered their ſervice; upon no other condition, than to have their goods reſtored unto them, when their City ſhould be recovered by the Romans. This was a thing of ſmall importance: but conſidering the general hatred of the Campans towards Rome, it ſerved to diſcover the inclination of the Italians in thoſe times; and how their affections recoyled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of thoſe mighty ſuccours, that had been promiſed from Carthage. The Conſentines alſo, and the Thurines, people of the Brutians, which had yielded themſelves to Hannibal, returned again to their old allegiance. Others would have followed their example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican had made himſelf a Captain, and gotten reputation by ſome petty exploits in forraging the Country, was ſlain by Hanno; with a great multitude of thoſe that followed him. Hannibal in the mean while had all his care bent upon Tarentum; which if he could take, it ſeemed that it would ſtand him in good ſtead, for drawing over that help out of Macedon, which his Carthaginians failed to ſend. Long he waited ere he could bring his deſire to paſs: and being loth to hazard his forces, where he hoped to prevail by intelligence; he contented himſelf with taking in ſome poor Towns of the Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum, found means to accompliſh their purpoſe, and his wiſh. One Phileas, that was of their conſpiracy, who lay at Rome as Embaſſadour, practiſing with the Hoſtages of the Tarentines, and ſuch as had the keeping of them, conveyed them by night out of the City. But he and his company the next day were ſo cloſely purſued, that all of them were taken, and brought back to Rome: where they ſuffered death as Traytors. By reaſon of this cruelty, or ſeverity, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans more generally and earneſtly than before. As for the Conſpirators, they followed their buſineſs the more diligently, as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention ſhould happen to be diſcovered. Wherefore they ſent again to Hannibal; and acquainting him with the manner of their plot, made the ſame compoſition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nico, and Philomenes, two of the chief among them, uſed much to go forth of the Town on hunting by night; as if they durſt not take their pleaſure by day, for fear of the Carthaginians. Seldom or never they miſſed of their game: for the Carthaginians prepared it ready for their hands, that they might not ſeem to have been abroad upon other occaſion: From the Camp of Hannibal it was about three dayes journey to Tarentum, if he ſhould have marched thither with his whole Army. This cauſed his long abode in one place the leſs to be ſuſpected: as alſo, to make his enemies the more ſecure, he cauſed it to be given out, that he was ſick. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were grown careleſs of ſuch his neighbourhood, and the Conſpirators had ſet their buſineſs in order; he took with him 10000 the moſt expedite of his horſe and foot; and long before break of day, made all ſpeed thitherward. 80 light horſe of the Numidians ran a great way before him, beating all the wayes, and killing any that they met, for fear leſt he, and his troop following him, ſhould be diſcovered. It had been often the manner of ſome few Numidian horſe, to do the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Governour, when he heard tell in the evening, that ſome Numidians were abroad in the fields, took it for a ſign, that Hannibal was not as yet diſlodged; and gave order, that ſome companies ſhould be ſent out the next morning, to ſtrip them of their booty, and ſend them gone. But when it grew dark night; Hannibal, guided by Philomenes, came cloſe to the Town: where, according to the tokens agreed upon, making a light to ſhew his arrival; Nico, that was within the Town, anſwered him with another light, in ſign that he was ready. Preſently Nico began to ſet upon one of the Gates, and to kill the watchmen. Philomenes went toward another gate: and whiſtling (as was his manner) called up the Porter; bidding him make haſte, for that he had killed a great Bore, ſo heavy, that ſcarce two men could ſtand under it. So the Porter opened the wicket: and forthwith entred two young men, loaden with the Bore; which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to be worthy the looking on. While the Porter ſtood wondring at the largeneſs of the beaſt, Philomenes ran him through with his Bore-ſpear: and letting in ſome 30 armed men, fell upon all the watch; whom when he had ſlain, he entred the great gate. So the Army of Hannibal entring Tarentum at two Gates, went directly towards the Market place, where both parts met. Thence they were diſtributed by their General, and ſent into all quarters of the City, with Tarentines to be their guides. They were commanded to kill all the Romans, and not to hurt the Citizens. For better performance hereof, Hannibal willed the Conſpirators, that when any of their friends appeared in ſight, they ſhould bid him be quiet, and of good cheer. All the Town was in an uproar: but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman trumpet was unskilfully ſounded by a Greek in the Theatre: which helped the ſuſpicion, both of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to ſpoil the Town; and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Governour fled into the Port: and taking boat, got into the Citadel, that ſtood in the mouth of the Haven; whence he might eaſily perceive the next morning, how all had paſſed. Hannibal aſſembling the Tarentines, gave them to underſtand, what good affection he bore them; inveighing bitterly againſt the Romans, as tyrannous oppreſſours; and ſpake what elſe he thought fit for the preſent. This done, and having gotten ſuch ſpoil as was to be had of the Souldiers goods in the Town, he addreſſed himſelf againſt the Citadel; hoping that if the Garriſon would ſally out, he might give them ſuch a blow, as ſhould make them unable to defend the Piece. According to his expectation it partly fell out. For when he began to make his approaches, the Romans in a bravery ſallying forth, gave charge upon his men: who fell back of purpoſe according to direction, till they had drawn on as many as they could, and ſo far from their ſtrength, as they durſt adventure. Then gave Hannibal a ſign to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared ready for the purpoſe: and fiercely ſetting upon the Enemy, drave him back with great ſlaughter, as faſt as he could run; ſo that afterwards he durſt not iſſue forth. The Citadel ſtood upon a Demi-Iſland, that was plain ground; and fortified only with a Ditch and Wall againſt the Town, whereunto it was joyned by a cawſey. This cawſey Hannibal intended to fortifie in like ſort againſt the Citadel; to the end that the Tarentines might be able, without his help, to keep themſelves from all danger thence. His work in few dayes went ſo well forward, without impediment from the beſieged, that he conceived hope of winning the piece it ſelf, by taking a little more pains. Wherefore he made ready all ſorts of engines, to force the place. But whil'ſt he was buſied in his works, there came by Sea a ſtrong ſupply from Metapontum: which took away all hope of prevailing; and made him return to his former counſel. Now foraſmuch as the Tarentine fleet lay within the haven, and could not paſs forth, whil'ſt the Romans held the Citadel: it ſeemed likely that the Town would ſuffer want, being debar'd of accuſtom'd trade and proviſions by Sea: whil'ſt the Roman garriſon by help of their ſhipping, might eaſily be relieved, and enabled to hold out. Againſt this inconvenience, it was rather wiſhed by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the haven; to guard the mouth of it, and cut off all ſupply from the Enemy. Hannibal told them, that this might well be done: for that their Town ſtanding in plain ground, and their ſtreets being fair and broad, it would be no hard matter to draw the Gallies over land, and lanch them into the Sea without. This he undertook, and effected: whereby the Roman garriſon was reduced into great neceſſity; though with much patience it held out, and found Hannibal oftentimes otherwiſe buſied, than his affairs required.

Thus with mutual loſs on both ſides, the time paſſed: and the Roman forces, growing daily ſtronger, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, with Appius Claudius, lately choſen Conſuls, prepared to beſiege the great City of Capua. 23 Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and haſty growth from that want of men, and of all neceſſaries, whereinto the loſs at Cannæ had reduced them. But to fill up theſe Legions, they were fain to take up young Boyes that were under ſeventeen years of age: and to ſend Commiſſioners above fifty mile round, for the ſeeking out of ſuch Lads as might appear ſerviceable, and preſſing them to the Wars; making yet a Law, that their years of ſervice, whereinto they were bound by order of the City, ſhould be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning ſo young, as if they had been of lawful age. Before the Roman Army drew near, the Campans felt great want of victual, as if they had already been beſieged. This happened partly by ſloth of the Nation, partly by the great waſte and ſpoil, which the Romans had in foregoing years made upon their grounds. They ſent therefore Embaſſadors to Hannibal; deſiring him to ſuccour them ere they were cloſed up, as they feared to be ſhortly. He gave them comfortable words, and ſent Hanno with an Army to ſupply their wants. Hanno appointed them a day; againſt which they ſhould be ready with all manner of carriages, to ſtore themſelves with victuals, that he would provide. Neither did he promiſe more than he performed. For he cauſed great quantity of grain, that had been laid up in Cities round about, to be brought into his Camp, three miles from Beneventum. Thither at the time appointed, came no more than forty Carts or Wagons, with a few pack-horſes, as if this had been enough to victual Capua. Such was the retchleſneſs of the Campans. Hanno was exceeding angry hereat: and told them they were worſe than very beaſts; ſince hunger could not teach them to have greater care. Wherefore he gave them a longer day; againſt which he made proviſion to ſtore them throughly. Of all theſe doings word was ſent to the Roman Conſuls, from the Citizens of Beneventum. Therefore Q. Fulvius the Conſul, taking with him ſuch ſtrength as he thought needful for the ſervice, came into Beneventum by night; where with diligence he made inquiry into the behaviour of the Enemy. He learned, that Hanno with part of his Army was gone abroad to make proviſions; that ſome two thouſand Wagons, with a great rabble of Carters and other Varlets, lay among the Carthaginians in their camp; ſo that little good order was kept: all thought being ſet upon a great harveſt. Hereupon the Conſul bade his men prepare themſelves to aſſail the enemies Camp: and leaving all his impediments within Beneventum, he marched thitherward ſo early in the morning, that he was there with the firſt break of day. By coming ſo unexpected, he had well near forced the Camp on the ſudden. But it was very ſtrong, and very well defended: ſo that the longer the fight continued, the leſs deſire had Fulvius to loſe more of his men in the attempt; ſeeing many of them caſt away, and yet little hope of doing good. Therefore he ſaid, that it were better to go more leiſurely and ſubſtantially to work; to ſend for his fellow-Conſul, with the reſt of their Army; and to lye between Hanno and home; that neither the Campans ſhould depart thence, nor the Carthaginians be able to relieve them. Being thus diſcourſing, and about to ſound the retrait; he ſaw that ſome of his men had gotten over the enemies Rampart. There was great booty; of (which was all one to the Souldiers) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that Camp. Wherefore ſome Enſign-bearers threw their Enſigns over the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, unleſs they would endure the ſhame and diſhonour following ſuch a loſs. Fear of ſuch ignominy (than which nothing could be greater) made the Souldiers adventure ſo deſperately, that Fulvius, perceiving the heat of his men, changed his purpoſe, and encouraged thoſe that were ſomewhat backward, to follow the example of them that had already gotten over the Trenches. Thus the Camp was won: in which were ſlain above 6000; and taken above 7000, beſides all the ſtore of victuals, and carriages, with abundance of booty, that Hanno had lately gotten from the Roman Confederates. This miſadventure, and the nearer approach of both the Conſuls, made them of Capua ſend a pittiful Embaſſage to Hannibal: putting him in mind of all the love that he was wont to proteſt unto their City; and how he had made ſhew to affect it no leſs than Carthage. But now, they ſaid it would be loſt, as Arpi was lately, if he gave not ſtrong and ſpeedy ſuccour. Hannibal anſwered with comfortable words: and ſent away 2000 horſe, to keep their grounds from ſpoil, whil'ſt he himſelf was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the Citadel, partly by the diſpoſition, which he ſaw in many Towns adjoyning, to yield unto him. Among the Hoſtages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and being overtaken, ſuffered death for their attempt; were ſome of the Metapontines, and other Cities of the Greeks, inhabiting that Eaſtern part of Italy, which was called of old, Magna Gracia. Theſe people took to heart the death of their Hoſtages, and thought the puniſhment greater than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as ſoon as the Roman garriſon was taken from them to defend the Citadel of Tarentum, made no more ado, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurines would have done the like, upon the like reaſon, had not ſome companies lain in their Town; which they feared that they ſhould not be able to maſter. Nevertheleſs, they helped themſelves by cunning: inviting to their gates Hanno and Mago, that were near at hand: againſt whom whileſt they proffered their ſervice to Atinius the Roman Captain, they drew him forth to fight, and recoyling from him, cloſed up their gates. A little formality they uſed in pretending fear, leſt the enemy ſhould break in together with the Romans, in ſaving Atinius himſelf, and ſending him away by Sea; as alſo in conſulting a ſmall while (becauſe perhaps many of their chief men were unacquainted with the practice) whether they ſhould yield to the Carthaginian or no. But this diſputation laſted not long: for they that had removed the chief impediment, eaſily prevailed in the reſt; and delivered up the Town to Hanno and Mago. This good ſucceſs, and hope of the like, detain'd Hannibal in thoſe quarters, whil'ſt the Conſuls fortifying Beneventum to ſecure their backs, addreſſed themſelves to the ſiege of Capua.

Many diſaſters befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterpriſe. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a very good man of War, that had of late been twice Conſul, was ſlain, either by treachery of ſome Lucans, that drew him into ambuſh, or by ſome Carthaginian ſtragglers, among whom he fell unawares. His body, or his head, was very honourably interred, either by Hannibal himſelf, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans; to whom Hannibal ſent it. He was appointed to lye in Beneventum, there to ſecure the back of the Army that ſhould beſiege Capua. But his death hapned in an ill time, to the great hinderance of that buſineſs. The Volones or Slaves lately manumiſed, forſook their Enſigns, and went every one whither he thought good, as if they had been diſcharged by the deceaſe of their Leader; ſo that it asked ſome labour to ſeek them out, and bring them back into their Camp. Nevertheleſs, the Conſuls went forward with their work, and drawing near to Capua, did all acts of hoſtility, which they could. Mago the Carthag. and the Citizens of Capua gave them an hard welcome, wherein above 1500 Romans were loſt. Neither was it long ere Hannibal came thither, who fought with the Conſuls, and had the better; inſomuch that it cauſed them to diſlodge. They removed by night, and went ſeveral wayes: Fulvius towards Cannæ, Claudius into Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudius, who having led him a great walk, fetcht a compaſs about, and returned to Capua. It ſo fell out, that one Marcus Centenius Penula, a ſtout man, and one that with good commendations had diſcharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Army not far from thence, where Hannibal reſted, when he was weary of hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vaunts to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would work, if he might be truſted with the leading of 5000 men. The Fathers were unwilling in ſuch a time, to reject the vertue of any good Souldier, how mean ſoever his condition were. Wherefore they gave him the charge of 8000: and he himſelf being a proper man, and talking bravely, gathered up ſo many voluntaries, as almoſt doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gave proof of the difference between a ſtout Centurion, and one able to command in chief. He and his fellows were all (in a manner) ſlain, ſcarce 1000 of them eſcaping. Soon after this, Hannibal had word, that Cneus Fulvius a Roman Prætor with 18000 men was in Apulia, very careleſs and a man inſufficient for the charge which he held. Thither therefore he haſted to viſit him: hoping to deal the better with the main ſtrength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when he ſhould have cut off thoſe forces that lay in the Provinces about, under men of ſmall ability. Coming upon Fulvius, he found him and his men ſo jolly, that needs they would have fought the firſt night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So he beſtowed Mago with 3000 of his lighteſt armed, in places thereabout moſt fit for ambuſh. Then offered battel to Fulvius, he ſoon had him in the trap: whence he made him glad to eſcape alive; leaving all, ſave 2000 of his followers, dead behind him.

Theſe two great blows, received the one preſently after the other, much aſtoniſhed the Romans. Nevertheleſs, all care was taken, to gather up the ſmall reliques of the broken Armies; and that the Conſuls ſhould go ſubſtantially forwards with the ſiege of Capua: which was of great conſequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other reſpects. The two Conſuls ſate down before the Town, and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Prætors, came with his Army from Sueſſula, to their aſſiſtance. They made Proclamation, That whoſoever would iſſue out of Capua before a certain day prefixed, ſhould have his pardon, and be ſuffered to enjoy all that unto him belonged: which day being paſt, there ſhould be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliouſly rejected; the Capuans relying on their own ſtrength, and the ſuccours attended from Hannibal. Before the City was cloſed up, they ſent meſſengers to the Carthaginian; which found him at Brunduſium. He had made a long journey in hope of gaining the Tarentine Citadel: of which expectation failing, he turned to Brunduſium, upon adadvertiſement that he ſhould be let in. There the Capuans met him, told him of their danger with earneſt words; and were with words as bravely re-comforted. He bade them conſider, how, a few daies ſince he had chaſed the Conſuls out of their fields; and told them, that he would preſently come thither again, and ſend the Romans going as faſt as before. With this good anſwer the Meſſengers returned, and hardly could get back into the City; which the Romans had almoſt intrenched round. As for Hannibal himſelf, he was of opinion, that Capua, being very well manned, and heartily devoted unto his friendſhip, would hold out a long time, and thereby give him leiſure to do what he thought requiſite among the Tarentines, and in thoſe Eaſtern parts of Italy; whilſt the Roman Army ſpent it ſelf in a tedious ſiege. Thus he lingred, and thereby gave the Conſuls time both to fortifie themſelves at Capua, and to diſpatch the election of new Magiſtrates in Rome; whilſt he himſelf purſued hopes that never found ſucceſs.

Claudius and Fulvius, when their term of office was expired, were appointed to continue the ſiege at Capua; retaining the ſame Armies, as Proconſuls. The Townſ-men often ſallied out, rather in bravery, than likelihood to work any matter of effect; the Enemy lying cloſe within his Trenches, as intending without other violence, to ſubdue them by famine. Yet againſt the Campan horſe (for their foot was eaſily beaten) the Romans uſed to thruſt out ſome Troops, that ſhould hold them skirmiſh. In theſe exerciſes the Campans uſually had the better, to the great grief of their proud Enemy; who ſcorned to take foil at the hands of ſuch Rebels. It was therefore deviſed that ſome active and couragious young men ſhould learn to ride behind the Roman men at arms; leaping up, and again diſmounting lightly, as occaſion ſerved. Theſe were furniſhed like the Velites, having each of them three or four ſmall darts: which alighting in time of conflict, they diſcharged thick upon the Enemies horſe; whom vanquiſhing in this kind of ſervice, they much diſheartened in the main. The time thus paſſing, and famine daily increaſing within the City, Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans: and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, fell upon their Camp. At the ſame time the Capuans iſſued with their whole power, in as terrible a manner as they could deviſe: ſetting all their multitude of unſerviceable people by the walls, which with a loud noiſe of Pans and Baſons troubled thoſe that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius oppoſing himſelf to the Campans, eaſily defended his Trenches againſt them; and ſo well repreſſed them, that he drave them at length back into their City. Nevertheleſs, in purſuing them to their gates, he received a wound that accompanied him in ſhort ſpace after to his grave. Q. Fulvius was held harder to this task by Hannibal, and the Carthaginian Army. The Roman Camp was even at point to have been loſt; and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought three and thirty, were either gotten within the rampart, or elſe (for the report varies) being ſome of them ſlain upon it, fell into the ditch, and filled it up in ſuch ſort, that their bodies ſerved as a bridge to the aſſailants. It is ſaid, that Hannibal in this tumult cauſed ſome fugitives that could ſpeak Latin well, to proclaim aloud as it were in the Conſuls name, That every one of the Souldiers ſhould ſhift for himſelf, and fly betimes unto the next hills, for as much as the Camp was already loſt. But all would not ſerve. The fraud was detected; and the Army having ſitten there ſo long, had at good leiſure ſtrongly intrenched it ſelf, ſo as little hope there was to raiſe the ſiege by force.

This did extremely perplex the Carthaginian. The purchaſe of Capua had (as was thought) withheld him from taking Rome it ſelf: and now his deſire of winning the Tarentine Citadel, had well-near loſt Capua; in reſpect of which, neither the Citadel, nor the City of Tarentum were to have been much regarded. Falling therefore into a deſperate anger with himſelf and his hard fortune, that of ſo many great victories he had made no greater uſe: on the ſudden he entertained an haughty reſolution, even to ſet upon Rome; and carry to the walls of that proud City, the danger of War that threatned Capua. This, he thought, would be a means, to draw the Roman Generals, or one of them at leaſt, unto the defence of their own home. If they roſe from the ſiege with their whole Army, then had he his deſire: If they divided their forces, then was it likely, that either he or the Campans, ſhould well enough deal with them a-part. Neither did he deſpair, that the terror of his coming might ſo aſtoniſh the multitude within Rome, as he might enter ſome part or other of the City. His only fear was, leſt the Campans, being ignorant of his purpoſe, ſhould think he had forſaken them; and thereupon forthwith yield themſelves to the Enemy. To prevent this danger, he ſent letters to Capua by a ſubtle Numidian; who running as a fugitive into the Roman Camp, conveyed himſelf thence over the innermoſt Trenches into the City. The Journey to Rome was to be performed with great celerity: no ſmall hope of good ſucceſs reſting in the ſuddenneſs of his arrival there. Wherefore he cauſed his men to have in a readineſs ten daies victuals; and prepared as many boats, as might in one night tranſport his Army over the River Vulturnus. This could not be done ſo cloſely, but that the Roman Generals, by ſome fugitives, had notice of his purpoſe. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate; which was therewith affected, according to the diverſity of mens opinions in a caſe of ſuch importance. Some gave counſel, to let alone Capua, yea, and all places elſe, rather than to put the Town of Rome into peril of being taken by the enemy. Others were ſo far from allowing of this, as they wondred how any man could think, that Hannibal, being unable to relieve Capua, ſhould judge himſelf ſtrong enough to win Rome; and therefore ſtoutly ſaid, That thoſe Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the City, would ſerve the turn well enough, to keep him out and ſend him thence, if he were ſo unwiſe as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that Letters ſhould be ſent to Fulvius and Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the preſent were in Rome: who, ſince they knew beſt what the ſtrength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were beſt able to judge, what was needful to oppoſe him. So it was referred unto the diſcretion of theſe Generals at Capua, to do as they thought behoveful: and if it might conveniently be, neither to raiſe their ſiege, nor yet to put the City of Rome into much adventure. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fulvius took 15000. foot, and 1000. horſe, the choice of his whole Army; with which he haſted toward Rome; leaving App. Claudius, who could not travel by reaſon of his wound, to continue the ſiege at Capua.

Hannibal having paſſed over Vulturnus, burnt up all his boats, and left nothing that might tranſport the Enemy, in caſe he ſhould offer to purſue or coaſt him. Then haſted he away toward Rome, ſtaying no longer in any one place, than he needs muſt. Yet found he the Bridges over Liris broken down by the people of Fregellæ: which, as it ſtopped him a little on his way; ſo it made him the more grievouſly to ſpoil their Lands, while the Bridges were in mending. The nearer that he drew to Rome, the greater waſte he made: his Numidians running before him; driving the Country, & killing or taking multitudes of all ſorts and ages, that fled out of all parts round about. The Meſſengers of theſe news came a-pace, one after another into the City; ſome few bringing true advertiſements; but the moſt of them reporting the conceits of their own fear. All the Streets and Temples in Rome were peſtered with women, crying, and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their hair, becauſe they could do none other good. The Senators were all in the great Market, or place of Aſſembly; ready to give their advice, if it were asked, or to take directions given by the Magiſtrates. All places of moſt importance were ſtuffed with ſouldiers: it being uncertain, upon which part Hannibal would fall. In the midſt of this trepidation, there came news that Quintus Fulvius, with part of the Army from Capua, was haſting to the defence of the City. The Office of a Proconſul did expire, at his return home, and entring into the Gates of Rome. Wherefore, that Fulvius might loſe nothing by coming into the City, in time of ſuch need, an Act was paſſed, That he ſhould have equal power with the Conſuls during his abode there. He and Hannibal arrived at Rome, one ſoon after another: Fulvius having been long held occupied in paſſing over Vulturnus; and Hannibal receiving impediment in his journey, as much as the Country was able to give. The Conſuls, and Fulvius incamped without the Gates of Rome, attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew nearer and greater; ſo took they more careful and eſpecial order againſt all occurrences. Hannibal came to the River Anio, or Anien, three miles from the Town; whence he advanced with 2000. horſe, and rode along a great way under the Walls, viewing the ſite thereof, and conſidering how he might beſt approach it. But he either went, or (as the Roman Story ſaith) was driven away, without doing or receiving any hurt. Many tumults roſe in this while among the people; but were ſuppreſſed by the care and diligence of the Senators. Above the reſt, one accident was both troubleſom, and not without peril. Of Numidians that had ſhifted aſide, and fallen (upon ſome diſpleaſures) from Hannibal to the Romans, there were ſome 1200. then in Rome; which were appointed by the Conſuls, to paſs thorow the Mown, from the Tount Aventine, to the Gate Colliatna, where it was thought that their ſervice might be uſeful, among broken waies, and Garden-walls lying in the Suburbs. The faces of theſe men, and their furniture, wherein they differed not from the followers of Hannibal, bred ſuch miſtaking, as cauſed a great uproar among the people: all crying out that Aventine was taken, and the Enemy gotten within the walls. The noiſe was ſuch, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the ſtreets were ſo full of cattel, and husbandmen, which were fled thither out of the Villages adjoyning, that the paſſage was ſtopt up: and the poor Numidians pitifully beaten from the houſe tops, with ſtones and other weapons that came next to hand, by the deſperate multitude, that would have run out at the Gates, had it not been certain who lay under the Walls. To remedy the like inconveniencies, it was ordained, That all which had been Dictators, Conſuls, or Cenſors, ſhould have authority as Magiſtrates, till the Enemy departed. The day following Hannibal paſſed over Anien, and preſented battel to the Romans, who did not wiſely if they undertook it. It is ſaid, that a terrible ſhowre of rain, cauſed both Romans and Carthaginians to return into their ſeveral Camps, and that this happened two daies together, the weather breaking up and clearing as ſoon as they were departed aſunder: certain it is; that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more than ten daies proviſion, could not endure to ſtay there, until his victuals were all ſpent. In which regard the Romans, if they ſuffered him to waſte his time and proviſions, knowing that he could not abide there long, did as became well adviſed men: if they offered to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parted (as is ſaid) by ſome accident of weather, the commendations muſt be given to their fortune. The terror of Hannibals coming to the City, how great ſo ever it was at the firſt, yet after ſome leiſure, and better notice taken of their forces, which appeared leſs than the firſt apprehenſion had formed them, was much and ſoon abated. Hereupon it helped well, that at the ſame time the Supply appointed for Spain, after the death of the two Scipio's, were ſent out of the Town, and went forth at the Gate, whilſt one Carthaginian lay before another. In all Pancik terrours, as they are called, whereof there is either no cauſe known, or no cauſe anſwerable to the greatneſs of the ſudden conſternation; it is a good remedy to do ſomewhat quite contrary to that which the danger would require, were it ſuch as men have faſhioned it in their amazed conceits. Thus did Alexander cauſe his ſouldiers to diſarm themſelves, when they were all on a ſudden in a great fear of they wiſt not what. And thus did Clearchus pacifie a fooliſh uproar in his Army, by proclaiming a reward unto him that could tell who had ſent the Aſs into the Camp. But in this preſent example of the Romans, appears withall a great magnanimity; whereby they ſuſtained their reputation, and augmented it no leſs, than by this bold attempt of Hannibal it might ſeem to have been diminiſhed. Neither could they more finely have checked the glorious conceits of their enemy, and taken away the diſgrace of that fear, which clouded their valour at his firſt coming; than by making ſuch demonſtrations, when once they had recovered ſpirit, how little they eſteemed him. To this purpoſe therefore that very piece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay encamped, was ſold in Rome: and ſold it was nothing under the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had been in time of peace. This dignity coming to his ear, incenſed Hannibal ſo much, that he made port-ſale of the Silver-ſmiths ſhops, which were near about the Market or Common place in Rome; as if his own title to the houſes within the Town were no whit worſe, than any Roman Citizens could be unto that piece of ground, whereon he raiſed his Tent. But this counter-practice was nothing worth. The Romans did ſeek to manifeſt that aſſurance which they juſtly had conceived; Hannibal, to make ſhew of continuing in an hope, which was already paſt. His victuals were almoſt ſpent: and of thoſe ends, that he had propoſed unto himſelf, this Journey had brought forth none other, than the fame of his much daring. Wherefore he brake up his Camp: and doing what ſpoil he could to the Roman Territory, without ſparing religious places, wherein wealth was to be gotten, he paſſed like a tempeſt over the Country, and ran toward the Eaſtern Sea ſo faſt, that he had almoſt taken the City Rhegium before his arrival was feared or ſuſpected. As for Capua, he gave it loſt: and is likely to have curſed the whole faction of Hanno, which thus diſabled him to relieve that fair City, ſince he had no other way to vent his grief.

Q. Fabius returning back to Capua, made Proclamation anew, what whoſo would yield before a certain tain day, might safely do it. This, and the very return of Fulvius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gave the Capuans to understand, that they were abandoned, and their case desperate. To trust the Roman pardon proclaimed, every mans conscience of his own evil deserts, told him, that it was a vanity: and some faint hope was given by Hanno and Bostar, Captains of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Town, that Hannibal should come again, if means could only be found, how to convey such Letters unto him as they would write. The carriage of the Letters was undertaken by some Numidians, who running as fugitives, out of the Town into the Roman Camp, waited fit opportunity to make an escape thence with their packets. But it happened ere they could convey themselves away, that one of them was detected by an harlot following him out of the Town; and the Letters of Bostar and Hanno were taken and opened, containing a vehement entreaty unto Hannibal, that he would not thus forsake the Capuans and them. For (said they) we came not hither to make War against Rhegium and Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions, wheresoever they lye, there also should the Carthaginian Army be ready to attend them; and by taking such a course, have we gotten those victories at Trebia, Thrasymene, and Cannæ. In fine, they besought him, that he would not dishonour himself, and betray them to their enemies, by turning another away; as if it were his only care, that the City should not be taken in his full view; promising to make a desperate sally, if he would once more adventure to set upon the Roman Camp. Such were the hopes of Bostar and his fellow.

But Hannibal had already done his best; and now began to faint under the burden of that War, wherein as afterward he protested he was vanquished by Hanno and his Persians, in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. It may well be, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those which were besieged in Capua, had been sent ever by the Hannonians, to observe the doings of Hannibal, and to check his proceedings. If this were so, justly might they curse their own malice, which had cast them into this remediless necessity. Howsoever it were, the Letters directed unto Hannibal, fell (as is shewed) into the Roman Proconsuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all such counterfeit fugitives, as carried such messages, whipt them back into the Town. This miserable spectacle brake the hearts of the Campans, so that the multitude crying out upon the Senate, with menacing terms, caused them to assemble and consult, about the yielding up of Capua unto the Romans. The bravest of the Senators and such as a few years since, had been most forward in joyning with Hannibal, understood well enough whereunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them invited the rest home to supper; telling them, that when they had made good chear, he would drink to them such an health, as should set them free from that cruel revenge, which the Enemies sought upon their bodies. About seven and twenty of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their lives together by drinking poyson. All the rest hoping for more mercy than they had deserved, yielded simply to discretion. So one of the Town-gates was set open; whereat a Roman Legion, with some other Companies, entring, disarmed the Citizens; apprehended the Carthaginian Garrison; and commanded all the Senators of Capua to go forth into the Roman Camp. At their coming thither, the Proconsuls laid Irons upon them all, and commanding them to tell what store of gold and silver they had at home, sent them into safe custody; some to Cales, others to Theanum. Touching the general multitude, they were reserved unto the discretion of the Senate, yet so hardly used by Fulvius in the mean while, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this adversity. Ap. Claudius was brought even to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately received; yet was he not inexorable to the Campans; as having loved them well in former times, and having given his Daughter in marriage to that Pacuvius, of whom he spake before. But this facility of his Colleague made Fulvius the more hasty in taking vengeance; for fear, lest upon the like respects, the Roman Senate might prove more gentle, than he thought behoveful to the common safety, and honour of their estate. Wherefore he took the pains to ride by night unto Theanum, and from thence to Cales; where he caused all the Campan prisoners to suffer death; binding them to stakes, and scourging them first a good while with rods; after which he struck off their heads.

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all Towns of Italy the less apt to follow the vain hope of the Campans; and bred a general inclination, to return upon good conditions to the Roman side. The Atellans, Calatines and Sabatines, people of the Campans, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made also now the like submission, for very fear and want of ability to resist. They were therefore used with the like rigour, by Fulvius; who dealt so extremely with them all, that he brought them into desperation. Wherefore some of their young Gentlemen burning with fire of revenge got into Rome; where they found means by night time, to set on fire many houses, that a great part of the City was like to have been consumed. The beginning of the fire in divers places at once, argued that it was no casualty. Wherefore liberty was proclaimed unto any slave and other sufficient reward for any free-men, that should discover who those Incendiaries were. Thus all came out; and the Campans being detected by a slave of their own (to whom, above his liberty promised, was given about the summ of an hundred marks) had the punishment answerable to their deserts. Fulvius hereby being more and more incensed against this wretched people held them in a manner as prisoners within their Walls: and this extreme severity caused them at length to become suppliants unto the Roman Senate; that some period might be set unto their miseries. That whereupon the Senators resolved in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffered before. Only two poor women in Capua (of which one had been an harlot) were found not guilty of the late rebellion. The rest were, some of them, with their wives and children sold for slaves, and their goods confiscated; others laid in prison, and reserved to further deliberation: but the generality of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certain day, and confined unto several places, as best liked the angry victors. As for the Town of Capua, it was suffered to stand, in regard of the beauty and commodious site; but no corporation or form of polity was allowed to be therein; only a Roman Provost was every year sent to govern over those that should inhabit it, and to do justice. This was the greatest act, and most important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great losses in the present War. After this, the glory of Hannibal began to shine with a more dim light than before: his oyl being far spent and that which should have revived his flame, being unfortunately shed; as shall be told in place convenient.

SECT. XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a party in Sardinia and Sicily, held War againſt the Romans in thoſe Iſlands, and were overcome.

WHilſt things paſſed thus in Italy, the commotions raiſed in Sardinia and Sicily by the Carthaginians and their friends, were brought to a quiet and happy end by the induſtrious valour of the Romans. The Sardinian rebellion was great and ſudden: above 30000 being up in arms, ere the Roman forces could arrive there to ſuppreſs it. One Harſicoras with his Son Hyoſtus, mighty men in that Iſland, were the Ring-leaders; being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian, that promiſed the aſſiſtance of his Country. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterpriſe ſo careleſs, as in the reſt of their main undertakings, about the ſame time. Yet it had been better if their care had been directed unto the proſecution of that main buſineſs in Italy; whereon this and all other hopes depended. For it would have ſufficed, if they could have hindred the Romans from ſending an Army into Sardinia. Harſicoras with his followers might well enough have ſerved to drive out Quintus Mutius the Prætor; who lay ſick in the Province; and not more weak in his own body, than in his train. But whilſt they ſought revenge of that particular injury, whereof the ſenſe was moſt grievous; they neglected the opportunity of requiting thoſe that had done them wrong, and of the ſecuring themſelves from all injuries in the future. Their fortune alſo in this enterpriſe was ſuch, as may ſeem to have encouraged them from being at the like charge, in caſes of more importance. For, whereas they ſent over Aſdrubal ſurnamed the Bald, with a competent Fleet and Army, aſſiſted in this expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion, and by Mago a Gentleman of the Barchine houſe, and near kinſman to Hannibal; it ſo fell out, that the whole Fleet, by extremity of foul weather, was caſt upon the Baleares; ſo beaten, and in ſuch evil plight, that the Sardinians had even ſpent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquiſhed, ere theſe their friends could arrive to ſuccour them.

Titus Manlius was ſent from Rome with 22000 foot, and 1200 horſe, to ſettle the eſtate of that Iſland, which he had taken in, and annexed unto the Roman Dominion, long before this, in his Conſulſhip. It was a laudable cuſtom of the Romans, to preſerve and uphold in their ſeveral Provinces, the greatneſs and reputation of thoſe men, and their families, by whom each Province had been firſt ſubdued unto their Empire. If any injury were done unto the Provincials, if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate, or whatſoever accident required the aſſiſtance of a Patron; the firſt conqueror, and his race after him, were the moſt ready and beſt approved means, to procure the benefit of the people ſubdued. Hereby the Romans held very ſure intelligence in every Province, and had always in a readineſs fit men to reclaim their ſubjects, if they fell into any ſuch diſorder, as would otherwiſe have required a greater charge and trouble. The coming of Manlius retained in obedience all that were not already broken too far out. Yet was Harſicoras ſo ſtrong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arm his Mariners: without whom he could not have made up that number of 22000, whereof we have ſpoken before: he landed at Calaris, or Carallis, where mooring his ſhips, he paſſed up into the Country, and ſought out the enemy. Hyoſtus, the Son of Harſicoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Army left unto him by his Father, who was gone abroad into the Country, to draw in more friends to their ſide. This young Gentleman would needs adventure to get honour, by giving battel to the Romans at his own diſcretion. So he raſhly adventured to fight with an old Souldier; by whom he received a terrible overthrow; and loſt in one day above thirty thouſand of his followers. Hyoſtus himſelf, with the reſt of his broken troops, got into Cornus, the chief Town of the Iſland; whither Manlius purſued them. Very ſoon after this deſeature came Aſdrubal with his Carthaginians; too late to win all Sardinia in ſuch haſte as he might have done, if the tempeſt had not hindred his voyage; yet ſoon enough, and ſtrong enough to ſave the Town of Cornus, and put a new ſpirit into the rebels. Manlius hereupon with-drew himſelf back to Calaris; where he had not ſtayed long, ere the Sardinians (ſuch of them as adhered to the Roman party) craved his aſſiſtance; their Country being waſted by the Carthaginians, and the rebels, with whom they had refuſed to joyn. This drew Manlius forth of Calaris; where, if he had ſtayed a little longer, Aſdrubal would have ſought him out with ſome blemiſh to his reputat ion. But the fame of Aſdrubal and his company, appears to have been greater than was their ſtrength. For after ſome trial made of them in a few skirmiſhes, Manlius adventured all to the hazard of a battel; wherein he ſlew twelve thouſand of the enemies; and took of the Sardinians and Carthaginians three thouſand. Four hours the battel laſted; and victory at length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Iſlanders, whoſe courages had been broken in their unproſp rous fight, not many days before. The death of young Hyoſtus, and of his Father Harſicoras, that ſlew himſelf for grief, together with the captivity of Aſdrubal himſelf, with Mago and Hanno the Carthaginians, made the victory the more famous. The vanquiſhed Army flhd into Cornus, whither Manlius followed them, and in ſhort ſpace won the Town. All other Cities of the Iſle that had rebelled, following the example of Cornus, yielded unto the Roman; who, impoſing upon them ſuch increaſe of tribute, or other puniſhment, as beſt ſorted with the nature of their ſeveral offences, or their ability to pay, returned back to Calaris with a great booty, and from thence to Rome leaving Sardinia in quiet.

The war in Sicily was of greater length, and every way more burdenſome to Rome: as alſo the victory brought more honour and profit, for that the Romans became thereby, not only ſavers of their own, as in Sardinia, but Lords of the whole Country, by annexing the City and Dominion of Syracuſe, to that which they enjoyed before. Soon after the battel at Canne, the old King of Syracuſe dyed; who had continued long a ſtedfaſt friend unto the Romans, and greatly relieved them in this preſent war. He left his Kingdom to Hieronymus his grand-child, that was about fifteen years of age; Gelo his Son, that ſhould have been his heir, being dead before. To this young King his ſucceſſor, Hiero appointed fifteen tutors; of which the principal were Andronodorus, Zoilus, and Themiſtius; who had married his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The reſt were ſuch, as he judged moſt likely to preſerve the Kingdom, by the ſame Art, whereby himſelf had gotten, and ſo long kept it. But within a little while, Andronodorus waxing weary of ſo many Coadjutors, began to commend the ſufficeincy of the young Prince, as extraordinary in one of his years; and ſaid that he was able to rule the Kingdom without help of any Protector. Thus by giving over his own charge, he cauſed others to do the like; hoping thereby to get the King wholly into his hands; which came to paſs in a ſort as he deſired. For Hieronymus, laying aſide all care of government, gave himſelf wholly over to his pleaſures: or, if he had any regard of his Royal dignity, it was only in matter of exteriour ſhew; as wearing a Diadem, with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby he offended the eyes of his people, that had never ſeen the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his Son. But much more he offended them, when by his inſolent behaviour, ſuitable to his outward pomp, he gave proof, that in courſe of life, he would revive the memory of Tyrants dead long ſince, from whom he took the pattern of his habit. He grew proud, luſtful, cruel, and dangerous to all that were about him; ſo that ſuch of his late tutors as could eſcape him by flight, were glad to live in baniſhment: the reſt, being moſt of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their own hands, to avoid the danger of his diſpleaſure, that ſeemed worſe than death it ſelf. Only Andronodorus, Zoilus, and one Thraſo, continued in grace with him, and were his Counſellors, but not of his Cabinet. Theſe, howſoever they agreed in other points, were at ſome diſſention about the main point of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them were wholly for the Kings pleaſure, which was ſet on change: but Thraſo, having more regard of his honour and profit, was very earneſt to continue the amity with Rome. Whil'ſt as yet it remained ſomewhat doubtful which way the King would incline, a conſpiracy againſt his perſon was detected by a Groom of his; to whom one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented; thereby to wring out of him the whole practice, and the names of the undertakers. Long it was ere he would ſpeak any thing: but yielding (as it ſeemed) in the end, unto the extremity of the torture, he confeſſed, that he had been ſet on by Thraſo; whom he appeached of the treaſon, together with many more, that were near in love or place unto Hieronymus. All theſe therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were indeed the Conſpirators, walked boldly in the ſtreets, and never ſhrunk for the matter: aſſuring themſelves, that the reſolution of Theodorus would yield to no extremity. Thus they all eſcaped, and ſoon after found means to execute their purpoſe. The King himſelf, when Thraſo was taken out of the way, quickly reſolved upon ſiding with the Carthaginians, whereto he was very inclinable before. Young men, when firſt they grow maſters of themſelves, love to ſeem wiſer than their Fathers, by taking different Courſes. And the liberality of Hiero to the Romans, in their great neceſſity, had of late been ſuch as might have been termed exceſſive, were it not in regard of his providence; wherein he took order for his own eſtate, that depended upon theirs. But the young Nephew taking little heed of dangers far off, regarded only the things preſent; the weakneſs of Rome, the prevalent fortunes of Carthage, and the much money that his Grand-father had laid out in vain, to ſhoulder up a falling houſe. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal; who readily entred into good correſpondence with him, that was maintained by Hippocrates and Epicides, Carthaginians born, but Grand-children of a baniſhed Syracuſian. Theſe grew into ſuch favour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they liſted. So that when App. Claudius the Roman Prætor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacy, between the people of Rome, and the King of Syracuſe; his meſſengers were diſmiſſed with an open ſcoff. For Hieronymus would needs have them tell him the order of the fight at Canna, that he might thereby learn how to accommodate himſelf, ſaying, that he could hardly believe the Carthaginians; ſo wonderful was the victory, as they reported it. Having thus diſmiſſed the Romans, he ſent Embaſſadours to Carthage, where he concluded a league: with condition, at firſt, that a great part of the Iſland ſhould be annexed to his Dominion; but afterward, that he ſhould reign over all Sicily; and the Carthaginians reſt ſatisfied with what they could get in Italy. At theſe doings Appius Claudius did not greatly ſtir; partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that it behoved not the Romans to entertain more quarrels than were enforced upon them by neceſſity; and partly (as may ſeem) for that the reputation, both of himſelf, and of his City, had received ſuch blemiſh, by that which happened unto him in his journey, as much diſcountenanced him when he came into Sicily, and forbad him to look big. The money that Hiero had beſtowed formerly upon the Romans, wherewith to relieve them in their neceſſity, this Appius was to carry back unto him; it being refuſed by the Roman Senate, with greater bravery than their preſent fortune would allow. But inſtead of returning the money with thanks, as he had been directed, and as it had been noiſed abroad that he ſhould do; the war againſt Philip King of Macedon (whereof we have ſpoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aſide vain-glory, and ſend word after him, that he ſhould conſign that money over to Marcus Valerius; of whoſe voyage into Greece, the City had not otherwiſe wherewith to bear the charge. This was done accordingly, and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Family is taxed with pride) his errand was changed, from a glorious oſtentation of the Roman magnanimity, into ſuch a pitiful tune of thankſgiving, as muſt needs have bred ſorrow and commiſeration in ſo true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were delivered after his death, matter of paſtime and ſcorn, in Hieronymus the new King.

But whil'ſt Hieronymus was more deſirous of war, than well reſolved how to begin it; his own death changed the form of things, and bred a great innovation in the State of Syracuſe; which thereby might have proſpered more than ever, had it been wiſely governed. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom we ſpake before, were ſent about the Country with two thouſand men, to ſolicite the Towns, and perſwade them to ſhake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himſelf with an Army of fifteen thouſand horſe and foot, went to Leontium a City of his own Dominion: hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Iſland fall to him in all haſte; and accept him for Soveraign. There the Conſpirators took him on the ſudden, as he was paſſing thorow a narrow ſtreet: and ruſhing between him and his guard, ſtruck him dead. Forthwith liberty was proclaimed; and the ſound of that word ſo joyfully anſwered by the Leontines, that the guard of Hieronymus had little courage to revenge their Maſters death. Yet, for fear of the worſt, a great largeſs was promiſed unto the Souldiers, with rewards unto their Captains; which wrought ſo effectually, that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned up, the Army as in deteſtation of his bad life, ſuffered his carkaſs to lye unburied. This news ran quickly to Syracuſe; whither ſome of the Conſpirators, taking alſo of the Kings horſes, poſted away; to ſignifie all that had paſſed, to ſtir up the people to liberty, and to prevent Andronodorus, if he or his followers would make offer to uſurp a tyranny. The Syracuſians hereupon preſently took arms, and made themſelves Maſters of their own City. Andronodorus on the other ſide fortified the Palace, and the Iſland; being yet uncertain what to do: between deſire of making himſelf a ſoveraign Lord, and fear of ſuffering puniſhment as a Tyrant, if his enterpriſe miſcarried. His wife Demarata, that was the daughter of Hiero, cheriſhed him in his hopes; putting him in mind of that well-known Proverb, which Dionyſius had uſed; That a Tyrant ſhould keep his place, till he were haled out of it by the heels, and not ride away from it on horſe-back. But fear, and better counſel, prevailed ſo far, that Andronodorus, having ſlept upon the matter, diſſembled his affections, and deferred his hope unto better opportunity. The next day he came forth, and made a ſpeech unto the people; telling them that he was glad to ſee, how prudently they behaved themſelves in ſo great a change; that he had ſtood in fear, leſt they would not have contained themſelves within the bounds of diſcretion; but rather have ſought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that, ſince he beheld their orderly proceeding, and their care, not to raviſh their liberty perforce, but to wed it unto them for ever; he was willingly come to them forth of his ſtrength, and ſurrendered up the charge committed unto him, by one that had been an evil Maſter both to him and them. Hereupon great joy was made, and Prætors choſen (as in former times) to govern the City, of which Andronodorus was one, and the chief. But ſuch was his deſire of Soveraignty, and ſo vehement were the inſtigations of his wife, that ſhortly he began to practiſe with Hippocrates, Epicides, and other Captains of the Mercenaries; hoping to make himſelf ſtrong by their help, that were leaſt pleaſed with the change. Hippocrates and Epicides had been with the Syracuſian Prætors, and told them, that being ſent from Hannibal to Hieronymus, they, according to inſtructions of their Captain, had done him, whil'ſt he lived, what ſervice they could; and that now they were deſirous to return home. They requeſted therefore that they might be friendly diſmiſſed, and with a convoy, that might keep them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and ſet them ſafe at Locri. This was eaſily granted; both for that the Syracuſian Magiſtrates were well contented to earn thanks of Hannibal, with ſuch a little courteſie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Town quickly of this troubleſome couple, which were good Souldiers, and gracious with the Army, but otherwiſe lewd men. It was not the deſire of theſe two Sicilians, to be gone ſo haſtily as they made ſhew; they were more mindful of the buſineſs for which Hannibal had ſent them. Wherefore they inſinuated themſelves into the boſomes of ſuch as were moſt likely to fill the Army with tumult, eſpecially of the Roman fugitives, and thoſe that had cauſe to miſtruſt what ſhould become of themſelves, when the Romans and Syracuſians were come to agreement. Such inſtruments as theſe, Andronodorus had great need of: as alſo of many other, to help him in his dangerous attempt. He found Themiſtius, that had married Harmonia, the Siſter of Hieronymus, ready to take his part; as being carried with the like paſſions of his own, and of his wife. But ſeeking to increaſe the number of his adherents, he revealed to matter the one, that revealed all to the reſt of the Prætors. Hereupon it followed, that he, and Themiſtius, entring into the Senate, were ſlain out of hand: and afterward accuſed to the people, of all the evil which they had done, whil'ſt Hieronymus lived, as by his authority; and now ſince attempted, in ſeeking to uſurp the tyranny themſelves. It was alſo declared, that the daughters of Hiero and Gelo were acceſſary to this dangerous treaſon: and that the unquiet ſpirits of theſe women would never ceaſe to work, until they had recovered thoſe royal ornaments and Soveraign power, whereof their family was now diſpoſſeſſed. Theſe daughters therefore of Hiero and Gelo were alſo condemned to dye, and executioners preſently ſent by the enraged people, to take away their lives. Demarata and Harmonia had perhaps deſerved this heavy ſentence: but Heraclea, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Soſippus, being altogther innocent, was murdered, together with her two young daughters, in the haſty execution of this raſh judgement. Her husband Soſippus was a lover of the Commonwealth; and in that reſpect ſo hated by Hieronymus, that being ſent Embaſſador to King Ptolomy, &c. he durſt not return home, but ſtayed in Egypt as a baniſhed man. This conſideration when it was too late, together with ſome pitiful accidents accompanying the ſlaughter, ſo affected the multitude, that (pardoning themſelves) all cryed out upon the Authors of ſo foul a butchery. Being thus incenſed againſt the Senate; and knowing not otherwiſe how to ſatisfie their anger, they called for an election of new Prætors, in the room of Andronodorus and Themiſtius, that were lately ſlain: meaning to ſubſtitute ſuch in their places, as the Senators ſhould have little cauſe to like. At the election were preſent a great rout, not only of the poorer Citizens, but of ſouldiers that preſſed into the throng. One of theſe named Epicides Prætor; another named Hippocrates: and the leſs that the old Prætors and Senators approved this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a general cry forced them to be accepted. Theſe being made Prætors did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, between the Syracuſians and the Romans. But having ſtriven in vain, and ſeeing that the people ſtood in fear of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus that was lately come into Sicily; they gave way unto the time, and ſuffered the old league of Hiero to be reconfirmed, which afterward they purpoſed to diſſolve by practice. The Leontines had ſome need of a garriſon; and to them was ſent Hippocrates the Prætor, attended by ſuch fugitives, and mercenary ſouldiers, as were moſt burdenſome to Syracuſe. Thither when he came, he began to do many acts of hoſtility againſt the Romans: firſt in ſecret, afterward more openly and boldly. Marcellus, rightly underſtanding the purpoſe of theſe two brethren, ſent word unto the Syracuſians, that they had already broken the league; and that the peace would never be kept ſincerely, until this turbulent pair of brethren were expelled the Iſland. Epicides, fearing to ſuſtain the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more deſirous to ſet forward the war, than to excuſe any breach of peace; went himſelf unto the Leontines, whom he perſwaded to rebel againſt the Syracuſians. For he ſaid, that ſince they had all of late ſerved one Maſter, there was little reaſon why the Leontines ſhould not be enfranchiſed by his death, as well as the Syracuſians; yea or much rather, all things conſidered; ſince in their ſtreets the Tyrant was ſlain, and liberty firſt proclaimed. Wherefore, ſince they of Syracuſe were not contented to enjoy the Freedom purchaſed among the Leontines; but thought it good reaſon, that they ſhould bear Dominion over thoſe that had broken the Chain, wherewith both the one and the other were bound: his advice was, that ſuch their arrogancy ſhould be checked betimes, ere it could get any colour of right by preſcription. Hereunto occaſion was given by one article of the League, made of late by the Romans and Syracuſians. For it was agreed, That all which had been ſubject to Hiero and Hieronymus, ſhould henceforth be Vaſſals unto the State of Syracuſe. Againſt this article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their own due; Epicides told them, that in this novelty of change, they had fit opportunity to recover the freedom, which their fathers had loſt not many ages before. Neither was it unreaſonable, which this crafty Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had been ſubdued by the ſame hand, which took liberty from the Syracuſians. But ſeeing they had long ſince yielded unto Syracuſe, and been ſubject unto that City, by what form ſoever it was grounded; this claim of liberty was rather ſeaſonable, than juſt. Nevertheleſs, the motion of Epicides was highly approved: inſomuch that when meſſengers came ſoon after from Syracuſe, to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done againſt the Romans; and to denounce unto Hippocrates and Epicides, that they ſhould get them gone, either to Locri, or whither elſe they liſted, ſo that they ſtayed not in Sicily: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requeſted the Syracuſians, to make any bargains for them with the Romans, nor thought themſelves bound to obſerve the covenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptory anſwer was forthwith reported unto Marcellus by the Syracuſians; who offered him their aſſiſtance in doing juſtice upon the Leontines their Rebels; with condition, That when the Town was taken, it might be theirs again. Marcellus required no better ſatisfaction: but forthwith took the buſineſs in hand, which he diſpatched in one day. At the firſt aſſault Leontium was taken, all ſave the Caſtle; whereinto Hippocrates and Epicides fled: and ſtealing thence away by night, conveighed themſelves into the Town of Herbeſus. The firſt thing that Marcellus did, when he had won the Town, was the ſame, which other Roman Captains uſed after victory, to ſeek out the fugitive Roman ſlaves and renegado's, whom he cauſed all to dye: the reſt both of the Townſmen and Souldiers, he took to mercy, forbearing alſo to ſtrip or ſpoil them. But the fame of his doings was bruited after a contrary ſort. It was ſaid, that he had ſlain Man, Woman and Child; and put the Town to ſack. Theſe news met the Syracuſian Army upon the way, as it was going to joyn with Marcellus, who had ended his buſineſs before. About eight thouſand Mercenaries there were, that had been ſent forth of Syracuſe, under Soſis and Dinomines, two of the Prætors; to ſerve againſt the Leontines and other rebels. Theſe Captains were honeſt men, and well affected to their Country: but the Souldiers that followed them, had thoſe diſeaſes, with which all mercenaries are commonly infected. They took the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow ſouldiers (as now they termed thoſe againſt whom they went) had been ſo cruelly butchered: and hereupon they fell to mutiny; though what to demand, or with whom to be angry, they could not tell. The Prætors therefore thought it beſt, to turn their unquiet thoughts another way, and ſet them awork in ſome place elſe: for as much as at Leontium there was no need of their ſervice. So towards Herbeſus they marched; where lay Hippocrates and Epicides, the architects of all this miſchief, deviſing what further harm they might do; but now ſo weakly accompanied, that they ſeemed unable to eſcape the puniſhments belonging to their offences paſt. Hereof the two brethren were no leſs well aware: and therefore adventured upon a remedy little leſs deſperate than their preſent caſe. They iſſued forth of Herbeſus unarmed, with Olive branches in their hands, in manner of Suppliants; and ſo preſented themſelves to the Army. Six hundred men of Crete were in the vant-guard; that had been well uſed by Hieronymus: and ſome of them greatly bound unto Hannibal, who had taken them priſoners in the Italian war, and lovingly diſmiſſed them. Theſe Cretians therefore welcomed the two brethren, and bade them be of good cheer, ſaying, That no man ſhould do them harm, as long as they could uſe their weapons. Herewithall the Army was at a ſtand; and the rumour of this accident ran ſwiftly from man to man, with general approbation. The Prætors thought to help the matter by ſeverity, which would not ſerve. For when they commanded theſe two traitors to be laid in Irons, the exclamation was ſo violent againſt them, that fain they were to let all alone, and return, uncertain what courſe to take, unto Megara, where they were lodged the night before. Thither when they came, Hippocrates deviſed a trick, whereby to help himſelf, and better the uncertain caſe wherein he ſtood. He cauſed Letters of his own penning, to be intercepted by ſome of his moſt truſty Cretans, directed (as they made ſhew) from the Syracuſian Prætors to Marcellus. The contents hereof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the ſword among the Leontines: but that it further behoved him, to make the like diſpatch of all the mercenaries belonging to Syracuſe; which were offenſive; all of them in general, to the liberty of the City; and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeit Epiſtle was openly rehearſed, the uproar was ſuch, that Soſis and his fellow Prætor, were glad to forſake the Camp, and fly for their lives. All the Syracuſians remaining behind, had been cut in pieces by the enraged Souldiers, if the two Artificers of the ſedition had not ſaved their lives; rather to keep them as pledges, and by them, to win their friends within the Town, than for any good will. They perſwaded alſo a miſchievous knave, that had ſerved amongſt the Leontines, to juſtifie the bruit of Marcellus cruelty, and to carry home the news to Syracuſe, as an eye-witneſs. This incenſed not only the multitude, but ſome of the Senate; and filled the whole Town with cauſeleſs indignation. In good time (ſaid ſome) was the avarice and cruelty of the Romans detected: who had they in like ſort gotten into Syracuſe, would have dealt much worſe, where their greedy appetites might have been tempted with a far greater booty. Whil'ſt they were thus diſcourſing, and deviſing how to keep out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Army came to the gates, exhorting the Citizens to let him in, unleſs for want of help, they would be betrayed to their enemies. The Prætors, with the beſt and wiſeſt of the Senate, would fain have kept him out: but the violence of the ſouldiers to force a gate, was no whit greater, than the head-ſtrong fury of thoſe within the Town, that laboured to break it open. So he entred, and immediately fell upon the Prætors, whom (being forſaken by all men) he put to the ſword, and made ſlaughter of them and their followers till night. The next day he went openly to work: and, after the common example of Tyrants, gave liberty unto all ſlaves and priſoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worſt and baſeſt ſort, made himſelf and his brother Prætors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of Syracuſe.

When

When Marcellus was advertiſed of this great alteration, he thought it no time for him to ſit ſtill, and attend the further iſſue. He ſent Embaſſadours to Syracuſe, that were not admitted into the Haven, but chaſed out as enemies. Then drew he near with his Army: and lodging within a mile and a half of the Town, ſent before him, ſome to require a parlee. Theſe were entertained without the walls by the two new Prætors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thither, not with purpoſe to do hurt, but in favour of the Syracuſians, which were oppreſſed by Tyrants; and to puniſh thoſe that had murdered and baniſhed ſo many of the principal Citizens. Wherefore they required that thoſe worthy men, their Confederates, which were chaſed out of the Town, might be ſuffered to return and enjoy their own; as alſo that the Authors of the great ſlaughter lately committed, might be delivered up. Hereto Epicides briefly anſwered, that if their errand had been to him, he could have told what to ſay to them: but ſince it was directed unto others, they ſhould do well to return, when thoſe to whom they were ſent, had the government in their hands. As for the War which they threatned, he told them, they ſhould find by experience, That to beſiege Syracuſe was another manner of work, than to take Leontium. Thus he ſent them gone; and returned back into the City. Immediately began the ſiege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quick and eaſie winning of Leontium, did put Marcellus in hope, that ſo long a circuit of walls as compaſſed Syracuſe, being manned with no beter kind of Souldiers, than thoſe with whom he had lately dealt, would in ſome part or other, be taken at the firſt aſſault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terrour in the very beginning; but did his beſt both by Land and Sea. Nevertheleſs all his labour was diſappointed, and his hope of prevailing by open force, taken from him by the ill ſucceſs of two or three of the firſt aſſaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defendants, or any ſtrength of the City, that bred ſuch deſpair of haſty victory. But there lived at that time in Syracuſe Archimedes the noble Mathematician: who at the requeſt of Hiero, the late King, that was his kinſman, had framed ſuch engines of war, as being in this extremity put in uſe, did more miſchief to the Romans than could have been wrought by the Cannon, or any inſtruments of Gunpowder; had they in that age been known. This Archimedes diſcourſing once with Hiero, maintained that it were poſſible to remove the whole earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were ſome other earth, or place of ſure footing, whereon a man might ſtand. For proof of this bold aſſertion, he performed ſome ſtrange works; which made the King entreat him to convert his ſtudy unto things of uſe, that might preſerve the City from danger of enemies. To ſuch Mechanical works, Archimedes, and the Philoſophers of thoſe times, had little affection. They held it an injury done unto the liberal ſciences, to ſubmit learned Propoſitions, unto the workmanſhip, and gain of baſe handy-crafts men. And of this opinion Plato was an Authour: who greatly blamed ſome Geometricians, that ſeemed unto him to prophane their ſcience, by making it vulgar. Neither muſt we raſhly tax a man ſo wiſe as Plato, with the imputation of ſupercilious auſterity, or affected ſingularity in his reprehenſion. For it hath been the unhappy fate of great inventions to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreams, before they were publiſhed: and being once made known, to be undervalued; as falling within compaſs of the meaneſt wit; and things that every one could well have performed. Hereof (to omit that memorable example of Columbus his diſcovery, with the much different ſorts of neglect, which he underwent before and after it) in a familiar and moſt homely example we may ſee moſt apparent proof. He that looks upon our Engliſh Brewers, and their ſervants, that are daily excerciſed in the trade; will think it ridiculous to hear one ſay, that the making of Malt was an invention, proceeding from ſome of an extraordinary knowledge in natural Philoſophy. Yet is not the skill of the inventors any whit the leſs, for that the labour of workmanſhip grows to be the trade of ignorant men. The like may be ſaid of many handy-crafts: and particularly in the Printing of Books; which being deviſed and bettered by great ſcholars and wiſe men, grew afterward corrupted by thoſe, to whom the practice fell; that is, by ſuch as could ſlubber things eaſily over, and feed their workmen at the cheapeſt rate. In this reſpect therefore, the Alchymiſts, and all others that have, or would ſeem to have any ſecret skill, whereof the publication might do good unto mankind; are not without excuſe of their cloſe concealing. For it is a kind of injuſtice, that the long travels of an underſtanding brain, beſide the loſs of time, and other expence, ſhould be caſt away upon men of no worth; yield leſs benefit unto the Author of a great work, than to meer ſtrangers; and perhaps his enemies. And ſurely, if the paſſion of Envy have in it any thing allowable and natural, as having Anger, Fear, and other like affections: it is in ſome ſuch caſe as this; and ſerveth againſt thoſe, which would uſurp the knowledge, wherewith God hath denied to indue them. Nevertheleſs, if we have regard unto common charity, and the great affection that every one ought to bear unto the generality of mankind, after the example of him that ſuffereth his Sun to ſhine upon juſt, and unjuſt: it will appear more commendable, in wiſe men, to enlarge themſelves and publiſh unto the world, thoſe good things that lay buried in their own boſoms. This ought ſpecially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not annexed to it ſome dangerous cunning, that may be perverted by evil men to a miſchievous uſe. For if the ſecret of any rare Antidote, contained in it the skill of giving ſome deadly and irrecoverable poiſon: much better it were, that ſuch a Jewel remain cloſe in the hands of a wiſe and honeſt man, than being made common, bind all men to uſe the remedy, by teaching the worſt men how to do miſchief. But the works which Archimedes publiſhed, were ſuch as tended unto very commendable ends. They were Engines, ſerving unto the defence of Syracuſe; not fit for the Syracuſians to carry abroad, to the hurt and oppreſſion of others. Neither did he altogether publiſh the knowledge, how to uſe them, but reſerved ſo much to his own direction; that after his death more of the ſame kind were not made, nor thoſe of his own making were imployed by the Romans. It ſufficed unto this worthy man, that he had approved unto the vulgar, the dignity of his ſcience; and done eſpecial benefit to his Country. For to enrich a Mechaniclal trade, or teach the Art of murdering men, it was beſides his purpoſe.

Marcellus had cauſed certain of his Quinquereme Gallies to be faſtened together, and Towers erected on them to beat the defendants from the wall. Againſt theſe Archimedes had ſundry devices; of which any one ſort might have repelled the aſſailants: but all of them together ſhewed the multiplicity of his great wit. He ſhot heavy ſtones, and long pieces of timber, like unto the yards of ſhips; which brake ſome of the Gallies by their force and weight.

weight. These afflicted such as lay far off. They that were come nearer the walls, lay open to a continual volly of shot, which they could not endure. Some with an Iron grapple were taken by the prow, and hoysted up, shaking out all the men, and afterwards falling down into the water. Some by strange Engines were lifted up into the Air, where turning round a while, they were broken against the walls or cast upon the rocks: and all them were so beaten, that they durst never come again to any second assault. In the like sort was the Land-Army handled. Stones and timber, falling upon it like hail, did not only over-whelm the men, but brake down the Roman Engines of battery; and forced Marcellus to give over the assault. For the remedy hereof it was conceived, that if the Romans could early before day get near unto the walls, they should be (as it were) under the point-blank, and receive no hurt by these terrible Instruments; which were woond up hard to shoot a great compass. But this vain hope cost many of the assailants lives: For the shot came down right upon them; and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great slaughter of them, all the way as they fled (for they were unable to tarry by it) even till they were gotten very far off. This did so terrifie the Romans, that if they perceived any piece of timber, or a ropes end, upon the wall, they ran away, crying out, That Archimedes his Engines were ready to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to overcome these difficulties, or to take away from his men, that fear, against the cause whereof he knew no remedy. If the Engines had stood upon the walls, subject to firing, or any such annoyance from without; he might have holpen it by some device, to make them unserviceable. But all, or the most of them were out of sight, being erected in the streets behind the walls; where Archimedes gave directions how to use them. Wherefore the Roman had no other way left, than to cut off from the Town all provision of victuals, both by Land and Sea.

This was a very desperate piece of work. For the enemies having so goodly an Haven; the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthaginians that were strong by Sea, willing to supply them: were not likely so soon to be consumed with famine, as the besiegers to be wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before so strong a City, having no probability to carry it. Yet, for want of better counsel to follow, this was thought the best, and most honourable course.

In the mean while, Himilco, Admiral of a Carthaginian Fleet, that had waited long about Sicily, being by Hippocrates advertised of these passages, went home to Carthage, and there so dealt with the Senate, that five and twenty thousand Foot, three thousand Horses and twelve Elephants, were committed unto his charge, wherewith to make war upon the Romans in Sicily by Land. He took many Towns; and many that had anciently belonged unto the Carthaginians did yield unto him. To remedy this mischief and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, began to turn unto the Carthaginians; Marcellus with a great part of his Army, rose from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Island. He took Pelorus and Herbesus, which yieled unto him. He took also Megara by force, and sackt it: either to terrifie others that were obstinate, especially the Syracusians, or else because Rome was at this time poor, and his Army must have somewhat to keep it in heart. His special desire was to have saved Agrigentum: whither he came too late; for Himilco had gotten it before. Therefore he returned back toward Syracuse; carefully, and in as good order as he could, for fear of the Carthaginian that was too strong for him. The circumspection that he used, in regard of Himilco, stood him in good stead against a danger that he had not mistrusted. For Hippocrates, leaving the charge of Syracuse unto his brother, had lately issued out of the City, with ten thousand foot, and five hundred horse, intending to joyn his forces with Himilco. Marcellus fell upon him, ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans being in good order, got an easie victory against the dispersed and half unarmed Syracusians. The reputation hereof helped a little to keep the Sicilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himilco, joyning with Hippocrates, ran over all the Island at his pleasure, and presented battel to Marcellus even at his Trenches; but the Roman wisely refused it. Bomilcar also a Carthaginian, entred with a great fleet into the Haven of Syracuse, and victualled the City. After this, the disposition of the Islanders changed so again, that although another Legion was come from Rome, which escaped from Himilco, and safely arrived at Marcellus his Camp: yet many places revolted unto the Carthaginians, and slew or betrayed the Roman Garrisons.

In the midst of these troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath a while: and Marcellus, leaving some of his Army before Syracuse, that he might not seem to have given over the siege, went unto Leontium, where he lay intentive to all occasions. In the beginning of the Spring he stood in doubt, whether it were better to continue the laborious work of besieging Syracuse, or to turn all his forces to Agrigentum, against Himilco and Hippocrates. But it would greatly have impaired his reputation, if he had gone from Syracuse, as unable to prevail; and he himself was of an eager disposition, ever unwilling to give ground, or to quit, as not feasible, an enterprise that he had once taken in hand. He came therefore to Syracuse: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before; and no likelihood to take the City by force or famine; yet was he not without hope, that the continuance of time would bring forth somewhat, which might fulfil his desire. Especially he assayed to prevail by treason, against which no place can hold out. And to this end he dealt with the Syracusian Gentlemen that were in his Camp; exhorting them to practice with their friends that remained in the City. This was not easie for them to do, because the Town would hearken to no parlee. At length a slave unto one of these banished men, making shew to run away from his Master, got into Syracuse; where he talked in private with some few, as he had been instructed. Thus began Marcellus to have intelligence within the City: whence the Conspirators used to send him advertisement of their proceedings, by a fisher-boat that passed forth in the night: but when they were grown to the number of fourscore, and thought themselves able to effect somewhat of importance, all was discovered; and they like Traitors put to death. In the mean while, one Damasippus a Lacedæmonian, that had been sent out of the Town as an Embassadour to Philip King of Macedon, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicides was very desirous to ransome him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpose, not far from the walls. There, one of the Romans looking upon the wall, and wanting the more compendious Art of Geometry, fell to numbering the stones; and making an estimate of the height, judged it leſs than it had been formerly deemed. Herewith he acquainted Marcellus: who cauſing better notice to be taken of the place; and finding that ladders of no extraordinary length would reach it, made all things ready, and waited a convenient time. It was the weakeſt part of the Town, and therefore the moſt ſtrongly guarded: neither was there hope to prevail by force againſt Archimedes, if they failed to take it by ſurprile. But a fugitive out of the Town brought word, that a great feaſt was to be held unto Diana, which was to laſt three daies: and that, becauſe other good chear was not ſo plentiful within the City, as in former times, Epicides, to gratifie the people, had made the more large diſtribution of wine. A better opportunity could not be wiſhed. Wherefore Marcellus in the dead of the Feſtival night, came unto the walls, which he took by Scalado. Syracuſe was divided into four parts (or five, if Epipole were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as diſtinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten ſome pieces, he had the commodity of a better and ſafe lodging, with good ſtore of booty; and better opportunity than before, to deal with the reſt. For there were now a great many as well of thoſe in Acradinia and the Iſland, inner parts of the Town, as of thoſe that were already in the hands of Marcellus, that began to hearken unto compoſition, as being much terrified by the loſs of thoſe parts, which the Romans had taken and ſackt. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harm, or none they did, unto thoſe that were ſheltred under ſtrong houſes: although it may ſeem, that the inner walls were not altogether unfurniſhed of his help; ſince they held out a good while, and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitives and Renegadoes, were more careful than ever to defend the reſt of the City: being ſure to be rewarded with cruel death, if Marcellus could prevail. Hippocrates and Himilco, were daily expected; and Bomilcar was ſent away to Carthage, to bring help from thence. It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himilco came: who fell upon the old Camp of the Romans, whilſt Epicides ſallied out of Acradinia upon Marcellus. But the Romans made ſuch defence in each part, that the Aſſailants were repelled. Nevertheleſs they continued to beſet Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as ſtraightly beſieged, as he himſelf did beſiege the Town. But the peſtilence at length conſumed, together with the two Captains, a great part of the Army, and cauſed the reſt to diſlodge. The Romans were (though ſomewhat leſs) afflicted with the ſame peſtilence, inſomuch that Bomilcar did put the City of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great forces were ſent thither. This Bomilcar wanted no deſire to do his Country ſervice: but his courage was not anſwerable to his good will. He arrived at Pachinus with a ſtrong fleet: where he ſtayed; being loth to double the Cape; for that the winds did better ſerve the enemy than him. Thither ſailed Epicides out of Syracuſe: to acquaint him with the neceſſities of the City; and to draw him on. With much intreaty, at length he came forward: but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was ready for him, he ſtood off into the deep; and ſailed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicily farewell. Then durſt not Epicides return into Syracuſe, but went to Agrigentum: where he expected the iſſue; with a very faint hope of hearing any good news.

The Sicilian Souldiers that remained alive of Hippocrates his Army, lay as near as they could ſafely, unto Marcellus, and ſome of them, in a ſtrong Town three miles off. Theſe had done what good they could to Syracuſe, by doing what hurt they could unto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the State of Sicily was given as deſperate by the Carthaginians: they ſent Embaſſadours to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themſelves, and for the Town. Hereunto Marcellus willingly gave ear: for he had ſtayed there long enough; and had cauſe to fear, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither ſtrong again. He therefore agreed both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers that lay abroad; that they ſhould be Maſters of their own, enjoying their liberty and proper laws; yet ſuffering the Romans to poſſeſs whatſoever had belonged unto the Kings. Hereupon they, to whom Epicides had left his charge, were put to death, new Prætors choſen; and the gates even ready to be opened unto Marcellus: when ſuddenly the Roman fugitives diſturbed all. Theſe perceiving their own condition to be deſperate, perſwaded the other Mercenary Souldiers, That the Citizens had bargained only for themſelves, and betrayed the Army to the Romans. Wherefore they preſently took Arms, and fell upon the new choſen Prætors; whom they ſlew, and made election of ſix Captains that ſhould command over all. But ſhortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the Souldiers; excepting only the fugitives. The Treaty was therefore again ſet on foot, and wanted little of concluſion: which yet was delayed; either by ſome fear of the Citizens, that had ſeen (as they thought) proof of the Roman avarice in the ſack of Epipolæ Tyche, and Neapolis, the parts already taken; or by ſome deſire of Marcellus to get the Town by force, that he might uſe the liberty of a Conqueror, and make it wholly ſubject to Rome. Mericus a Spaniard was one of the ſix Captains that had been choſen in the laſt commotion: a man of ſuch faith, as uſually is found in Mercenaries; holding his own particular benefit above all other reſpects. With this Captain, Marcellus dealt ſecretly: having a fit inſtrument, of the ſame Nation, one Belligenes, that went in company with the Roman Embaſſadors, daily paſſing to and fro. This craſty Agent perſwaded Mericus, That the Romans had already gotten all Spain: and that if ever he purpoſed to make his own fortune good, either at home in Spain, or any where elſe, it was now the only time to do it; by conforming himſelf to the will of the Roman General. By ſuch hopes the Spaniſh Captain was eaſily won, and ſent forth his own brother among the Syracuſian Embaſſadors to ratifie the covenant with Marcellus.

This under-hand dealing of Marcellus againſt the Syracuſians, cannot well be commended as honeſt: neither was it afterwards throughly approved at his coming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had been ſuch, as deſerved not to be requited with the ruine of his Country: much leſs, that the miſeries of his people, oppreſſed (though partly through their own folly) by an Army of Mercenaries, ſhould miniſter unto the people of Rome advantage againſt them. The poor Citizens could not make good their parts againſt the hired Souldiers; and therefore were fain to yield unto the time, and obey thoſe Miniſters of Hannibal, that ruled the Army. But as long as they were free after the death of Hieronymus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicides: it had been their chief care to maintain amity with the people of Rome. They had lately ſlain many of the principal of Epicides his followers; and many of themſelves had alſo been ſlain, both lately and in former times, becauſe of this their deſire unto peace. What though it were true, that the Raſcality, and ſome ill adviſed perſons joyned with the Souldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occasion of the slaughter which they heard to be done at Leontium, and afterward beheld in those parts of their own City which was taken? Ought therefore the Roman General, in a treaty of peace held with the Syracusians, to make a bargain underhand against them, with a Captain of the Mercenaries? These things were objected against Marcellus, at his return home: but the Senators thought it a great de better, to comfort the Syracusians with gentle words, and promise of good usage in time to come; than to restore the booty, and give over the Dominion of a City, so great, wealthy, strong, and many waies important. Nevertheless if we consider the many inconveniencies and great mischiefs whereunto Syracuse was obnoxious; both by evil neighbours, and by that very form of policy, after which it was governed; we may truly affirm, that it received no small benefit, by becoming subject unto Rome. For thereby it was not only assured against all forreign enemies, domestical conspiracies, and such Tyrants as of old had reigned therein: but freed from the necessity of banishing, or murdering, the most worthy Citizens; as also from all factions, intestine seditions, and a housand the like miseries, that were wont to grow out of the jealousie, wherein they held their liberty in vain. Neither enjoyed that City, from her first foundation, any such long time of happiness, as that wherein it flourished, when it rested secure under the protection of Rome; and was no more molested, by the disease of ambition; whereof by Marcellus his victory it was throughly cured. But such benefit, arising from wrongs done, serves not to make injustice the more excusable: unless we should approve the answer of that thief, who being found to have stollen a silver cup from a sick man said, He never leaves drinking.

By the reason of Marcius, the Roman Army was let into possession of all Syracuse: wherein the booty that it found, was said to have been no less, than could be hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it self, that maintained war by Land and Sea against them. All the goodly works and Imageries, wherewith Syracuse was marvellously adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left untouched, save only the houses of those banished men, that had escaped from Hippocrates and Epicides, into the Roman Camp. Among other pitiful accidents; the death of Archimedes was greatly lamented, even by Marcellus himself. He was so busie about his Geometry, in drawing figures, that he hearkened not to the noise, and uproar in the City; no, nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him. Marcellus took heavily the death of him; and caused his body to be honourably buried. Upon his Tomb (as he had ordained in his life-time) was placed a Cylinder and a Sphere, with an inscription of the proportion between them; which he first found out. An invention of so little use, as this may seem, pleased that great Artist beter, than the devising of all those Engines, that made him so famous. Such difference is in the judgement of learned men, and of the vulgar sort. For many an one would think the money lost, that had been spent upon a Son, whose studies in the University had brought forth such fruit, as the proportion between a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuse, all the Towns in Sicily yielded unto the Romans, except Agrigentum and a few places thereabout. At Agrigentum lay Epicides with one Hanno a Carthaginian, and Mutines an African, that was lately sent from Hannibal. This Mutines by many good pieces of service, had added some credit to the beaten Carthaginian side; and withal made his own name great. By his perswasions, Hanno and Epicides adventured to meet Marcellus without the Town, and not behave themselves as men expecting to be besieged. Neither was he more valiant in counsel, than in execution. Once and again he set upon the Romans, where they lay encamped, and drove them fearfully into their Trenches. This bred envy in Epicides and Hanno; especially in Hanno, that having been lately sent from Carthage, with commission and authority from the State, thought himself wronged greatly by Hannibal; in that he had sent unto him this Mutines, to be his companion, and to take upon him like as good a man as himself. The indignity seemed the greater, when Mutines being to step aside into Heraclea, for the pacifying some troubles there among the Numidians; advised (as directing Hanno and Epicides not to meddle with the enemy, until his return. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight; and offered battel unto Marcellus, before he sought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Army was left behind in Syracuse, as need required; which made the Carthaginians the better able to deal with those that came against them. But whatsoever disproportion was between the two Armies; far greater were the odds between the Captains. For howsoever the people of Carthage would give authority by favor; yet could they not give worth and ability, in matter of war. The Numidians, having before conceived some displeasure against their Captains; and being therefore some of them gone away to Heraclea, were much more offended, when they saw that the vainglorious envy of Hanno carried him unto the fight, upon a foolish desire to get victory, without the help of Mutines their Country-man. Wherefore they sent unto the Roman General, and bade him be confident; for that it was not their purpose to shew themselves his enemies that day, but only look on, and see the proud Carthaginians well beaten by whom they had been misused. They made good their promise, and had their desire. For Marcellus, finding likelihood of truth in their message, did so lustily set upon the enemies, that he brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousands, drove them back into Agrigentum.

If Hanno could have been contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of War than himself, and not to have hazarded a battel without need; the Romans would shortly have been reduced into terms of great difficulty in their Sicilian War. For Marcellus was shortly after to leave the Province & soon upon his departure, there landed in the Island a supply of 8000 foot, and 3000 Numidian horse that were sent from Carthage. The fame of this new Army drew many of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Army consisting (for the most part) of the Legions of Cannæ, took it very hainously, that no good service done, could bring them into the favour of the Senate; but that, as banished men, they were sent far from home, and not suffered to return back to Rome with their General. Mutines had pacified his country-men the Numidians, and like an honest man, did what he could for those whom he served, without contending against the foolish pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might have been, if the Army lately overthrown had been entire. M. Cornelius the Roman Prætor, used all diligence, both to pacifie his own men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. He recovered those inland towns that had rebelled: and though he could not hinder Mutines from over-running all the Country; yet he hindered the Country from revolting unto Mutines. Above threescore Towns, great and small, the Carthaginians held in Sicily: of which Agrigentum was the principal, and far bigger than any of the rest. Thence issued Mutines as often as he pleased, in despight of the Romans: not only to the succour of his own adherents, but to the great waste of those that followed the contrary part. But Hanno, instead of being pleased with all these good services, was filled more and more with envy, against the man that performed them. He had (belike) received instruction from old Hanno at Carthage, not to suffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to have a share in the honour of these Sicilian Wars: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied; whilst Italy was neglected, that should have been regarded more than all the rest. Wherefore to shew his authority, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint unto him an Assistant, or Director: He took away from Mutines his charge, and gave it to his own Son; thinking thereby to discountenance the man, and make him little esteemed, as one out of Office, among the Numidians. But it fell out quite contrary: and this spightful dealing occasioned the loss of whatsoever the Carthaginians held in Sicily. For the Numidians were so incensed by the indignity offered unto their Country-man, being such a brave Commander, that they offered him their service to requite the wrong; and were thenceforth absolutely at his own disposition. M. Valerius Lævinus, the Roman Consul, was newly come unto the Province, when this fell out: and with him did Mutines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brook these indignities; but being neither a Carthaginian, nor favoured by those that bore all the sway in Carthage, he thought it the wisest way, to play the best of his own game, and forsake that City, which was likely to perish by the evil counsel that governed it. He did not therefore, as his Country-men had lately done, content himself to see his Adversaries reap the bitter fruits of his own malicious overweening, and to suffer that harm, in doing whereof he would not bear a part; but conspired against them to deliver up Agrigentum, and to help to expel them utterly out of Sicily. The Consul was glad of his friendship; and carefully followed his advertisements. Neither was there much cunning needful, to the performance of that which Mutines had undertaken: For he with his Numidians did forcibly seize upon a gate; whereat they let in some Roman Companies, that lay near in a readiness for the purpose. Hanno, when first he heard the noise, thought it had been no worse matter, than some such tumult of the Numidians, as he had been well acquainted with of late. But when making haste to pacifie the trouble, he saw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among those discontented followers of Mutines, forthwith he betook himself to flight: and saving himself, with Epicides, in a small Bark, set sail for Africk; leaving all his Army and adherents in Sicily, to the mercy of the Romans, that henceforward continued Masters of the whole Island.

Lævinus the Consul having taken Agrigentum, did sharp execution of justice upon all the Citizens. The principal of them he scourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans: all the rest of them he sold for slaves, and confiscated their goods; sending home to Rome the mony that was raised of the booty. This was indeed a time wherein Rome stood in no less necessity of gold than of steel: which may have been the reason, why Lævinus dealt so cruelly with the Agrigentines. Nevertheless, the fame of such severity bred a terror among all the Dependants of the Carthaginians, so that in great haste they sought to make their peace. About forty Towns yielded themselves quickly unto the Romans; twenty were delivered up by Treason; and six only stayed to be won by force. These things done, Lævinus returned home to Rome; carrying with him about four thousand men from Agatirna, that were a company of outlaws, bankrupts, and banished men, accustomed to live by spoil of others in these troublesome times. He bestowed them about Rhegium in Italy, where they might exercise their own occupation against the Brutians; a thievish kind of people, that were enemies unto those of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Mutines, he was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where he lived in good accompt; accompanying the two Scipio's in their journey against Antiochus, and therein doing (as is said) very especial service. So by this enterprise of Sicily, the Carthaginians wasted much of their forces, that with greater profit might have been employed in Italy: leaving yet unto the Romans, in the end of this war, the entire possession of this Island; which they wanted when it began.

SECT. XVI.

How the War passed between the Romans and Hannibal in Italy, from the taking of Capua to the great victory of Metaurus.

SHortly after the winning of Capua, Marcellus came to Rome: where for his good services done in the Island of Sicily, he had granted unto him the honour of the lesser Triumph, which was called Ovation. The greater Triumph was denyed him: because he had not finished the war, but was fain to leave his Army behind him in the Province. He stayed not long in Rome, before he was again chosen Consul together with M. Valerius Lævinus, who succeeded him in the Government of Sicily, and was, at the time of his election, making war against King Philip in Greece. Great Complaint was made against the Consul Marcellus, by the Syracusians, for that which he had done unto them; they alledging their great friendship to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their City did never willingly break the alliance; excepting when it was oppressed by such Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Rome, than to all good men that lived in Syracuse. The Consul, on the other side, reckoned the labours and dangers whereunto they had put him; willing them to bemoan themselves to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their necessity; and not unto the Romans, whom they had kept out. Thus each part having some good matter to alledge, the Senate made such an end of the controversie, as best agreed with the benefit of their own Common-wealth, blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not restoring the booty that he had taken, nor making the Syracusians free from their subjection, but comforting them with gentle words, and hopeful promises, as hath been shewed before. The two new Consuls Marcellus and Lævinus, were appointed to make war, as their lots should fall out; the one in Italy, the other in Sicily. The Isle of Sicily fell unto Marcellus; which Province he willingly changed with his Collegue; to the end that the Syracusians (whose cause had not as yet been heard in the Senate) might not seem hindred by fear, from uttering their grievances freely. Afterwards, when his business with them was dispatcht, he gently undertook the the patronage of them: which remained long in his Family, to the great benefit of their Country in times following. So Valerius, the other Conſul, was ſent into Sicily, whoſe doings there have been already rehearſed: but Marcellus was employed againſt Hannibal.

Before the Conſuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with preſſing of Souldiers to the war, and moſt of all, with getting Mariners for their Navy. They were all of the poorer ſort, that uſed to be employd in Sea-ſervices, eſpecially in rowing. Theſe could not live without preſent wages: neither was there mony enough in the Treaſury to give them pay. Wherefore it was ordained, that they ſhould be ſet out at the expence of private men; who in this neceſſity of the State, were driven to ſuſtain all publick charges. Hereat the people murmured, and were ready to fall into ſedition; had not the Conſuls deferred the matter unto further conſideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or do, in a caſe of ſuch extremity. For manifeſt it was, that the multitude had already indured ſo much, as well it could undergo; and ſomewhat more than could with honeſty have been impoſed upon it. Nevertheleſs it was impoſſible to maintain the war againſt the Carthaginians; or to keep the Macedonian out of Italy without a ſtrong fleet. Wherefore, ſome were of opinion; That ſince the common Treaſure was ſo empty, the people muſt be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden upon them. At laſt the Conſuls began to ſay, That no perſwaſions would be ſo effectual with the people, as good examples: and that if the Senators would follow the Conſuls, like it was that the people alſo would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, that every one of them ſhould bring forth, and put into the Treaſury, all the mony that he had; and that no Senator ſhould keep any veſſel of gold, or plate whatſoever; excepting one Salt-ſeller, and a Bowl wherewith to make their offering unto the gods; as alſo a Ring for himſelf, with ſuch other tokens of ingenuity for his wife and children, as every one did uſe, and thoſe of as ſmall value as might be. This advice of the Conſuls was not more thankfully accepted by the Senate, than the ready performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded, and haſtily followed by the Gentlemen of Rome. Neither did the Commonalty refuſe to do that, which their betters had openly done before them. For ſince the publick neceſſity could no otherwiſe be holpen; every one was contented, that his private eſtate ſhould run the ſame fortune with the Commonwealth, which if it ſuffered wrack, in vain could any particular man hope to enjoy the benefit of his proper ſubſtance. This magnanimity deſerved well that greatneſs of Empire, whereof it was the foundation.

Convenient order being thus taken for an Army and Fleet: Marcellus went forth of the City againſt Hannibal; and Lævinus toward Sicily. The Army of Hannibal was greatly diminiſhed, by long and hard ſervice: neither did his Carthaginians ſeem to remember him, and think upon ſending the promiſed ſupply, or any ſuch proportion as he needed. His credit alſo among his Italian friends, was much weakned, by the loſs of Capua: which gave them cauſe to look unto themſelves; as if in his help there were little truſt to be repoſed, when they ſhould ſtand in need. This he well perceived; yet could not tell how to remedy. Either he muſt thruſt Garriſons into all the Towns he ſuſpected, and thereby ſo diminiſh his Army, that he ſhould not be able to keep the field; or elſe he muſt leave them to their own fidelity, which now began to waver. At length his jealouſie grew ſo outragious, that he ſacked and waſted thoſe places that he was unable to defend: thinking that the beſt way to enrich himſelf; and make unprofitable to his enemies, the purchaſe from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him: and ſome of thoſe, whom before he had leaſt cauſe to doubt. The Town of Salapia yielded unto Marcellus, and betrayed unto him a gallant Regiment of Numidian horſe, the beſt of all that ſerved under Hannibal; which was a greater loſs, than the Town it ſelf. Blaſius the author of this rebellion, could not bring his deſire to effect, without getting the conſent of one Daſius, that was his bitter enemy. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Daſius in private, and was by him accuſed unto Hannibal. But when he was convented and charged of Treaſon, he ſo ſtourly denyed it, and by way of recrimination, ſo vehemently preſſed his accuſer with the ſame fault: that Hannibal thought it a matter deviſed out of meer malice; knowing well what enemies they were; and ſeeing that neither of them could bring any proof of what he affirmed. This notwithſtanding, Blaſius did not ceaſe to preſs his adverſary anew, and urge him from time to time, with ſuch lively reaſon; that he who could not be believed by Hannibal, was contented at length to win the favour of Marcellus. Preſently after this, the Conſul took by force, Maronæa and Meles, Towns of the Samnites; wherein he ſlew above 3000 of Hannibal his men.

Hannibal could not look to all at once; but was fain to catch advantages, where he might get them; the Romans now being grown ſtronger in the field than he. The beſt was, that his Carthaginians, having wearied themſelves with ill ſpeed in many petty enterpriſes, and laid aſide all this while the care of Italy, to follow buſineſs of far leſs importance; had now at length reſolved, to ſend preſently the great ſupply, that had been ſo long promiſed and expected. This, if they had done in better ſeaſon; Rome it ſelf might have been ſtrucken down, the next year after that great blow received at Cannæ. But ſince that which is paſt cannot be amended; Hannibal muſt force himſelf to make a good countenance; and tell his followers, that this mighty ſuccour would come time enough. For Maſaniſſa was at Carthage with 5000 Numidians, ready to ſet ſail for Spain; whither, when he came, it was appointed that Aſdrubal ſhould forthwith take his journey into Italy, of which there had been ſo much talk. Theſe news did not more comfort Hannibal and his followers, than terrifie the Romans. Wherefore each did their beſt; the Romans, to prevent the threatning miſchief, and win as much as they could upon Hannibal, before the coming of his Brother; Hannibal, on the contrary, to hold his own; and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, that Cn. Fulvius, a Roman Prætor, lay near unto Herdonea, to get the Town by practice. It was not long ſince, near unto the ſame place, another Cn. Fulvius had loſt his Army. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherward; and came to Herdonea ere Fulvius heard news of his approach. As ſoon as he came, he offered battel to the Roman Prætor; who accepted it with more haſte than good ſpeed. The Roman Legions made good reſiſtance a while, till they were compaſſed round with the Carthaginian horſe. Then fell they to rout, and great ſlaughter was made of them. Fulvius himſelf, with 12 Tribunes or Colonels, were loſt: of the common Souldiers, that were ſlain, the number is uncertain; ſome reporting ſeven, others thirteen thouſand.

The

The Town of Herdonea, becauſe it was at point to have yielded unto Fulvius, Hannibal did ſet on fire: and putting thoſe to death that had practiſed with the Enemy, carried away the multitude; whom he beſtowed among the Thurians and Metapontines. The Conſul Marcellus hearing of this, wrote unto the Senate: and exhorted them to be of good chear; for that he would ſhortly abate the enemies pride. He followed the Carthaginian apace; and overtaking him at Numiſtro in the Country of the Lucans, fought with him a battel: which beginning at nine of the clock in the morning, laſted until night, and ended, by reaſon of the darkneſs, with uncertain victory. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia, whither Marcellus followed him. At Venuſia they met, and had many skirmiſhes; but none of importance. Hannibal removed often; and ſought to bring the enemy within danger of ſome ambuſh. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battel, would yet adventure nothing, but by open day-light, and upon fair ground.

Thus paſſed the time away, until Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fulvius, he that lately had taken Capua, were choſen Conſuls. Fabius conſidering how much the Roman affairs were bettered by the taking of Capua, purpoſed that year to beſiege Tarentum; which if he could win, like it was, that ſcarce one good City would afterwards remain true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Colleague, and Marcellus (to whom was continued the command of thoſe Legions that ſerved under him the year before) to preſs the Carthaginian ſo hard, as he might have no leiſure to help Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for he thought no Roman fitter than himſelf, to deal with Hannibal in open field. He followed him therefore to Cannuſium, and thence from place to place: deſiring ever to come to battel, put upon equal terms. The Carthaginian had not mind to hazard much in fight: but thought it enough to entertain his enemy with skirmiſh; as being deſirous to keep his Army ſtrong until the coming of Aſdrubal. Yet could he not avoid the importunity of Marcellus, nor brook the indignity of being daily braved. He therefore bade his men to be luſty, and to beat ſoundly this hot-ſpirited Roman Captain, that would never ſuffer them to be at quiet; until they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him blood. Hereupon followed a battel; wherein Hannibal had the victory; took ſix Enſigns; and ſlew of the Romans almoſt 3000, among which were ſome of mark. Marcellus was ſo impatient of his diſhonour, that he rated his men, as Peſants, and baſe cowards: telling them, that they were the firſt of the Roman Legions, which had been beaten by Hannibal, by plain force and manhood, without being circumvented by any ſtratagem. With theſe and many other the like words, which they were aſhamed to hear, he did ſo vex them; that thinking themſelves better able to endure any violence of the enemy, than ſuch diſpleaſure of their General; they beſought him to pardon them, and lead them forth once again to fight. He did ſo: and placing thoſe Companies formoſt, that had loſt their Enſigns the day before, bade them be careful to win a victory; whereof the news might be at Rome, before the report of their ſhameful overthrow. Hannibal was angry, to ſee that nothing could make this Enemy quiet: and therefore was ready to fight again; ſince all other motives continued the ſame, and his men had been heartned by the late victory. But the Romans were ſtirred up with deſire of revenge, and of repairing their honour loſt, which affections gave a ſharp edge unto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were grown dull, and weary by ſeeing themſelves diſappointed of their hope; and the enemy, notwithſtanding their late victory, as ready to moleſt them as before. In this ſecond battel Marcellus got the victory: which he purchaſed at ſo dear a rate; that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cauſe to vaunt, the ſecond night. For if 8000 of the Carthaginians were ſlain, and 3000 of the Roman ſide, in this next battel, the difference was no greater, than even to recompence the late received overthrow: eſpecially ſince the number of the Romans that were wounded, was ſo great, as diſabled Marcellus from purſuing Hannibal; who diſlodged by night. Nevertheleſs it ſufficed, that Fabius the Conſul hereby got leiſure, to follow his buſineſs at Tarentum without any diſturbance. Q. Fulvius the other Conſul about the ſame time, took in many of the Hirpines, Lucans, and Volcentes, that willingly yielded themſelves, and betrayed the Garriſons of Hannibal that lay in their Towns; whom Fulvius entertained in loving ſort; gently rebuking them for their errours paſt, without puniſhing thoſe that had been authors, or buſie doers in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian thieves, which Lævinus had lately brought from Agaterna, was then alſo ſet on work to beſiege Caulonia, a Town of the Brutians: and nothing was omitted, that might ſerve to divert Hannibal, from the ſuccour of Tarentum.

Q. Fabius the Conſul, having taken Manduria a Town of the Salentines, ſate down before Tarentum: making all preparation that ſeemed needful to carry it either by aſſault or long ſiege. Of the Garriſons in the Town, a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, under a Captain of their own Nation. This Captain fell in love with a Tarentine wench; whoſe brother ſerved under Fabius. Hereof ſhe gave notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman ſide; by telling him how rich, and of what great account her lover was. But her brother made the Conſul acquainted with theſe news: and ſaid, that if the Brutian were far in love, he might perhaps be won, by intreaty of his Miſtriſs, to do what ſhe would have him. The Conſul hearing this, and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his Souldier to convey himſelf into the Town as a fugitive, and try what good might be done. It fell out according to his deſire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captain: and partly by his own perſwaſions, partly by the flattering intreaty of his ſiſter; wan him to betray the Town to the Romans. When they had agreed upon the buſineſs, and reſolved how to order it; the ſame Souldier got out of the Town by night, and acquainted the Conſul with his proceedings: telling him in which part that Brutian kept watch, and what might conveniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gave an alarm to the City; eſpecially about thoſe parts of the wall, which were fartheſt from the place where he meant to enter. The Captains in the Town, prepared to make reſiſtance in thoſe places, where the noiſe did threaten them with greateſt likelihood of danger. But Fabius himſelf with the choice of his men, came in great ſilence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captain, helped the Romans to get up, and break open the next gate, whereat the Army was let in. The Tarentines and Carthaginian Souldiers, made head againſt Fabius in the Market place: but (as happeneth in like caſes, where the main confidence is already taken away) not very obſtinately. Nico, Democrates and Philomenes, with thoſe that before had let in Hannibal, uſed now the laſt of their courage in dying againſt the Romans. Carthalo, who commanded commanded the Garriſon within the Town, offered himſelf priſoner: hoping to be well uſed becauſe of his hoſpitality that had paſſed between his Father and the Conſul. But he was ſlain by the way, ere he could come to Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the ſword, in ſuch ſort, that they ſpared few of the Brutians. This ſlaughter of the Brutian, was thought to have been made by appointment of the Conſul, to the end that he might ſeem to have won the Town by force and not by treaſon: though he thereby failed of his purpoſe; and neither had the glory which he expected, nor preſerved his reputation of faithful dealing, and keeping his word. The booty found in Tarentum was very great: whereof the Roman Treaſury, whither it was carried, had great need. As for the Imageries, and other curioſities that were in the City, Fabius was contented to let them alone: and being told of ſome Idols that ſeemed worthy to be carried away, being very goodly pieces, in ſuch habit and poſiture as if they were fighting: he ſaid, Let us leave unto the Tarentines their angry gods.

Hannibal being gotten clear from Marcellus, fell upon thoſe that beſieged Caulonia. They fled at his coming: but he was ſo near, that they were fain to betake them to a hill, which ſerved to no other purpoſe, than to bear off the firſt brunt. There they defended themſelves a little while, and then they yielded. When this buſineſs was done, he haſted away to relieve Tarentum. But when he came within five miles of the City, he had news that it was loſt. This grieved him: yet he ſaid no more than this, The Romans have alſo their Hannibal; we have loſt Tarentum in ſuch ſort as we got it. That he might not ſeem to turn back amazed, or in any fear of the victorious Conſul; he incamped a few daies together, ſo near as he was unto Tarentum: and thence departing to Metapontum, bethought himſelf how to take Fabius in a trap. He cauſed the chief of the Metapontines to write unto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garriſon; with condition, that he ſhould in that reſpect, forgive them all offences paſt. Theſe letters were ſent by two young men of the ſame City; who did their errand ſo well, that the Conſul wrote back by them unto the Metapontines, and appointed the day, when they ſhould expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leiſure made ready his ambuſhes for the wary Fabius. But whether ſome ſecret notice of the plot were given; or whether indeed (as it is related) ſome tokens in ſacrificing, terrified the ſuperſtitious Roman; the journey to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the ſame two Meſſengers were employed again; but being apprehended, and threatned with torture, they diſcovered all.

This year was happy to the Romans, in all their wars: for they got every where, ſave only at Caulonia; where they had loſt a company of ſuch lewd fellows, that it may ſeem good fortune, to have been ſo rid of them. But their common poverty, and diſability to maintain their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirty Roman Colonies were then in Italy: of which, twelve refuſed to contribute any longer to the Wars. For it was conſidered; that the Legions of Cannæ, and thoſe unhappy Companies that had been beaten under the one and the other Cn. Fulvius, were tranſported into Sicily; where they lived, in a ſort, as baniſhed men. This grieved their friends at home, and made them reckon up the more diligently thoſe other miſeries which they daily felt. Ten years together they had been exhauſted with levies of men, and impoſitions of money: in every of which years they had received ſome notable overthrow. In this caſe the leaſt that they could fear, or rather the beſt that they could hope; was to fall into the hands of the enemy to be made priſoners. For Hannibal did gently ſend home their people that was taken by him: whereas the Romans did baniſh from their homes, thoſe that had eſcaped. It was therefore likely to come to paſs within a while, that they ſhould be all conſumed: ſince new ſouldiers were daily preſſed forth of their Towns; and the old ones never returned. Such talk was frequent among thoſe of the Colonies: eſpecially where they that were tranſported into Sicily, had moſt compaſſionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrium, Alba, and other good Towns, to the number of twelve, That they ſhould boldly deny unto the Romans their farther help. This was thought the likelieſt way to obtain peace: whereof otherwiſe they ſaw little hope, as long as Hannibal lived. When the Conſuls heard the Embaſſadours of theſe Towns make ſuch declaration, and proteſt their diſability of giving any further help; they were much amazed. They willed the Embaſſadours to return home, and bring a better anſwer, foraſmuch as this was none other than treaſon: they bade them to conſider, that the people were not Campans or Tarentines, but the off-ſpring of the Romans; and no leſs partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-City. But all would not ſerve, the Embaſſadours continuing to proteſt, that they had already done what they could, and that they had remaining, neither men, nor money. It was well for the Romans that the other eighteen Colonies did not imitate theſe twelve; but ſhewed themſelves willing to undergo whatſoever ſhould be laid upon them, without ſhrinking under the burden. This their offer was ſo higly pleaſing to the Conſuls; that the Embaſſadours of thoſe faithful Colonies, were brought into the Senate, and produced into the Aſſembly of the people: where, with commemoration of all their former good ſervices, this their preſent love unto the State was magnified, and thanks accordingly beſtowed upon them; with promiſe, that it ſhould not be forgotten. As for the Embaſſadours of thoſe twelve Colonies, that refuſed to contribute; it was thought beſt, neither to detain them in the City, nor yet to diſmiſs them, nor take any notice of them at all; but leave them to their own conſideration of their ill deſerving.

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of theſe twelve people would have wrought in thoſe that were ſo willing to help the State, if Aſdrubal had been then coming into Italy. For then muſt the Romans have betaken themſelves wholly to their own defence; whereas now, to the great comfort of their ſubjects, they employed their forces in the conqueſt of Italy, with hopeful and fortunate ſucceſs. Nevertheleſs, they were fain to open their moſt privy treaſury; and thence take out the gold that had been laid up to ſerve them in caſes of greateſt extremity. Of the mony thus extracted, one quarter was delivered to Fabius the Conſul, to ſet him well out againſt the Tarentines; all the reſt was ſent into Spain to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Army; and to provide that Aſdrubal might not paſs from thence into Italy. It is likely that Fabius did not ſpend all his money; finding ſuch eaſie ſucceſs at Tarentum, as was ſhewed before. But to ſtop the journey of Aſdrubal; neither the mony ſent into Spain, nor any

The Town of Herdonea, becauſe it was at point to have yielded unto Fulvius, Hannibal did ſet on fire: and putting thoſe to death that had practiſed with the Enemy, carried away the multitude; whom he beſtowed among the Thurians and Metapontines. The Conſul Marcellus hearing of this, wrote unto the Senate: and exhorted them to be of good chear; for that he would ſhortly abate the enemies pride. He followed the Carthaginian apace; and overtaking him at Numiſtro in the Country of the Lucans, fought with him a battel: which beginning at nine of the clock in the morning, laſted until night, and ended, by reaſon of the darkneſs, with uncertain victory. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia, whither Marcellus followed him. At Vennſia they met, and had many skirmiſhes; but none of importance. Hannibal removed often; and ſought to bring the enemy within danger of ſome ambuſh. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battel, would yet adventure nothing, but by open day-light, and upon fair ground.

Thus paſſed the time away, until Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fulvius, he that lately had taken Capua, were choſen Conſuls. Fabius conſidering how much the Roman affairs were bettered by the taking of Capua, purpoſed that year to beſiege Tarentum; which if he could win, like it was, that ſcarce one good City would afterwards remain true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Colleague, and Marcellus (to whom was continued the command of thoſe Legions that ſerved under him the year before) to preſs the Carthaginian ſo hard, as he might have no leiſure to help Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for he thought no Roman fitter than himſelf, to deal with Hannibal in open field. He followed him therefore to Cannuſium, and thence from place to place: deſiring ever to come to battel, put upon equal terms. The Carthaginian had not mind to hazard much in fight: but thought it enough to entertain his enemy with skirmiſh; as being deſirous to keep his Army ſtrong until the coming of Aſdrubal. Yet could he not avoid the importunity of Marcellus, nor brook the indignity of being daily braved. He therefore bade his men to be luſty, and to beat ſoundly this hot-ſpirited Roman Captain, that would never ſuffer them to be at quiet; until they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him blood. Hereupon followed a battel; wherein Hannibal had the victory; took ſix Enſigns; and ſlew of the Romans almoſt 3000, among which were ſome of mark. Marcellus was ſo impatient of his diſhonour, that he rated his men, as Peſants, and baſe cowards: telling them, that they were the firſt of the Roman Legions, which had been beaten by Hannibal, by plain force and manhood, without being circumvented by any ſtratagem. With theſe and many other the like words, which they were aſhamed to hear, he did ſo vex them, that thinking themſelves better able to endure any violence of the enemy, than ſuch diſpleaſure of their General; they beſought him to pardon them, and lead them forth once again to fight. He did ſo: and placing thoſe Companies formoſt, that had loſt their Enſigns the day before, bade them be careful to win a victory; whereof the news might be at Rome, before the report of their ſhameful overthrow. Hannibal was angry, to ſee that nothing could make this Enemy quiet: and therefore was ready to fight again; ſince all other motives continued the ſame, and his men had been heartned by the late victory. But the Romans were ſtirred up with deſire of revenge, and of repairing their honour loſt, which affections gave a ſharp edge unto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were grown dull, and weary by ſeeing themſelves diſappointed of their hope; and the enemy, notwithſtanding their late victory, as ready to moleſt them as before. In this ſecond battel Marcellus got the victory: which he purchaſed at ſo dear a rate; that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cauſe to vaunt, the ſecond night. For if 8000 of the Carthaginians were ſlain, and 3000 of the Roman ſide, in this next battel, the difference was no greater, than even to recompence the late received overthrow: eſpecially ſince the number of the Romans that were wounded, was ſo great, as diſabled Marcellus from purſuing Hannibal; who diſlodged by night. Nevertheleſs it ſufficed, that Fabius the Conſul hereby got leiſure, to follow his buſineſs at Tarentum without any diſturbance. Q. Fulvius the other Conſul about the ſame time, took in many of the Hirpines, Lucans, and Volcentes, that willingly yielded themſelves, and betrayed the Garriſons of Hannibal that lay in their Towns; whom Fulvius entertained in loving ſort; gently rebuking them for their errours paſt, without puniſhing thoſe that had been authors, or buſie doers in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian thieves, which Lævinus had lately brought from Agaterna, was then alſo ſet on work to beſiege Caulonia, a Town of the Brutians: and nothing was omitted, that might ſerve to divert Hannibal, from the ſuccour of Tarentum.

Q. Fabius the Conſul, having taken Manduria a Town of the Salentines, ſate down before Tarentum: making all preparation that ſeemed needful to carry it either by aſſault or long ſiege. Of the Garriſons in the Town, a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, under a Captain of their own Nation. This Captain fell in love with a Tarentine wench; whoſe brother ſerved under Fabius. Hereof ſhe gave notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman ſide; by telling him how rich, and of what great account her lover was. But her brother made the Conſul acquainted with theſe news: and ſaid, that if the Brutian were far in love, he might perhaps be won, by intreaty of his Miſtriſs, to do what ſhe would have him. The Conſul hearing this, and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his Souldier to convey himſelf into the Town as a fugitive, and try what good might be done. It fell out according to his deſire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captain: and partly by his own perſwaſions, partly by the flattering intreaty of his ſiſter; wan him to betray the Town to the Romans. When they had agreed upon the buſineſs, and reſolved how to order it; the ſame Souldier got out of the Town by night, and acquainted the Conſul with his proceedings: telling him in which part that Brutian kept watch, and what might conveniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gave an alarm to the City; eſpecially about thoſe parts of the wall, which were fartheſt from the place where he meant to enter. The Captains in the Town, prepared to make reſiſtance in thoſe places, where the noiſe did threaten them with greateſt likelihood of danger. But Fabius himſelf with the choice of his men, came in great ſilence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captain, helped the Romans to get up, and break open the next gate, whereat the Army was let in. The Tarentines and Carthaginian Souldiers, made head againſt Fabius in the Market place: but (as happeneth in like caſes, where the main confidence is already taken away) not very obſtinately. Nico, Democrates and Philomenes, with thoſe that before had let in Hannibal, uſed now the laſt of their courage in dying againſt the Romans. Carthalo, who commanded commanded the Garrison within the Town, offered himself prisoner: hoping to be well used because of his hospitality that had passed between his Father and the Consul. But he was slain by the way, ere he could come to Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the sword, in such sort, that they spared few of the Brutians. This slaughter of the Brutian, was thought to have been made by appointment of the Consul, to the end that he might seem to have won the Town by force and not by treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glory which he expected, nor preserved his reputation of faithful dealing, and keeping his word. Hannibal being gotten clear from Marcellus, fell upon those that besieged Caulonia. They fled at his coming: but he was so near, that they were fain to betake them to a hill, which served to no other purpose, than to bear off the first brunt. There they defended themselves a little while, and then they yielded. When this business was done, he hasted away to relieve Tarentum. But when he came within five miles of the City, he had news that it was lost. This grieved him: yet he said no more than this, The Romans have also their Hannibal; we have lost Tarentum in such sort as we got it. That he might not seem to turn back amazed, or in any fear of the victorious Consul; he incamped a few daies together, so near as he was unto Tarentum: and thence departing to Metapontum, bethought himself how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chief of the Metapontines to write unto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgive them all offences past. It is likely that Fabius did not spend all his money; finding such easie success at Tarentum, as was shewed before. But to stop the journey of Asdrubal; neither the mony sent into Spain, nor any any victories won by Scipio could ſuffice. Nevertheleſs, it fell out happily for the people of Rome, that this year, and the next were ſpent, before his coming; and they better prepared, than at leſs warning they could have been, to entertain him. Here it were not amiſs to note, that ſince the Romans, being in ſo great a neceſſity of mony, were driven to furniſh the Army in Spain, with the greateſt part of all their ſtock that was left: it muſt needs be, that either the booty taken in new Carthage, was far leſs than fame had reported it; or elſe that Scipio had not as yet won it: howſoever Livie rather inclines to thoſe, who ſay that he got it ſoon after his arrival.

M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintus Criſpinus, were choſen Conſuls after Fabius and Fulvius. In their year it was, that Aſdrubal took his journey out of Spain, though he came not into Italy until the year following. After the great battel at Canne, Hannibal had loſt much time about Cannæ and Naples, in ſeeking to make himſelf Maſter of a good haven; for the landing of thoſe ſuccours that were promiſed from Carthage. The hope that he repoſed in Philip, cauſed him to turn his principal care to the Eaſtern parts of Italy; where he made ready a fair entrance for the Macedonian, if he had been ready to come; but ſince his hope was vaniſhed, and the long promiſed ſuccour of Aſdrubal was (though far later than had been expedient) ready to arrive: he began to deal with the people of Hetruria, through whoſe Countries his Brother was to paſs, that therein he might make a party againſt the Romans. The loſs of Capua, Tarentum, and many other Towns, might have terrified all other of the Italian Towns, from hearkning to any ſolicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the poverty of the Romans, and wearineſs of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Army coming than that which Hannibal brought into Italy; did embolden many of the Hetrurians, eſpecially the Aretines, to take ſuch counſel as they thought moſt expedient for themſelves, without regard of their fidelity to Rome. The Roman Senate, hearing the rumour of this conſpiracy, ſent Marcellus the new choſen Conſul into Hetruria: whoſe coming did ſo terrifie them, that they reſted quiet for a while. All the year following they were deviſing how to break out: as contrarywiſe the Roman Proprætors, partly by terrour of ſevere judgments and inquiſitions; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they viſited all ſuſpected places, kept them honeſt againſt their wills, and took many Hoſtages for better aſſurance. The two Conſuls had an earneſt deſire, to make ſtrong War upon Hannibal without more temporiſing; perſwading themſelves, that in battel they ſhould be too ſtrong for him. Criſpinus had further his particular deſire, to make his Conſulſhip notable by the winning of ſome good Town: as Fulvius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the ſiege of Locri; one of the beſt Cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italy: and brought thither all ſorts of Engines; ſending for a fleet out of Sicily to help him. But Hannibal was not ſlow to relieve the City: the fame of whoſe approach, made Criſpinus deſiſt from his enterpriſe, and retire unto his Colleague, that lay at Venuſia. Thither followed Hannibal, to whom the Conſuls daily offered battel. This great man of War had no need to ſtand upon his reputation: which was already ſo confirmed, that his refuſing to fight, was not likely to be aſcribed unto fear; but rather deemed as part of his wiſdom. He entertained the Conſuls with many light skirmiſhes, and ſought to take them at ſome advantage; reſerving his own numbers as full as he could, unto a time of greater employment. In this lingring manner of War, Marcellus took no pleaſure: but ſought to compel the Enemy to battel, whether he would or no. The Admiral of the Roman fleet about Sicily, L. Cincius, was commanded again to aſſail the Town of Locri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he began, to trifle away the time at Venuſia. To the ſame purpoſe a part of the Garriſon that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to go by land to the aſſiſtance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behind him. He laid an ambuſh in the way, between Tarentum and Locri, whereinto the Romans fell: and having loſt above three thouſand of their Company, were well glad, the reſt of them, to quit their enterpriſe, and ſave their own lives within Tarentum. As for the Conſuls, it was the deſire of Hannibal to waſte their Army by little and little: which to do, he neglected no advantage. There lay between him and them an Hillock, overgrown with wood, that ſeemed fit to cover a number of men: who lying there undiſcerned, might fall upon ſuch as ſhould ſtraggle from the Roman Camp; and cut them off. Therefore he ſent thither by night ſome companies of Numidians: whom he willed to keep themſelves cloſe, and attend their beſt advantage. To this piece of ground the Conſuls thought it fit to remove their Camp: Marcellus thinking that he never lay near enough unto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode to view the place, accompanied with the ſon of Marcellus, a few Colonels, and other principal men: and not many more than two hundred horſe, moſt of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinel gave warning of their approach to his fellows, who diſcovered not themſelves until they had ſurrounded the Conſuls and their train. The Conſuls, as neceſſity compelled them, defended themſelves: hoping to be quickly relieved from their camp that was near at hand. But the Hetrurians ran away from them, at the firſt: and left them in that great danger, to the weak aſſiſtance of no more than forty horſemen, that were of the Colonie of Fregellæ. Theſe Fregellans abode by the Conſuls, and did what they could to have brought them ſafe off. But when Marcellus was ſtricken thorow with a Lance and fell down dead; then began every one to ſhift for himſelf, and eſcape as they might. Criſpinus the other Conſul, had his deaths wound, being ſtricken with two Darts; and young Marcellus was likewiſe wounded; yet theſe two recovered their camp: The reſt of the Colonels and Officers, together with the Lictors that carried the bundle of Rods and Axes before the Conſuls, were all ſlain or taken. To the dead body of the Conſul Marcellus, Hannibal gave honourable Funeral, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times: and beſtowing his aſhes in a ſilver pot, covered it with a crown of gold; and ſo ſent them to young Marcellus, to be by him interred, where he thought good.

Preſently after this Criſpinus bethought himſelf, how that the ſignet Ring of Marcellus was faln into the cuſtody of Hannibal; who might uſe it to his own purpoſes, ere that which had happened were well known abroad. Wherefore he ſent word unto all the Towns about; that his Colleague was ſlain, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring: wiſhing them in that regard, to give no credit unto any letters therewithal ſigned. This providence of Criſpinus was not more than requiſite.

requiſite. For his Meſſenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another Meſſenger arrived there ſent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and ſealed with the captive Ring; whereof the contents were: That it was his purpoſe to come the ſame night unto Salapia; where he willed, that the Souldiers of the Garriſon ſhould be in a readineſs, for ſuch imployment as he ſhould think needful. The device was plain, and no leſs plain was the revengeful mind which he bare againſt that City, becauſe of his brave Numidian companies that had therein been betrayed. The Salapians hereupon beſought themſelves, how to take their enemy in his own ſnare. They ſent back the Meſſenger, which was a Roman fugitive, without letting him perceive any ſign of diſtruſt in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readineſs, for the entertainment of ſuch a friend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troop of Roman fugitives armed Roman-like, leading the way. Theſe all talking Latine together, called unto the Watch, and bade open the gate; for the Conſul was there. The gate was opened fair and leiſurely, and the Port-cullis drawn up no higher than needs it muſt be, to let them enter. But when ſix hundred of them were gotten in, down fell the Port-cullis again: and they that thought to have taken others, were taken themſelves; being laid at on all hands by the Salapines, that quickly made an end with them.

Hannibal being thus over-reached with this ſtratagem, haſted away to Locri; whereunto Cincius the Admiral of the Roman fleet about Cicil, did lay hard ſiege. The firſt appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vantcurrors, made the Romans in all confuſed haſte, run to their ſhips: leaving all their engines, and whatſoever was in their Camp, to the enemies diſpoſition.

The Roman Senate hearing of theſe accidents, ſent unto Criſpinus the ſurviving Conſul, and requeſted him to name a Dictator that might take charge of the Common-Wealth, and diſpatch the election of new Magiſtrates, with other buſineſs; whereunto himſelf was diſabled by his hurts. He did ſo: and ſoon after he died. Then was it thought needful, that new Conſuls ſhould be choſen out of hand: foraſmuch as two Roman Armies lay ſo near unto the Enemy, without any General, Eſpecially it was deſired, that Election ſhould be made of ſuch men as were not only valiant, but well adviſed: ſince the beſt, and moſt fortunate of their great Darers, M. Marcellus, by loſing himſelf ſo ſtrangely, had given them a fair warning, not to commit their Army unto raſh heads. Among thoſe that ſtood for the Conſulſhip, C. Claudius Nero, was the moſt eminent. He was of great Nobility, a good Souldier, and one, whoſe many ſervices in this preſent War, did forcibly commend unto the place. Yet he ſeemed a little too violent; and one, whoſe temper needed the allay of a more ſtaid wit. The Fathers therefore endeavoured to joyn unto him in the Conſulſhip, M. Livius: one that had born the ſame office long before. This M. Livius had be Conſul with L. Æmilius Paulus, in the year foregoing the beginning of this War. After their Conſulſhip, wherein they did good ſervice, they had both of them been called into judgement by the people: and this Livius condemned; Æmilius hardly eſcaping. Though it hath been once already noted; yet I cannot forbear to remember it again: how it pleaſed God to upbraid the unthankful Romans, with the malicious judgement, given by their multitude upon honourable men. For in the battle at Canné, it was apparent what lamentable effects the memory of their injuſtice wrought: when L. Æmilius rather choſe to yield to the froward ignorance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the greateſt overthrow that ever fell upon the State of Rome, than by reſiſting the pernicious courſes of Terrentius Varro, to caſt himſelf a new upon the danger of the popular fury. As for M. Livius, he is even now ready, and will ſo continue, to tell the people of their faults in a divers manner. Eight years together after his condemnation, had he been abſent out of the City, and lived in his Country Grange, ſtill vexing himſelf with the indignity of his condemnation. Marcellus and Lævinus, being Conſuls two or three years ago, had brought him into Rome: where he lived private in diſcontented ſort, as might appear, both by his careleſneſs in apparel, and by the wearing of his long hair and beard; which in that time were the badges of men afflicted. Very lately he was compelled by the Cenſors, to poll his hair; and come into the Senate: where he uſed to ſit ſilent, and ſignifie his aſſent or diſlike to what was propoſed, either in ſhort formal words, or in paſſing from ſide to ſide, when the houſe was divided. At length it happened, that in ſome buſineſs weightily concerning one that was his kinſman; he ſtood up and made a ſet ſpeech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bade them enquire of him, and take better notice, that he was, and what he had been. The Senate was much altered ſince he had left it; many brave men were loſt; new ones were choſen ſuch as rather ſerved to fill up the number, than, to anſwer to the dignity of the place: and they that were left of ancient ſtanding, had even ſpent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore all began to ſay; that it was a great pitty, ſo worthy and able a Man as this Livius, had been all this while forgotten; one of whom the Common-wealth ſtood in great need, yet had not uſed in this dangerous war. Now ſeeing that the Conſuls ought, one of them, to be choſen a Patrician: the other of neceſſity a Plebeian: and ſince neither Fabius, nor Valerius Lævinus, being both of them Patricians, could be joyned with Claudius Nero: every one was of opinion, that there could not be choſen and coupled together, two fitter men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Livius. But Livie would not endure to hear of this. He ſaid it was unreaſonable, that one condemned as a diſhoneſt man, ſhould afterwards be choſen Ruler of the City. If they had done ill to truſt him with one Conſulſhip, what meant they then to offer him another? With theſe and the like phraſes he reſiſted their deſires: till by perſwaſions and examples rehearſed, of ſuch as had patiently digeſted injuries done by the people, and repayed good for evil; he was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Emblem, with which Themiſtocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: reſembling himſelf to a Palm-tree, the branches and boughs whereof men break in fair weather; but run under it for ſhelter in a ſtorm. Such unthankfulneſs to well deſerving men, is not rarely found in the outragious multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much unlike, of Philip the ſecond King of Spain his dealing with the Duke of Alva. For although he had committed the Duke to priſon, upon ſome ſmall offence conceived, without all regard of his former deſerts: yet when his intended Conqueſt of Portugal, required the ſervice of a man more than ordinarily ſufficient; he ſtood no longer upon the any victories won by Scipio could ſuffice. Nevertheleſs, it fell out happily for the people of Rome, that this year, and the next were ſpent, before his coming; and they better prepared, than at leſs warning they could have been, to entertain him. Here it were not amiſs to note, that ſince the Romans, being in ſo great a neceſſity of mony, were driven to furniſh the Army in Spain, with the greateſt part of all their ſtock that was left: it muſt needs be, that either the booty taken in new Carthage, was far leſs than fame had reported it; or elſe that Scipio had not as yet won it: howſoever Livie rather inclines to thoſe, who ſay that he got it ſoon after his arrival.

M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintus Criſpinus, were choſen Conſuls after Fabius and Fulvius. In their year it was, that Aſdrubal took his journey out of Spain, though he came not into Italy until the year following. After the great battel at Canne, Hannibal had loſt much time about Cannæ and Naples, in ſeeking to make himſelf Maſter of a good haven; for the landing of thoſe ſuccours that were promiſed from Carthage. The hope that he repoſed in Philip, cauſed him to turn his principal care to the Eaſtern parts of Italy; where he made ready a fair entrance for the Macedonian, if he had been ready to come; but ſince his hope was vaniſhed, and the long promiſed ſuccour of Aſdrubal was (though far later than had been expedient) ready to arrive: he began to deal with the people of Hetruria, through whoſe Countries his Brother was to paſs, that therein he might make a party againſt the Romans. The loſs of Capua, Tarentum, and many other Towns, might have terrified all other of the Italian Towns, from hearkning to any ſolicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the poverty of the Romans, and wearineſs of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Army coming than that which Hannibal brought into Italy; did embolden many of the Hetrurians, eſpecially the Aretines, to take ſuch counſel as they thought moſt expedient for themſelves, without regard of their fidelity to Rome. The Roman Senate, hearing the rumour of this conſpiracy, ſent Marcellus the new choſen Conſul into Hetruria: whoſe coming did ſo terrifie them, that they reſted quiet for a while. All the year following they were deviſing how to break out: as contrarywiſe the Roman Proprætors, partly by terrour of ſevere judgments and inquiſitions; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they viſited all ſuſpected places, kept them honeſt againſt their wills, and took many Hoſtages for better aſſurance. The two Conſuls had an earneſt deſire, to make ſtrong War upon Hannibal without more temporiſing; perſwading themſelves, that in battel they ſhould be too ſtrong for him. Criſpinus had further his particular deſire, to make his Conſulſhip notable by the winning of ſome good Town: as Fulvius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the ſiege of Locri; one of the beſt Cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italy: and brought thither all ſorts of Engines; ſending for a fleet out of Sicily to help him. But Hannibal was not ſlow to relieve the City: the fame of whoſe approach, made Criſpinus deſiſt from his enterpriſe, and retire unto his Colleague, that lay at Venuſia. Thither followed Hannibal, to whom the Conſuls daily offered battel. This great man of War had no need to ſtand upon his reputation: which was already ſo confirmed, that his refuſing to fight, was not likely to be aſcribed unto fear; but rather deemed as part of his wiſdom. He entertained the Conſuls with many light skirmiſhes, and ſought to take them at ſome advantage; reſerving his own numbers as full as he could, unto a time of greater employment. In this lingring manner of War, Marcellus took no pleaſure: but ſought to compel the Enemy to battel, whether he would or no. The Admiral of the Roman fleet about Sicily, L. Cincius, was commanded again to aſſail the Town of Locri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he began, to trifle away the time at Venuſia. To the ſame purpoſe a part of the Garriſon that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to go by land to the aſſiſtance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behind him. He laid an ambuſh in the way, between Tarentum and Locri, whereinto the Romans fell: and having loſt above three thouſand of their Company, were well glad, the reſt of them, to quit their enterpriſe, and ſave their own lives within Tarentum. As for the Conſuls, it was the deſire of Hannibal to waſte their Army by little and little: which to do, he neglected no advantage. There lay between him and them an Hillock, overgrown with wood, that ſeemed fit to cover a number of men: who lying there undiſcerned, might fall upon ſuch as ſhould ſtraggle from the Roman Camp; and cut them off. Therefore he ſent thither by night ſome companies of Numidians: whom he willed to keep themſelves cloſe, and attend their beſt advantage. To this piece of ground the Conſuls thought it fit to remove their Camp: Marcellus thinking that he never lay near enough unto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode to view the place, accompanied with the ſon of Marcellus, a few Colonels, and other principal men: and not many more than two hundred horſe, moſt of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinel gave warning of their approach to his fellows, who diſcovered not themſelves until they had ſurrounded the Conſuls and their train. The Conſuls, as neceſſity compelled them, defended themſelves: hoping to be quickly relieved from their camp that was near at hand. But the Hetrurians ran away from them, at the firſt: and left them in that great danger, to the weak aſſiſtance of no more than forty horſemen, that were of the Colonie of Fregella. Theſe Fregellans abode by the Conſuls, and did what they could to have brought them ſafe off. But when Marcellus was ſtricken thorow with a Lance and fell down dead; then began every one to ſhift for himſelf, and eſcape as they might. Criſpinus the other Conſul, had his death's wound, being ſtricken with two Darts; and young Marcellus was likewiſe wounded; yet theſe two recovered their camp: The reſt of the Colonels and Officers, together with the Lictors that carried the bundle of Rods and Axes before the Conſuls, were all ſlain or taken. To the dead body of the Conſul Marcellus, Hannibal gave honourable Funeral, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times: and beſtowing his aſhes in a ſilver pot, covered it with a crown of gold; and ſo ſent them to young Marcellus, to be by him interred, where he thought good.

Preſently after this Criſpinus bethought himſelf, how that the ſignet Ring of Marcellus was faln into the cuſtody of Hannibal; who might uſe it to his own purpoſes, ere that which had happened were well known abroad. Wherefore he ſent word unto all the Towns about; that his Colleague was ſlain, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring: wiſhing them in that regard, to give no credit unto any letters therewithal ſigned. This providence of Criſpinus was not more than requiſite.

requiſite. For his Meſſenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another Meſſenger arrived there ſent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and ſealed with the captive Ring; whereof the contents were: That it was his purpoſe to come the ſame night unto Salapia; where he willed, that the Souldiers of the Garriſon ſhould be in a readineſs, for ſuch imployment as he ſhould think needful. The device was plain, and no leſs plain was the revengeful mind which he bare againſt that City, becauſe of his brave Numidian companies that had therein been betrayed. The Salapians hereupon beſought themſelves, how to take their enemy in his own ſnare. They ſent back the Meſſenger, which was a Roman fugitive, without letting him perceive any ſign of diſtruſt in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readineſs, for the entertainment of ſuch a friend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troop of Roman fugitives armed Roman-like, leading the way. Theſe all talking Latine together, called unto the Watch, and bade open the gate; for the Conſul was there. The gate was opened fair and leiſurely, and the Port-cullis drawn up no higher than needs it muſt be, to let them enter. But when ſix hundred of them were gotten in, down fell the Port-cullis again: and they that thought to have taken others, were taken themſelves; being laid at on all hands by the Salapines, that quickly made an end with them.

Hannibal being thus over-reached with this ſtratagem, haſted away to Locri; whereunto Cincius the Admiral of the Roman fleet about Cicil, did lay hard ſiege. The firſt appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vantcurrors, made the Romans in all confuſed haſte, run to their ſhips: leaving all their engines, and whatſoever was in their Camp, to the enemies diſpoſition.

The Roman Senate hearing of theſe accidents, ſent unto Criſpinus the ſurviving Conſul, and requeſted him to name a Dictator that might take charge of the Common-Wealth, and diſpatch the election of new Magiſtrates, with other buſineſs; whereunto himſelf was diſabled by his hurts. He did ſo: and ſoon after he died. Then was it thought needful, that new Conſuls ſhould be choſen out of hand: foraſmuch as two Roman Armies lay ſo near unto the Enemy, without any General, Eſpecially it was deſired, that Election ſhould be made of ſuch men as were not only valiant, but well adviſed: ſince the beſt, and moſt fortunate of their great Darers, *M. ſcanning of late diſpleaſures; but employed the ſame Duke, whom he had newly diſgraced. This is wiſdom often taught by neceſſity.

It was a dangerous year toward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius were choſen Conſuls, Aſdrubal was already come into France, and waited only, to have the wayes of the Alps thawed by warm weather, for his paſſage into Italy. The Romans uſed at this time the ſervice of three and twenty Legions: and wanted not employment for many more, if they had known how to levy and maintain them. Of theſe which they had, four ſerved in Spain, two in Sicil, and two in Sardinia: the reſt were ſo diſpoſed, in ſeveral parts of Italy, where need ſeemed to require, that only two Legions were left to each of the Conſuls. But the Conſuls were men of execution; and would not be tyed to the punctual obſervance of what the Senate thought fit. M. Livius would not ſtir out of Rome, againſt ſo mighty a power as followed Aſdrubal, until he had firſt obtained, that he might carry with him as many as could well be ſpared from other imployments; and thoſe, or the moſt of them, choſen Companies. It was true that two Legions appointed to ſerve under Lucius Portius a Prætor of that year, among the Ciſalpine Gauls, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Livius; to whom the War againſt Aſdrubal was alloted. So might alſo two other Legions, that were among the Salentines, near unto Tarentum, unto another of the Prætors be accounted a part of Claudius his Army, that was ſent againſt Hannibal. Nevertheleſs, the Conſuls, by the eſpecial inſtance of Livie, did obtain, that all might be left to their own diſcretion. For news came that Aſdrubal was already paſſing the Alps; the Ligurians, who dwelt in the Country about Genua, with their neighbour people, were in readineſs to joyn with him; and L. Portius ſent word, that he would adventure no further, than he ſafely might. When all was ordered as themſelves thought beſt, the two Conſuls went forth of the City, each his ſeveral way. The people of Rome were now quite otherwiſe affected, than they had been, when L. Æmilius Paulus, and C. Terentius Varro, were ſent againſt Hannibal. They did no longer take upon them, to direct their Generals, or bid them diſpatch, and win the victory betimes: but rather they ſtood in fear, leſt all diligence, wiſdom and valour ſhould prove too little. For ſince few years had paſſed, wherein ſome one of their Generals had not been ſlain; and ſince it was manifeſt, that if either of theſe preſent Conſuls were defeated, or put to the worſt the two Carthaginians would forthwith joyn, and make ſhort work with the other: it ſeemed a greater happineſs than could be expected, that each of them ſhould return home victor; and come off with honour, from ſuch mighty oppoſition, as he was like to find. With extream difficulty had Rome held up her head, ever ſince the battle of Cannæ: though it were ſo that Hannibal alone, with little help from Carthage, had continued the War in Italy. But there was now arrived another Son of Amilcar; and one, that in his preſent Expedition, had ſeemed a man of more ſufficiency than Hannibal himſelf. For whereas in that long and dangerous march, thorow barbarous Nations, over great Rivers and Mountains, that were thought unpaſſable, Hannibal had loſt a great part of his Army: this Aſdrubal in the ſame places, had multiplied his numbers; and gathering the people, that he found in the way, deſcended from the Alps like a rowling Snow-ball, far greater than he came over the Pyrenees at his firſt ſetting out of Spain. Theſe conſiderations, and the like, of which fear preſented many unto them, cauſed the people of Rome, to wait upon their Conſuls out of the Town, like a penſive train of Mourners: thinking upon Marcellus and Criſpinus; upon whom in the like ſort they had given attendance the laſt year; but ſaw neither of them return alive, from a leſs dangerous War. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gave his accuſtomed advice to M. Livius, that he ſhould abſtain from giving or taking battle, untill he well underſtood the Enemies condition. But the Conſul made him a froward anſwer, and ſaid, that he would fight the very firſt day: for that he thought it long, till he ſhould either recover his honour by victory; or by ſeeing the overthrow of his own unjuſt Citizens, ſatisfie himſelf with the joy of a great, though not an honeſt revenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the overthrow that Aſdrubal received in Spain by Scipio, a little before he took his Journey into Italy; ſuch mention hath already been made, as agreed with the report of that noble Hiſtorian Livie. Yet I think it not amiſs to add in this place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his Hiſtory concerning that accident: Aſdrubal had wreſtled with many difficulties in Spain; by reaſon of thoſe Captains that were ſent from the City of Carthage, to joyn with him in the adminiſtration of that Province: they being, as it may ſeem, of the Hannonian faction; which is to ſay, thus far forth Traytors, that they preferred the advantage of their own ſide, before the good of their Common-wealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthy Son of Amilcar, and how they hindred his courſes undertaken, it cannot be known; ſince thoſe Books wherein Polybius hath exactly handled theſe matters, there are to us remaining only a few broken pieces. But by the ſpightful dealing of Hanno in Scicil with Mutines, a better man of War than himſelf, whom Hannibal had ſent into the Iſland: we may conceive, that againſt the Brother of Hannibal it was thought needful, by theſe miſchievous Partizans of Hanno, to uſe the violent oppoſition of more earneſt malice. Nevertheleſs, Aſdrubal was a good Patriot: and therefore endured patiently ſuch indignities, as Mutines could not long digeſt. His Journey into Italy being reſolved upon: he lay with part of the Army at Betula, not far upon the Mines of Silver; whence he was to furniſh his Expeditions. Thither came Scipio; and drave him out of his Camp; though he were ſtrongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Captains could or would come to his aſſiſtance. The overthrow ſeems not to have been ſo great, as it muſt have been ſuppoſed, if no way lay open to thoſe that fled. Rather it appears, that Aſdrubal dealt like a provident man, and ſeeing that his Camp was likely to be forced, ſent away all mony with the Elephants before him: but ſtayed behind himſelf to ſuſtain the Romans a while, until his carriages might be out of danger. Herein he had his deſire, afterwards he gathered his broken troops together, and retired in ſuch ſort, that Scipio thought it not good to purſue him, and ſo paſſed over Tagus. Then taking unto him the forces aſſigned for his expedition, he marched away toward the Pyrenees: leaving the care of Spain unto his Brother Mago, and to Aſdrubal the Son of Geſco; that thought himſelf the fitteſt man for the adminiſtration thereof. Fain would Scipio have ſtopped him in his Journey, by ſending to defend againſt him the ordinary ordinary way of the Mountains. But whether Asdrubal took another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scipio had sent to keep the Pyrenees (as the defence of hard passages commonly sorts to no good effect) he was not letted in his voyage by any such impediment. Coming into Gaul, and following the steps of his Brother Hannibal: he found the Nations that lay in his way, so well affected, either to him or to his money, that no passages were defended against him, nor any sort of resistance made; but he, and his Army well entertained, and their number much increased, by access of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choice: for that he was driven to winter in their Country; whilst that the passages of the Alps were closed up with Ice and Snow. The Mountainers likewise, that had so greatly molested Hannibal in his Journey over the Alps, were easily won to take part with Asdrubal, when he travelled thorow their Country. For these poor men, at the first coming of Hannibal, were verily perswaded, that it was his purpose to rob them of their cattle; and to make spoil of that little wealth which they had painfully scraped together out of the desolate rocks. But now in process of time, they were better informed. Therefore, understanding that there were two mighty Cities, far dis-joyned asunder, which made War upon each other, by Land and Sea; and that the Alps did only lye in the way: they gladly condescended to take their part in the fortune of the invadvers. The like affection upon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cisalpine Gauls. The Ligurians also joyned with Asdrubal: and so would the Hetrurians have done, if he had arrived in their Country, there was no other Roman Army near, than L. Portius with his two Legions; of whom there was no great fear. Therefore did Asdrubal set upon Placentia, a Roman Colony: in hope to make his coming the more terrible, by the destruction of that Town. But there he lost a great deal of time, and finally was driven to quit the enterprise: by undertaking which, he gave the Roman Consuls leasure to make ready for him; and caused his Brother Hannibal (who upon the first bruit of Asdrubal he so timely, and easily passing the Alps, was about to leave his wintring Camps, and go forth to meet with him) to sit still a while, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in haste.

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Consul, made what speed he could to meet with Hannibal and stop him from joyning with his Brother. He had about forty thousand foot, and five hundred horse: with which he dayly offered battle to the Carthaginians; and had of him the better in many Skirmishes. Hannibal was only driven to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentines and Apulians, unto the Country of the Brutians, there to increase his forces; which were otherwise too weak for the Journey intended. Afterward coming to Grumentum, a Town of the Lucans, he there fought unprosperously with Nero the Consul. Nevertheless, he got off; and marched away to Venusia. But Nero followed him, and had there again the better of him; wherefore he was driven to return to Metaponcum: where joyning Hanno, that had made ready a good Army, he assayed again, to make way by force to his Brother. So he passed onward, and came again to Venusia, having Nero still at his heels. Thence went he over the River Ausidus, to Canusium, where he sate down, not far from the place, in which he had obtained his most memorable victory. There also did Nero sit down by him: and both of them rested, without making offer to fight. It seemed perhaps unto Hannibal, who knew the Contry very well: that his Brother might with little impediment, overcome the way to Canusium: where, if he could once again deal with both the Consuls, and all the Roman forces together, he had reason to hope for such another victory, as once he had gotten in the same open Country. If this had so faln out; Rome would have been undone for ever. But the Carthaginians should not have need to wish any second victory, in the naked Campans about Cannæ; If such an Army as this which Asdrubal now brings, had come to second Hannibal, when he was in full strength; and the Romans not able to keep the field. Wherefore this worthy General had good reason afterward to say that Hanno was the man, who by delaying the supply, did beat him out of Italy; which else no power of the Romans could have done.

Whilst Nero waited upon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Army that was coming to their succour: he was advertised of Asdrubal his approach; by Letters and Messengers intercepted, as they were going to Hannibal. These gave notice, that Asdrubal had left the siege of Placentia, and drew onwards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his Brother; notwithstanding all opposition that could be made by Livie the Consul. Of these news Claudius Nero was nothing joyful. For if Hannibal could once be joyned as head, unto that great body of an Army, which Asdrubal brought with him: it was most apparent, that howsoever the fortune of Rome should avoid, for the present, any great calamity; yet the very countenance of so strong a War at home, would inforce the Latines, and other faithful Associates to faint under the burden; as twelve of the thirty Roman Colonies had already done. Wherefore he resolved, that it were better to make any desperate adventure, than to suffer the conjunction of two such malevolent Planets: whose pestilent influence, if not on the suddain, yet within few years, was like to work most lamentable effects. It seemed apparent, that his Colleague was unable to stay the progress of Asdrubal: neither were there any good Legions in a readiness, that could do service in such a needful case; excepting those, that were already imployed under the two Consuls. Hereupon he concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tye himself to his own charge; which was the war against Hannibal: but rather that it behoved him, to help where more necessity required; and to carry part of his forces unto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet since the meeting of the two Carthaginian Brethren, was far more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth: it seemed the best way to put Fortune in trust, with that which was the less importance. Six thousand foot, and a thousand horse he therefore took, that were the very choise of his Army: and making shew, as if he would only step aside, to do some small piece of service near at hand; away he posted as fast as he could, to assist his fellow-Consul. His Messengers ran before him, to give warning to all Towns by which he was to pass, that they should be ready to meet him with victuals, and all other necessaries for his Army. Livius the other Consul at that time, lay encamped near unto Sena Gallica; and Asdrubal, within half a mile of him. In six dayes Nero had finished his Journey thither; and when he drew near, sent Messengers before him him, to give notice of his coming. Livie thought it fitteſt that he ſhould ſtay in ſome place of covert until dark night, and then enter ſecretly into the Camp: leſt the Enemy, perceiving this acceſs of ſtrength, ſhould accordingly frame his counſels. This was done; and a token given, that the Colonels, Captains, and all Souldiers, as well horſe as foot, that Nero had brought with him, ſhould be lodged and entertained by men of their own ſort. Their Company was ſomewhat increaſed by Voluntaries that joyned with him on the way. Nevertheleſs it was not needful that the Quarter which received them, ſhould be enlarged; ſince they had brought with them nothing but their arms. The next day they held a Counſel of war: wherein ſome were of opinion, that it were beſt for theſe new arrived Companies to refreſh themſelves a few days after their weary Journey, before they ſhould be drawn forth to battle. But againſt this, Nero was very earneſt: and beſought his Colleague, to make uſe of him out of hand; that he might betimes return to his own Camp, e're Hannibal ſhould have notice of his abſence. The Souldiers alſo of Nero were full of ſpirit; perceiving that the honour of the victory was like to be theirs: foraſmuch as the battle would not have been undertaken, without this their coming to help. Finally, it was agreed when the Counſel brake up, that the ſign of battle ſhould be hung out; which was commonly a Purple Coat over the Generals Pavilion.

Aſdrubal was no leſs willing than the Romans to come to battle, having long deſired it, and hitherto not found occaſion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Army, to behold the Enemies countenance: it ſeemed to him, that they were more than they had been; and ſome of their Arms and Horſes looked as though they had wanted dreſſing, after a long Journey. Hereupon he began to withdraw his Army back into the Camp: and gave order, that if no priſoners could be taken, by whom he might be certified of the truth; yet ſhould there good obſervation be made, whether the Enemies Camp were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might ſhew their forces to be increaſed. The Camp, as hath been ſaid, was not extended: but the trumpet, that ſounded onely once in the Quarter of L. Portius the Prætor, did now, contrary to former cuſtom, ſound twice in the Quarter of Livius the Conſul. Hereat Aſdrubal greatly muſed: and being well acquainted with the Roman orders, held this for a ſure token, that the other Conſul was there arrived. How this might be, if Hannibal were alive, and in good caſe, he was not able to conjecture: but thought it the beſt way, to go leiſurely to work, till he might be better informed. Upon confidence in his own Forces, he had not cared hitherto, how near he lay to the Romans; nor troubled himſelf perhaps with overſtrongly fortifying his own Camp. Yet when he now perceived, that ſomewhat was fallen out beſide his expectation, he changed his reſolution; and held it no diſhonour to remove a little further off. So he diſlodged ſecretly by night, intending to get over the River Metaurus; whereby to keep himſelf as long as he could, from neceſſity of battle. But whether it were ſo, that his guide did ſteal away from him in the dark, ſo that he could not find the way to the Fords; or whether his carriages were too heavy, and hindred his ſpeed: far he had not gone, e're the Conſul Nero was at his heels with all the Roman horſe, and ſtayed him from paſſing any further. Soon after came L. Portius with the light armature: whom the other Conſul followed anon with all the Legions; in good order, and ready for battle. Aſdrubal, ſeeing himſelf overtaken with neceſſity to fight, omitted no care and circumſpection. His Gauls, in whom he repoſed leaſt confidence, he placed in his left wing upon a Hill, which the Enemy ſhould not, without much difficulty, be able to climb: in the right wing he ſtood himſelf with his Africans and Spaniards; his Ligurians he placed in the midſt; and his Elephants he beſtowed in the front of his battles. On the Roman ſide, Nero had the leading of the right wing, Livius of the left, and Portius of the battle. Both Romans and Carthaginians well underſtood, how much depended upon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of ſafety there was unto the vanquiſhed. Only the Romans herein ſeemed to have had the better in conceit and opinion; that they were to fight with men deſirous to have fled from them. And, according to this preſumption, came Livius the Conſul with a proud bravery, to give charge on the Africans, by whom he was ſo ſharply entertained, that the victory ſeemed very doubtful. The Africans and Spaniards were ſtout Souldiers, and well acquainted with the manner of the Roman fight. The Ligurians alſo were a hardy Nation, and not accuſtomed to give ground; which they needed the leſs, or were able now to do, being placed in the midſt. Livius therefore, and Portius, found ſtrong oppoſition: and with great ſlaughter on both ſides, prevailed little or nothing. Beſides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants, that brake their firſt ranks; and put them in ſuch diſorder, as the Roman Enſigns were driven to fall back. All this while Claudius Nero, labouring much in vain againſt a ſteep Hill, was unable to come to blows with the Gauls, that ſtood oppoſite unto him, but out of danger. This made Aſdrubal the more confident; who, ſeeing his own left wing ſafe, did the more boldly and fiercely make impreſſion on the other ſide, upon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero perceiving that the place wherein he ſtood, was ſuch as would compell him to remain idle till the fight were ended; took a part of his Forces and led them round behind the Forces of Portius and Livius: which having compaſſed, he fell upon Aſdrubal, and charged him in the flanck. Here began the Victory to be manifeſt on the Roman ſide. For Nero, finding none to reſiſt him in front, ran all along the depth of Aſdrubal his battle: and falling upon the skirts thereof, diſordered the Enemies, and put all to rout. Of the Spaniards therefore and Africans, that were laid at on every ſide, the greateſt part was ſlain. The Ligurians and Gauls eſcaped as they could; and ſaved themſelves by timely flight. Of the Elephants, four were taken alive; the reſt were ſlain: ſome by the Enemies weapons, others by their own guides that rode them. For when any of them, being ſore wounded, began to wax unruly, and ruſh back upon their own battles following them, the guide had in readineſs a Mallet and a Chizzel, wherewith he gave them a ſtroke between the ears, in the joynt of the neck, next unto the head, wherewith he killed the beaſts upon a ſudden. This ſpeedy way of preventing ſuch harm as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to do to the Squadrons following them, is ſaid to have been the device of Aſdrubal himſelf, who died in this Battle.

Great

Great commendations are given to Asdrubal, both by Polibius, and by Livie. He is said at all times to have shewed himself worthy of Amilcar his Father, and Hannibal his Brother; to have striven with great patience against many difficulties, whereinto he fell by the means of those Captains that were sent from Carthage into Spain; to have performed in this last battle all duties of a worthy General; and finally, when he saw the loss irrepairable, to have ridden manfully into the thickest of his Enemies; where, fighting bravely, he was slain. Of the number that died with him in this battle, the report of Livie and Polibius do very much disagree. For Livie saith, that the Carthaginians had no less an overthrow, than was that which they gave to the Romans at Cannæ: that fifty six thousand of them were slain, five thousand and four hundred taken prisoners, and above four thousand Roman Citizens, whom they had captives with them, delivered and set at liberty. He saith also, that of the Romans and their Associates, there were slain eight thousand: and of the booty, that it was exceeding great; not only in other kinds, but in gold and silver. Concerning the booty, Polybius hath no mention of it. Likely it is to have been as rich as Livie reporteth it; for Asdrubal came well stored with mony. But Polybius (who had no desire to make this battle of Metaurus, a paralel unto that of Cannæ) reports no more then about ten thousand of the Carthaginian side; and two thousand of the Roman, to have been slain. The number of the prisoners he doth not mention: but only saith, That some of the Carthaginian Princes were taken alive; and that all the rest died in the battle. Whereby it may seem that they were all Barchines: forasmuch as they preferred the honour of themselves, and of their Country, above their lives.

The joy of this victory was no less in Rome, than had been the fear of the event. For ever since it were known in what sort Nero had left his Army, the whole City was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his coming thither. Men thought it strange, that the Consul should make such a great adventure, as thus to put the one half of all the Roman forces unto hazard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chance to have notice of this his departure, and either pursue him, or set upon the Army that staid behind, much weakned, and without a General? Thus did they talk; yet reserving their censure unto the success, with liberty to approve or condemn, according to the issue. In the mean time the people filled the Market-place, the Women ran to the Temples with Vows and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in councel, waiting still ready at hand upon the Magistrates; as if some great matter were likely to fall out, that would ask every ones help. In brief, they were all so full of melancholly, that when the first news of victory came, there were not many that would believe it. Afterwards, when Messengers arrived from the Consuls, with Letters contained all that had passed, there was not only great and joyful concourse of all sorts of men unto the Temples, but the very face of the City was altered; and men from thenceforth began to follow their private business, making contracts one with another (which they had long forborn to do) and attending their own affairs in such wise, as if Hannibal were already driven out of Italy.

Nero returning to his Camp, threw forth openly the head of Asdrubal before the Carthaginians: and producing his African prisoners bound, sent two of them loose to give Hannibal notice of what had hapned. These two prisoners might have served well enough to certifie Hannibal of the misadventure, without doing wrong to the dead body of Asdrubal: especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and far different manner, had given burial to Gracchus and Marcellus; yea, to all the Roman Generals, whose carkasses fell into his hands. But it may seem, that howsoever the People of Carthage wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their love unto the Common-weal: yet in dealing with enemies, they were far more civil, and less prone to the insolency of revenge. The best excuse of this outrage done by Nero, is, that he hoped much more by the sudden terrour of such a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that which passed, to make a deep impression of fear into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That he forgot himself, being over-joyed with the greatness of his prosperity. For it was the battle of Metaurus that weighed down the ballance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the lowest Ebb, ceased not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks. Hannibal having lost in this unhappy fight (besides the worthy Gentleman his brother) all the hope that so long sustained him in Italy, withdrew himself into the Country of the Brutians: and thither he caused all the Lucans, that were of his party, to remove; as likewise all that dwelt in Metapontum. For he wanted men to defend so many places, as he held at the present, because they lay too far asunder. Wherefore he drew them all into a lesser compass, in the utmost corner of Italy, it being a country of much fastness, and the people exceedingly devoted to his service. In this business Nero gave him no memorable impediment: either because Hannibal was too strong for him, having all his forces united; or because it is likely that this remove of the Lucans and Metapontines, was not before the end of Summer, when their harvest was gathered in: at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Livius the other Consul, tarried among the Cisalpine Gaules untill the end of summer; there to set things in such order, as he thought requisite: which done, he wrote unto the Senate, that there was no more need of him and his Army in that Province, but that L. Portius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well discharge the place. For this cause he desired leave to return home; and that he might bring his Army with him. The Senate well understood his meaning: which was to have the honour of triumph, as he well deserved. But forasmuch as it was well known, what interest Nero had in the late victory: order was so given, that not only Livie with his Army should come home; but likewise Nero, though leaving his Army behind him, to confront Hannibal. So the honour of triumph was granted to them both: in the pomp whereof, Livie made the greater shew, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers; because in his Province, and upon his day of command, the victory was gotten: his Army also being present at the triumph. But Nero that rode on horseback, and without such attendance, was the more extolled by the People and Souldiers; by whom, the victory was in a manner wholly ascribed unto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Cecilius Metellus, Lieutenants to the the Generals, the due acknowledgement of their good ſervice. For they were commended unto the People, as men worthy to be choſen Conſuls: and Conſuls they were choſen for the year following. But nothing was done by them, worthy of memory in their Conſulſhip. Neither indeed from this year, which was the thirteenth of this preſent war, untill the eighteenth year wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italy; ſave only the taking of Locri from the Carthaginians by ſurpriſe. For Hannibal wanted ſtrength, wherewith to make any great offer: and the Romans had little mind to provoke him; but thought it well that he was quiet. Such opinion had they conceived of him, that though all about him went to ruine, yet in him alone, they thought there was force enough to hold himſelf upright. And ſurely, very notable are the commendations given unto him by Polybius, whom Livie therein follows. That making war upon a People, of all other the moſt war-like, he obtained ſo many victories by his own good conduct: and that leading an Army, compounded of ſo many ſundry Nations, Africans, Spaniards, Gaules, Carthaginians, Italians and Greeks, which were neither in Language, Laws, Conditions, or any other thing, one like to another; he held them all in ſuch good order, that they never fell to ſedition among themſelves, or againſt their General. But that which Livie adds hereto, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That he ſuſtained his Army, without help from other places; from this time forward, upon the hungry ſoil of the Brutians: which when it was beſt manured in time of peace, could hardly ſuffice to nouriſh the Inhabitants. It's therefore apparent, that by his proper worth and vertue, he kept his Army in ſuch order and obedience, rather than by any greatneſs of reward and booty; ſince after the death of Aſdrubal, he made no invaſion upon the wealthier parts of Italy; but held himſelf ſtill among the poor Brutians. Where we muſt leave him; until he be drawn into Africk by Scipio; whoſe doing will henceforth entertain, and lead us unto the end of this War.

SECT. XVII.

How P. Cornelius Scipio the Roman, made entire conqueſt of Spain.

†. I.

How the Carthaginians were driven by Scipio from the Continent into the Iſle of Gades.

MAgo and Aſdrubal the ſon of Geſco, took upon them the charge of Spain, when Aſdrubal the Son of Amilcar departed thence into Italy. Theſe agreed together, that Mago ſhould make a voyage to the Baleares; there to levy a ſupply of men; and Aſdrubal withdraw himſelf into Luſitania (which is now Portugal) whither the Romans had ill means to follow; being altogether unacquainted in thoſe parts. Mago had ſoon ended his buſineſs, and returned into Spain: where he met with one Hanno (the ſame perhaps that had lately been imployed in Sicil) who brought new forces out of Africk; and came to ſucceed in place of Aſdrubal the Barchine. It is not unlikely that Spain was now the better, and more readily furniſhed with men, and all things needful from Carthage: when that Son of Amilcar, whoſe authority had been greateſt, was thence departed. For hereby might the factious diligence of old Hanno approve it ſelf, againſt that noble race of Warriors; when it ſhould appear, that things did proſper much the better by being left unto the handling of other men. Whether it were upon deſire to make good ſome ſuch opinion raiſed of him at home, or whether upon confidence in the forces that he brought over; Hanno took the field, and led Mago with him; as purpoſing afreſh to ſet upon the Romans. So he entered into the country of the Celtiberians, not very far from new Carthage: where, by money, and over-perſwaſions, he levied above nine thouſand men.

P. Scipio in the mean while contained himſelf in the Eaſtern parts of Spain: attentive, as it may ſeem to the proceedings of Aſdrubal, the ſon of Amilcar; againſt whom he is reported by ſome Writers to have ſent part of his forces into Italy, to the aſſiſtance of C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius the Conſuls. But hearing of the levy made by Hanno and Mago among the Celtiberians, he ſent M. Syllanus the Pro-pretor, with ten thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe. Syllanus got intelligence by ſome fugitive Celtiberians, who became his guides, that their Country-men incamped apart from the Carthaginians in great diſorder: as men fearing no danger, becauſe they were at home. Wherefore as cloſely as he was able, he drew near to theſe Celtiberians: and falling upon them on the ſudden, gave them ſuch an overthrow, that Hanno and Mago coming to their ſuccour, inſtead of heartning and re-inforcing them, became partakers of the loſs. Mago ſaved himſelf with all the horſe, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thouſand: and in ten dayes journey, brought them ſafe to Aſdrubal. The reſt of the Africans were either ſlain or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill luck to be taken priſoner; though he kept himſelf out of the fight until all was loſt. As for the Celtiberians, they knew better how to make ſhift; and ſaved moſt of themſelves by running into the woods.

It could not otherwiſe be, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherein Italy ſtood, by the coming thither of Aſdrubal. Ten thouſand foot, and eighteen hundred horſe he did therefore ſend out of Spain (as it is reported by ſome Authors to the defence of his own Country; or was perhaps, about to ſend them: and thereupon remained at new Carthage, intentive to the neceſſity and ſucceſs of his Country-men at home. But when he had word of the great victory at Metaurus, which fell out long before the end of the Summer, then might he well adventure, to take in hand the entire conqueſt of Spain; which muſt needs be alienated from the Carthaginians, by the report of ſuch an overthrow. The Spaniſh Souldiers that ſerved under Hannibal, and thoſe that had been ſent over into Africk, were as pledges heretofore, by whom their Country was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noiſed abroad, that all which hath followed Aſdrubal into Italy, were fallen into the hands of the Romans; and that Hannibal with his Army was cloſed up in a ſtraight, whence he could not get out: then did it greatly behoove the Spaniards to conform themſelves unto the will of the Victors.

ctors. That it was the ſucceſs of things in Italy, which gave ſuch confidence unto Scipio; it was the more probable, becauſe he took not this great enterpriſe in hand, until the Summer was almoſt ſpent. Aſdrubal therefore uſed the benefit of the ſeaſon; and by diſpoſing his Army into many Garriſons, hindred the Enemy from doing any great exploit before Winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the year, cauſed Scipio to return back: without any other matter performed, than that his Brother L. Scipio took by aſſault the Town of Oringis.

Againſt the next years danger, Aſdrubal prepared a great Army: and ſpared not coſt, nor travel, in ſtrengthning himſelf, for the tryal of his laſt fortune in Spain. With ſeventy thouſand foot, four thouſand horſe, and two and thirty Elephants, he took the field: which number I believe, that he could hardly have raiſed, without boldly denying the truth of thoſe reports that came from Italy. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too weak to encounter with ſuch a multitude. Wherefore he judged it needful to uſe the help of his Spaniſh friends. But the death of his Father and Uncle, that were caſt away by the treaſon of ſuch falſe Auxiliaries, made him on the other ſide very doubtful of relying upon thoſe, that might perhaps betray him in his greateſt need. Yet ſince one Colchus, that was Lord of eight and twenty Towns, had promiſed him the laſt Winter, to raiſe three thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe for his ſervice: he reſolved to make uſe of thoſe, and ſome few others, that might help to make a ſhew; and yet not be able to do any great harm, if they would revolt. So with five and forty thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe, he ſought out the Enemy; near unto whom he incamped. At his firſt coming, Mago and Maſaniſſa fell upon him; with hope to take him unprepared, whilſt he was making his lodgings. But he laid certain Troops of Horſe in covert: which, breaking upon them unexpected, cauſed them to fall off. They made at firſt an orderly retreat: but being more hardly preſſed, they ſhortly betook themſelves to plain flight. After this encounter, which added ſome courage to the Romans, and abated the preſumption of the Carthaginians, there were daily skirmiſhes between the horſe and light armature, on both ſides; wherein was nothing done of importance. Aſdrubal drew forth his Army, and arranged it before his Trenches: the like did Scipio; each of them to ſhew that he durſt fight, yet not proceeding any farther. Thus they continued many dayes: Aſdrubal being ſtill the firſt that iſſued forth in the morning; and the firſt that, in the evening, withdrew himſelf into his Trenches. The Spaniſh Auxiliaries were placed on both ſides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the midſt, with their Elephants before them; and oppoſite to theſe on the other ſide, were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at far diſtance, many dayes together: it grew to be the common opinion; that they ſhould ſhortly meet in the ſame form, and be matched on each part, with the enemies long before deſigned. But Scipio, when he purpoſed indeed to fight, altered the form of his Army; and withall, came forth earlier than he had been wont. He cauſed his men and horſes to be well fed betimes in the morning before day: and then ſent forth his horſe and light armature, to train out the Carthaginians with their bellies empty: uſing herein the ſame trick, whereby he might remember that Hannibal had beaten his Father in the battle of Trebia. His Roman Legions he beſtowed in the wings; his Spaniards in the battle. Aſdrubal ſent forth his horſe in all haſt, to entertain the Romans; whilſt he himſelf arranged his men, in their wonted order at the Hill foot, upon which he incamped. In the skirmiſhes of the horſe it could not be diſcerned which part had the better: ſince, being over-preſſed on either ſide, they had a ſafe retrait unto their foot; and one troop ſeconding another by courſe, returned to charge. This fight was portracted by Scipio to a great length: becauſe his men, having well fed themſelves, were like to hold out better than the enemy. But about noon he cauſed his wings to advance a good pace; leaving their battle of Spaniards far behind them, that came on leiſurely, according to direction. The Spaniſh Mercenaries that ſtood in Aſdrubal his wings, were no way comparable, ſave only in number, to the Latine and Roman Souldiers that came againſt them; for they were freſh Souldiers, levied in haſt; and fighting only in reſpect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flank, at the ſame time, by the Roman Velites, and by ſome cohorts, that were appointed to wheel about for the ſame purpoſe, they were ſorely preſſed, and with much difficulty made reſiſtance. The Carthaginians would fain have ſuccoured them; but that they durſt not ſtir out of their places, becauſe of the Spaniſh battle which was coming againſt them; though it were as yet far off. Thus the beſt part of Aſdrubal his Army ſtood idle, until the wings were broken. For, had he adventured to meet with the Spaniards, he muſt have caſt himſelf into the open ſpace that lay before him between the Roman wings: to the depth whereof, when he had arrived, he ſhould have found himſelf incloſed in ſuch ſort, as was the Conſul Paulus at the battle of Cannæ. Wherefore he did only imploy his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harm to his Enemies, than to his Friends. When they were chafed with wounds, they could no longer be ruled as their guides: but ran, as chance led them, and troubled both parts, or thoſe perhaps the more, that were the more unwilling to kill them. In proceſs of the fight, the Romans, who had well refreſhed their bodies in the morning, endured luſty; when the others began to faint with travel and heat of the day. Wherefore perceiving their advantage, they followed it the more hotly; and gave not over till they had forc't the enemy to change his place, and run from him. Aſdrubal did his beſt to have made an orderly retreat; and afterward again to have cauſed his men to turn head at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not ſuffer the victory to be ſo extorted from them: neither was it eaſie to put freſh courage into the vanquiſhed, led by the obſtinate paſſion of fear, which hearkens to no perſwaſion. The Camp of Aſdrubal had that day been taken, if a ſtorm of rain, which fell vilently on the ſudden, and bred ſome ſuperſtition in the Romans, had not cauſed them to give over.

The ſame night Aſdrubal gave no reſt to his men; but cauſed them, hungry, and over-laboured as they were, to take pains in fortifying the Camp; wherein he feared to be aſſaulted. But little aſſurance could he have in the ſtrength of his Trenches, when he had loſt the hearts of his Spaniſh ſouldiers. One Attanes, that was Lord of the the Turdetani, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his ſubjects: many followed this example; and ſoon after two ſtrong Towns were yielded up to Scipio, and the Garriſons betrayed. It ſeems that the perverſe fortune of this late battle, whereupon Aſdrubal had ſet his reſt, bred in the Spaniards a diſpoſition, to believe the more eaſily thoſe reports which they heard from Italy. For henceforward, they never did good office to the Carthaginians. Aſdrubal, perceiving this, withdrew himſelf, and marched away faſter then ordinary pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning, and overtaking the Carthaginians with his horſe, cauſed them ſo often to make ſtand, that they were at laſt attached by the Roman Legions. Here began a cruel ſlaughter: for there was no reſiſtance made, but all fell to rout, ſave only ſeven thouſand, that, with Aſdrubal himſelf recovered a very ſtrong piece of ground, which they fortified in haſte. The place he made ſhift a while to defend: but wanting there neceſſaries to ſuſtain himſelf long, he was forſaken by ſome of thoſe few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherefore he reſolved to make ſhift for one; and ſtealing from his Company by night away to the Sea ſide, that was not far thence, he took ſhipping, and ſet ſail for Gades. When Scipio underſtood that Aſdrubal was thus gone, he left Syllanus with ten thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, to beſiege their (Camp, which was not taken in haſte, for Mago and Maſſaniſſa ſtayed in it) whilſt he with the reſt of the Army did what was needful in the Country abroad. It was not long e're Mago and Maſſaniſſa followed Aſdrubal to Gades: and their Army diſperſed it ſelf; ſome flying over to the Romans, others taking what way they like. So upon all the Continent of Spain, there were only three Towns left, Illiturg, Caſtulo, and Aſtapia, that made continuance of war againſt the Romans: of which only Caſtulo had a Carthaginian Garriſon, conſiſting of ſuch as had ſaved themſelves by flight in the late overthrows. Hereby it ſeems that the report of thoſe Hiſtorians was ill grounded, who ſaid, that Caſtulo yielded long ſince unto the Romans; though Hannibal took a wife in that City. For this was one of the laſt three towns that held out on the Carthaginians ſide. Illiturgi had ſometimes been inclinable to the Romans, if not altogether at their devotion. Yet after the death of the two elder Scipio's, following too earneſtly the Carthaginian fortune, it not only rebelled, but with great cruelty betrayed and ſlew the poor men that eſcaped thither from the overthrows. Aſtapa was a Town that ſtill adhered to the Carthaginians; and, which was worſe, had thriven by the ſpoil of the Romans and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not until the next year) Scipio went againſt theſe, and took himſelf Illiturgi, and Caſtulo: Illiturgi by aſſault, and with a general ſlaughter of the Inhabitants; Caſtulo, by reaſon of one Credubellus. Aſtapa was taken by Lucius Marcius; or rather deſtroyed by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raiſed in the Market place: whereinto was thrown all the gold, and ſilver, with whatſoever elſe was precious; the women and children ſtanding by it under a ſure guard, that ſhould kill and burn them if the Romans got into the Town. This proviſion being made, and all the Inhabitants that could bear Arms, ruſhed forth deſperately, and fell upon the Roman Camp; where ſtriving beyond their power, they were every one ſlain. Then was the Town forthwith ſet on fire, by thoſe that had taken charge to do it: and many of the Romans conſumed with the flame; whilſt they ruſhed over-haſtily to catch the gold and ſilver, which they ſaw lying on the pile ready to melt.

Aſdrubal being beaten into the Iſland of Gades, found no cauſe of long ſtay there: but returned home to Carthage, with ſeven Gallies: leaving Mago behind him, to wait upon occaſion, if any ſhould be offered. He viſited in his way home, Syphax, King of the Maſæſili, a people of the Numidians; hoping to win him to the friendſhip of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his evil Angel, in the Kings-port: who landing at the ſame time, carried Syphax quite another way. For Scipio having driven the Carthaginians out of Spain, did forthwith bethink himſelf, how to finiſh the war, by putting them to the like diſtreſs in Africk. Hereunto it ſeemed that the help of Syphax would be much available: a King that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and ſuſtained much hurt by their procurement; of which in all likelihood he might eaſily be moved to ſeek revenge. He had alſo been beholding to P. and Cn. Scipio, that ſent him over a Captain into Africk; who inſtructed him ſo well in marſhalling his forces, as he thereby often became victorious. Upon theſe reaſons, the Numidian King ſent Embaſſadors to Rome, and made league with the City in time of great extremity. So that hereby P. Scipio conceived hope of laying a good foundation to the War, which he intended in Africk, upon the friendſhip of this ill neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cauſe he ſent over C. Lælius his Embaſſador to deal with Syphax: who declaring that the Carthaginians did very ill in Italy, and had nothing now at all to do in Spain, eaſily perſwaded the King to take part with thoſe that had the better, and were without queſtion his better friends. Only Syphax requeſted that the Roman General ſhould viſit him in perſon, to conclude the League; by which he was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treaty. Hereto Scipio condeſcended, thinking the friendſhip of ſo great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not far diſtant from Spain, well worthy of the adventure. So with two Quinqueremes Gallies he took Sea, and arrived in the Kings Port, at the ſame time with Aſdrubal. This would have been very dangerous unto him, had he been deſcryed by his enemies further at Sea: but in the Haven they forbear to make offer one upon another. Syphax might well be proud; ſeeing at one time, two ſuch Captains of two moſt powerful Cities, came to deſire his friendſhip. He would have brought them to treat of peace: But the Roman excuſed himſelf, by want of ſuch Commiſſion from the Senate. He feaſted them together: and ſhortly diſmiſſed Scipio, with whom he readily entred into Covenant; which in time of performance, he as readily brake,

§. II.

Funeral games held by Scipio. A Duel between two Spaniſh Princes. A digreſſion concerning Duels.

SCipio returning into Spain, and reſting that Winter, took vengeance the next year, upon thoſe of Illiturgi, Caſtulo, and Aſtapa, as hath been ſaid before. The conqueſt of the Country being then in a manner at an end; he performed at new Carthage, with great ſolemnity, ſome Vows that he had made, and honoured the memory of his Father and Uncle, with funeral games, eſpecially of thoſe that fought at ſharp, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needful that he ſhould trouble himſelf with preparing ſlaves for that ſpectacle, to hazard their lives, as was uſed in the City of Rome: for there were enow, that either offered, themſelves as Voluntaries, or were ſent from their Princes, to give proof in ſingle combat, of the valour that was in their ſeveral Countries. Some alſo there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwiſe end, agreed to defer the deciſion of their Controverſies, to tryal of the ſword, in ſingle fight. Among theſe, the moſt eminent, were Corbis and Orſua; Coſen-germans: that contended for the principality of a Town called Ibes. Corbis was the elder, and the elder brothers ſon: wherefore he claimed the Lordſhip, as eldeſt of the houſe, after the manner of our Iriſh Tampſtry. But the father of Orſua ſtood lately ſeized of the principality: which though himſelf received by the death of his elder brother; yet this his Son would not let it go back, but claimed to hold it as heir unto his father, and old enough to rule. Fain would Scipio have compounded the matter. But they anſwered peremptorily, that all their friends and kindred had already laboured in vain, to take up their quarrel; and that neither God nor Man, but only Mars, their god of battle, ſhould be Umpire between them. So they had their wills: and the elder, who was alſo the ſtronger, and more skilful at his weapon, eaſily vanquiſhed the fool-hardineſs of the younger.

Such combates have been very ancient and perhaps more ancient, than any other kind of fight. We read of many performed before the War of Troy; by Theſeus, Hercules, Pollux, and others: as alſo of two more at the War of Troy, the one between Paris and Menelaus; the other between Hector and Ajax. Neither want there examples of them among the Hebrews: whereof that between David and Goliah; and others performed by ſome of Davids Worthies, againſt thoſe that challenged them, are greatly celebrated. Unto the ſame kind appertains the fight between twelve of the Tribes of Juda, and as many of the Benjamites. The Romans had many of them: whereof that was principal, in which they ventured their Dominion upon the heads of three brethren the Horatii, againſt the three brethren, Curatii, that were Albans. The combat of Manlius Torquatus; and ſhortly after: of Valerius Corvinus, with two Champions of the Gauls, which challenged any Roman; were of leſs importance, as having only reference to bravery. In England there was a great Combat fought between Edmond Ironſide, and Canutus the Dane, for no leſs matter than the Kingdom. The uſe of them was very frequent in the Saxon times; almoſt upon every occaſion, great or ſmall. In the reign of Edward the third, who ſuſtained the party of Mountfort, againſt the Earl of Bloys, contending for the Dutchy of Britain; there was a fight for honour of the Nations, between thirty of the Britans, and thirty Engliſh: two of which Engliſh, were Calverlie, a brave Captain; and that Sir Robert Knolles is, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French wars, and did highly honour his blood, whereof the Lord Knolles is deſcended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in Engliſh, French and Italian Hiſtories. Moſt of them have been combats of bravery, and of gayeté de cœur, as the French term it; for honour of ſeveral Nations; for love of Miſtreſſes; or whatſoever elſe gave occaſion unto men, deſirous to ſet out themſelves. But beſides thoſe of this ſort, there are two other natures of combats; which are, either upon accuſation for life, or upon trial of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of right. And of this latter kind, was that, of which we ſpeak even now, between Corbis and Orſua. Unto theſe (methinks) may be added, as of different condition from the reſt, the combat upon Wager; ſuch as were that between David and Goliah, or that between the Horatii and Curatii, in which without regard of Tittle, the Dominion of Nations, one over the other, is adventured upon the head of Champions. Upon an accuſation for life, there was a combat appointed between the Lord Henry of Boulinbrook Duke of Hereford, and Moubray Duke of Norfolk. There was a combat performed by Sir John Anſley and one Cattrington: whom Anſley charged with treaſon: and proved it upon him, by being victorious. The like was fought between Robert of Mountfort and Henry Eſſex. The like alſo, between a Navarrois, and one Welſh of Grimsby, whom the Navarrois accuſed of treaſon: but, being beaten in fight, confeſſed that he had belyed him, and was therefore drawn and hanged. Whether our tryal by battle to determine, that the falſe accuſer, if he be vanquiſhed, ſhall ſuffer the puniſhment which had been due to the offender, if the accuſation had been proved; I cannot affirm. But we every where find, That if he which is accuſed of treaſon, or according to the cuſtoms of Normandy, of Murder, Rape, or burning of places (offences puniſhed by death) be overcome, He ſhall ſuffer the pains appointed for thoſe crimes. In combats for tryal of right, it is not ſo: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in perſon, but he may try it by his Champion, as did Paramour and Low, or offered to do, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. And in this caſe, he that is beaten or yieldeth, loſeth only his cauſe, not his life. Neither are the combats upon accuſation, or tryal of right, fought in open field, as are thoſe of bravery; but in Camp cloſe, that is, within rails. Now this trial by combat was ſo ordinary in France, before the time of S. Lewis and Philip the fair his grand-child, as every Lord of Fee, Eccleſiaſtical or Temporal, had power to grant it within his own Juriſdiction. And it ſeemeth, that the French Kings, and other Lords, made their profit hereby. For in the * Memorials of the Chamber of Accounts, is found an Article to this effect; That if a Combat were once accepted, and after, by conſent of the Lord, were taken up, each of the parties ſhould pay two ſhillings ſix pence; but if it were performed, then ſhould the party vanquiſhed forfeit an hundred and twelve ſhillings.

And upon this custom grew the French Proverb, which they use when any man hath had an hard and unjust judgement; saying, That He was tryed by the Law of Loray or Berne; on le battu oaye l' amende, where he that is beaten gives the recompence. Of the these frequent trials by battle that great learned man Yvo, Bishop of Chartres did often complain, and specially against the French Church-men: as appears by * his Letters to the Bishop of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Rembert Arch-bishop of Sens, and to others; wherein he rebukes the judgement of their Churches, that had ratified such challenges of combat. But this liberty and kind of tryal, was retrencht by S. Lewis, and Philip the fair; so that no man could decree or grant it, save the King himself. It hath since been granted, though more sparingly, by the French King, as to the Lord of Carogues, against Jaques le Gris, and to Julian Romero the Spaniard, against Moro his country-man; wherein Sir Henry Knevet, Father to the Lord Knevet now living, was Patron to Romero that had the victory; and lastly to the Lord of Chast. Now in those challenges, upon accusation of Treason, Murder, other offences deserving death (and in those only) the rule held, That le defendeur estoit tenu de proposer ces deffences par un dementir; The defendant was bound to plead not guilty, by giving the accuser the Lye: otherwise it was concluded, that the defendant did taisiblement confesser le crime; silently confess the crime. But after such time as Francis the French King, upon some dispute about breach of Faith, had sent the Lye, unto the Emperor Charles the fifth, thereby to draw him to personal combat; every petty companion in France, in imitation of their Master, made giving of the Lye mortality it self; holding it a matter of no small glory, to have it said, That the meanest Gentleman in France would not put up, what the great Emperour Charles V. had patiently endured.

From this beginning is derived a challenge of combat, grounded upon none of those occasions that were known to the Ancient. For, the Honour of Nations, the Tryal of Right, the Wager upon Champions, or the Objection and Refutation of capital offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of half so many Duels, as are founded upon meer private Anger, yea, or upon matter seeming worthy of anger in the opinion of the Duellists. So that in these daies, wherein every man takes unto himself a Kingly liberty, to offer, accept, and appoint personal combats, the giving of the Lye, which ought to be the Negation only in accusations for life, is become the most fruitful root of deadly quarrels. This is held a word so terrible, and a wrong so unpardonable, as will admit no other recompence, than the blood of him that gives it. Thus the fashion, taken up in haste by the French Gentlemen, after the pattern of their King, is grown to be a custome: whence we have derived a kind of Art and Philosophy of quarrel; with certain grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are reduced. Yea, there are (among many no less ridiculous) some so mystical curiosities herein, as that it is held a far greater dishonour, to receive from an enemy a slight touch with a Cane, than a sound blow with a Sword; the one having relation to a slave, the other to a souldier. I confess that the difference is pretty: though for my own part, if I had had any such Italianated enemy in former times, I should willingly have made with him such an exchange; and and have given him the point of honour to boot.

But let us examine indifferently the offence of of this terrible word, the Lye; with their conditions who are commonly of all other the most tender in receiving it. I say, that the most of these, who present death on the points of their swords to all that give it them; use nothing so much in their conversation and course of life, as to speak and swear falsly. Yea, it is thereby, that they shift and shuffle in the World, and abuse it. For how few are there among them, which, having assumed and sworn to pay the moneys, and other things they borrow, do not break their word and promise, as often as they engage it? Nay, how few are there among them, that are not Lyars by Record, by being sued in some Court or other of Justice, upon breach of word or Bond? For he which hath promised that he will pay money by a day, or promised any thing else, wherein he faileth; hath directly lied to him to whom the promise hath been made. Nay, what is the profession of love that men make now a daies? What is the vowing of their service, and of all they have, used in their ordinary complements, and (in effect) to every man whom they bid not good morrow, or salute, other than a courteous and Court-like kind of lying? It is (saith a wise French man, deriding therein the Apish custome of his Country) un marche & complot fait ensemble, se mocquer, mentar, & piper les un les autres; A kind of merchandize, and complot made among them, to mock, belye, and deride each other: and so far now-adaies in fashion, and in use; as he that useth it not, is accounted either dull or Cynical. True it is notwithstanding (omitting the old distinction) that there is great difference between these mannerly and complemental lyes, with those which are sometime perswaded by necessity upon breach of promise; and those which men use out of cowardize and fear; the latter confessing themselves to be in greater awe of men, than of God; a vice of all other stiled the most villanous. But now for the Lye it self, as it is made the subject of all our deadly quarrels in effect, to it I say, That whosoever giveth another man the Lye, when it is manifest that he hath lyed, doth himself no wrong at all; neither ought it to be more hainously taken, than to tell him, he hath broken any promise which he hath otherwise made. For he that promiseth any thing, tells him, to whom he hath promised, that he will perform it; and, in not performing it, he had made himself a Lyar. On the other side, He that gives any man the Lye, when he himself knows, that he, to whom it is given, hath not lyed; doth therein give the Lye directly to himself. And what cause have I, if I say that the Sun shines when it doth shine, and that another fellow tells me I I lye, for it's midnight; to prosecute such an one to death, for making himself a foolish Ruffian and a lyar in his own knowledge? For he that gives the Lye in any other dispute, than in defence of his Loyalty, or Life; gives it impertinently, and Ruffian-like. I will not deny but it is an extream rudeness to tax any man in publick with an untruth (if it be not pernicious, and to this prejudice against whom the untruth is uttered:) But all that is rude, ought not to be civilized with death. That were more to admire and imitate a French custome, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the councel of God. But you will say, that these discourses savour of cowardize. It is true; if you call it cowardize to fear God or hell: whereas he that is truly wise, and truly valiant valiant, knows that there is nothing elſe to be feared. For againſt an Enemies ſword, we ſhall find ten thouſand ſeven penny-men (waged at that price in the wars) that fear it as little, or perchance leſs, than any profeſt Sword-man in the world. Diligentiſſima in tutelâ ſui Fortitudo; Fortitude is a diligent preſerver of it ſelf. It is (ſaith Ariſtotle) a modiocrity between doubting and daring. Sicut non Martyrem pœna; ſic nec fortem pugna, ſed cauſa: As it is not the puniſhment that makes the Martyr: ſo it is not fighting that declares a valiant man: but fighting in a good cauſe. In which, whoſoever ſhall reſolvedly end his life, reſolvedly in reſpect of the cauſe, to wit; in defence of his Prince, Religion or Countrey: as he may juſtly be numbred among the Martyrs of God; ſo may thoſe that die with malicious hearts, in private combats, be called the Martyrs of the Devil. Neither do we indeed take our own revenge, or puniſh the injuries offered us, by the death of the injurious. For the true conqueſt of revenge is, to give him, of whom we would be revenged, cauſe to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death upon our own conſciences; Animaſq; in vulnere ponere; And to drown our ſouls in the wounds and blood of our enemies. Hereupon you will again ask me, if I condemn, in generous and noble ſpirits, the defence of their honours, being preſt with injuries? I ſay that I do not, if the injuries be violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the Eternal Law: and the Laws of all Chriſtian Kings and States; do favour him that is aſſailed, in the ſlaughter of the aſſailant. You will ſecondly ask me, Whether a Noble-man, or a Gentleman, being challenged by Cartel by one of like quality, be not bound in point of honour to ſatisfie the challenger in private combat? I anſwer that he is not: becauſe (omitting the greateſt, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrary and oppoſite to that, which they call the point of honour; The Law which hath dominion over it, which can judge it, which can deſtroy it; except you will ſtile thoſe Acts honourable, where the Hang-man gives the Garland. For, ſeeing the Laws of this Land have appointed the Hang-man to ſecond the Conqueror, and the Laws of God appointed the Devil to ſecond the Conquered, dying in malice: I ſay, that he is both baſe and a fool, that accepts of any Cartel ſo accompanied. To this, perchance it will be anſwered, That the Kings of England, and other Chriſtian Kings, have ſeldome taken any ſuch advantage over men of quality, who upon even terms have ſlain their private enemies. It is true, that as in times of trouble and combuſtion they have not often done it; ſo did our Noble-men and Gentlemen in former ages; in all important injuries, ſue unto the King, to approve themſelves by battle and publick combat. For as they dared not to brave the Law; ſo did they diſdain to ſubmit themſelves unto the ſhameful revenge thereof; the ſame revenge (becauſe it deteſteth murder) that hath declared againſt a common Cut-purſe or other Thieves: Nay let it be granted that a pardon be procured for ſuch offenders: yet it is not the manſlayer freed from his pardon. For theſe two remedies hath the party grieved notwithſtanding; that is, to require juſtice by grand Aſſize, or by battle, upon his appeal, which (ſaith Sir Thomas Smith) is not denyed; and he further ſaith (for I uſe his own words) That if the Defendant (to wit, the manſlayer) be convinced either by great Aſſize or by Battle, upon that appeal; the manſlayer ſhall die notwithſtanding the Princes pardon. So favourable (ſaith the ſame learned Gentleman) are our Princes, and the Law of our Realm, to juſtice and to the puniſhment of blood violenly ſhed. It may further be demanded, how our Noblemen and Gentlemen ſhall be repaired in honour, where an enemy, taking the ſtart either in words or blows ſhall lay on them an infamy unſufferable: I ſay, that a Marſhals Court will eaſily give ſatisfaction in both. And if we hold it no diſgrace to ſubmit our ſelves for the recovery of our Debts, Goods, and Lands; and for all things elſe by which the lives of our ſelves, our wives, and children, are ſuſtained, to the Judges of the Law; becauſe it may be felony to take by violence even that which is our own: why ſhould we not ſubmit our ſelves unto the Judges of honour in caſes of honour; becauſe to recover our reputation by ſtrong hand, may be murder? But yet again it may be objected, that the loſs of honour ought to be much more fearful unto us, than either the loſs of our goods, of our lands, or of our lives; and I ſay ſo too. But what is this honour, I mean honour indeed, and that which ought to be ſo dear unto us: other than a kind of Hiſtory, or fame following actions of vertue, actions accompanied with difficulty or danger and undertaken for the publick good? In theſe he that is imployed and truſted, if he fail in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other baſe affection; it is true that he loſeth his honour. But the acting of a private combate, for a private reſpect, and moſt commonly a frivolous one; is not an action of vertue, becauſe it is contrary to the Law of God, and of all Chriſtian Kings: neither is it difficult, becauſe even and equal in perſons and arms: neither for a publick good, but tending to the contrary; becauſe the loſs or mutilation of an able man, is alſo a loſs to the Common-weal.

Sir Tho. Smith in his Commonwealth of England.

Now that a Marſhal of England hath power to ſave every mans fame and reputation, as far as reputation may ſuſtain injury by words, I think no man doubteth. For to repent us of any evil words that we have given, and to confeſs that we have done him wrong, unto whom we have given them, is a ſufficient ſatisfaction; and as may fall out; more than ſufficient. For he that gives ill words in choler, and ſuddenly denyes them, or repents himſelf of them upon adviſement hath the diſadvantage in point of reputation. Concerning blows, which are in deed not to be given but to thoſe that are ſervile, whether ſufficient recompence will be made for them, it ſhall appear by a notable example of a moſt worthy Gentleman Monſieur de Pleſſis, that was ſtricken not long ſince by a Baron of the ſame nation. The ſatisfaction which was given him by a judgement of the Conſtable and Marſhals of France, was this. In the open Court, wherein the Conſtable gave judgement, M. de Pleſſis was ſet in a chair under the degrees where the Conſtable and Marſhals ſate: the Baron, who had given him the blow, did kneel before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a Sword, with the point towards himſelf, and in his left hand the like cudgel or baſtinado, wherewith he had ſtricken M. de Pleſſis, both which weapons he delivered into Pleſſis's hands, ſubmitting himſelf to ſuch revenge, as it ſhould pleaſe him to take with either of theſe weapons; the Conſtable and Marſhals having formerly left it to the will of Pleſſis, to uſe his own diſcretion in the revenge of his own wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reaſon to pleaſe himſelf, as one before-hand in point of honour, (who ſtruck M. de Pleſſis like a Ruffian coming behind him, and having the advantage of company, and his horſes ready, ſhifted himſelf away on the ſudden; but being afterwards taken, was taught to repent himſelf in this ſhameful manner:) or whether M. de Pleſſis (of whoſe valour no man doubted) had not far juſter cauſe to reſt ſatisfied, ſince he might at his pleaſure have beaten or wounded his enemy, but forgave him: let any wiſe man judge. To this, if it be ſaid, That the Baron was conſtrained to make his ſubmiſſion, that his repentance was enforced, and not voluntary; and therefore no diſgrace unto him: I anſwer, that one may ſay as well, that it is no diſgrace to a Thief, when he is brought to the Gallows, to repent him of the Robberies by him committed, becauſe his repentance alſo is conſtrained. And it is true, that enforced repentance is no grace in reſpect of a force, but in reſpect of the fact: which (but for our ſins to God) makes all repentance ſhameful: becauſe all forced repentance is inflicted upon us for ſomewhat unworthy of a Gentleman, and of an honeſt man. Nay, voluntary repentance it ſelf, as it hath relation to men, ariſeth either out of the fear of the ill that may befall us, or out of the acknowledgment of our own weakneſs. Certainly as wiſe men, and valiant men, do rather deride petty injuries or ſudden injuries, that are not offered from malice fore-thought, than revenge them: ſo men, apt to quarrel, do commonly ſuſpect their own valour; and rather deſire that thereby the world ſhould believe them to be of great daring, than know any ſuch reſolution in themſelves. For he that knows himſelf indeed to be an honeſt man, ſcorns to hunt after opinion.

Now the ſame power which the Conſtable and Marſhals of France have, hath alſo a Marſhal of England, or his Deputies: by whoſe judgement, in all diſputes of honour, every mans reputation may be preſerved, we may therefore as well ſubmit our ſelves to the Judge of honour, in all diſputes of honour, as we do ſubmit our ſelves in all controverſies of livelihood and life, to the Judges of the Law. And, out of doubt, the inſtitution of this Court of Chevalry in England, in France, and elſewhere: was no leſs charitable than politick. For the blood of man, violently ſpilt, doth not bring forth hony-bees as that of Bulls doth, which ſting but the fingers, or the face: but it produceth that monſtrous beaſt, Revenge, which hath ſtung to death, and eaten up, of ſeveral nations, ſo many noble perſonages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatning the wrath of God upon ſupream Governours, than the permiſſion.

His Majeſty therefore (which Henry the IV. of France alſo endeavoured) hath done a moſt Kingly and Chriſtian-like deed in Scotland, which the moſt renowned of all his predeceſſors could never do: in beating down, and extinguiſhing that hereditary proſecution of malice, called the deadly feud; a conqueſt, which ſhall give him the honour of Prudence and Kingly power for evermore. And we have cauſe to hope, that his Royal care ſhall be no leſs happy in preventing the like miſchief, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and brave, yet outragious vanity of Duelliſts.

Unto this that I have ſpoken of lying, and of man-ſlaughter, it muſt be added, That each of theſe are of great Latitude, and worthy of reproof and vengeance proportionably, more or leſs, in their ſeveral degrees. There is much difference between Lies of neceſſity upon breach of promiſe, or complemental lies; and ſuch pernicious lies, as proceed from fear and cowardize, or are uttered by falſe witneſſes: the former ſort being excuſable by weakneſs or levity; the latter being altogether deteſtable. No leſs, if not more, difference there is, between killing of a man in open field, with even weapons; and that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dolo or per inſidias; though our Laws do not much diſtinguiſh them in puniſhment. For in the latter, God, forſaking his own priviledge, commandeth that the guileful murderer be drawn by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither is every guilful murder performed by the Sword, nor by overt violence: but there is a guileful murder alſo, by poyſoning: and by the pen, or by practice. For ſuch diſtinction is found, between coming preſumptuouſly upon a man, to ſlay him with guile; and lying in wait for blood, privily, for the innocent, without a cauſe, upon hope of ſpoil, after ſuch manner as the net is ſpread before the eyes of the Birds. Francis the firſt, Queen Mary of England, and the Kings Majeſty now reigning, have given notable teſtimony of their juſtice, upon three Noble men, who committed guileful murder. Of the firſt kind, King Francis upon the Lord of Talard: who being (ſaith the French Hiſtorian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & ſupport de pluſieurs grandes alliances; who being of high and ancient lineage, and ſupported by divers great alliances, of which the Cardinal of Bellay (in eſpecial favour with the King) was one; was notwithſtanding delivered over into the hands of the Hangman. Q. Mary, upon a Noble man of her own Religion, and in many other reſpects very dear unto her, His Majeſty, upon a Baron of Scotland; whoſe houſe was no leſs ancient and faithful, than himſelf valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilefully by poyſon, and of puniſhment following ſuch wicked Artiſans, every age hath had too many examples. Of killing guilefully by the pen (that I may not ſpeak of any Engliſh Judge) the French Recherches gives us two notable inſtances: the one of des Eſhars, who (ſaith Paſquier) fit mourir Montaigu grand Maiſtre de France, pour contenter l'opinion celuy dont il eſtoit lors idolaſtre; & Dieu permit que depuis il fut pendu & eſtrangle; Who cauſed Montaigu great Maſter of France to die to content his mind (to wit, the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Eſhars worſhipped as his Idol; but God permitted, that he himſelf was ſoon after hanged and ſtrangled. The other was of the Great Francis the firſt, upon his Chancellor Poyet: who to ſatisfie the Kings paſſion, practiced the deſtruction of the Admiral Chabot; a man moſt nobly deſcended, and of great ſervice. For as in other men, ſo in Kings, the paſſion of love grows old, and wears out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admiral, he charged him with ſome offences, which he had formerly committed: The Admiral preſuming upon the great good ſervice which he had done the King in Piemont, and in the defence of Marcilles againſt the Emperor, gave the King other language than became him; and deſired nothing ſo much, as a publick trial. Hereupon the King (it being eaſie to provoke an ill diſpoſition) gave Commiſſion to the Chancellor, as Preſident, and other Judges, upon an information of the Kings Advocate, to queſtion the Admirals life; The Chancellor, an ambitious man, and of a large conſcience, (which is not rare in men towards the law) hoping highly to content the King; wrought with ſome of the Judges with ſo great cunning; with others with ſo ſharp threats; and with the reſt, with ſo fair promiſes; as albeit nothing could be proved againſt the Admiral, worthy of the Kings diſpleaſure, yet the Chancellor ſubſcribed, and got others to ſubſcribe, to the forfeiture of his Eſtate, Offices, and Liberty, though not able to prevail againſt his life. But what was the Chancellors reward (the King hating falſhood in ſo great a Magiſtrate) other than his own degradation, arraignment, and condemnation? Belle les ont certes (ſaith Paſquier) a tout Juge pur de-meurer touſiours en ſoy, & ne laiſſer fluctuer ſa conſcience debans les vagues d'une imaginare faveur, qui pour fin de jeu le ſubmerge; A fair Leſſon to all Judges, to dwell alwayes in themſelves, and not to ſuffer their conſciences to float upon the waves of imaginary favour, which in the end overwhelms them. And as for the Admiral, though it might have been anſwered unto his friends, if any bewail his calamity as undeſerved, That he was tryed, according to his own deſire, by the Laws of his Country, and by the Judges of Parliament; yet the Kings Juſtice, ſurmounting all other his paſſions, gave back unto him his Honour, his Offices, his Liberty, and his Eſtate.

†. III.

The laſt Acts of Scipio in Spain, His return to Rome, where he is choſen Conſul.

THe laſt buſineſs that troubled Scipio in Spain, grew by the rebellion of the people, and mutiny of his Souldiers. He fell dangerouſly ſick, in ſuch ſort that the rumour of his death, ran current throughout Spain. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, petty Kings, that had forſaken the Carthaginians, and followed Scipio a while before, to take Arms againſt the Romans. They were vainly perſwaded, that after the Carthaginians were driven out, they themſelves ſhould become the mightieſt in all Spain. But ſeeing now, that things were no way anſwerable to the greatneſs of their hopes; they thought it beſt, to take the preſent advantage, and hammer out their own fortunes. So they raſhly fell upon the Sueſſetani and Sedetani, confederates of the Romans; and waſted their Country. Part of the Roman Army lying at Sucro, inſtead of making head againſt theſe Rebels, grew to be affected with the like diſtemper. They had not reaped ſuch profit of the Roman Conqueſts, as might ſatisfie their deſires; or as they thought, eaſie to be gotten, if they might be their own Carvers. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported, they thought that the time ſerved very well to enrich themſelves with the ſpoil of the Country. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greateſt of all, driving away their Colonels, that ſhould have bridled their fury; they choſe out of their own number two baſe fellows, Albinus Calenus, and Atrius Umber, to their Commanders. Theſe took upon them all the Enſigns of Pro-conſuls, or Pro-pretors; as if this their election had been like to that, wherein Lucius Marcius was choſen by the Souldiers after the death of the two Scipio's: But whilſt they were deviſing what exploits they might do, for the enriching of themſelves, in a time of ſuch combuſtion as was expected, there arrived more certain news, that Scipio was both alive, and in good health. There came alſo new Colonels, ſent unto them from their General: who mildly rebuking their want of conſideration, and ſeeming to be glad that they had no further over-ſhot themſelves; led them to Carthagena, there to receive their pay. Before their coming, Scipio had reſolved to do exemplary juſtice on the principal offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them in fear of what they had deſerved. Therefore he cauſed Syllanus to make ready their Companies which lay before in the Town, as it were to make an expedition againſt Mandonius and Indibilis: he cauſed Albius and Atrius, with ſome thirty other of their Complices, to be ſecretly apprehended in their lodgings: he called the Mutiners to aſſembly; and having them unarmed as they were, encircled round by Syllanus and his companies, prepared for the purpoſe; he bitterly inveighed againſt them all as Traitors. This done, Albius and Atrius, with the other priſoners, were haled to the ſtake, where they were whipt and beheaded, as was the Roman cuſtom toward ſuch offenders. The reſt of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thouſand, were cauſed to take their oath of obedience anew; and received every man his pay when he was ſworn.

Mandonus and Indibilis continued in arms: notwithſtanding that they had certain word of Scipio his life and health. Well they could have been contented to be quiet: but by the ſeverity uſed to the Roman Souldiers, they ſtood in fear, as being Spaniards, and greater offenders, of harder meaſure. Scipio went againſt them, and found them in a valley, that was ſcarce large enough to hold all their Army. In the entrance thereof he fought with them: and ſending Lælius with all hie horſe, to fetch a compaſs about the hills, and charge them in rear, he overthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonus had after this, no hope remaining to preſerve themſelves and their eſtates, otherwiſe than by making ſubmiſſion. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio: and humbly craving pardon, both for himſelf and for his brother Indibilis, obtained his requeſt; yet ſo, that they were taught to acknowledge themſelves leſs free Princes than formerly they had been.

Afterwards Scipio went toward Gades: and was met on the way by Maſaniſſa; who ſecretly promiſed to do him all ſervice, if the people of Rome would ſend him to make war in Africk. Unto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage, that letting all care of Spain alone, he ſhould thence depart from his Fleet into Italy; and there wage an Army of Gauls and Ligurians, to joyn with Hannibal. For this purpoſe, was mony ſent unto him from Carthage; and he himſelf laid hold upon all that he could find in the Town of Gades; without ſparing either private men, the common treaſury, or the Temples. In this voyage thence, he landed at Carthagena; hoping to have taken it by ſurpriſe. But he failed in the attempt, and was ſo beaten to his ſhips, that he returned back to repoſe himſelf a while at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the robberies and ſpoil that he had made at his taking leave of them, would would not ſuffer him again to enter into their City. By this he foreſaw, that it would not be long e're they became Romans. Wherefore ſending Meſſengers into the Town, to complain of this uncourteous dealing, he allured their Magiſtrates forth unto him; whom, notwithſtanding all the excuſe that they could make, he whipt and crucified. This done, he followed his former intended voyage; bidding Spain farewell for ever.

The Iſle and City of Gades, was yielded to the Romans, preſently after the departure of Mago. Then did Scipio deliver up the Province, to thoſe that were ſent from Rome to ſucceed him therein: and himſelf with ten ſhips returned home. At his coming to Rome, he made ſuit for the honour of a triumph, But it was denied him: for that it had as yet been granted unto no Pro-conſul, excepting to ſuch, as received that dignity after a Conſulſhip, as it were by prorogation. But to make amends for this repulſe, the election of new Conſuls being then in hand, by general voice of the City, P. Cornelius Scipio was choſen Conſul, and P. Licinius Craſſus joyned with him. This Craſſus, being high-Prieſt, or Biſhop of the Romans, might not by the cuſtom of thoſe times, go far from the City; as being to attend the matters of their ſuperſtition: though Cæſar, and others, who in ages following held the ſame office, were ſtayed by no ſuch religious impediment, from being far and long abſent. Hereby it came to paſs, that Scipio, deſiring to have the war transferred into Africk, was in no danger to loſe that honourable charge, by any miſchance of lot, in the diviſion of Provinces; for that his Colleague was not capable of employment ſo far off.

SECT. XVIII.

Scipio obtains leave to make war in Africk. His preparations. Of Maſaniſſa who was joyned with Scipio. The victories againſt Aſdrubal and Syphax.

Pub. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Craſſus, entring into their Conſulſhip, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: where it was decreed, that Scipio ſhould be allowed, to beſtow part of the money which he had brought out of Spain into the treaſury; upon the ſetting forth of ſolemn plays, that he had vowed to make whilſt he was buſied in his Spaniſh wars. This helped well to revive the memory of his victories already gotten; and to give hope unto the People of greater victories in the war, which he intended to make in Africk. To the ſame purpoſe, did the Spaniſh Embaſſages avail much in the Senate; eſpecially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions highly and deſervedly; ſaying, that they were the moſt happy of all their Countrymen, ſince they being preſent, had ſeen him choſen Conſul, and ſhould carry home ſuch joyful news. The Saguntine Embaſſadors were lovingly entertained by the Senate: as their faith to Rome (though coſtly it were both to them and to the Romans) had well deſerved. Nevertheleſs, when Scipio propoſed, that Africk might be decreed unto him for his Province, there wanted not many, even of the principal men, that vehemently gainſaid him. Of theſe was Q. Fabius Maximus the chief: who ſeems to have been troubled with that diſeaſe, which too often cauſed men, renowned for long approved virtue, to look aſquint upon the actions of thoſe, that follow them in the ſame kind. He alledged many reaſons againſt the purpoſe of the Conſul; whereof the chief were, that the Treaſury was unable to ſuſtain the charges of a war in Africk; and that it was extreamly perilous to hazard ſo great forces, where they could not at pleaſure be recalled unto the defence of Rome it ſelf, if need required. Hereunto he added many words concerning the danger wherein Italy ſtood, not only of Hannibal, but of Mago his Brother, that was arming the Ligurians: as alſo concerning the honour of the Conſul; which would (he ſaid) be greater in ſetting Italy free from enemies, than it could be in doing any harm to Africk. Neither did he forget, both to elevate the Spaniſh wars, as of leſs moment than the intended voyage againſt Carthage, nor withall to lay great blame upon Scipio, for having ſuffered Aſdrubal to paſs into Italy: ſhewing, that it was greatly to be feared, leſt the like might happen again; and that a new Army, notwithſtanding the good ſucceſs of Scipio, (if it hapned to be good) might be ſent from Carthage, to the utter endangering of Rome, whileſt the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the main point which he urged, was, that neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be that year a Province; which the Conſul nevertheleſs propounded in ſuch wiſe, as if it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other ſide, inſiſted upon this one point; that it was better to make an offenſive, then a defenſive war, eſpecially againſt ſuch as the Carthaginians, who being ill provided of able men at home, did furniſh themſelves, by help of mony, with levies made abroad. As for the care of Italy, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Colleague, would be as well able to diſcharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promiſing to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his own home; and taxing as civilly as he could, the envy of Fabius, which withſtood ſuch a gallant enterpriſe, he propoſed the matter again to the Senate. Much alterations there was about the manner of his proceeding: foraſmuch as it was noiſed abroad, that if he could not bring the Senate to his mind, he would carry it by the people. This offended many of the ancients: who reſented in this honourable man, a little ſpice of that arrogancy, which in following ages grew to be much hotter, in thoſe that had commanded long abroad. But in concluſion, Scipio referred himſelf wholly to the Senates good will and pleaſure; whereby he obtained thus much, That the Iſle of Sicil might be appointed unto him for his Province; with leave to paſs over into Africk, if he found it expedient.

Want of money, and no great liking to his voyage, made the Roman Senate have little care to furniſh out Scipio to the war, by him intended upon Africk. Herewithall it fell out, that Mago, coming on the ſudden from the Baleares to Genua, and winning the Town, bred a fear of no leſs terrible invaſion upon Italy, than that which Aſdrubal had lately made. He could not indeed raiſe any great Army of the Ligurians; for that he found them diſtracted with civil wars. Therefore he was driven to make choice of his party; and to help thoſe whom he thought fitteſt for his turn, againſt the others. This troubleſome buſineſs, though it occupied more of his time than he could wil-willingly have ſpared: yet it got him reputation by his victories; and made the unſteady Gauls ready to enter into his pay. Hereupon the diſperſed Legions of the Romans, that under Pro-conſuls, and Prætors, lay ready to be imployed where need ſhould require; were directed unto the borders of Lombardy and Liguria, there to make head againſt Mago. But all his menaces paſſed away in vapour. For a fleet, either coming to his aid from Carthage, or by him ſent thither (the report is uncertain) loaden with the booty that he had taken, fell into the hands of the Roman Prætor, that governed in Sardinia. This did much diſable him: and though after a while there came letters from Carthage, together with ſtore of money, heartning him in his proceedings; yet ſome impediments which he found, and that fatal voyage of Scipio into Africk, diſturbed all; and made him be re-called home.

Againſt Hannibal was nothing done this year. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Hiſtorians have been pleaſed to take notice. Only it is ſaid, that he ſpent his Summer by the Temple of Juno Lacinia, where he raiſed an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, graven in Punick and Greek Letters. Such account of winnings paſt, is commonly in Gameſters that are at the height of their fortune, a cauſe of remiſſion and careleſneſs; in thoſe that are upon the loſing hand, a cauſe both of the ſame for the preſent, and ſhortly after of dejection, when they find a notable change. A great peſtilence infeſting both the Carthaginian and the Roman Camp, is ſaid to have been the occaſion of this years idleneſs; which fell out not much amiſs for the City of Rome, that was marvelouſly impoveriſhed by this war; and had already tryed the utmoſt way to defray the charges, which grew inſupportable. To relieve the preſent neceſſity, it was well thought upon, that a great part of Campania (not many years ſince confiſcated) ſhould be ſold, or let out: in which bargain, that the City might receive no loſs, the tenth part of the fine was ordained, as a reward unto the detectors of Lands concealed.

Of this, or other mony, none was given to Scipio. Neither was he allowed to make preſs of Souldiers for his African voyage; neither did he over-much labour to obtain it. That which the Senate refuſed, the people did for him: or rather they did it for themſelves; that were therein wiſer than the Senate. It is uſually found in Councels of eſtate, that the buſie, or obſtinate heads of a few do carry all the reſt. And many times men make a ſurrender of their own judgements, to the wiſdom, that hath gotten it ſelf a name, by giving happy direction in troubles forepaſt. Therefore, he that repoſeth himſelf upon the advice of many, ſhall often find himſelf deceived: the counſel of thoſe many being wholly directed by the Empire of a few, that over-ſway the reſt. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his wary nature ſorted well with the buſineſs, that fell out in the chief of his employment. Unto him therefore Q. Fulvius adhered; with others of the Senators, that were grown old in following one courſe; from which they could not ſhift, as the change of time required. But the People (who though they could not well adviſe, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend) embraced the needful reſolution of Scipio: in ſuch ſort, that beſides his Roman forces, he had from divers parts of Italy about ſeven thouſand Voluntaries. He had alſo proviſion from the ſeveral Towns: Corn, Iron, Canvas for Sails, Axes, Beed-hooks, Hand-mils, and the like implements; Firre for building of Ships, many thouſands of Targets, Helmets and Spears of all kinds: every place furniſhed him with that commodity, which it beſt could afford.

Unto this willingneſs of the people, the diligence of Scipio was correſpondent. In the compaſs of five and forty dayes he had both fell'd his Timber, built, and lanched twenty Trireme, and ten Quinquereme Gallies; wherewith he tranſported his Army into Sicil. In Sicil he found, beſides other forces, two Legions, that had ſerved at Cannæ: which were old Souldiers, and (as he himſelf well knew) not guilty of the overthrow; for which they had long undergone a heavy cenſure. They had ſerved under Marcellus and Lævinus, at the taking of many Cities and ſtrong pieces: in which regard, they were like to be of good uſe to him in Africk, where would be ſtore of ſuch employment. For increaſing the number of his horſe, he preſſed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthy young men, and ſuch as loved well their eaſe. Theſe he afterward diſcharged from the War, highly to their contentment: but with condition, that they ſhould deliver their Horſe and Arms, to as many Roman Gentlemen, which he brought over with him for the purpoſe. Whilſt he was providing to have things in a readineſs for Africk, the baniſhed Locrians, that followed the Roman ſide, made him acquainted with an intelligence, whereby they hoped to recover their City. Some handicrafts-men, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadels of Locri, (for there were two in the Town) being taken priſoners for the Romans, promiſed to betray the place, if they might be ranſomed and rewarded. Scipio being advertiſed of this, gave order to have the attempt made by night: which happily ſucceeded, and that Citadel was ſurpriſed. The other Citadel was ſtrongly defended by the Carthaginian Garriſon, which ſent to Hannibal for aid. The Romans in like ſort, fearing leſt their paucity ſhould make them too weak for Hannibal, craved help of the Conſul Scipio. The Towns-men were doubtfully affected: but the beſt, and moſt of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out; whom the coming of Scipio cauſed thence to depart; and cauſed likewiſe the Carthaginian Garriſon to abandon the other Citadel. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in the cuſtody of the Town. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Locrians unto the Roman Senate; not only againſt thoſe of the Garriſon: but much more againſt Pleminius the Captain, who gave bad example, and was worſe than all the reſt. Beſides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other villanies, the Temple of Proſerpina, that had a great fame of ſanctity, was ſpoiled by theſe barbarous Thieves. The Locrians therefore adviſed the Senate to make preſent amends to the Goddeſs for this ſacrilege: ſaying, that the like had never been committed, without notorious revenge by her taken upon the Authors. The Senate gave good ear to this complaint, comforted the Locrians, and redreſſed the injuries done unto them; ſent for Pleminius, with other principal offenders; whom they caſt into priſon, and uſed according to their deſerts: as alſo they reſtored unto Proſerpina her money twice told. But old Q. Fabius was not herewithal contented. He laid much of the blame upon Scipio, that had placed ſuch a man in Locri; and had had not carefully hearkned to the complaints made againſt him, but ſuffered him to run on in theſe his wicked courſes. By the ſharp invective that Fabius made, others took courage to ſpeak what they pleaſed, as well againſt the demeanour of Scipio, as againſt the diſſoluteneſs of his Army; which lay, as they ſaid, idle in Sicil, neither mindful of any ſervice toward, nor fit for it if need ſhould require. Finally, things were ſo far urged, that ten Legates were ſent over into Sicil, together with the Prætor appointed for that Iſland; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Ædiles; who ſhould examine theſe matters; and either cauſe the General to return into Italy, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all was, they found him ſo well prepared againſt Carthage, as that they haſtened him on his journey, and gave him high commendations at their return.

Scipio had already imployed Lælius in Africk; rather to make diſcovery, than to work any other great effect of war. He took a great booty: and ſtruck no little terror into the Carthaginians; who ſaw their affairs to be upon terms of change. But the greateſt fruit of his journey was, That ſpeaking with Maſaniſſa, he well informed himſelf of the ſtate of Africk; and knew what was to be expected of thoſe two Kings, that had promiſed to joyn with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Maſaniſſa his revolt from the Carthaginians, and his compact made underhand with Liv. lib. 21 the Romans, Livie doth profeſs, That there was no ſuch evident cauſe thereof at the preſent; but that the long continuance of his faith and conſtancy in following times, muſt help to prove, that this his change, was not without ſome good cauſe. But Appianus (an Hiſtorian far inferiour to Livie, both in worth and time) gives one reaſon ſo probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carryes with it a great appearance of neceſſary truth. Only the doubt is, How could it any way come to paſs, that the knowledge of ſuch a matter ſhould have eſcaped the diligence of Livie if it had been true: unleſs we ſhould believe, that he wilfully forbear to rehearſe a Tragedy; the ſorrow whereof would cauſe men to think amiſs of Scipio. Howſoever it was thus Appian tells it: and many circumſtances
Appian. Alexan. de Bell. Punic. of things done confirm it. Aſdrubal, the Son of Geſco, had a fair Daughter, whom both King Syphax and Maſaniſſa loved. Maſaniſſa, being brought up at Carthage, and being withall a goodly Gentleman of perſon, and excellent in qualities, was choſen by Aſdrubal to be his Son-in-law. When the Virgin was betrothed unto him, he went into Spain, and there did great Service. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the marriage of Aſdrubals Daughter to be a matter of State: and beſtowed her upon Syphax, without ſtanding to acquaint her Father or Maſaniſſa therewithall: This they did, for that Syphax was the more mighty Prince; and for that the indignity of the repulſe, had made him become their enemy. Hereof Maſaniſſa was advertiſed; and forthwith entred into intelligence with Scipio, ſecretly as he thought; yet not ſo ſecretly, but ſome notice was taken of it: which would have coſt him his life, had he not with great circumſpection conveighed himſelf home, into his Fathers Kingdom. Thus far forth we may believe Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things paſt, and following. Only it ſeems, that howſoever Sophonisba, the Daughter of Aſdrubal, was promiſed by the Carthaginians unto Syphax: yet ſince this their courteſie proceeded from fear, he thought it wiſdom to continue and increaſe the ſame their fear, by making fair promiſes to the Romans, until Aſdrubal had ſent for his daughter from Carthage, and marriage was conſummated. In other matters Liv. lib. 25 concerning the war it ſelf, wherein Appian differs much from Livie, and from Polybius, whom (as appears by the broken pieces of his works remaining) Livie did follow; it will be no offence, to take little heed unto his reports.

Maſaniſſa was the Son of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whoſe Father dying, the Crown deſcended, by order of the Country, unto Deſalces the Brother, not unto Maſaniſſa the Son. But this Uncle of Maſaniſſa ſhortly dyed: and his elder Son, who took poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, was vanquiſhed, and ſlain in a battle by a Rebel, that made himſelf Protector over the younger, which was a child. The Traitor fortified himſelf againſt Maſaniſſa, whoſe return he feared, by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not ſerve: He and his Pupil, were diſpoſſeſſed of their Eſtates by Maſaniſſa; that was a skilful Warriour, and well beloved for the memory of his Father Gala. The Carthaginians, in reaſon would have been glad, that Maſaniſſa, who had done them notable Service, was thus confirmed in his Eſtate, had they not been guilty of the injury by them done unto him; whileſt his Uncle or Couſin reigned, and he ſeemed unlikely to ſtand them in any ſtead. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his own malice, towards his Corrival, warred upon him; and over-charging him with numbers, drave him out of his Kingdom. Nevertheleſs, Maſaniſſa ſtill retained the hearts of his people; and thereby remained ſtrong enough to infeſt both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though he was often put in diſtreſs, by great forces that were ſent againſt him. He therefore keeping much about the leſſer Syrtis, between the borders of the Carthaginians, and the Nation of the Garamants, expected the coming of the Romans: yet ſo, as he made long roads over all the Country, even as far as Hippo; and when Lælius arrived thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him to haſten on Scipio to the invaſion of Africk.

But Syphax, in whoſe great aid and ſuccour was repoſed more hope of good ſucceſs, than could be expected from the good will of poor Maſaniſſa, ſent an Embaſſage into Sicil about the ſame time, which was little pleaſing unto Scipio. He excuſed himſelf of his promiſe lately made: and ſignified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, That he could not chuſe but fight for the defence of Africk, wherein he was born and reigned; and for the defence of his beloved wives Country, if it were invaded. Nevertheleſs, he promiſed to remain a Neuter, ſo long as the Romans and Carthaginians held war abroad, far enough from Africk, as hitherto they had done. This meſſage haſtened Scipio in his expedition, much more than any perſwaſion could have done. For, the promiſed aſſiſtance of Syphax had not a little advanced his enterpriſe; in procuring both the aſſent of the Senate, and the forwardneſs of many adventurers. Leſt therefore the failing of this hope, ſhould work too great a change in common opinion, He thought it the beſt way to prevent all diſcourſe, and ſet the war undertaken, immediately on foot. The Embaſſadors he diſmiſſed in haſte, with Letters to their King: wherein he willed him to conſider, that what he had promiſed, he had had also sworn; and therefore should do well to make it good. Having sent them away, he called his Souldiers together; and bade them make ready for the voyage, which he intended no longer to defer. For, said he, Masanissa hath been with Lælius: and Syphax hath newly sent to me; greatly wondring upon what I should thus stay; and saying, That they will provide for themselves, if I fail their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale prevented all further inquisition, that might else have been made concerning the message of these Embassadors: whose followers had been seen walking up and down Syracusa. And lest any thing should afterwards break out, that might hinder the business, Scipio immediately sent about his fleet unto Lylibæum: and requesting by letters M. Pomponius, that was Prætor in Sicil, to meet him there; hasted thither with his Army. Lylibæum he agreed with the Prætor, about the division of the Legions between them, which to leave behind for defence of the Island; and which to carry with him into Africk. What numbers he transported, it is not certain: some Historians reckoning only ten thousand foot; and two and twenty hundred horse; others increasing them to five and thirty thousand, horse and foot. Concerning his directions for embarquing, and other matters belonging to their course, I hold it needless to set them down; since they were points of ordinary care, and which it is like that neither he, when he took his voyage into Spain, nor others upon like occasions, have omitted; they being also word for word set down by an Historian, who borrowed them from Livie, and fitted them to a Prince of later age.

This Roman Army landed in Africk, near to a fore-land then called the fair Promontorie: which how far it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compass, I cannot precisely affirm; because it is uncertain, whether it were the Cape or Headland which bore the name of Mercury, and lay to the North-east of Carthage; or whether that of Apollo, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by West. The coming of Masanissa unto Scipio at his first arrival, helpt to confirm the opinion of Xylander, who thinks the fair Promontory to have been the same, that was also called Mercuries Cape, since with little difficulty Masanissa might come thither from the lesser Syrtis, whereabout was his common abiding. But for as much as without any memorable impediment soon after his arrival, Scipio encamped before Utica, that stood Westward from Carthage beyond the River Bagradas: it may rather seem, that he landed within the Promontory of Apollo; whence the way to Utica was not long. This is also strongly proved; for that out of Carthage were sent, the next day, five hundred horse to trouble him in his dis-embarking. Neither was it so hard for Masanissa, that roved about the Country with a troop of horse, to find out the Romans, though they landed far from the place to the which he usually resorted, like as before he had met with Lælius at Hippo that was farther off; as it would have been for Scipio, with his Army and Carriages, to overcome the trouble of a long journey, and fetch a great compass to Utica, by Land; when he might have dis-embarqued nearer unto it. Nevertheless it may pass as a conjecture, That Scipio came first of all to Emporio, a plentiful Region about the lesser Syrtis; since he gave charge to the Masters of his ships, at the setting forth from Lilybæum, to shape their course for that coast. The Country thereabout was very rich, and fit for sustenance of an Army: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well provided to make resistance. Thus much perhaps Masanissa had signified unto Lælius, when he spake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, howsoever they made brave promises, would not come strong enough to fight at head. But when he saw their Fleet and Army to be such, as not only served to invade the lands of Carthage, but threatned a conquest of the City and whole Estate: then might he better advise them to set sail for Utica, and make War upon the Enemies at their own doors.

The Carthaginians had at that time neither any Captain of great worth at home, nor better Army than of raw Souldiers; that were levied, or to be levied in haste. Asdrubal the son of Gesco, the same that had lately been chased out of Spain by Scipio, was their best man of war. And good enough perhaps he was thought by Hanno and his fellows, of whose faction he was: or if ought were wanting in him, yet this Riches and Nobility, together with the affinity of King Syphax, made him passable. He was then with the King his son-in-law, working him no doubt against the Romans: when letters were brought from Carthage both to Syphax and to him, informing them of the Invasion: entreating the one of them to give assistance, and commanding the other to make his repair unto the City, where he was chosen General. But e're these could be ready, Scipio had beaten the troop of Carthaginian horse, that were sent out of the City to disturb his landing; and slain Hanno a young Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and sacked a Town of the Carthaginians: wherein, besides other booty, he took eight thousand prisoners; all which he conveighed aboord his Hulks or Ships of burden, and sent them back loaden into Sicil. He took likewise a Town called Salera which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with four thousand Numidian horse: whose service being fitter, for the field, than for defence of walled places, made Scipio to perceive the unskilfulness of their Leader, that had thus housed them. Wherefore he sent Masanissa before him: who rode up to the gates; and, by making a bravado, trained out the improvident Hanno so far, that he drew him into a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victory was easily gotten, and Hanno either taken or slain. With those that fled, the Romans entered pell-mell into the Town, which presently they made their own. Thence went Scipio to Utica, a City of great importance, of which mention hath been formerly made, and sate down before it, Forty dayes he spent about it, assailing it both by Land and Sea, and using all his engines of battery, whereof he had plenty, yet was in no likelihood of prevailing. And now the Summer was quite spent: so that it was time for him to choose a place, and fortifie his Winter Camp, which must be well stored against the year following. Whilst thus necessity urged him to leave Utica: and shame of taking his repulse in his first great enterprise, rather than hope of any better success, caused him to stay there: Asdrubal and Syphax gave him the honour of a fair pretence to leave the siege. Asdrubal had made a levy of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse: yet adventured not with his ill-trained Army to draw near to the Romans, before the coming of Syphax. Syphax brought with him unto Carthage fifty thouſand foot, and ten thouſand horſe: which joyning unto the Forces of Aſdrubal, they marched bravely toward Scipio; who thereby took occaſion to diſlodge. He choſe for his Winter-Camp the banks of an In-let, that had good harbour for his Navy. His foot-men he lodged on a Promontory, joyning to the continent by an arm of Land: his horſe-men he beſtowed upon lower ground, on the other ſhoar: in the bottom of the Creek he mored his ſhips; and there he quartered the Mariners, with all that belonged unto the Fleet. The whole camp he ſtrongly fortified, and ſo attended the ſeaſon of the year, when it ſhould ſerve him again to fight. Of cattle and other booty Maſaniſſa had brought in great ſtore, by driving the Country, before the coming of Aſdrubal and Syphax. Corn he had alſo gotten ſome: and great ſtore was ſent from Scicil and Sardinia. Likewiſe apparel for his Souldiers, was ſent from home, or from Sardinia: though ſcarce enough to ſerve turn, for that it was a matter of more coſt. The ſhips that brought theſe things, he fraighted homewards with ſuch part of his booty, as he could beſt ſpare: eſpecially with captives to be ſold for ſlaves. Aſdrubal and Syphax encamped near unto Scipio: not ſo ſtrongly fortifying themſelves, as did the Romans, either for that they wanted the ſeverer inſtitution, which the Romans uſed in the diſcipline of war, or for that they preſumed upon their multitude, againſt which they found in Scipio no diſpoſition to iſſue forth of his ſtrength, and fight. So the Winter paſſed without action.

When Spring drew near, Scipio thought it good to aſſay his old friend the Numidian King, if perhaps he might be won by perſwaſions to forſake the Carthaginians. It was conſidered, that thoſe Barbarians were naturally unconſtant; and particularly, that Syphax had given proof before this of his much levity. It might therefore be hoped, that having weared himſelf by lodging a whole Winter in the Camp: and being peradventure no leſs weary with ſatiety of his wife, who had cauſed him to enter into this war: he might be moved with a little entreaty to withdraw himſelf home into his Kingdom, and reſt a Neuter. But it is not unlikely, that ſuch a friend as this King, had been highly entertained and honoured in the City of Carthage, which was near at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleaſed him, or as he had been invited, to make a ſtep thither and repoſe himſelf a while: his wife Queen Sophonisba lying alſo there at the ſame time, to cheriſh him in his reſolution. Howſoever it were, Syphax did only make an overture of peace: propounding it as reaſonable, That Hannibal ſhould be recalled out of Italy by the Carthaginians: and that the Romans in like ſort ſhould quietly depart out of Africk, and ſo make an end of the war: wherewith now both Africk and Europe were diſquieted. Unto this would not Scipio at firſt give ear: yet being preſſed earneſtly by many meſſages from Syphax, and deſiring to continue the intercourſe of Embaſſadors; he began to make ſhew, as if he would conſider of the motion. He was given to underſtand by thoſe whom he had ſent unto the King, that the Enemies had their camps without any great defence of earth, full of wooden Cabins, and covered with boughs: and that the Numidians, ſuch of them as came firſt with Syphax, uſed coverings, Mats and Reeds; others that came later, had thatched their lodging with dry boughs and leaves: under which they lay careleſly without their Trenches. Upon this advertiſement he bethought himſelf, That it would not be hard for him to ſet their camps on fire, and thereby give them a notable overthrow. Without help of ſome ſuch ſtratagem, he foreſaw that it would be a work of great difficulty for him, to proceed in his wars when time ſhould ſerve. It was a plain open Country wherein he lay: and the Enemies had great advantage of him in number, eſpecially in horſe, which, upon ſuch ground, could not be reſiſted by the Roman Legions. The longer therefore that he thought upon the matter; the more needful he found it for himſelf, to make ſudden attempt upon their Camp. To this end he ſent many Embaſſadours, under pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeed of purpoſe to diſcover all that might concern the intended ſurpriſe. With theſe Embaſſadours he ſent, as Attendants, many old Souldiers diſguiſed like ſlaves; that wandring (as it were) idle up and down in the Camp, might obſerve the wayes and entrances, with whatſoever elſe was needful. When he had learned as much as he deſired: upon the ſudden he ſent word to Syphax, that it was vain to hold any longer treaty, foraſmuch as he could not get the conſent of his Council of war; without whoſe approbation, all that himſelf could do, was no more, than the good will of one man. This he did, to the end that, without any breach of faith, he might put his deſign in execution. The Truce being thus cut off, Aſdrubal and Syphax were very penſive: as having lately perſwaded themſelves, that their trouble was almoſt at an end. But ſince it could be no better, they began to deviſe, by what art they might draw Scipio out of his Camp, and provoke him to battle in thoſe Plains. This if they could do, they hoped to make his Council of war repent as greatly the refuſal of peace, as did Marcus Atilius after the like preſumption. But if he ſhould refuſe to come forth of his Trenches, what elſe remained than to beſiege him? Which they themſelves were well able to do by land; and the Carthaginian Fleet ſhould do by Sea that was making ready for the purpoſe. By ſuch diſcourſes theſe two comforted themſelves; recompencing (in conceipt) the loſs of their hopes paſt, with that Victory to come. But herein they were extreamly and worthily diſappointed; for that conſulting about the future, they provided not againſt preſent danger, but continued in the ſame negligence, which was grown upon them by the long diſcourſe of peace. As for Scipio, he was not idle; but made preparation out of hand, as it were to do ſomewhat againſt Utica. Two thouſand Souldiers he had made ready, and appointed to take the ſame piece of ground, whereon he lay againſt Utica before. This he did, partly to keep ſecret that which he had in hand, leſt being ſuſpected by his own Souldiers, the Enemy might happen to have notice of it, partly to hinder thoſe of Utica from ſetting upon the few, that he purpoſed to leave behind him in his Camp. He cauſed his men that night to ſup well, and betimes that they might be ready for the journey. After ſupper, he appointed ſuch Companies as he thought fit, to the defence of his Camp; all the reſt of the Army he led forth, about nine of the clock at night. The Carthaginians lay from him ſeven miles and an half: whom he purpoſed to undertake himſelf with the one half of his Army; the other half he committed to Lælius and Maſaniſſa, whom he ſent before him to ſet upon the camp of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the

the Camp of Syphax ſhould be on a light fire, e're he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might ſeem to have taken by caſualty upon the Numidians that lay farther off: whereas if it firſt appeared in the camp of Aſdrubal, it would be ſuſpected as the doing of enemies, and give Syphax warning to look to himſelf. To this end therefore Scipio marched fair and ſoftly; that Lælius and Maſaniſſa, who had a longer journey, and were to fetch a compaſs about for fear of being diſcovered, might have time to get before him, and do their feat. It was about two or three a clock in the morning, when the camp of Syphax began to blaze: which not only the Numidians, but their King himſelf, imputed unto caſuality; as thinking themſelves ſafe enough from enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interpoſed between them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to do, ſome ſtarting half a ſleep; and others that had ſitten up late at drinking, run out of their Cabbins to quench the fire. But ſo great was the tumult, that they neither could rightly underſtand in what caſe they were, nor give any remedy to the miſchance as it was ſuppoſed, Many were ſmothered and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater, many, leaping into the Trenches for fear of the ſudden miſchief, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that eſcaped the fire, fell upon the enemies ſword, which was ready to receive them. Eſpecially Maſaniſſa that beſt knew the Country, did great execution upon them: having laid all the wayes; by which he foreſaw that they would ſeek to eſcape. The Carthaginians perceiving this fire, thought none other than that it was a pittiful miſchance: ſo that ſome ran out to help the poor Numidians; carrying only what would ſerve to quench the fire. Others ran up to the Rampart: where fearleſs of any danger toward themſelves, they ſtood beholding the greatneſs of the flame, and lamenting the misfortune. This fell out right as Scipio would have it. He therefore loſt no time: but ſetting upon thoſe that were running towards the Numidians; he killed ſome, and purſued the reſt back into their camp, which in a little while he made to burn as bright, as did that of Syphax. Aſdrubal ſeeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not ſtand to make reſiſtance, but ſhifted only for himſelf, and eſcaped with a few of his horſe about him. If Hannibal, or any of the Barchine faction, had been taken in ſuch a manner: it is more than probable that old Hanno would have judged him worthy to be crucified. It would then have been ſaid, that with leſs than one half of 30000. men, he might at leaſt have given ſome bad recompence, to them that were taking pains in kindling theſe fires; had he not been only careful how to ſave his own fearful head. Nevertheleſs Polybius acknowledgeth, and it is moſt likely to have been true, That if Aſdrubal, or any of thoſe about him, would have ſtricken to ſhew valour, when the Camp was once one fire: He ſhould not thereby have done any manner of good, becauſe of the tumult and conſternarion. I ſhall not need to tell what a fearful thing it was, to hear the cries of ſo many thouſands that periſhed by fire and ſword, or to behold the cruel flame that conſumed them; which (as Polybius affirms) none that hath being is able to deſcribe. It is enough to ſay, That of thoſe many thouſands, very few did eſcape; which accompanied Aſdrubal and Syphax in their ſeveral wayes of flight. Beſides theſe alſo there were ſome ſcatterers, eſpecially of the Numidians, that ſaved themſelves in the dark: but they were not many, as after ſhall appear. Surely it muſt needs have been very hard to tell, how many were burnt, or otherwiſe made away, and what numbers eſcaped in the dark of the night. Wherefore Livie who in the reſt of this relation, as often elſewhere, doth follow Polybius, may ſeem to have followed ſome leſs worthy Author, and him no good Arithmatician, in caſting up the ſum. For he reckons only two thouſand foot, and five hnndred horſe, to have eſcaped; forty thouſand to have periſhed by ſword or fire: and above ſix thouſand to have been taken priſoners: the whole number of all which together, is far ſhort of fourſcore and thirteen thouſand, which were in theſe two Camps.

Aſdrubal, putting himſelf into the next Town that was very ſtrongly fortified, thought there to find the Romans work, until the Carthaginians at good leiſure might repair their Army. He had with him no more than two thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe: which he thought ſufficient to defend the Town; if the Townſ-men would not be wanting to themſelves. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earneſt in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to yield. Unto this diſputation, he well foreſaw, that the arrival of Scipio would ſoon give an end. Wherefore, leſt they ſhould lay hold upon him, and ſeek the Victors favour by delivering him up: he ſhrunk away betimes and made all haſte to Carthage. As for the town which he left; it opened the gates to Scipio at his firſt coming: and thereby preſerved it ſelf from all manner of loſs. The two next Towns adjoyning would needs be valiant, and make countenance of war: but their ſtrength not being anſwerable, they were ſoon taken by Scipio: who abandoned them to the pleaſure of his Souldiers. This being done, he returned to the ſiege of Utica.

The Carthaginians were ſore troubled, as they had good reaſon; when inſtead of either peace or Victory, which they lately hoped for, they heard news of ſuch a lamentable overthrow. Neceſſity enforced them to make haſty proviſion for the future: but how to do it, few of them ſaw any means. Some gave advice to crave peace of Scipio: others to ſend for Hannibal out of Italy; but the moſt, and they which finally prevailed, were of opinion, That notwithſtanding the loſs of this Army, they might well defend themſelves againſt the Romans, by raiſing new forces: eſpecially, if Syphax would not leave them. It was therefore concluded, that they ſhould bend all their care this way, levying in all haſte another Army; and ſending Embaſſadors to deal with Syphax, who lay then at a Town called Abba, not paſſing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the ſame their unfortunate Commander, Aſdrubal the ſon of Geſco, was employed to make new levies of men: and Queen Sophonisba went forth with Embaſſadors to her husband Syphax, who having gathered together as many as he could of his ſubjects that had eſcaped from the late ſlaughter, was thinking to return into his own Kingdom. Sophonisba laboured ſo with her husband, that at length ſhe won him to her own deſire. And it fell out at the ſame time, that four thouſand Spaniards, waged by the Carthaginians, were brought over to ſerve in Africk. Of theſe were made ſuch brave reports, as if their courage, and the Arms which they uſed, were not to be reſiſted. Even the multitude within Carthage believed theſe tales, and were more glad than they had cauſe to be; which is great wonder, ſince in one age, the whole country of Spain had been twice conquered; firſt, by the Carthaginians themſelves, and after by the Romans. But with Syphax theſe tales prevailed much: which the Carthaginian Embaſſadors helped with a lye; ſaying, That there were come ten thouſand of theſe terrible Spaniards. Upon this confidence, the people of Carthage and their friends gathered ſuch ſpirit, that in thirty days they made up an Army, conſiſting well-near of thirty thouſand men, reckoning the Spaniards and Syphax with his Numidians in the number. So they incamped in a Region called The great Fields, about five days journey from Utica. Scipio hearing of this, came from Utica thither, to viſit them: leaving behind him his impediments, with ſome part of his Army, to make a ſhew of continuing the Siege. Two or three days, after the meeting of both Armies, paſſed away in skirmiſh, without any great thing done. It had now been time for Aſdrubal to follow the example of the Roman Fabius, and and ſeek to weary out the Enemy by delayes. But either (which is likely) he was a far worſe Commander or elſe it was not in his power, to give ſuch directions as beſt pleaſed himſelf. The fourth day the Armies met in battle: wherein the Romans were marſhalled by Scipio after their wonted manner, having their Italian horſe in the right wing; and Maſaniſſa with his Numidians in the left. On the contrary ſide, Aſdrubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax the left; and the Spaniards, the battle. The victory was gotten without many blows: for the untrained followers of Syphax and Aſdrubal, could not ſuſtain the firſt charge of the Italians, or of Maſaniſſa. Only the Spaniards fought a long time, even untill they were all in a manner ſlain: rather as men deſperate, and not hoping for mercy, ſince they were thus come over to fight againſt Scipio, who had otherwiſe deſerved of them, than upon any likelihood or conceit of victory. This their obſtinacy was beneficial to thoſe that fled; for that it hindred the Romans from making any great purſuit. Hereby Aſdrubal and Syphax eſcaped: Aſdrubal to Carthage; and Syphax home to his own Kingdom: whither his wife was either gone before, or immediately followed him.

Scipio, having thus gotten the maſtery of the Field, took counſel about the proſecution of the war. It was reſolved upon as the beſt courſe, That he himſelf, with part of the Army, ſhould attempt the Cities round about him: and that Maſaniſſa, with his Numidians, and Lælius, with ſome of the Roman Legions, ſhould follow after Syphax; not permitting him to take reſt within his own Kingdom, where eaſily elſe he might repair his forces, and put them to new trouble. This advice, it ſeems that Maſaniſſa gave: who knew beſt the quality of the Numidians; and what good might be done among them, by the reputation of a victory. The leaſt that could be expected, was his reſtitution into his own Kingdom, uſurped by Syphax, which to accompliſh, it no leſs concerned the Romans at the preſent, than it did himſelf. According to this order concluded, Lælius was ſent away with Maſaniſſa: and Scipio ſtayed behind, carrying the War from Town to Town. Many places yielded for fear; many were taken by force; and all the Subjects of Carthage wavered in their fidelity, as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of thoſe unreaſonable burdens, which their proud Maſters had laid upon them, for maintenance of the war in Spain and Italy. What to do in this caſe, the Carthaginians could hardly reſolve. Fortune was their enemy; they had loſt their Armies, and many of their Towns: neither durſt they make bold to trouble their own Subjects with any violent exaction of men or money; who nevertheleſs of their own free will were likely to give little help. Very much it grieved them to ſend for Hannibal out of Italy: yet ſince there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Army; it was decreed, That Embaſſadors ſhould be forthwith ſent to call him home. Some there were that gave advice, to ſet out a Fleet againſt that of Scipio, and rode before Utica, weakly manned, that eaſie to be taken, whilſt Scipio himſelf was buſied in the Iſland Countries. Some were of opinion, that it ſhould be their principal care to fortifie by all means the City of Carthage: upon the ſafety whereof they ſaid, all depended: adding, that whilſt they were true, and at unity among themſelves, they might well enough ſubſiſt, and expect thoſe opportunities, with which Fortune (doubtleſs) would preſent them. Theſe counſels were not rejected; but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning the defence of the City, and for the attempt upon the Roman Fleet at Utica. Nevertheleſs, it was conſidered, that thereby they ſhould only protract the war; without any advancing their own affairs towards likelihood of victory, no, though it ſhould fall out, that all the Ships at Utica might be taken, or deſtroyed. Wherefore the determination held concerning Hannibal, that he ſhould immediately come over into Africk, as the laſt refuge of Carthage. The Council was no ſooner broken up, than all the Senators betook themſelves to the execution of that which was decreed: ſome, to the Fortification of the Town: ſome, to make ready the Fleet; and ſome, appointed thereunto, forthwith to embarque themſelves for Italy.

In this their trepidation, Scipio came to Tunes, a City in thoſe days very ſtrong, and ſtanding in proſpect almoſt of every part of Carthage. This place, or rather ſome defenſible piece adjoyning, he eaſily took; the Garriſons forſaking it, and running away, as ſoon as he drew near. But whilſt he was about there to incamp, and fortifie himſelf againſt the City, he might perceive the Carthaginian Fleet ſetting forth, and making towards Utica: What this meant, he readily conceived, and ſtood in great fear, leſt his own Ships, that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight, (as being heavily loaden with Engines of Battery, and wholly diſpoſed in ſuch order, as was moſt convenient for aſſaulting the Town) ſhould make bad reſiſtance, againſt a Fleet appointed for that ſpecial Service. Wherefore he haſted away towards Utica, to aſſiſt with his preſence in this needful caſe. It fell out well, that he had ſent his Carriages, and all the great booty which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not he now made great expedition, he ſhould have come too late. Neither could he indeed have been there in due time, if the Carthaginians had uſed ſuch diligence as was convenient. But they reſted one night in harbour by the way; and at their coming to Utica, they tarryed a while to make a bravado; preſenting themſelves in order order of battle, as if the Romans would have put forth to Sea againſt them. But Scipio had no ſuch intent: he thought it would be ſufficient, if he could preſerve his Gallies. As for the pleaſure of their bravery at Sea; it ſhould little avail the Carthaginians, if they got nothing by it, and loſt their whole eſtate by Land. Wherefore he took his ſhips of burden, and faſtning them together with Cables, in four ranks, one behind another, made a four-fold Bridge over the Channel of the Haven; whereon he placed a thouſand of his choiſe men, with ſtore of Darts, and other caſting weapons, to make defence. Some other ſpaces he left, whereat his Frigots, and other ſmall Veſſels, might run out and back again upon any advantage or need: but theſe he covered with planks, uſing the Maſts and Yards of his Ships inſtead of Rafters, to joyn all together, that his men might help one another, and the Bridge it ſelf not be torn aſunder. Scarce was this work finiſhed, when the Carthaginians, ſeeing none iſſue forth againſt them, came into the Haven. The Fight between them, and the Romans that were in the Hulks, was rather like to the aſſaulting of a Wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that ſtood upon the Bridge, had ſure footing, and threw their weapons downwards, with their whole ſtrength and violence; which the Carthaginians out of their Gallies, that were lower and unſteady, could not do, but the Roman Frigots and long Boats, adventuring forth from behind the Bridge, were greatly over-born by the force of the Gallies; and were one occaſion of that ſmall loſs that followed. They that ſtood upon the Bridge, were neither able to relieve them, nor yet could freely beſtow their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before; for fear of hurting theſe their friends, that were intangled and mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grappling hooks, hanging at Iron chains. Theſe they threw upon the Maſts and Yards, which ſerved as Arches to joyn the Bridge together: then rowing backwards, they tore all aſunder: in ſuch ſort, that one Ship followed another, and all the firſt rank was broken or defaced. The Defendants had no other way, than to ſave themſelves as haſtily as they could, by ſhifting into the next rank of Ships, that lay behind them untouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themſelves any further in this laborious work: but having haled away ſix Ships of burden, and towed them out of the Haven, returned home to Carthage. Their welcome was greater than their victory; becauſe among ſo many grievous loſſes, only this exploit had ſucceeded well, though it were of ſmall importance.

Whileſt things thus paſſed about Carthage, Lælius and Maſaniſſa, in their journey againſt Syphax, found as good ſucceſs as could be deſired. The fame of the victories already gotten, reſtored Maſaniſſa to his Kingdom, without farther contention: the Maſæſyli, his Subjects, joyfully receiving him, and forſaking the uſurpers. But here they ſtayed not: neither indeed would Syphax permit them to be quiet. He had ſuch abundance of men and horſes, that he felt not greatly the loſſes paſt: and therefore being ſolicited by Aſdrubal and Sophonisba, he prepared again for war. But beſide the inſtigation of his beloved wife; the loſs of the Maſæſyli would let him take no reſt: neither was it the purpoſe of Lælius and Maſaniſſa, to give him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no leſs unwillingly from that which they have gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance; but to think alike their own, whereof they are in poſſeſſion, be the title unto ſome part never ſo unjuſt. Hereunto alludes the fable of the young Kite; which thought that ſh[illegible] omited up her own Guts, when it was only the Garbage of ſome other Fowl, that ſhe had haſtily ſwallowed, and was not able to digeſt. But whether or no, Syphax, like the young Kite, believed the Kingdom of the Maſæſyli to be part of his entrails: Lælius and Maſaniſſa will ſhortly give him ſomewhat that ſhall make him caſt his Gorge. For to this purpoſe chiefly are they come ſo far. It concerned the Romans to diſpoſſeſs (if it might be) the King, whoſe falſe and hollow friendſhip towards them, had been converted into ſtrong enmity; as alſo to ſet in his place another, who might do them ſuch good offices, as Syphax had lately done unto the Carthaginians. How eaſily this might be effected, Maſaniſſa knew beſt, as being well acquainted with the nature of thoſe Countries; wherein, even to this day, though there be many ſtrong Towns, yet the fortune of a battle is enough, to tranſlate the Kingdom from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax, who came againſt them with no leſs an Army, than his former, and marſhalled in the Roman order, according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman Centurion, long ago ſent unto him out of Spain from Cn. Scipio. But though he could teach his men how to march in order; yet he could not teach them how to fight couragiouſly. They were a rabble of all ſorts, gathered up in haſte: and few of them had ſeen war before. Encamping near unto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that ſome ſmall Troops of Horſe on both ſides, encountered one another in the mid-way: and they that had the worſt, were ſeconded by other of their fellows. By continuance of the skirmiſh, more and more were drawn out from either Camp: ſo that at length Syphax, unwilling to diſhearten his men by taking any foil at their firſt meeting with the Enemy, came up with all his horſe, which were the beſt part of his forces, and therewith over-charged Maſaniſſa, whoſe numbers were far leſs. But whilſt he was proſecuting ſome hope of victory: ſome Roman Squadrons of Foot came againſt him through their own Troops of Horſe; which fell to the ſides, and made a lane for them. So their battle ſtanding now more firm, than a little before; Syphax was unable, though he laboured much in vain, to make them give ground. Maſaniſſa likewiſe, and his Troops grew confident upon this aſſiſtance: and charging afreſh the Enemy, that could not make way forward, cauſed him to give back. Herewithal the Legions came in ſight: which terrified ſo the Numidian horſe, that they began preſently to disband. Fain would Syphax have ſtayed them from flight: and to that end made head in perſon againſt the Romans; with hope, that his men would be aſhamed to leave him. But it fell out unhappily, that he was caſt from his Horſe, which received a wound, and ſo taken priſoner. Of others that were ſlain or taken: the multitude was not great. It ſufficed, that they forſook the place, and fled, and that their King, upon whom all depended, was in the Romans hand. Maſaniſſa told Lælius, that this victory ſhould make an end of the Numidian war, if preſently they haſted away to Cirta the chief City of the Kingdom; whither he himſelf deſired to be ſent before with the Horſe, carrying rying Syphax along with him. Hereunto Lælius agreed. Masanissa coming to Cirta, before any news of the Kings mischance was there arrived, called out the chief of the City to parlee: wherein by many fair promises and threats, but especially by shewing unto them Syphax bound, he prevailed so far, that the gates were forthwith opened unto him; and every one strove to get his favour: that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the rest, Queen Sophonisba yielded her self into his hands, and vehemently besought him, that she might not be delivered up unto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beauty, so commended her suit, that Masanissa forthwith granted it; and to make good his promise, marryed her himself that very day; thereby to prevent Lælius and Scipio from determining otherwise of her, since she was his wife. But Lælius, when he came thither, took the matter hainously, so that at first he would have haled her away, together with Syphax and other prisoners, and have sent her unto Scipio. But being over-intreated by Masanissa, he suffered the matter to rest a while as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's discretion; to whom he sent away Syphax and other Captives immediately; following shortly after himself with Masanissa, when they had done what was needful in the Kingdom.

At the coming of Syphax, there was great joy in the Roman Camp: the mighty Armies which he had lately brought into the field; and his entertainment of Scipio and Asdrubal, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together sought his friendship; with such other commemoration of his past and present fortune, ministring to every one a large argument of discourse. Scipio demanded of him, what had moved him, not only to forsake the Roman friendship, but to make war upon them, unprovoked. He briefly answered, That his wife had moved him so to do; calling her a Fury, and a pestilent creature: and saying, that Masanissa was no wiser than himself, since he had now taken the same woman to his Wife, who would shortly draw him to the same courses. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled: and stood in great doubt, lest this perilous woman should deprive him of Masanissa, as she had done of Syphax. It was not long, e're Masanissa and Lælius came unto him: both of whom together he lovingly welcomed; and highly commended in publick, for their notable service in this Expedition. Then taking Masanissa apart, he brake with him, as touching Sophonisba: letting him understand, that the Romans had title to her head, and that she was a mischievous enemy of theirs. Wherefore he intreated him to moderate his affections: and not to deface the memory of his great services already done (for which he should be highly rewarded to his own contentment) by committing a great offence upon little reason. Masanissa blusht, and wept: and finally promised to be governed by Scipio, whom he nevertheless intreated, to think upon his faith given to Sophonisba, that she should not be delivered into the Romans power. So he departed to his own Tent, where, after some time spent in agony, he called unto him a Servant of his that had the custody of his poyson, (which Princes used then to have in a readiness, against all mischances that might make them unwilling to live:) and tempering a potion for Sophonisba, sent it unto her with this message; that gladly he would have had her to live with him as his Wife: but since they who had power to hinder him of his desire, would not yield thereto, he sent her a cup, that should preserve her from falling alive into the hands of the Romans; willing her to remember her Birth and Estate, and accordingly to take order for her self.

At the receeit of this Message and Present, she only said; That if her Husband had no better Token to send unto his new Wife, she must accept of this; adding, That she might have dyed more honourably, if she had not Wedded so lately before her Funeral. And herewithall she boldly drank off the poison. Thus Livie reporteth. But Appian varies from this; and sets it down agreeably to that which hath been spoken before. concerning the pre-contract between Masanissa and Sophonisba. He saith, That after the taking of Syphax, Embassadors from Cirta, met with Lælius and Masanissa upon their way thither, yielding up their City, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophonisba, for her own private, sent messengers to excuse her Marriage with Syphax, as made against her will, by compulsion of those in whose power she was. Masanissa readily admitted this excuse; and accepted her to Wife. But when Scipio had received information from Syphax, how cunning in perswasion Sophonisba was: and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage; he fell out about her with Masanissa at his return, and challenged her, as a part of the booty belonging to the Romans; Masanissa said, she was his own Wife, and unto him betrothed many years before. But Scipio would not hear of this: or if it were true, yet he said it was no reason, that Masanissa should keep her in possession, as long as it was disputable, unto whom she might appertain. Wherefore he willed him first of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claim unto her, wherein he should have no wrong. Herewithall he sent to fetch her away: and Masanissa accompanied the messengers, as it were to deliver her: but making her acquainted with the necessity, gave unto her a cup of poison, wherewith she ended her life, before they came that should have apprehended her. So he shewed unto the Romans her dead body, which he royally interred. The sudden violence of Masanissa his love, and the ready consent of Sophonisba to marry with him, add not so much credit unto this relation of Appian, as doth the want of all other evident cause (which Livie notes) of the sudden falling out between him and the Carthaginians, under whom he had been trained up, and done them great Service. Howsoever it were; Scipio, hearing of this tragical accident, sent for Masanissa, and comforted him as well as he could, lest his melancholly should lead him to some inconvenience. Having therefore gently rebuked him for his rashness, he brought him forth in the presence of the Army: where extolling his noble acts, and shewing how highly he had deserved of the City of Rome, he proclaimed him King, and gave unto him a Crown of Gold, with other Royal Ornaments. This was indeed the ready way to divert his thoughts from the sad remembrance of that which was past, unto the more chearful contemplation of good fortune, that began to smile upon him. Lib. 28.

This was the first time that the Romans took upon them to create or proclaim a King. Which honour though Masanissa well deserved: yet would not the title have redounded unto his great benefit: neither should he have been much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their means recovered possession of his Country, together with the

the greatest parr of Syphax his Dominions. It seemeth not unlikely, that had he remained a Neuter in these wars, and sustained himself with his Troop of Horse, in such sort as he did before the coming of the Romans; he might nevertheless have recovered his proper Inheritance, by the love of his own Subjects without other help, when Syphax had once or twice been vanquished. As for the inlargement of his Kingdom, it was not more than he deserved: neither were the Romans then in case to make a Conquest of Numidia for themselves; neither could they have wished a fitter opportunity, than upon such a man upon whom to bestow it, that was their assured Friend, and passable withall among the Numidians as being (for the Masesyli were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the same Nation. Yet this liberality of the Romans, was noised abroad as very glorious: and the Romans themselves, in a politick sort of gravity, took highly upon them; as if even their saluting him by the name of King, had been a matter of great consequence. He thrived indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mighty in times following, incroaching upon his neighbours on all sides; but most of all upon the State of Carthage, whereat they were little displeased. Hence it grew that Vermina the Son of Syphax (of whom we shall shortly speak more) which held some pieces of his Fathers Kingdom, desiring Friendship of the Romans, and promising by all means to deserve their love, requested therewithall, that they would call him King. But though it were so, that never any before him had made this a matter of suit, yet the Roman Senate was Punctilious herein, and answered very bravely, That it was not their custom to give the honour of that appellation, save only unto such Kings, as had greatly deserved of their City. Thus they made it a matter of State; and in process of time grew so proud of this their imaginary prerogative, that they imputed as a singular benefit unto Kings that no way depended upon them, the salutation by †that name, though it were not accompanied with any other favour or profit thence redounding.

SECT. XIX.

The Carthaginians desired Truce, and break it.

THe Carthaginians were extreamly dismayed, when they heard of the great calamity, that was befallen their good Friend Syphax, and understood that Masanissa their mortal enemy, had got possession of his Kingdom. To increase their fear, Scipio returned again to Tunes in view of their City: where he made an end of that Fortification, which he had begun at his last being there. The Carthaginians had neither Forces, nor Courage, to withstand him: but their hearts so failed them, that they sent forth unto them thirty Embassadors, Princes of the City, which were their Privy Councel, to make suit for peace. These being admitted into the presence of Scipio, did not only prostrate themselves on the ground; but kissed the *feet of him, and of those that sat in Councel with him.

*Excerpt è Polyb. l. 15. Liv. lib. 30

Answerable to this base adoration was their speech that followed. They confessed themselves to have unjustly broken the Peace between them and Rome; and to have deserved whatsoever punishment it should please the Romans to inflict upon them. Yet they humbly besought Scipio and the rest, that in common regard of those misfortunes whereto all men are subject, they would shew mercy unto the City of Carthage, and let it remain, as a monument of their clemency; which by the folly of her Citizens, had now twice deserved to be overthrown. Herewithall they did not forget, to lay the blame upon Hannibal: who without their appointment had begun the War; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole City. By this it appears, that these Embassadors were no Barchines: but rather, that they were Hanno, and the choice of his company; who had now their long desired work in hand, of suing unto the Romans for peace. Whatsoever they were, it must needs be that they were most insolent men over those that were subject unto their power, for they would not have made such adoration to the Romans in their own necessity, unless they themseves had expected the like, wherein they had the advantage.

It was not unknown to Scipio, or to his Assistants, in what poor case the City of Rome then was; and how unable to defray the charges of continuing the War. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the loss of so many Armies, in such ill case, as the Romans themselves had very lately been. For they had money enough, wherewith to wage more men: they had a City far stronger then Rome; and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman resolution: and therefore distrusted the Walls of Carthage, though Utica, a weaker City, had all this while held out against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Army, though so often victorious in the Field. Scipio therefore accepted their submission, and told them, That though he came into Africk, to make a Conquest, and not Peace: yet having the Conquest as it were in his hand, he would not deny to grant them the Peace which they desired; for thereby should all Nations understand, that the People of Rome did follow the rule of Justice, both in making War, and in concluding it. The Conditions which he imposed upon them, were these; That they should render up unto him all the prisoners that they had taken, together with all Renegadoes and fugitive Slaves: That they should withdraw their Armies out of Italy and Gaule: That they should not meddle in Spain, nor yet in any Island between Italy and Africk: That they should deliver up all their Ships of War, save Twenty; and that they should pay a great sum of money, with certain hundred thousand bushels of Wheat and Barley. To consider of these Articles, he gave them three days: and when they had approved them, he granted a Truce; that they might send Embassadors unto the Roman Senate.

This done, Masanissa was dismissed, and went home into his Kingdom, as if the War had been already at an end. Syphax was a little before sent with Lælius unto Rome: where the fame of these victories filled men with joy, and gave hope, that the long endured miseries would be shortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were set open, and an Holy-day appointed for Thanksgiving and Supplication to their Gods. Lælius was accompanied with Embassadors from King Masanissa: who gratulating the happy success of the Romans in their African War, and giving thanks unto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio unto their Master, Master made request for the Numidians, such as were now his Subjects and prisoners in Rome, that they might be bestowed upon him, who by rendring them to liberty, should do an act very plausible, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reign. The Roman Senate were not behind with Masanissa in complement: but shewing themselves to be highly pleased with all that Scipio had done, and should do for him, they called him King again; released his Numidians that were captives; and sent him two purple Cassocks, that had each of them one gold button, with such other presents, as in time of their poverty might serve to testifie their good will. Scarcely were these and Lælius gone from Rome, when the news came, that Embassadors from Carthage were arrived to desire peace. These Embassadors were not admitted into the City, but were lodged without: untill Lælius being sent for, came back from Ostia, to be present when their demands were to be heard. Then was audience given them in the Temple of Bellona; that stood in the Suburbs, The errand of these Embassadors, was peace, but the meaning of them and of their City was only to win time, and get respite for war; until Hannibal and Mago should come out of Italy, either to chase the Romans out of Africk, or to obtain peace for Carthage, by terrour of their great Names and Armies, upon more easie conditions. Wherefore they made an idle discourse of the League, that was concluded between them and Lutiatius Catulus, at the end of the former war. This League they said, all things well considered, did still remain in force: neither had there since been any war at all, between the people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was only Hannibal, that without any leave from Carthage, had of his own head besieged and razed the Town of Saguntum: and after that adventured in like sort, without Commission, to pass the Alps, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italy. This being so, their message was none other than to desire, that the League before spoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter stand in force; as indeed it hereto did, and ought to do. The Senators had cause to wonder at this tale, hearing these Embassadors make (as it were) a jest of war, that had been so terrible. Wherefore they asked them a great many questions, concerning that peace made by Lutiatius, and other passages following between the two Cities. But they excused themselves, by their age: (for they were all young men) and said, that those things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but collusion, and that they sought no other than to gain time untill they might repair the war. Wherefore they were sent home, in company of Lælius without any conclusion at all of peace, and in effect, without answer. This notwithstanding, we find in Polybius, that the Senate received advertisement from Scipio, of that which had passed between him and the Carthaginians in this Treaty of peace: approved the Conditions by him propounded, and gave him licence thereupon, to proceed unto Conclusion. This may with good reason be believed, since it was not unknown that if the war continued, all these goodly hopes must rest upon the most uncertain issue of one battle between Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune should be averse to them, their forces in Africk were no better than quite lost.

Matters thus hanging in suspence, before the Carthaginian Embassadors came back from Rome, a Fleet out of Sicil, wherein were two hundred ships of burden, and thirty Gallies, being bound for Africk, to victual the Roman Camp, was over-taken by foul weather at Sea, and hardly escaping wrack, was dispersed, and driven a-ground in divers parts of the Bay Carthage, even in view, and under command of the City. There was at that time, as we find in Appian, and may gather out of Polybius, a great dearth of victuals in Carthage, which caused the people to cry out upon their Magistrates, that they should not let such a booty escape them, saying, that the danger of famine was greater and worse, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were so, that hunger urged them, or that they yielded to their own greedy desires: the multitude in Carthage understood (as it seems) that all this discourse of Peace in hand, was no better than meer mockery, and therefore cared not for observation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was the manner in Carthage, as likewise in Alexandria, for all the rascality, together with women and boys, to be medling in uproars: the clamors of the boys being in such tumults no less violent than of the men. Wherefore it is no marvel, if little regard were had of reason, or of honour, in any such commotion. A Fleet was sent out under Asdrubal, to gather up the dispersed Roman ships of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oars recovered the station whereto their camp adjoyned) and bring them into Carthage; which was done. Scipio was hereat much offended: not only for the loss; and for that the Town was thereby relieved: but for that by this breach of Truce, he foresaw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the war, and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he sent Embassadors unto them, both to require satisfaction for the injurie done; and to deterr them from entertaining any other hope, than in the peace which they had so much desired. These gave the Carthaginians to understand, that Letters were come from Rome unto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the Peace; upon those conditions which he had propounded. But (say they) we hold it strange, That ye, who so lately have cast your selves to the ground before us, and kissed our feet after an unusal manner of humility, confessing your selves to have perfidiously broken the League that was between us, and thereby to have deserved such punishment as is due unto Rebels; should so soon forget what ye then uttered, and run headlong again into the same crimes for which ye acknowledged your selves worthy to be destroyed, having only recourse unto our mercy. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which ye repose in Hannibal, that thus emboldens you. Yet were it not amiss, that ye should consider, how long he hath been pent up in a corner of Italy, among the Brutians; where he is in a manner besieged, and unable to stir: so that ye are like to find his help wanting in your greatest need. Or let it be supposed that he were now in Africk, and ready to give us battle: yet should it well agree with your wisdom to doubt what might befall, remembring that he is a man; and not invincible. Now if it should happen that he were overcome, what refuge have ye left unto your selves against hereafter? What gods will ye either swear by, to be believed, or call upon in your misery? What words, and lamentable gesture will ye henceforth use, to move compassion? Surely ye have already wasted all your force of perswasion, and shall not again deceive us, if ye refuse the grace, whereof at this present ye are capable. It is no marvel though the Carthaginians were angry, when they heard themſelves upbraided with the baſe demeanour of their Embaſſadors. For it was not the general opinion of the City, that the Truce was broken by themſelves: though it had pleaſed Hanno, or ſuch as were of his faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of ſubmiſſion; and to renounce not only the hope of the future, but all juſtification of matters paſt. And indeed it ſeems, that the Roman Embaſſadors were very much delighted, in the rehearſal of that point which was yielded unto them, as knowing that thereon depended the juſtice of the quarrel. But the Carthaginians took this in ſo ill part, that hardly they could refrain from doing violence unto the men, who had uſed unto them ſuch inſolent ſpeeches. Yet the fury of the multitude was in ſome ſort appeaſed; either by Hanno, whom Appian, (I know not why) calls Hanno the Great: or by the very reverence, due unto the place of thoſe that had uttered ſuch liberal words. So they were dimiſſed in friendly ſort, although it were without anſwer to their propoſition. There were alſo two gallies appointed for their ſafe convoy home; though with little intent of good unto their perſons. Aſdrubal was then in the midway, as men ſailed from Carthage towards Utica. He, whether only deſirous to pleaſe the multitude, of whoſe diſpoſition he was informed, or whether directed by publick order to cut off theſe Embaſſadors in their way homeward, lay waiting for them Behind a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the River Bagradas. Their Convoy having brought them on the way, as far as to the mouth of Bagradas, wiſhed them a good voyage; and ſo took leave of them, as if they had been then in ſafety, ſince the Roman Camp was even in ſight. The Embaſſadors took this in ill part; not as fearing any danger toward, but thinking themſelves too much neglected, foraſmuch as their attendants did ſo abruptly leave them. But no ſooner had they doubled the Cape, than Aſdrubal fell upon them, in ſuch manner, as they might well diſcern his purpoſe: which was to have ſtemmed them. They rowed hard therefore: and being in a Quinquereme, that had more banks of Oars, than had any Galley of Aſdrubal, they ſlipt away, and made him over-ſhoot himſelf. Yet he gave them chaſe, and had well-near ſurpriſed them. But they diſcovered ſome Roman Companies on the ſhoar over againſt them, and therefore adventured to run their Veſſel aground: whereby they ſaved their own lives, though a great part of their company were ſlain, or hurt. This practice of the Carthaginians was inexcuſable: and for the ſame cauſe perhaps were the Citizens heartned in ſuch a diſhonourable attempt, by thoſe that were deſirous to continue the war; that thereby they might be driven to ſtudy nothing elſe, than how to get the victory, as having none other hope remaining. Yet likely it is, that the ſame fear, which had cauſed them to make ſuch earneſt ſuit for peace, would alſo have cauſed them to be better adviſed, than thus to abandon all hope of Treaty; had they not been given to underſtand, that Hannibal was already landed in Africk, in whom they repoſed no ſmall confidence, but verily perſwaded themſelves, that he would change their fortune, and teach the Romans to hold themſelves contented with more eaſie conditions, than were thoſe that Scipio, in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded.

SECT. XX.

In what ſort Hannibal ſpent the time after the Battle of Metaurus: The doings of Mago in Italy. Hannibal and Mago called out of Italy. How the Romans were diverſly affected by Hannibals departure.

EVer ſince the loſs of that battle at Metaurus, Hannibal remaining in the Country of the Brutians, waiting for another ſupply from Carthage. The Roman Conſuls that ſucceeded unto Claudius and Livius, by whom Aſdrubal was overcome and ſlain, were contented to be quiet all their year. Neither did Licinius the Colleague of Scipio ought worthy of remembrance againſt Hannibal, being hindred by the Peſtilence that was in his Army. Sempronius the Conſul, who followed Licinius; and Cn. Servilius Capio, who followed Sempronius, were earneſtly bent to have done ſomewhat: but their diligence was in a manner fruitleſs. In ſome skirmiſhes with Hannibal, they had the better; in ſome the worſe: and a few poor Towns they got from him, as it were by ſtealth; his care being more to preſerve his Army, than to keep thoſe places that were weak.

The Romans had at this time ſo many great pieces of work in hand, that their chief enemy was become not the chief part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent upon Africk, wherein they were at no ſmall charges to maintain the Army, which (as was hoped) ſhould bring the War to a ſhort and happy concluſion. They ſtood nevertheleſs in much fear of Mago, the brother of Hannibal: who took exceeding pains among the Ligurians and Gauls to raiſe an Army, wherewith to kindle anew the War in Italy, that began to wax cold. Mago ſolicited alſo the Hetrurians, and found them ſo ready to ſtir in his behalf, that if he could have entred their Country ſtrong, it might have proved no leſs needful for Scipio to return home out of Africk, than ſhortly it was for Hannibal to make ſpeed unto the defence of Carthage. Theſe dangers cauſed the Romans to imploy one of their Conſuls or Pro-conſuls, with an Army, among the Hetrurians; another among the Gauls; and a third among the Ligurians: foraſmuch as it was uncertain, upon which ſide Mago would break out: Being thus buſied, it was no wonder though they forbore to overcharge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago, when things were in ſome readineſs for his ſetting forwards, he met in the Country of the Inſubrians, which is about Milan, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconſul, and P. Quintilius Varrus one of the Prætors. With theſe he fought a battle, wherein though his vertue ſhewed it ſelf worthy of his Father and Brethren: yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The fight continued a long while doubtful; in ſuch ſort that the Roman Commanders began to diſtruſt the iſſue. Wherefore Quintilius the Prætor taking unto him all the Roman Horſe, thought to have ſhaken the Enemies to pieces. The Legions at the ſame time gave a loud ſhout: and ſtrained themſelves hard, as if at that brunt the victory ſhould have been carried before them. But Mago oppoſed his Elephants to the Horſe: the ſervice of thoſe beasts being fitter for such use, than against the squadrons of Foot. The figure, sent, and braying of these Elephants, did so affright the Horse, that they started aside, and were scattered over the field; their Riders being unable to manage them. Hereby the Numidians got advantage upon them: whose manner of fight was more available against those that were loose, than against the troops that were close and thick. Then fell the Elephants upon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a shour of darts, and killed four of them; causing all the rest to give back. This notwithstanding the same Legions were so vehemently pressed by the Enemy; that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make resistance, they held their ground. The Pro-consul therefore brought up those forces, which he had kept unto the last, to succour where need should most require. Against these, Mago imployed some of his Gauls, whom he had in readiness for the like occasion. But the Gauls discharged their parts very ill. They were soon beaten off, and recoiled so hastily, that they brought fear upon all the rest. When Mago saw that his men began to shrink, he put himself in the head of his Army; and held them so well to it, that keeping their order, they made a fair Retreat, with their faces toward the Enemy. But at length he received a grievous wound in his thigh; whereof shortly after he dyed. He was taken up, and carried out of danger by some of his own men: the rest of them, after a little further resistance, provided every one for himself: So the Romans obtained victory, not without great cost: as purchasing the death of about five thousand enemies, with the less of two thousand and three hundred of the Prætors Army, besides those that dyed of the proconsul Legions; also besides divers Colonels, Captains, and Gentlemen of mark that fell in this hot piece of service. Neither were there any prisoners taken; whereby it may seem that the Enemies did not fall to rout, before they had recovered some ground that might assure them from pursuit. However it were, this victory would have much imported for the assurance of Italy, if the State of Carthage could longer have permitted these valiant sons of Amilcar to abide therein. But Mago with-drawing himself (by easie journeys, because of his wound) into Liguria, found there Embassadours from Carthage attending him: who gave him to understand the pleasure of their City, which was, That both he and Hannibal should presently repair home with all their forces; not staying any longer to think upon the conquest of Italy, since Carthage it self was ready to be lost. He obeyed this Commandment, and imbarqued shortly his Army; but dyed of his wound about Sardinia, in the way homewards.

About the same time Hannibal received the like command from Carthage, to return into Africk. He heard it with great impatience; gnashing his teeth, and groaning, and hardly keeping in the tears, that were ready to burst out, whilst the Embassadors were delivering their errand. When their message was done: He told them, that this was yet plain dealing: For, said He, They that now directly bid me come home, have long ago done their best to hale me out of Italy; though more closely and crookedly they went to work, by stopping the supply that should have enabled me to manage the War here. Scipio therefore shall not need to brag, that he hath drawn me home by the heels: it is Hanno that hath wrought this noble feat; and overwhelmed the house of the Barchines, for lack of other means to do it, with the ruine of Carthage. He had before prepared a Fleet in readiness, doubting that which after came to pass: wherein he imbarqued, besides his own men, as many of the Italians as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were that shrunk back from him, and refused to do service in this expedition; of whom, such as he could take, he slew; not sparing those that fled into the Temple of Juno Lacinia, which had been held an inviolable Sanctuary unto that day. He was indeed then wholly transported with rage; and departed out of Italy no less passionate, than men are wont to be, when they leave their own Countreys to go into exile. He looked back unto the shoar accusing both gods and men; cursing his own dulness; in that he had not led his Army from Cannæ, hot and bloody as it was, directly unto the walls of Rome. With such vexation of spirit He quitted the possession of Italy; wherein he had lived almost half his time.

If it could have been foretold unto the Romans; in the first beginning of this War, with what exceeding joy in times following they should entertain the news of Hannibal his departure out of Italy: they would (I think) less earnestly have pressed the Carthaginians to send him over thither. When sure advertisement was brought into the City, that Hannibal was gone with all his Army: an Holy-day was appointed for thanksgiving unto their gods; and extraordinary good sacrifices publickly made, for joy of such tydings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did still remain the same, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal at his coming into Africk, would find P. Scipio other manner of work, than he had been troubled with at any time before; and would do greater matters in his own Country, than ever he was able to perform abroad in a land of strangers. The remove of the War from their own doors, and the conceit of that victory for which they hoped; was enough to make them presume further, than at other times they would have done. When therefore the Saguntine Embassadors brought unto them a great mass of Gold and Silver, together with some Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spain: only the Carthaginian prisoners were excepted, the treasure was rendred back unto the Saguntines that had surprised it. Upon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of those moneys that had been borrowed in time of more necessity from private men. Hence also proceeded the severe chastisement laid upon those twelve Colonels, that for want either of means, or of good will, had refused to give aid to the Romans. They were commanded, and enforced to give double the number of Foot to that which they had been wont to set out for the Wars, with a proportion of Horse answerable to the very most of their ability. So confident were the Romans grown (though their wealth were not as yet suitable to the greatness of their spirit) upon the good success of the battle at Metaurus, and the hopes which they reposed in Scipio. All this notwithstanding, when they considered more nearly of that which might happen: and were informed that the terrible Army, wherof Italy had been few dayes since discharged, was landed safe in Africk: they began to revolve a thousand fearful matters in their heads, and to stand in doubt, lest Q. Fabius (who

(who died about the same time) would be found a true Prophet. For, bethinking themselves of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories against Syphax and Asdrubal no specialty of so great worth, as might promise the like success against another manner of General, followed by another manner of men, than were either of those two. The Numidian King had been wont to bring into the field a rascal multitude of half skullions, that were good for nothing; being himself a fit Captain for such Souldiers. Likewise Asdrubal the son of Gesco was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate, but otherwise, one, that in the field was only good at saving himself by a swift retreat. But now there came an Army of men hardened from their childhood with incredible patience, fleshed many hundred times in Roman blood, and wearing the spoils, not only of good Souldiers, but of brave Captains, by them slain. Such talk used the people of Rome, saying, That Scipio was like to meet in battle with many that had slain Roman Prætors, yea, and Consuls with their own hands: with many that had been first in getting over the Trenches of several Roman Camps, or in winning the tops of walls at the siege of towns; briefly, that he should now be opposed by an Army, as good as ever had served in war, and following the dreadful name of Hannibal.

SECT. XXI.

Hannibal in Africk prepares to fight with Scipio; treats with him about peace in vain; loseth a battle at Nedagra, and perswades the Carthaginians to sue for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

Hannibal disembarqued his Army at Leptis, almost an hundred miles from Carthage, Eastward from the Headland of Mercury, and somewhat more than one degree to the South. He was ill provided of Horse; which it was not easie for him to transport out of Italy. Therefore it behoved him to land, as he did, somewhat far from the enemy; that he might furnish himself of these and the like needful helps against the day of battle. From Leptis he passed on to Adrumetum, and so along through the Inland Country gathering friends unto him by the way. Tychæus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was said to have in those dayes the best Horses of service, that were to be found in Africk. Him therefore did Hannibal allure unto his party; making him understand, that if the Romans got the victory, it should be easie for Masanissa, by their countenance and help to oppress both him, and as many other of the neighbour Princes, as hindred his prospect. This argument, and the fame of him that used it, prevailed with Tychæus, who shortly after brought unto the Carthaginian two thousand Horse. Appian further adds, That Mezetellus, (the same who had made himself Protector over Masanissa his Cousins; and was Head of a Family, and adverse to the Numidian Kings of that race) brought to Hannibal another thousand Horse: as likewise, that Vermina the Son of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdom, began at the same time to assail the places that yielded the obedience to Masanissa. This Vermina, as we find in Livie, came with more than 16 thousand men (for he lost more than so many) to succour Hannibal whan it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in such hard estate, or (at least) so impatient of the state wherein they were; that they could not attend the leisure of those preparations, which would have made the victory assured. When they considered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatness of his Acts: it offended them to think, that they had been so base as to make humble suit unto the Romans for peace; whilst they had such a brave Champion alive, to maintain their cause by War. But when as they bethought themselves of their own sufferings, which, for want of Roman magnanimity to endure them, appeared greater than indeed they were: than cried they out earnestly that it was no time to linger, but presently to fight; that so they might see an end of these troubles, either good or bad; and to this purpose they sent their Mandates to Hannibal, requiring him without any further protraction, to do what he could out of hand. Hannibal made answer, that they were his good Lords, and had power to dispose of him and his Army; but since he was general of their forces, He thought it reasonable that they should suffer him to do as a General ought to do; and to choose his own times. Nevertheless, to give them satisfaction, He made great marches to Zama, and there encamped.

The Breach of Truce made by the Carthaginians: the violence done to his Embassadours: and the news of Hannibal his being landed in Africk, made Scipio to understand the resolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yield unto any conditions unprofitable for themselves, as long as they were able to make resistance. Wherefore he sent unto Masanissa: and informed him of all that was fallen out: praying him to come away with speed, and lay all other business apart. Ten Roman Companies of Horse and Foot together, Masanissa had with him; that were lent unto him by Scipio, to do him service in the establishing and inlarging of his Kingdom. But he well understood, that those and many more besides all his own forces, would but little avail him; if Hannibal should drive the Romans out of Africk. Wherefore taking such order as he could upon the sudden, for the safety of his own Kingdom; with four thousand Horse, and six thousand Foot, he made all haste unto Scipio.

Soon after the beginning of these new troubles, the Carthaginian Embassadors that had been at Rome, returned back under the conduct of Lælius and Fulvius, who brought them safe into the Roman Camp. There when they arrived, and understood what lately passed, especially how their Citizens had behaved themselves towards the Roman Embassadours: they made little doubt, how their own heads should answer for such notorious outrage. To confirm them in this opinion.

M. Bæbius one of the late Embassadors that had been in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Camp, laid hands upon them and detained them; sending word unto his General, who was gone abroad to make War in the Country, that he had them in his power, and that now the Carthaginians might be repaid in their own Coyn, for the injury by them lately done. Sci- pio was very glad to hear of this; and commanded Bæbius to use them with all possible courtesie, and send them safe home. By thus doing, He brake the hearts of his Enemies; and caused them to acknowledge themselves (which was a great Victory) far less honourable than the Romans. This notwithstanding, he made more cruel War upon them than before: taking their Towns by force; and putting them to sack, without hearkning to any Composition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they took a Town by assault, to put all that came in their way, to the Sword, whatsoever they were, without regard. This they did, to make themselves terrible: and the better to work such impression in the minds of those, with whom they had to do; they used oftentimes to kill the very Dogs and other Beasts, that ran athwart them in the Streets: hewing their bodies asunder: as men delighted in shedding of blood. This being their practice at other times; it is likely that now they omitted no piece of cruelty; when they meant to give proof of their vehement indignation, and revengful minds, for the injuries received. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were so earnest in pressing Hannibal to fight.

Excerpt. è Polyb. lib. 10.

Hannibal being incamped at Zama, sent forth his Scouts and Spies, to discover where the Romans lay, what they were adoing, and as much as might be, of their demeanour. Some of these were taken, and brought unto Scipio: who instead of Trussing them up, gave them free leave to view his Camp at pleasure, appointing one to conduct them up and down, and shew them whatsoever they desired. This done, he gave them leave to depart; and sent them unto their General. Hannibal understanding this, admired the bravery and courage of his Enemy: with whom on the sudden he grew so desirous to have an Enterview, and personal conference; and signified so much unto him by a messenger sent of purpose. Of this motion the Roman liked well: and returned answer, that he would meet him shortly in a place convenient. The next day Masaniſſa came with his Army: whom Scipio taking with him, removed unto a Town called Nedagara: near unto which he sat down, in a place otherwise commodious, and close by a water that might opportunely serve his Camp. Thence he sent word unto the Carthaginian, That the time and place did fitly serve, if he had ought to say to him. Hannibal thereupon removed from Zama, and came within four miles of the Enemy; where he incamped well to his own good liking in all things else; excepting that his men were driven to take much pains in fetching their Water somewhat far off. Then was order taken for their meeting: and the two Generals, each of them with a Troop of Horse, rode forth of their Camps, till they came unto a piece of ground; which was before well searched for fear of ambush. There they will their followers to stand off: and themselves, with each of them one Interpreter, encountred each other in the mid-way between their Companies. They remained a while silent, viewing one the other with mutual admiration. Then began the Carthaginian, saluting the Roman, to deliver his mind to this effect: That it had been better both for Carthage, and Rome, if they could have limited and contained their ambition within the shores of Africk and of Italy; for that the Countreys of Sicil and Spain, about which their Fathers and themselves had striven, were no sufficient recompence for so many Fleets as had been lost, and of so much blood as had been shed, in making those costly purchases. But since things past could not be recalled: He said, That it was meet for them to consider, unto what extream dangers their own Cities had been exposed, by the greedy desire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was even time for them now at length to make an end of their obstinate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wisdom hereafter. And to such peaceable disposition, He affirmed, That his own years, and long tryal of Fortune, both good and evil, had made him inclinable. But much he feared, that Scipio, by want of the like experience, might rather fix his mind upon uncertain hopes, than upon a contemplation of that mutability, whereto all humane affairs are subject. Yet (said he) mine own example may peradventure suffice to teach thee moderation. For I am that same Hannibal, who after my Victory at Cannæ, won the greatest part of Italy; and devised with my self, what I should do with your City of Rome, which I hoped verily to have taken. Once I brought my Army to your Walls, as thou hast since brought thine to ours of Carthage: but now, see the change! I stand here intreating thee to grant us peace: This may serve as a document of Fortunes instability. I have fought with thy Father Scipio; He was the first of the Roman Generals that ever met me in the Field. I did then little think, that the time would come, that I should have such business, as now at the present, with his Son. But this is even one of Fortunes pageants, whereof she hath many. And thou maist have experience of the like in thy self, who knows how soon? Think upon M. Atilius: If he would have hearkned unto such perswasions, as I now use to thee, he might have turned home to Rome an happy man, and so maist thou do now, if any reasonable offer will give thee satisfaction. How saist thou? Canst thou be contented, that all Spain, Sicil, Sardinia, and whatsoever Islands else are scituate between Italy and Africk be abandoned by the Carthaginians for ever, and left unto the Romans, to bear dominion therein? Thou shalt have glory enough by effecting thus much: and the Romans may well be glad of such a bargain. As for us, our own quiet shall henceforth give us contentment. And the same contentment of ours, shall make us faithfully observe the peace with you. But if thou thinkest all too little, I must desire thee to ponder well how great an hazard thou must undergo for obtaining a very little more, than that which thou maist have without contention. It is now in thine own power to lay hold upon good fortune, if it please thee: stay but untill to morrow night, and thou maist take such fortune as it please the Gods. The issue of Battle is uncertain, and many times beguileth expectation. Men and Steel we shall each of us bring into the field; but of the Victory neither of us have assurance. Let us therefore without more ado make Peace. And do not tell me that some false-hearted Citizens of ours dealt fraudulently of late in the like Treaty: It is I Hannibal that now desire Peace with thee, which I would never do, if I thought it not expedient for my Countrey. And thinking it expedient, I will always maintain it, like as I have maintained, unto my power, as long as the Gods did not envy me, the War by me begun.

Hereunto Scipio made answer, That it was no ambitious desire of ruling in Sicil and in Spain which had moved the Romans to enter into this or the former War: but that the defence of the Mamertines, and afterwards of the Saguntines, their their Confederates, had cauſed them to put on thoſe arms; which the gods by the final iſſue of Wars had approved, and would approve to be moſt juſt. As for the mutability of Fortune, he ſaid, that he was not thereof ignorant; and that without any note of inſolence or overweaning, he might well refuſe the conditions offered. For was it not plain that all theſe Countreys, with which the Carthaginians now ſo willingly departed, were already won from the Romans? If, ſaid he, theſe conditions had been propounded whilſt as yet ye detained ſome part of Italy, they might peradventure not have been rejected. But as the caſe now ſtands, I ſee no reaſon why I ſhould remit unto you any one piece of theſe my former demands, to which the Carthaginians have yielded already, and thought me to be gracious in dealing ſo moderately. Rather I ſay, that the injuries which they have done me ſince, have made them unworthy of obtaining Peace upon ſo friendly terms. But I cannot blame thee Hannibal, though thou wouldſt be glad to make thy Citizens underſtand, from how much of their burden they are by thy means eaſed. Only thou muſt think, that in like ſort it concerns me in honour, not to let them be gainers or ſavers by the wrongs which they have done of late. Thou knoweſt well, that beſides thoſe offers which thou here haſt made, they were well contented to reſtore unto us ranſome-free, all Priſoners that they have of ours, to pay us five thouſand Talents, to deliver up their Gallies, and to deliver hoſtages for aſſurance of fair dealing. And muſt they now be diſcharged of all this by their breach of Truce, their ſpoiling of our Fleet, and their violating our Embaſſadors? Not ſo. But if they can be contented, beſides all this, to make ſuch amends as I ſhall require, for theſe injuries newly done; then will I take advice with my counſel what anſwer to give you; otherwiſe you may even prepare for war, and blame your own ſelves for that I have denied you peace.

Hereupon they brake off: and returned each to his own Camp, with no other news than war; bidding their Souldiers prepare for a battle, wherein ſhould be decided the quarrel between Rome and Carthage. The next morning at break of day they iſſued into the Field: a notable march, and ſuch as hath very ſeldom been found: whether we regard the Generals, their Armies, the two Cities that contended, or the great importance of the battle at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing firſt the Haſtati, divided into their Maniples, or ſmall Battalions, with a reaſonable diſtance between them: Not far behind theſe followed the Principes, likewiſe divided; and ſo after them the Triarii. But herein Scipio altered a little the ordinary cuſtom of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes oppoſite unto the void ſpaces between the Haſtati, that ſo the Haſtati, as was uſual, might fall back between the Principes; but he placed them directly one behind another, as it were, in File. This he did, becauſe of the Elephants, whereof Hannibal had many. For of thoſe Beaſts, the danger was leſs whilſt there was open way to let them through. Therefore he took ſuch order, that when they had paſſed through the ſpaces between the firſt Battalions, they ſhould not come upon the Principes in Front. Unto his Velites, or thoſe of the light armature that were to begin the Fight, he gave direction, that when they found themſelves to be overcharged, either by the Enemies; or (which was moſt to be feared) by the Elephants, they ſhould run back through thoſe Lanes that were between the Maniples; and that thoſe which were ſwifteſt, or otherwiſe beſt able, ſhould continue on their flight, until they were got behind all their own Army; thereby leaving room enough unto thoſe that were wounded, or caſt behind, to ſave themſelves on the void ground, that was betwixt the firſt and ſecond, or the ſecond and third battels, without cloying up the way between the Maniples, which he deſired to keep open. His Italian Horſe he placed in the left wing, under C. Lælius. In the right wing was Maſaniſſa with his Numidians. He himſelf riding up and down, exhorted his men to do valiantly; uſing words, not many, but forcible. He bad them remember what they had atchieved, ſince their coming into Africk. He told them, that if this day were theirs, the War was at an end: and that their Victory in this War, ſhould make them Lords of all the World, for that afterwards, none would be found able to reſiſt them. On the contrary, if they were beaten, he asked them whither they would flie. They were far from home, yea, and far from their own ſtanding Camp: neither was there any place in Africk, that would give them ſhelter: if they fell into the Carthaginians hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but death or victory: unleſs they would live like wretched ſlaves, under moſt mercileſs Enemies. In ſuch neceſſity he ſaid, that they which conſider themſelves to be, and take reſolution anſwerable thereunto, have never been known to fail of getting Victory.

Hannibal on the other ſide placed his Elephants, that were more in number than fourſcore, in Front of his Battle. Next behind theſe he made his Vant-guard of all Mercenaries, Ligurians, Gaules, Balcares and Moors. Then followed his Battle; which was of Carthaginians and Africans, more intereſſed in the quarrel than were thoſe Mercenaries; though not ſo good Souldiers: but to help (if it might be) their want of courage, they had with them four thouſand Macedonians, lately ſent from King Philip. More than the ſpace of a Furlong, behind theſe, came his Rere-ward, conſiſting of thoſe brave Souldiers, which had ſerved him in his Italian Wars, and were the only men, in whom he repoſed any confidence. Oppoſite to Lælius, in his own right wing, he beſtowed the Carthaginian Horſe. Tychæus and the Numidians, he placed in his left wing againſt Maſaniſſa. He was indeed far too weak for the Enemy in Horſe, both in number and in goodneſs. For Tychæus and Mezetullus had no more than three thouſand; and thoſe not ſo well exerciſed, as were the four thouſand of Maſaniſſa. The Carthaginians alſo were no more, nor none other, than ſuch as could be levied in the haſt of a few days; and the remainder of thoſe, that had of late been often vanquiſhed, and accuſtomed to fly. But it was no time for Hannibal, neither had he perhaps authority, to make theſe his companions alight and ſerve on Foot, ſetting better men in their Saddle. All that he could have done, was to ſtay a little longer, and expect more help. Had Vermina the Son of Syphax come thither, as he did in a few days after, with ſixteen thouſand and upwards, the moſt of them Horſe, the advantage of number might have ſerved well to ſupply all other defect. Yet ſince the Lords of Carthage would brook no delay, Hannibal muſt be fain to comfort himſelf with the hope that he repoſed in his old Italian Souldiers; whoſe vertue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more ſtrongly oppoſed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their ſeveral conditions: promiſing unto the Mercenaries bountiful rewards, threatning the Carthaginians with inevitable ſervitude, if they loſt that day: but eſpecially animating his old fellow-ſouldiers, by the many Victories which they had obtained againſt far greater numbers. He bad them to look upon the Enemies, and make an eſtimate, whether they were any thing like ſo many, as that huge Army which they had ſlaughtered at Cannæ. He willed them to remember, That it was one P. Scipio, even the Father of this man, whom they had firſt of all compelled to run away. He told them, that theſe Legions, which they yonder beheld, were for the moſt part of them, the very worſt of the Roman Souldiers; even ſuch, as for their daſtardly flight out of ſundry battels, could no longer be truſted to bear Arms in their own Country. As for the reſt, they were young men, the Sons of Cowards, and bred up in the continual fear of thoſe weapons, by which their Fathers were daily ſlain or chaſed. Wherefore he intreated theſe his old companions, upon whoſe vertue he meant wholly to repoſe himſelf, that they would this day ſtrive to make good their honour, and to purchaſe the fame of men invincible.

Such exhortations uſed the two Generals before the Fight. When they drew near together, the Numidian Horſe-men on both beſides began to skirmiſh. The Trumpets and other inſtruments of War, ſounded to battle: and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to break upon the Romans. Of theſe Elephants (as they were always an uncertain kind of help) thoſe that ſtood near unto the point of the left wing, turned back for fear: and ran upon their own Numidian Horſe; which they affrighted and diſordered. Maſaniſſa eſpying this, gave charge upon the ſame Numidians; and not ſuffering them to rally themſelves, drave them quite out of the Field. The reſt of thoſe Beaſts made a great ſpoil of the Roman Velites, whom they followed into the ſpaces between the Maniples: but without any harm to the Battalions themſelves; which gave them open way, accordingly as Scipio had well provided. Divers of them receiving many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be governed, but ran back upon the right point of their own battle, and beyond that into the open Field. Herewithal they diſordered the Carthaginian Horſe, which were in that wing: againſt whom they gave to Lælius the ſame advantage that Maſaniſſa had againſt the Numidians; which he uſed in like ſort. In the mean while, the battels of Foot advanced, and drew near together with a ſlow and ſtately pace, till they were almoſt within a weapons caſt: at what time they gave a ſhout, and ran one at the other. The Mercenaries for a time ſeemed both in audacity, and in quickneſs to have the better of the Romans; wounded many, and doing more harm, than they took. But the Roman Diſcipline after a while prevailed againſt the boiſterous violence of theſe untrained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a little, that the battle of the Principes, following ſomewhat near after the Haſtati, enconraged their fellows, and ſhewed themſelves ready, if need were, to relieve them. Contrariwiſe, the Mercenaries received no manner of help or comfort, from thoſe that ſhould have ſeconded them. For the new-levied Carthaginians and Africans, when they ſaw their hired Souldiers give back, did alſo themſelves retire. This cauſed the Ligurians, Gaules, and the reſt, to think themſelves betrayed: whereupon they inclined unto flight. The Carthaginian Battle was herewith more terrified than before, ſo as it refuſed to give way unto the Mercenaries for their ſafe retreat; and yet withall forbore to make head againſt the Enemies, that purſued them. It was no time to ask them what they meant by this: Fear and Indignation cauſed thoſe that were at once chaſed by the Romans, and betrayed, as they thought, by their own fellows, to turn their Arms with an heedleſs fury againſt the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten down and ſlain, through their own indiſcretion, by their own Mercenaries. The Roman Haſtati in like ſort, fighting with deſperate men in a throng, had their hands ſo full of work, that the Principes were fain to come up unto them, and help to over-bear this great medly of Enemies, that were together by the ears among themſelves. In this place was was made a great ſlaughter, both of the Mercenaries and of the Carthaginians: which hindering one another, could neither fight, nor eaſily fly. Such of them as eſcaped, ran towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not ſtir one foot, to help or ſave theſe Run-awayes. He cauſed his men to bend their Pikes at thoſe of his own ſide, that would have ruſhed upon him: whom he thereby compelled to turn aſide beyond his battle, and ſave themſelves in the open Field. The ground over which the Romans were now to march, e're they could meet with Hannibal, was covered with heaps of dead bodies and weapons; and ſo ſlippery with blood, that Scipio began to ſtand in great doubt, leſt the orders of his Battalions ſhould be diſſolved in paſſing that way. In ſuch caſe, if he ſhould fight with that war-like Army, which he ſaw before him, remaining yet entire, and without fear expecting him; He might be well aſſured to receive a notable overthrow. He cauſed therefore the Haſtati to make a ſtand there where they were, oppoſite to the main battle of the Hannibalians. Then drawing up his Principes and Triarii, he placed them, when they had overcome the bad way, all in one Front with the Haſtati, and made of them his two Cornets. This done, he advanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than ever he had been received in his life before. All the days work till now, ſeemed to have been a matter of paſtime, in regard of the ſharp Conflict, that was maintained between theſe notable Souldiers. The Romans were encouraged by their having prevailed all the day before: they were alſo far the more in number. But theſe old Souldiers of Hannibal were freſh; (and perhaps the better men.) They fought with ſuch obſtinate reſolution, that no man gave back one foot; but rather choſe to die on the ground whereon he ſtood. So that, after a long time it was uncertain which part had the worſe: unleſs it may ſeem, that the Romans were beginning to ſhrink; foraſmuch as the return of Maſaniſſa and Lælius from purſuit of the Enemies Horſe, is ſaid to have been moſt happy, and in a needful time. Theſe upon a ſudden charged the Hanibalians in the Rear; and over-bearing them by meer violence, compelled them to fall to Rout.

In this Battle there dyed of the Romans fifteen hundred and upwards: On the Carthaginian ſide, above twenty thouſand; beſides as many that were taken; of whom, Sopater Captain of the Macedonians was one. The ſingular skill that Hannibal ſhewed ſhewed in this his laſt Fight, is highly commended by Polybius; and was acknowledged, as Livie reports, by Scipio himſelf. But the Enemies were too ſtrong for him in Horſe: and being enjoyned, as he was, by the State of Carthage, to take Battle with ſuch diſadvantage, he would work no marvels. He ſaved himſelf with a few Horſe; and ſtayed not in his Journey, till he came to Adrumetum. Thence he was ſent for to Carthage; from which he had been abſent ſix and thirty years. At his coming into the Senate, He ſaid plainly, That there was none other way left, than to take ſuch Peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians, not knowing what other courſe to take, reſolved to ſend Embaſſadors again, and try the favour of Scipio, whoſe Arms they could not now reſiſt.

Scipio having ſpoiled the Enemies Camp, returned back to Utica: where he found P. Lentulus newly arrived, with fifty Gallies, and an hundred Ships of burden. With this Fleet, and that which he had before, He thought it beſt to make towards Carthage: rather of purpoſe to terrifie the City; than with any hope to take it. His Legions he committed unto Cn. Octavius; whom he willed to meet him there by Land. Then ſending Lælius away to Rome, with news of the Victory, ſet Sail from Utica towards Carthage. He was encountred on the way by ten Embaſſadors from the City: who bearing up with the Admirals Gally, began to uſe the pittiful geſture of ſuppliants. But they received none other anſwer, than that they ſhould meet him at Tunes, where he would give them audience. So rowing along before the City, and viewing it more in bravery, than with meaning to attempt it; he returned back to Utica, and called back Octavius thither, with whom in perſon he ſet forwards for Tunes. As they were in their Journey thither, they heard the news, that Vermina the Son of Syphax, was coming with an Army of more Horſe than Foot, to the ſuccour of thoſe that were already vanquiſhed. This Vermina ſeems to have been both careleſs of getting intelligence how things paſſed, and very defective in all other duties requiſite in the Commander of an Army. Part of the Roman Foot, with all their power of Horſe, was ſent againſt him, which did not only beat him, but ſo compaſs him in, that he hardly eſcaped himſelf with a few; leaving fifteen thouſand of his followers dead behind him, and twelve hundred taken Priſoners. If this good company had been with Hannibal at Nadagara, they ſhould have been far better conducted, and might well have changed the Fortune of the day; which the Carthaginian loſt by default of Horſe. But God had otherwiſe determined. It is not to be doubted, that this Victory, though it were no great acceſs unto the former; yet ſerved well to daunt the Carthaginians, and imprint in them the greater fear of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirty Embaſſadors from Carthage: whoſe behaviour, though it was more pittiful than it had been before, yet it procured leſs commiſeration, by reaſon of their late falſe dealing, after they had in like ſort humbled themſelves. Nevertheleſs it was conſidered, what a long and laborious work it would prove, to beſiege the mighty City of Carthage. And particularly, Scipio ſtood in great doubt, leſt the honour of this War, if it were protracted, ſhould be taken out of his hands, and given to one of the Conſuls. Cn. Servilius Cæpio, that Conſul who had charge of the War againſt Hannibal at ſuch time as he departed out of Italy: was bold to paſs over into the Iſle of Sicil (as it were in chaſe of Hannibal by him terrified and driven away) with a purpoſe thence to have proceeded into Africk, and taken from Scipio the command of the Army there. But a Dictator was choſen of purpoſe, to reſtrain the ambition of this Conſul Servilius. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made ſuit for the ſame Province of Africk: and was therein ſo earneſt, that though neither the Senate, nor People, would grant him his deſire; yet he needs would be going, procuring only leave of the Senate, that he being Conſul might joyn with Scipio, were it no more than with equal authority. But e're he could have his Fleet, and all things in a readineſs for the Journey wherein no man cared to further him, Winter came on, and he was only toſt at Sea with foul weather; firſt upon the Coaſt of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Conſulſhip expired, and ſo he returned home a private man. Then came the joyful news to Rome, of the Victory obtained againſt Hannibal, and that the War was now even at an end. Yet was Lentulus the new Conſul ſo paſſionate, in deſiring Africk for his Province, that he ſaid he would ſuffer nothing to paſs in the Senate, until he had firſt his will. Much ado there was about this: and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the People, at laſt it was ordered, That if Peace were granted, it ſhould be granted by Scipio; if the War continued, Scipio ſhould have command therein by Land, and the Conſul at Sea. The ambition of theſe men, cauſed Scipio to give the more favourable anſwer unto the Carthaginian Embaſſadors. He willed them to conſider what they had deſerved: and in regard thereof, to think themſelves well dealt withall; in that he was contented to leave unto them their liberty and their own Laws, without appointing any Governour over them, or Garriſon to hold them in ſubjection; leaving alſo unto them their poſſeſſions in Africk, ſuch as they were at the beginning of this War. As touching the reſt he was at a point, that, before he either granted them Peace or Truce, they ſhould make ſatisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whilſt the late Treaty was in dependance. Hereunto if they would yield, then required, He, That immediately they ſhould deliver up to the Romans all Priſoners, Fugitives, and Renegado's, that they had of theirs: likewiſe all their Gallies, excepting ten: and all their Elephants. That they ſhould make no War at all thenceforth out of Africk, neither yet within Africk, without licence of the Romans: That the Countries, Towns, Goods whatſoever, belonging any wiſe unto Maſaniſſa, or to any of his Anceſtors, which were in their poſſeſſion, ſhould be all by them reſtored unto him: That they ſhould find Corn for the Roman Army, and Wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, untill the Peace were fully concluded; that they ſhould pay ten thouſand Talents of Silver, in the term of Fifty years, by two hundred Talents a year, and that for obſervance of Conditions, they ſhould give an hundred Hoſtages: ſuch as Scipio would chooſe, being none of them under fourteen years of age, nor above thirty.

With theſe conditions the Embaſſadors returned home, and reported them unto the City. They were very unpleaſing; and therefore one Geſco ſtood up to ſpeak againſt them: and exhorted the People, who gave good attention, that they ſhould not condeſcend unto ſuch intolerable de-demands. But Hannibal perceiving this, and noting withall what favourable audience was given to this vain Oratour, by the unquiet, yet unwarlike multitude, was bold to pull him down from his ſtanding, by plain force. Hereat all the People murmured, as if their common liberty were too much wronged, by ſuch inſolence of this preſumptuous Captain. Which Hannibal perceiving, roſe up and ſpake unto them, ſaying; That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwiſe than the cuſtoms of the City would allow; foraſmuch as he had been thence abſent ever ſince he was a Boy of nine years old, until he was now a man of five and forty. Having thus excuſed himſelf of the diſorder, he diſcourſed unto them concerning the Peace: and perſwaded them to accept it, as wanting ability to defend themſelves, had the Demands of the Enemy been yet more rigorous. Finally, upon good advice they reſolved to yield unto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they paid out of hand five and twenty thouſand pounds weight in Silver, in recompence of damages, and injuries by them done to his Fleet and Embaſſadors. Scipio granted them Truce for three Months, in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithall he gave injunction, that they ſhould neither in the mean while ſend Embaſſadors any whither elſe, not yet diſmiſs any Embaſſadors to them ſent, without firſt making him acquainted what they were, and what their errand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wiſe and honourable men, by the miſeries whereinto Carthage was fallen, through their malicious counſels. Aſdrubal, ſurnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and a great Friend of Hanno, was chief of the Embaſſages which they ſent to Rome for obtaining Peace. They went thither in company of Scipio his Embaſſadors, who related unto the Senate and People theſe joyful news. About the ſame time arrived at Rome Embaſſadors from Philip King of Macedon: who, together with the Carthaginians, were fain to wait a while for Audience, till the Election of new Conſuls, then in hand, was finiſhed; and order taken, for the Provinces of them, and the new Prætors. Then were the Macedonian Embaſſadors called into the Senate: who firſt anſwering unto ſome points, wherein the Romans had lately ſignified unto their King, that they found themſelves grieved; returned the blame upon thoſe Greeks themſelves, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accuſed they Marcus Aurelius: who being one of the three Embaſſadors, that had lately been ſent from Rome unto King Philip, tarried in Greece behind his fellows, and there levying men, made War upon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was between him and the Romans. Further they deſired of the Senate, That one Sopater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Country-men, that had lately ſerved Hannibal for Pay; and being taken Priſoners in Africk, were kept in Bonds by Scipio, might be releaſed and delivered unto them. Unto all this M. Furius, whom Aurelius had ſent to Rome for that purpoſe, made a ſharp anſwer. He ſaid, that the Greeks, which were confederate with Rome, enduring ſo many injuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was fain to ſtay behind, to help them as he might; which elſe were like to be brought under the Kings Subjection. As for Sopater, he affirmed it to be one of the Kings Counſel, and very inward with him: one that ſerved not for money, but carryed money with him, and four thouſand men, ſent from the King to the aid of Hannibal. About theſe points, when the Macedonian Embaſſadors could make unto the Senate no good anſwer, they were willed to return, and tell their Maſter, That War he ſought, and War he ſhould find, if he proceeded as he had begun. For in two main points He had broken the League that was between him and the Romans: Firſt, in that he had wronged their Confederates: and Secondly, in that he had aided their Enemies againſt them, with men and money.

Theſe quarrels with Philip, that promiſed to open a way into Greece and the Eaſtern Countreys, helped well the Carthaginian Embaſſadors in their ſolicitation of Peace. They appeared a very reverend company, when they entred into the Senate: and Aſdrubal above the reſt was much reſpected, as one, whoſe good offices had kept the Romans from neceſſity of ſending Embaſſadors to Carthage, upon the like errand. He liberally granted, that the juſtice of the quarrel had been wholly on the Romans ſide; ſaying, that it was the fault of ſome violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could he not altogether excuſe the City, that had been too vehement in the proſecution of bad counſel. But if Hanno, and himſelf might have had their wills, the Carthaginians, even at the beſt of their Fortune, ſhould have granted the Peace, which they now deſired. Herewithall he commended the moderation of the Romans, as no ſmall argument of their Valour; by which always they had been Victorious. To the ſame effect ſpake the reſt of the Embaſſadors: all of them entreating to have the Peace ratified; though ſome with more lamentable words than others, according to the diverſity of their ſtile. They had patience enough to endure ſuch reproof of Perjury, as they themſelves might have laid upon the Romans, if their diligence and fortune had been ſuch as the Romans was. Among the reſt, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would ſwear to keep the Peace hereafter: Aſdrubal made anſwer; Even by the ſame gods, that are ſo ſevere unto thoſe that violate their Leagues.

Lentulus the Conſul, interpoſing the authority of his office, would have hindred the Senate from proceeding unto concluſion of Peace; for that hereby he was like to loſe the honour, which he purpoſed to get by making War in Africk. But the matter was propounded unto the People, in whom reſted the Soveraign Command of Rome; and by them referred wholly unto the pleaſure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio, with ten Delegates, ſent unto him from Rome of purpoſe, ſhould make a League with the Carthaginians, upon ſuch conditions as ſeemed beſt: which were none other, than the ſame which he had already propounded. For this favour, the Carthaginian Embaſſadors humbly thanked the Senate; and craved licence, that they might viſit their Country-men, which were Priſoners in Rome: afterwards, that they might ranſome and carry home with them ſome that were their eſpecial Friends; of whom they gave in writing almoſt two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of thoſe Priſoners, which the Embaſſadors would chooſe, ſhould be ſent over into Africk, and be freely reſtored ſtored to liberty by Scipio, when the Peace was fully concluded. So they took leave, and returned home, in company of the ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to joyn with Scipio in Commiſſion.

At their coming into Africk, the Peace was given, and accepted, without any controverſie or diſputation. The Priſoners, Fugitives, and Renegado's, were delivered up to Scipio: likewiſe the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio took more vengeance upon the Renegado's than upon the Fugitives; and upon thoſe of the Romans, than upon the Latines, or other Italians. The Latines he beheaded: the Romans he crucified. About the firſt payment of their money, the Carthaginians were ſomewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treaſury could have ſpared two hundred Talents for the preſent; yet ſince the penſion was annual, and to continue fifty years: it was thought meet to lay the burden upon the Citizens. At the collection of the ſum there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Roman yoke had begun to pinch them; ſo as many, even of the Senators, could not forbear weeping. Contrariwiſe, Hannibal could not refrain from laughter. For which, when he was checked by Aſdrubal Hædus, and told, That it worſt of all beſeemed him to laugh, ſince he had been the cauſe why all others did weep; He anſwered, That laughter did not always proceed from joy; but ſometimes from extremity of indignation: Yet, ſaid He, My laughter is more ſeaſonable, and leſs abſurd, than your tears. For ye ſhould have wept when ye gave up your Ships and Elephants, and when ye bound your own hands from the uſe of Arms, without the good leave of the Romans firſt obtained. This miſerable condition keeps us under, and holds us in aſſured ſervitude. But of theſe matters ye had no feeling. Now, when a little money is wrung out of your private purſes, ye have thereof ſome ſenſe. God grant that the time come not hereafter, wherein ye ſhall acknowledge, that it was the very leaſt part of your miſery for which ye have ſhed theſe tears. Thus diſcourſed Hannibal unto thoſe, who taſting the bitter fruits of their own malicious counſel, repented when it was too late; and inſtead of curſing their own diſorders, which had bred this grievous Diſeaſe, accuſed the Phyſician, whoſe noble endeavours had been employed in procuring the remedy.

Scipio being to take leave of Africk, produced Maſaniſſa, and magnified him in preſence of the Army, with high commendations not undeſervedly. To him he alſo conſigned over thoſe towns of King Syphax, which the Romans at that preſent held; wherein, to ſay truth, he gave him but his due; and that which otherwiſe he knew not well how to beſtow. But the love of the Romans, and friendſhip of Scipio, was fully anſwerable, now and hereafter, to all the deſervings of this Numidian King. About Carthage there reſted no more to be done. Wherefore the Romans embarqued themſelves for Sicil: where when they arrived at Lylibæum, Scipio with ſome part of his Army took his way home to Rome by Land; and ſent the reſt before him thither by Sea. His Journey through Italy was no leſs glorious than any triumph: all the People thronging out of the Towns and Villages, to do him honour as he paſſed along. He entred the City in Triumph: neither was there ever before, or after, any Triumph celebrated with ſo great joy of the People, as was this of Scipio; though, in bravery of the pomp, there were others in time ſhortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the City in this Triumph, and dying ſoon after in priſon; or whether he were dead a while before: it cannot be affirmed. Thus much may be avowed, that it was a barbarous cuſtom of the Romans, to inſult over the calamities of mighty Princes, by leading them contumeliouſly in Triumph; yea, though they were ſuch, as had always made fair and courteous War. But hereof we ſhall have better example e're the ſame age paſs. It was neither the perſon of Syphax, nor any other glory of the ſpectacle, that ſo much beautified the Triumph of Scipio, as did the contemplation of that grievous War paſt, whereof the Romans had been in a manner without hope that ever they ſhould ſee Italy free. This made them look chearfully upon the Author of ſo great a converſion; and filled them with more joy, than they well could moderate. Wherefore they gave to Scipio the Title of the African: ſtiling him by the name of that Province, which he had ſubdued. This honourable kind of ſurname, taken from a conquered Province, grew afterwards more common, and was uſurped by men of leſs deſert: eſpecially by many of the Cæſars, who ſometimes arrogated unto themſelves the title of Countreys, wherein they had performed little or nothing; as if ſuch glorious Attributes could have made them like in vertue unto Scipio the African.

OF the great similitude found in worldly event, the limitation of matter hath been assigned as a probable cause. For since Nature is confined unto a subject that is not unbounded; the works of Nature must needs be finite, and many of them resemble one the other. Now in those actions, that seem to have their whole dependance upon the will of man, we are less to wonder, if we find less variety: since it is no great portion of things which are obnoxious unto the humane power; and since they are the same affections, by which the wills of sundry men are over-ruled, in managing the affairs of our daily life. It may be observed in the change of Empires, before those times whereof we now write, how the Assyrians or Chaldeans invaded the kingdom of the Medes, with two hundred thousand Foot, and threescore thousand Horse; but failing in their intended conquest, they became subject within a while themselves unto the Medes and Persians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell upon the Greeks with such number of men, as might have seemed resistless. But after that the Persians were beaten home again, their Empire was never secure of the Greeks: who at all times of leisure from intestine War, devised upon the conquest thereof, which finally they made under the great Alexander. If Nabuchadonosor with his rough old Souldiers, had undertaken the Medes: or Cyrus with his well trained Army, had made attempt upon Greece, the issue might, in humane reason, have been far different. Yet would it then have been expedient for them, to employ the travel and vertue of their men, rather then the greatness of their names against those people, that were of no less valiant, (though less renowned,) than their own. For the menacing words used by Cyrus, and some small displeasures done to the Greeks (in which kind it may be, that Nabuchadonosor likewise offended the Medes and Persians) were not so available to victory, as to draw on revenge in the future. Great Kingdoms, when they decay in strength, suffer as did the old Lion, for the oppression done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolf, gored by the Bull, yea and kickt by the Ass. But Princes are often carried away from reason, by mis-understanding the language of Fame: and despising the vertue that makes little noise, adventure to provoke it against themselves; as if it were not possible that their own glory should be foiled by any of less-noted excellence. Against the same stone: whereat Xerxes, and before him (as I take it) Evilmerodach, had stumbled, Pyrrhus the Epirot had dasht his foot. He was not indeed the King of all Greece; though most of mark, and a better Souldier than any other Greekish King, when he entered into the war against the Romans. This war he undertook as it were for his minds sake; having received no injury; but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greeks that served under him, to prevail so easily against the barbarous Romans, that they should only serve as a step to his further intended conquests, of Sicil and Africk. But when the Romans by their victory against Pyrrhus had found their own vertue to be of richer metal; than was the more shining valour of the Greeks: than did all the bravery of the Epirots (his Elephants, and whatsoever else had served to make him terrible) serve only to make the Romans, in time following, to think more highly of themselves. *For since they had overcome the best Warrior in Greece, even Him, that being thus beaten by them, could in a year after make himself Lord of Greece and Macedon: what should hinder them from the conquest of all those unwarlike Provinces, which in compass of 12. years a Macedonian King of late memory had won? Certainly there was hereunto requisite no more: than to bring to their own devotion by some good means, the whole Country of Greece: all the rest, this done, would follow it self. How to deal with the Greeks, Philip and Alexander had shewed a way: which, or perhaps a better, they might learn, by getting more acquaintance with the Nation.

*The King of Spains pretended invincible Navy, being beaten out of the British Seas, invited us to those of Spain; and having broken the greatest Fleet that ever the Spaniards gathered together, we never made account of any of his preparations after that time.

When therefore the first Punick war was ended, which followed soon after the wars of Pyrrhus and of the Tarentines: then were the Romans at good leasure to hearken after news in Greece; and to entertain any good occasion: that should be on that side presented. They had also then a strong Fleet: and were become, though not otherwise very skilfull Marriners; yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as happily as could be wished, that the Illyrian Queen Teuta made at the same time cruel war upon the Greeks: wasting their Countrey, and sacking their Towns, only because they were unable to resist, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrel, if the Romans were desirous to enter; the Queen was not slow to give them cause. And their accomplishing of that war, which they made with her, was, in their own opinion, a matter not unworthy to make their Patronage to be desired by the Greeks. But no such thing here hapned: though they sent Embassadours, as it were to offer themselves; by signifying, that for the love of Greece they

they had undertaken this Illyrian war. Thus began the first acquaintance betwixt the Greeks and Romans: which afterwards encreased very hastily, through the indiscretion of King Philip the Macedonian; whose business with them, now being the subject of our story, it is meet that we should relate (though somewhat briefly) the beginning of his reign, and his first actions. It was like to prove a busie time in the world, when, within the space of 4 years, new Kings began to reign in the most of all Countreys known; and 3. of them young boyes, in 3 of the greatest kingdoms. This hapned from the third year of the hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, unto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleucus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria, in whose room succeeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the Great. Ptolomy Philopater succeeded in in the Kingdom of Egypt unto his father Evergetes. And Philip the son of Demetrius, being 16 or 17 years old, received the Kingdom of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Achæans and most of the Greeks, by the decease of his Uncle Antigonus Doson, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedæmon, and the Countreys about Mount Taurus. For Ariathes then began his reign in Cappadocia. Lycurgus found means to make himself King over the Lacedemonians, whose Common-wealth, since the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headless; and Achæus, a kinsman of Antiochus but a Rebel unto him, occupied the Regions near unto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the State of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second and third years of the one hundred and fortieth Olympiad it was, that open war brake out between Rome and Carthage; and that Hannibal began his great Invasion upon Italy. Those troubles of the Western world, which were indeed the greatest, we have already followed unto an end: Of Antiochus, Ptolomy, and the rest; we shall speak hereafter, when the Romans find them out.

Philip, soon after the beginning of his reign, came into Peloponnesus; greatly desired of the Achæans, and many other his dependants. That Country, having freed it self by the help of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an easie subjection unto Cleomenes; was now become no less obnoxius to the Macedonian, than it should have been to the Spartan; and therewithal it lay open unto the violence of the Ætolians; who despised even the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons thereof. The Ætolians were no men to be idle; nor were much addicted unto any other Art than war. Therefore wanting employment, they fell upon the Messenians that were their own Clients, and (excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their consanguinity) the only good friends which they had at the present in Peloponnesus. Their invasion was no less unexpected, then it was unjust: whereby with greater ease they made spoil of the Conntrey; finding none prepared to make resistance. The Achæans, were called by the Messenians to help: which they did the more willingly: because the Ætolians passing without leave through their Territory, had (as was their manner) done what harm they listed. Old Aratus could hardly abide these Ætolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembring the injuries, wherewith most ingratefully they had required no small benefits done to them by the Achæans. He was therefore so hasty to fall upon this their Army, that he could hardly endure to stay few dayes until the time of his own Office came; being chosen Prætor of the Achæans for the year following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he shewed himself a man fitter (as hath been already noted of him) for any other service, than leading of Army. He suffered them to pass quietly along with their booty, through a part of the Country, wherein he might very easily have distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so near, when they had recovered ground of advantage, that they easily defeated all his Army. So they departed home rich, and well animated to return again. As for the Achæans, they got hereby only the friendship of the Messenians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made Confederacy. Shortly after, the Ætolians invaded Peloponnesus again: having no more to do, than to pass over the narrow Straights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulph of Lepanto, where they might land in the Countrv of the Eleans. There joyned with them, in this their second invasion, a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that Condition imposed upon them by the Romans, of setting out no Ships of war unto the Coast of Greece; made bold to seek adventures again, and did great mischief. Demetrius Pharius, a creature of the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his Kingdom, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, and fell upon the Islands of the Cyclades in the Ægean sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip, or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians under Scerdilaides, or Scerdiletus, having gotten what they could elsewhere by roving at Sea, accompanied the Ætolians into Peloponnesus: who made greater havock in the Country now, than in their former Expedition, and returned home without finding any resistance.

Of these things great complaint was made unto Philip, when he came to Corinth. And because men were desirous to satisfie themselves with some speedy revenge: there were that urged to have some grievous punishment to be laid upon the Lacædemonians; who were thought underhand to have favoured the Ætolians, in meer despight of the Achæans and Macedonians, by whom themselves had lately been subdued. It is true, that the Lacedæmonians had been so affected: and (which was worse) at the arrival of Philip, they slew such friends of his, as having checked their inclination, seemed likely to appeach them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they well commit themselves to judgement: but intreated the King, that he would abstain from coming to them with an Army: since their Town was lately much disquieted with civil discord, which they hoped soon to appease, and meant always to remain in his devotion. Philip was easily satisfied with this: not for that he (or rather old Aratus, who then wholly governed him) did misunderstand the Lacedæmonians: but for that a greater work was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth in presence of the King, the Embassadors of the Achæans, Bœotians, Epirots, and Acarnanians; all complaining upon the Ætolians: and desiring to have War decreed against them, by common assent. Philip sent his letters unto the Ætolians, requiring them to make ready their answer in some covenient time; if they could alledge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet ſhould be holden at Rhium for that purpoſe: whither if it pleaſed him to come, or ſend, he ſhould be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to have been there at the day. But when the Ætolians underſtood this for certain, they adjourned the Counſel unto a further time, ſaying, That ſuch weighty matters ought not to be handled, ſave in the great Parliament of all Ætolia. This trick of Law notwithſtanding, open War was proclaimed againſt them. And they, as it were, to ſhew how well they had deſerved it, made election of Scopas to be their prætor, that was Author of theſe Invaſions made on Peloponneſus; and the only man, in a ſort, upon whom they muſt have laid the blame of theſe actions, if they would have ſhifted it from the publick.

After this, Philip went unto Macedon, where he prepared buſily for the War againſt the year following. He alſo aſſayed the Illyrians Scerdilaidas, with fair words and promiſes; whom he eaſily won from the Ætolian ſide, for as much as the Ætolians had couzened him of his ſhare, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like ſort the Achæans, who had firſt of all others proclaimed the War in their own Country, ſent unto the Acarnanians, Epirots, Meſſenians, and Lacedæmonians; requeſting them forthwith to declare themſelves, and to denounce war unto the Ætolians; without ſtaying (as it were) to wait the event. Hereunto they received divers anſwers according to the qualities of thoſe with whom they dealt. The Acarnanians, a free-hearted and valiant, though a ſmall Nation, and bordering upon the Ætolians, of whom they ſtood in continual danger; ſaid, that they could not honeſtly refuſe to ſhew their faithful meaning in that War, which was concluded by general aſſent. The Epirots that were more mighty, were nevertheleſs more cunning and reſerved: ſo that they ſtood upon a needleſs point, and deſired to be held excuſed, until Philip (of whoſe meaning they needed not to have made any doubt) ſhould firſt proclaim the war. The Meſſenians, for whoſe cauſe the war was undertaken, excuſed themſelves, by reaſon of a Town which the Ætolians held upon their borders, and ſaid, that they durſt not be over-bold, until that bridle were taken out of their mouths. As for the Lacedæmonians, the chief of them ſtudied only, how to manage the treaſon for which their City had been ſo lately pardoned: and therefore diſmiſſed the Embaſſadors of the Confederates, without any anſwer at all. They had three years together continued ſubject againſt their wills to the Macedonians, expecting ſtill when Cleomenes ſhould return out of Egypt to reign over them again, and maintain, as he was wont, the honour of their City. In this regard they choſe not any Kings, but were contented with the rule of Ephori. Of theſe there were ſome, that thought the publick ſafety to conſiſt, in holding their faith with the Macedonians that had preſerved them. And hereto they referred all their counſels: being perhaps a little moved with reſpect of the benefit, which might redound unto themſelves, by adhering firmly to thoſe which at the preſent bore rule over them. Others, and thoſe the greater part were ſtill deviſing, how to make all ready for Cleomenes againſt his return; and ſought to joyn with the Ætolians, which were moſt likely to give im ſtrong aſſiſtance. The Macedonian faction had the more authority, and durſt more freely ſpeak their minds: but the contrary ſide was the more paſſionate, and ſpared not by murders or any other violent courſes, to ſet forward their deſire. Neither did it ſuffice, that about theſe times there came certain report of Cleomenes his death. For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which theſe intended, fancying unto themſelves the glory of their Anceſtors in ſuch Ages paſt, as it were not like to come again. Cleomenes was, they knew, the moſt able man to reſtore them unto their greatneſs and luſtre; which once he had in a manner performed: But ſince he was dead, and that, without injury to his well-deſerving vertue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would have, and thoſe of the race of Hercules, as in former times; for that without ſuch helps, they muſt continue little better than ſubjects unto the Macedonian, and far leſs by him reſpected, than were the Achæans. Thus were they tranſported by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the moſt working ſpirits among them, procured the Ætolians to ſend an Embaſſie to Sparta: which propounded the matter openly unto the people, whereof no one of the Citizens durſt have made himſelf the Author. Much diſputation, and hot, there was, between thoſe of the Macedonian party, and theſe their oppoſites: in ſuch wiſe that nothing could be concluded; until by maſſacre or baniſhment of all, or the chief, that ſpake againſt the Ætolians: the diverſity of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded between the Lacedæmonians and Ætolians: without all regard of the Macedonians or Achæans, who had ſpared the City, when they might have deſtroyed it. Then alſo they went in hand with election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was ſo nice, and ſo regardful of their antient Laws, as touching the chooſing of the one King, that we may juſtly wonder, how they grew ſo careleſs in making choice of the other. In the one of their Royal Families they found Ageſipolis, the ſon of Ageſipolis, the ſon of King Cleombrotus: and him they admitted to reign over them, as heir apparent to his Grandfather. This Ageſipolis was a young Boy, ſtanding in need of a Guardian; and had an Uncle, his Fathers Brother, that was fit for the Government. Yet becauſe the Law required, that the ſon, how young ſoever, ſhould have his fathers whole right and Title: the Lacedæmonians, though ſtanding in need of a man, were ſo punctual in obſervation of the Law, that they made this child their King, and appointed his Uncle Cleomenes to be his Protector. But in the other branch of the Royal Family, though there was no want of heirs: yet would not the people trouble themſelves about any of them, to examine the goodneſs of his Claim; but made election of one Lycurgus, who having no manner of title to the Kingdom, beſtowed upon each of the Ephori, a Talent, and thereby himſelf be ſaluted King of Sparta, and a Gentleman of the race of Hercules. This Lycurgus to gratifie his Partiſans, and to approve his worth by action, invaded the Country of the Argives: which lay open and unguarded, as in a time of peace. There he did great ſpoil, and won divers Towns; whereof two he retained, and annexed unto the State of Lacedæmonian. After ſuch open hoſtility, the Lacedæmonians declared themſelves on the Ætolian ſide; and proclaimed War againſt the Achæans.

Thus

Thus the beginnings of the War fell out much otherwiſe, than the Achæans and their Confederates had expected, when they firſt made preparation. Philip was not ready: the Epirots gave uncertain anſwer: the Meſſenians would not ſtir: all the burden muſt lye upon themſelves and the poor Acarnanians, whom the Ætolians, by favour of the Eleans, could invade at pleaſure, as they were like to do; and by help of the Lacedæmonians, could aſſail on all parts at once. It was not long e're the Ætolians, paſſing over the Bay of Corinth, ſurpriſed the Twon of Ægira: which if they could have held, they ſhould thereby grievouſly have moleſted the Achæans, for that it ſtood in the mid-way between Ægium and Sycion, two of their principal Cities, and gave open way into the heart of all the Country. But as Ægira was taken by ſurpriſe: ſo was it preſently loſt again, through greedineſs of ſpoil; whileſt they that ſhould have made it their firſt care, to aſſure the place unto themſelves, by occupying the citadel and other pieces of ſtrength, fell heedleſly to ranſack private houſes, and thereby gave the Citizens leave to make head, by whom they were driven with great ſlaughter back unto their Fleet. About the ſame time, another Ætolian Army landing among the Eleans, fell upon the Weſtern Coaſt of Achaia; waſting all the Territory of the Dymæans and other people, that were firſt beginners of the Achæan Confederacy. The Dymæans and their neighbours made head againſt theſe Invaders; but were ſo well beaten, that the enemy grew bolder with them than before. They ſent for help unto their Prætor, and to all the Towns of their Society in vain. For the Achæans having lately been much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to do little of themſelves: neither could they get any ſtrength of Mercenaries; foraſmuch as at the end of Cleomenes his war, they had covetouſly with-held part of their due from thoſe that ſerved them therein. So through this diſability of the Achæans, and inſufficiency of their Prætor; the Dymæans, with others, were driven to with-hold their contribution heretofore made for the publick ſervice, and to convert the money to their own defence. Lycurgus alſo with his Lacedæmonians, began to win upon the Arcadians that were confederate with Philip and the Achæans.

Philip came to the borders of the Ætolians, whilſt their Army was thus employed a far off in Peloponneſus. The Epirots joyned all their forces with him: and by ſuch their willing readineſs, drew him to the ſiege of a Frontier piece, which they deſired to get into their own hands; for that, by commodity thereof, they hoped ſhortly to make themſelves Maſters of Ambracia. There he ſpent forty dayes, e're he could end the buſineſs; which tended only to the benefit of the Epirots. Had he entred into the heart of Ætolia at his firſt coming in; it is thought that he might have had an end of the War. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken upon ſmall Towns or Forts: and not ſeldom, that the importunity of Aſſociates, to have their own deſires fulfilled, converts the preparations of great Kings to thoſe uſes for which they never were intended; thereby hindring the proſecution of their main deſignes. Thus was our King Henry the VIII. led aſide, and quite out of his way, by Maximilian the Emperour to the ſiege of Tournay: at ſuch time as the French King Lewis the XII. hearing that the ſtrong City of Terwin was loſt, and that his Cavallry, wherein reſted his chief confidence, two thouſand were beaten by the Earl of Eſſex with ſeven hundred Engliſh; was thinking to withdraw himſelf into Britain, in fear that Henry would have come to Paris.

The ſtay that Philip made at Ambrachus did wondrouſly embolden the Ætolians in ſuch ſort, as their Prætor Scopas adventured to lead all their forces out of the Country; and therewith not only to over-run Theſſalie, but to make impreſſion into Macedon. He ran as far as to Dium, a City of Macedon upon the Ægean Sea: which, being forſaken by the Inhabitants at his coming, he took, and razed to the ground. He ſpared neither Temple, nor any other of the goodly building therein, but overturned all: and among the reſt, he threw down the Statua's that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly honoured by his Country-men at his return; foraſmuch as hereby they thought their Nation to be grown terrible, not only (as before) unto Peloponneſus, but even to Macedon it ſelf. But this their pride was ſoon abated; and they rewarded ſhortly at home in their own Country, for their pains taken at Dium. Philip having diſpatched his work at Ambracus, made a ſtrong invaſion upon Ætolia. He took Phætiæ, Metropolis, Oeniade, Pæanium, Elæus, and divers other Towns and Caſtles of theirs, of which he burnt ſome, and fortified others. He alſo beat the Ætolians in ſundry skirmiſhes: and waſted all the Country over, without receiving any harm. This done, while he was about to make a cut over the Straights into Peloponneſus, and to do the like ſpoil in the Country of the Eleans, whereto he was vehemently ſolicited by the Achæan Embaſſadors; news came out of Macedon, that the Dardanians were ready with a great Army to fall upon the Country. Theſe Dardanians were a barbarous people, divided by Mount Hæmus from the Northern part of Macedon, and were accuſtomed to ſeek booty in that wealthy Kingdom, when they found their own times. Having therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a journey into Peloponneſus; they purpoſed in his abſence, which they thought would be long, to get what they could for themſelves in his Countrey: as had been their manner upon the like advantages. This made the King to diſmiſs the Achæan Embaſſadors, (whom he ſhould have accompanied home with his Army) and to bid them have patience until another year. So he took his way home-wards: and as he was paſſing out of Acarnania into Epirus, there repaired unto him Demetrius Pharius, with no more than one Ship; that was newly chaſed out of his Kingdom by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately ſhewed himſelf a friend to Antigonus Doſon in the wars of Cleomenes: and returning in his laſt Voyage from the Cyclades, was ready at their firſt requeſt, to take part with Philips Captains. Theſe, or the like conſiderations, made him welcome unto the Macedonian King: whoſe Counſellor he was ever after. The Dardanians hearing of the Kings return, brake up their Army, and gave over for the preſent their invaſion of Macedon, towards which they were already on their way.

All that Summer following the King reſted at Lariſſa in Theſſaly, whilſt his People gathered in their Harveſt. But the Ætolians reſted not. They avenged themſelves upon the Epirots: whom for the harms by them and Philip done in Ætolia, they requited with all extremities of War; among which, the the moſt notable was, the ruine of the moſt famous Temple of Dodona. When Winter grew on, and all thought of War, until another year, was laid aſide: Philip ſtole a Journey into Peloponneſus, with 5000 Foot, and about 400 Horſe. As ſoon as he was within Corinth; He commanded the Gates to be ſhut, that no word ſhould be carryed forth of his arrival. He ſent privily for old Aratus to come thither unto him: with whom he took order, when, and in what places, he would have the Achæan Souldiers ready to meet him. The Enemies were then abroad in the Country, without ſomewhat more than two thouſand Foot, and an hundred Horſe; little thinking to meet with oppoſition. Indeed they had little cauſe to fear: ſince the Achæans themſelves were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians; until they heard, that theſe two thouſand Eleans, Ætolians, and their fellows, were by him ſurprized, and all made Priſoners, or ſlain. By this exploit which he did at his firſt coming Philip got very much reputation and likewiſe he purchaſed both reputation and love, by divers actions immediately following. He won Pſophis, an exceeding ſtrong Town, in the Borders of Arcadia, which the Eleans and Ætolians then held. He won it by aſſault at his firſt coming: wherein it much availed him, that the Enemy, not believing that he would undertake ſuch a piece of work at ſuch an unſeaſonable time of the year, was careleſs of providing even ſuch ſtore of Weapons, as might have ſerved to defend it. The Town was preſerved by the King from ſacking; and given to the Achæans of his meer motion, before they requeſted it. Thence went he to Laſion, which yielded for very fear; hearing how eaſily he had taken Pſophis. This Town alſo he gave to the Achæans. The like liberality he uſed towards others, that had ancient title unto places by him recovered. Then fell he upon the Country of Elis, where was much wealth to be gotten: for that the People were addicted to Husbandry, and lived abroad in Villages; even ſuch as were of the wealthier ſort among them. So he came to the City of Olympia: where having done ſacrifice to Jupiter, feaſted his Captains, and refreſhed his Army three days; He proceeded on to the ſpoil of thoſe, that had taken pleaſure to ſhare with the Ætolians, in the ſpoils of their otherwiſe-deſerving neighbours. Great abundance of Cattle he took, with great numbers of Slaves, and much wealth of all ſorts, ſuch as could be found in rich Villages. Then he fell in hand with the Towns, whereinto a great multitude of the Country People were fled. Some of theſe were taken at the firſt aſſault. Some yielded for fear. Some prevented the labour of his Journey, by ſending Embaſſadors to yield before he came. And ſome that were held with Garriſons againſt their wills, took courage to ſet themſelves at liberty, by ſeeing the King ſo near: to whoſe Patronage thenceforth they betook themſelves. And many places were ſpoiled by the Ætolians Captains; becauſe they diſtruſted their ability to hold them. So the King won more Towns in the Country, than the ſharpneſs of Winter would ſuffer him to ſtay there days. Fain he would have fought with the Ætolians: but they made ſuch haſte from him, that he could not overtake them, till they had covered themſelves within the Town of Samicum; where they thought to have been ſafe. But Philip aſſaulted them therein ſo forcibly, that he made them glad to yield the place; obtaining licence to to depart with their Lives and Arms. Having performed ſo much in this expedition, the King repoſed himſelf a while in Megalopolis, and then removed to Argos, where he ſpent all the reſt of the Winter.

Before the Kings arrival in Peloponneſus, the Lacedæmonians, with Lycurgus their new King, had gotten ſomewhat in Arcadia; and threatned to do great matters. But when they were admoniſhed, by the calamity that fell upon the Eleans, of the danger hanging over their own heads; they quitted their winnings, and withdrew themſelves home. This Lycurgus, as he had no other right to the Kingdom of Sparta, than that which he could buy with mony, ſo was he neither free from danger of conſpiracies made againſt him: nor from thoſe jealouſies, with which Uſurpers are commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royal blood, that thinking himſelf to have beſt right unto the Kingdom, purpoſed to make way thereunto by maſſacre of his oppoſites; and afterwards to confirm himſelf, by propounding unto the Multitude ſuch reformation of the State as was moſt popular: namely, by making an equal diſtribution of all the Lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient inſtitution of that Common-wealth. He won to his party ſome two hundred men; with whom he fell upon the Ephori, as they were together at Supper, and ſlew them all. Then went he to Lycurgus his Houſe: who perceiving the danger, ſtole away and fled. It remained that he ſhould give account of theſe doings to the People, and procure them to take part with him. But their minds not being hereto pre diſpoſed; they ſo little regarded his goodly offers, as even whilſt he was uſing his beſt perſwaſions, they were conſulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceived whereabout they went, and ſhifted preſently away. So he lived afterwards among the Achæans, a baniſhed man, and hated of his own People. As for Lycurgus he returned home: and ſuſpecting thenceforth all thoſe of Hercules his race, found means to drive out his fellow-King young Ageſipolis, whereby he made himſelf Lord alone. His doings grew to be ſuſpected in ſuch ſort, as once he ſhould have been apprehended by the Ephori. But though his actions hitherto might have been defended; yet rather than to adventure himſelf into Judgment, he choſe to flie for a time, and ſojourn among his Friends the Ætolians. His well-known vehemency in oppoſition to the Macedonians, had procured unto him ſuch good liking among the People, that in his abſence they began to conſider the weakneſs of their own ſurmiſes againſt him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Eſtate. But in time following, he took better heed unto himſelf: not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was ſo acknowledged) but by taking order, that it ſhould not be in the power of the Citizens to expell him when they liſted. By what actions he got the name of a Tyrant; or at what time it was, that he chaſed Ageſipolis out of the City; I do not certainly find. Like enough it is, That this being the firſt of three Uſurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to be placed in the rank of Tyrants; which the laſt of the three very juſtly deſerved. Whatſoever he was toward ſome private Citizens, in the War againſt Philip, he behaved himſelf as a provident man, and careful of his Countreys good.

SECT.

SECT. II.

How Philip was misadvised by ill Counsellors: who afterwards wrought Treason against him; and were justly punished. He invadeth the Ætolians a second time: and forceth them to sue for Peace: which is granted unto them.

WHilst the King lay at Argos devising upon his business for the year following, some ambitious men that were about him, studied so diligently for their own greatness, as they were like to have spoiled all that he took in hand. Antigonus Doson had left unto Philip such Counsellors, as to him did seem the fittest men for governing of his Youth. The chief of these was Apelles; that had the charge of his Person, and also the ordering of his Treasures. This man, seeming to himself a great Politician, thought that he should do a notable piece of service to his Prince, if he could reduce the Achæans unto the same degree of subjection, wherein the Macedonians lived. To bring this to pass; during the late expedition, he had caused some of the Macedonians to thrust the Achæans out of their Lodgings, and to strip them of the booty that they had gotten. Proceeding further, as occasion fell out; he was bold to chastise some of that Nation; causing his Ministers to take and whip them. If any of them offered (as there were some of them that could not refrain) to help their Fellows; them he laid by the Heels, and punished as Mutineers. Hereby he thought to bring it to pass by little and little, that they should be qualified with an habit of blind obedience; and think nothing unjust that pleased the King. But these Achæans were tenderly sensible in matters of liberty: whereof if they could have been contented to suffer any little diminution, they needed not have troubled the Macedonians to help them in the War against Cleomenes. They bemoaned themselves unto old Aratus: and besought him to think upon some good order, that they might not be oppressed by degrees. Aratus forthwith dealt earnestly with the King; as in a matter more weighty than at first it might seem. The King bestowed gracious words upon those that had been wronged, and forbade Apelles to follow the course begun. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he dissembled his choler for a time. He thought so well of his own Project, that he could not endure to lay it aside; being perhaps unable to do the King any valuable Service, in business of other nature. He purposed therefore hereafter to begin at the head: since, in biting at the Tail, the Fish had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise be, than that among the Achæans there were some, who bore no hearty affection to Aratus. These he enquired out, and sending for them, entertained them with words of Court: promising to become their especial Friend, and commend them unto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himself: letting him know, that as long as he continued to make much of Aratus, he must be fain to deal precisely with the Achæans, and as it were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased, to give countenance unto those others whom he himself commended, then should the Achæans, and all other Peloponnesians, be quickly brought to conform themselves unto the duty of obedient Subjects By such perswasions, he drew the King to be present at Ægium, where the Achæans were to hold Election of a new Prætor. There with much more labour, than would have been needful in a business of more importance, the King by fair words and threatnings together, obtained so much, That Eperatus, a very insufficient man, but one of Apelles his new Favourites, was chosen Prætor, instead of one more worthy, for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good introduction unto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Patras and Dyma, to a very strong Castle held by the Eleans, which was called Tichos. The Garrison yielded it up for fear, at his first coming: whereof he was glad, for that he had an earnest desire to bestow it upon the Dymæans, as he presently did.

The King thought it strange, that all this while he heard of no Messengers from the Eleans, to sue for Peace. For at his departure out of their Country the last Winter, he had let loose one Amphidamus a Captain of theirs, that was his Prisoner; because he found him an intelligent man, and one that undertook to make them forsake their alliance with the Ætolians, and joyn with him upon reasonable terms. This if they could be contented to do, he willed Amphidamus to let them understand, That he would render unto them freely all Prisoners which he had of theirs; That he would defend them from all forrain invasion; and that they should hold their liberty entire, living after their own Laws, without paying any manner of Tribute, or being kept under by any Garrison. These conditions were not to be despised, if they had found credit, as they might have done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Tichos, and made a new invasion upon their Country: then began the Eleans, (that were not before over-hasty to believe such fair promises) to suspect Amphidamus as a Traitor, and one that was set on work for no other end, than to breed a mutual diffidence between them and the Ætolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands upon him, and send him Prisoner into Ætolia. But he perceived their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for himself; in better for Aratus. For the King (as was said) marvailing what should be the cause, that he heard no news from the Eleans, concerning the offers which he had made unto them by Amphidamus: Apelles his Counsellor, thereby took occasion to supplant Aratus. He said, that old Aratus, and his Son together, had such devices in their Heads, as tended little to the Kings good: And long of them he said it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out. For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Arati, (the Father and the Son) had taken him aside, and given him to understand, that it would be very prejudicial to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the devotion of the Macedonian: And this was the true cause, why neither Amphidamus was very careful in doing this message; nor the Eleans in hearkning to the Kings offers. All this was a false lye, devised by Apelles himself, upon no other ground than his own malice. Philip had no sooner heard this tale, but in a great rage he sent for the two Arati, and bade Apelles rehearse it over again to their Faces. Apelles did so, and with a bold countenance, talking to them as to men already convicted. And when he had said all the rest, e're either Philip or they spake any word; word; He added this clauſe, as it were, in the Kings name: Since the King hath found you ſuch ungrateful wretches, it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Achæans; and therein having made it known what ye are, to depart into Macedon, and leave you to your ſelves. Old Aratus gravely admoniſhed the King; That whenſoever he heard any accuſation, eſpecially againſt a Friend of his own, or a man of worth, He ſhould forbear a while to give credit, until he had diligently examined the buſineſs. For ſuch deliberation was Kingly, and he ſhould never thereof repent him. At the preſent he ſaid there needed no more, than to call in thoſe that had heard his talk with Amphidamus, and eſpecially him that brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a very abſurd thing, That the King ſhould make himſelf the Author of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other evidence, than one mans yea, and anothers no. Hereof the King liked well; and ſaid, that he would make ſufficient inquiry. So paſſed a few days: wherein whilſt Apelles delayed to bring in the proof, which indeed he wanted, Amphidamus came from Elis, and told what had befaln him there. The King was not forgetful, to examine him about the conſpiracy of the Arati: which, when he found no better than a meer device againſt his honourable Friends, he entertained them in a loving manner as before. As for his love to Apelles, though it was hereby ſomewhat cooled; yet by means of long acquaintance, and daily employment, no remiſſion therein could be diſcerned.

The unreſtful temper of Apelles, having with much vehemency brought nothing to paſs, began (as commonly Ambition uſeth) to ſwell and grow venemous for want of his free motion. He betakes himſelf to his cunning again: and as before, being checkt in his doings with thoſe of the Vulgar, he had prepared a Snare for the Arati: ſo failing of them, he thinks it wiſdom to lay for the King himſelf, and for all at once which were about him. In ſuch manner ſometime, the Spider thought to have taken the Swallow, which drave away flyes out of the Chimny; but was carryed (Net and all) into the Air by the Bird, that was too ſtrong to be caught, and held by the ſubtle workmanſhip of a Cob-web. Of the four that next unto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chief place about Philip; Taurion, his Lieutenant in Peloponneſus, and Alexander Captain of the Guard, were faithful men, and ſuch as would not be corrupted. The other two, Leontius Captain of the Targettiers, and Megaleas chief of the Secretaries, were eaſily won to be at Apelles his diſpoſition. This politician therefore ſtudied how to remove the other two from their places, and put ſome Creatures of his own into their rooms. Againſt Alexander he went to work the ordinary way, by calumniation and privy detraction. But for the ſupplanting of Taurion he uſed more fineneſs; loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of War, and one, whom for his many vertues the King might ill ſpare from being always in his preſence. By ſuch Art he thought to have removed him, as we ſay, Out of Gods bleſſing into a warm Sun. In the mean ſeaſon Aratus retired himſelf: and ſought to avoid the dangerous friendſhip of the King, by forbearing to meddle in affairs of State. As for the new Prætor of Achaia, lately choſen by ſuch vehement inſtance of the King; He was a man of no diſpatch, and one that had no grace with the people. Wherefore a great deal of time was loſt, whilſt Philip wanted both the money and the Corn, wherewith he ſhould have been furniſhed by the Achæans. This made the King underſtand his own errour: which he wiſely ſought to reform betimes. He perſwaded the Achæans to rejourn their Parliament from Ægium, to Sycion, the Town of Aratus. There he dealt with the old man and his ſon, perſwading them to forget what was paſt; and laying all the blame upon Apelles, on whom thenceforth he intended to keep a more diligent eye. So by the travel of theſe worthy men, he eaſily obtained what he would of the Achæans. Fifty Talents they gave him out of hand; with great ſtore of Corn; and further decreed, That ſo long as he himſelf in perſon followed the Wars in Peloponneſus, he ſhould receive ten Talents a month. Being thus enabled, he began to provide Shipping, that ſo he might invade the Ætolians, Eleans, and Lacedæmonians, that were maritime People, at his pleaſure, and hinder their excurſions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond meaſure, to ſee things go forward ſo well without his help; even by the miniſtry of thoſe whom he moſt hated. Wherefore he entred into conſpiracy with Leontius and Magaleas: binding himſelf and them by Oath, to croſs and bring to nought, as well as they were able, all that the King ſhould take in hand. By ſo doing, they thought to bring it to paſs, that very want of ability to do any thing without them; ſhould make him ſpeak them fair, and be glad to ſubmit himſelf to their directions. The King it is like had ſtood in ſome awe of them whilſt he was a child; and therefore theſe wiſe men perſwaded themſelves, that by looking big upon him; and imputing unto him all that fell out ill through their own miſ-government of his affairs, they might rule him as a Child ſtill. Apelles would needs go to Chalcis, there to take order for the proviſions, which were to come that way out of Macedon: The other two ſtaid behind with the King, to play their parts; all more mindful of their wicked Oath, than of their Duty.

His Fleet and Army being in a readineſs: Philip made countenance, as if he would have bent all his Forces againſt the Eleans; to whoſe aid therefore the Ætolians ſent men, little fearing that the miſchief would have fallen, as ſoon after it did, upon themſelves. But againſt the Eleans, and thoſe that came to help them, Philip thought it enough to leave the Achæans, with ſome part of his and their Mercenaries. He himſelf, with the body of his Army putting to Sea, landed in the Iſle of Cephalonia: whence the Ætolians, dwelling over againſt it, uſed to furniſh themſelves of Shipping, when they went to rove abroad. There he beſieged the Town of Palæa, that had been very ſerviceable to the Enemy againſt him and his Confederate; and might be very uſeful to him, if he could get it. Whilſt he lay before this Town, there came unto him fifteen Ships of War from Scerdilaidas; and many good Souldiers from the Epirots, Acarnanians and Meſſenians. But the Town was obſtinate; and would not be terrified with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts ſave one, on which ſide Philip carried a Mine to the wall, wherewith he overthrew two hundred Foot thereof. Leontius Captain of the Targettiers, was appointed by the King to make the aſſault. But he, remembring his covenant with Apelles, did both wilfully forbear to do his beſt:

and caused others to do the like. So the Macedonians were put to foile, and many slain, not of the worst Souldiers, but such as had gotten over the breach, and would have carried the Town, if the Treason of their Captain, and some by him corrupted, had not hindred the Victory. The King was angry with this, but there was no remedy: and therefore he thought upon breaking up the Siege. For it was easier unto the Towns-men to make up the Gap in their Wall, than for him to make it wider. Whilst he stood thus perplexed and uncertain what course to take: the Messenians and Acarnanians lay hard upon him, each of them desirous to draw him into their own Countrey. The Messenians alledged, that Lycurgus was busie in wasting their Countrey: upon whom the King might come unawares in one day; the Etesian Winds which then blew, serving fitly for his Navigation. Hereto also Leontius perswaded; who considered that those Winds, as they would easily carry him thither, so would they detain him there perforce (blowing all the Dog-days) and make him spend the Summer to small or no purpose. But Aratus gave better counsel, and prevailed: he shewed how unfitting it were, to let the Ætolians overrun all Thessaly again, and some part of Macedon, whilst the King withdrew his Army far off to seek small adventures. Rather, he said, that the time now served well to carry the War into Ætolia: since the Prætor was gone thence abroad on roving, with the one half of their strength. As for Lycurgus, he was not strong enough to do much harm in Peloponnesus: and it might suffice, if the Achæans were appointed to make head against them. According to this advice, the King set Sail for Ætolia, and enters the Bay of Ambracia, which divided the Ætolians from Acarnania. The Acarnanians were glad to see him on their Borders; and joyned with him as many of them as could bear Arms, to help in taking vengeance upon their bad Neighbours. He marched up into the inland Countrey: and taking some places by the way, which he filled with Garrisons to assure his Retreat; He passed on to Thermum, which was the Receptacle of the Ætolians, and surest place of defence in all extremities. The Countrey round about was a great fastness, environed with rocky Mountains of very narrow steep, and difficult assent. There did the Ætolians use to hold all their chief meetings their Fairs, their election of Magistrates, and their solemn Games. There also they used to bestow the most precious of their goods, as in a place of greatest security. This opinion of the natural strength, had made them careless in looking unto it. When Philip therefore had overcome the bad way, there was nothing else to do than to take spoil: whereof he found such plenty, that he thought the pains of his journey well recompenced. So he loaded his Army: and consuming all that could not be carried away, forgot not to raze a goodly Temple, the chief of all belonging unto the Ætolians; in remembrance of their like courtesie, shewed upon the Temples of Dium and Dodana. This burning of the Temple, might (questionless) more for the Kings honour have been forborn. But perhaps he thought as Monsieur du Gourgues the French Captain told the Spaniards in Florida, That they which had no Faith, needed no Church. At his return from Thermum, the Ætolians laid for him: which that they would do, he believed before, and therefore was not taken unawares. Three thousand of them there were that lying in ambush, fell upon his skirts: but he laid a Counter-ambush for them, of his Illyrians; who staying behind the rest, did set upon the backs of the Ætolians, whilst they were busily charging in Rear the Army that went before. So with slaughter of the enemy, he returned the same way that he came: and burning down those places that he had taken before, as also wasting the Country round about him, He safely carried all that he had gotten aboard his Fleet. Once the Ætolians made countenance of Fight, issuing out of Stratus in great bravery. But they were beaten home faster than they came, and followed to their very Gates.

The joy of this victorious expedition being every way compleat, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any sinister accident; it pleased the King to make a great Feast unto all his Friends and Captains. Thither were invited among the rest Leontius, with his fellow Megaleas. They came because they could not choose: but their heavy looks argued, what little pleasure they took in the Kings prosperity. It grieved them to think, that they should be able to give on better account unto Apelles, of their hindering the Kings business; since Apelles himself, as will be shewed anon, had played his own part with a most mischievous dexterity. Finding Aratus no the way home to his Tent: they fell to reviling him, throwing Stones at him, so that they caused a great uproar: many running in (as happens in such cases) to take part with the one or the other. The King sending to enquire of the matter, was truly informed of all that had passed: Which made him send for Leontius and his fellows. But Leontius was gotten out of the way: Megaleas, and another with him, came. The King began to rate them for their disorder: and they, to give him froward answers: insomuch, as they said at length, That they would never give over, till they had rewarded Aratus with a mischief as he deserved. Hereupon the King committed them to Ward. Leontius hearing of this, comes boldly to the King, with his Targettiers at his heels: and with a proud grace demanded, who it was that had dared to lay hands upon Megaleas, yea, and to cast him into Prison? Why said the King, it was even I. This resolute answer, which Leontius had not expected, made him depart both sad and angry; seeing himself out-frowned, and not knowing how to remedy the matter. Shortly after Megaleas was called forth to his answer, and was charged by Aratus with many great crimes. Among which were, The hinderance of the Kings Victory at Palea, and the Compact made with Apelles: matters no less touching Leontius, that stood by as a looker on, than Megaleas that was accused. In conclusion, the presumptions against him were so strong, and his answers thereto so weak; that he, and Crinon one of his fellows, were condemned in twenty Talents: Crinon being remanded back to Prison; and Leontius becoming Bail for Megaleas. This was done upon the way home-wards, as the King was returning to Corinth.

Philip dispatched well a great deal of business of this year. For as soon as he was at Corinth, he took in hand an Expedition against the Lacedæmonians. These and the Eleans had done what harm they could in Peloponnesus, whilst the King was absent. The Achæans had opposed them as well as they could; with ill success, yet so, as they hindred them from doing ſuch harm as elſe they would have done. But when Philip came, he over-ran the Country about Lacedæmon; and was in a manner at the Gates of Sparta, e're men could well believe that he was returned out of Ætolia. He took not in this Expedition any Cities, but made great waſt in the fields; and having beaten the enemy in ſome skirmiſhes, carried back with him to Corinth a rich booty of cattle, ſlaves, and other Country ſpoil. At Corinth he found attending him, Embaſſadors from the Rhodians and Chians, that requeſted him to ſet Greece at quiet, by granting peace unto the Ætolians. They had gracious audience: and he willed them to deal firſt with the Ætolians, who if they would make the ſame requeſt, ſhould not find him unreaſonable. The Ætolians had ſped ill that year: neither ſaw they any likely hopes for the years following. The Army that they had ſent forth to waſte Theſſaly and Macedon found ſuch oppoſition on the way, that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the mean ſeaſon they had been grievouſly afflicted, as before is ſhewed, by Philip in the centre of their own Countrey. All Greece and Macedon was up in arms againſt them, and their weak Allies the Eleans and Lacedæmonians. Neither was it certain, how long the one or other of theſe their Peloponneſian friends ſhould be able to hold out, ſince they were not ſtrong enough to keep the field, but had already ſuffered thoſe miſeries of war, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each to ſeek their own peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Ætolians readily entertain'd this negotiation of peace: and taking truce for thirty dayes with the King, dealt with him by interceſſion of the ſame Embaſſadors, to intreat his preſence at a Diet of the Nation, that ſhould be held at Rhium; whither if he would vouchſafe to come, they promiſed that he ſhould find them conformable to any good reaſon.

Whileſt theſe things were in hand, Leontius and Megaleas thought to have terrified the King, by raiſing ſedition againſt him in the Army. But this device ſorted to no good effect. The Souldiers were eaſily and quickly incenſed againſt many of the Kings friends, who were ſaid to be the cauſe, why they were not rewarded with ſo much of the booty, as they thought to belong of right unto them. But their anger ſpent it ſelf in a noiſe, and breaking open of doors, without further harm done. This was enough to inform the King (who eaſily pacified his men with gentle words) that ſome about him were very falſe. Yea, the Souldiers themſelves repenting of their inſolence, deſired to have the Authors of the tumult ſought out, and puniſhed according to their deſerts. The King made ſhew as if he had not cared to make ſuch inquiſition. But Leontius and Megaleas were afraid, leſt the matter would ſoon come out of it ſelf to their extream danger. Wherefore they ſent unto Appelles, the Head and Architect of their treaſon: requeſting him ſpeedily to repair unto Corinth, where he might ſtand between them and the Kings diſpleaſure. Apelles had not all this while been wanting to the buſineſs undertaken by him and his treacherous companions. He had taken upon him, as a man that had the Kings heart in his own hand: and thereby was he grown into ſuch credit, that all the Kings Officers in Macedon and Theſſaly addreſſed themſelves unto him, and received from him their diſpatch in every buſineſs. Likewiſe the Greeks in all their flattering Decrees, took occaſion to magnifie the vertue of Apelles, making ſlight mention (only for faſhion ſake) of the King: who ſeemed no better than the Miniſter and Executioner of Apelles his will and pleaſure. Such was the arrogancy of this great man, in ſetting himſelf out unto the people: but in managing the Kings affairs, he made it his ſpecial care, that money and all things needful for the publick ſervice, ſhould be wanting. Yea, ſell his own Plate and houſhold veſſels: thinking to reſolve theſe and all other difficulties, by only ſaying, Sir, be ruled wholly by me, and all ſhall be as you would wiſh. Hereto if the King would give aſſent, then had this Politician obtained his hearts deſire. Now taking his journey from Chalcis in the Iſle of Eubœa, to the City of Corinth, where Philip then lay: he was fetcht in with great pomp and royalty, by a great number of the Captains and Souldiers; which Leontius and Megaleas drew forth to meet him on the way. So entring the City with a goodly train, he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride, and had vehement ſuſpition of his falſhood. Wherefore one was ſent to tell him, that he ſhould wait a while, or come another time, for the King was not now at leiſure to be ſpoken with. It was a pretty thing, that ſuch a check as this, made all his attendants forſake him, as a man in diſgrace; in ſuch ſort, that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him ſave his own Pages. After this, the King vouchſafed him now and then, ſome ſlender graces: but in conſultations, or other matters of privacy, he uſed him not at all. This taught Megaleas to look to himſelf, and run away betimes. Hereupon the King ſent forth Taurion his Lieutenant of Peloponneſus, with all the Targettiers, as it were to do ſome piece of ſervice, but indeed of purpoſe to apprehend Leontius in the abſence of his followers. Leontius being taken, diſpatched away a meſſenger preſently to his Targettiers, to ſignifie what was befallen him: and they forthwith ſent unto the King in his behalf. They made requeſt, That if any other thing were objected againſt him, he might not be called forth to trial before their return: as for the debt of Megaleas, if that were all the matter, they ſaid they were ready to make a purſe for his diſcharge. This affection of the Souldiers made Philip more haſty then elſe he would have been, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long, e're letters of Megaleas were intercepted, which he wrote unto the Ætolians; villifying the King with opprobrious words, and biding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out a while, for that Philip was even ready to ſink under the burden of his own poverty. By this the King underſtood more perfectly the falſhood, not only of Megaleas, but of Apelles; whoſe cunning head had laboured all this while to keep him ſo poor. Wherefore he ſent one to purſue Megaleas that was fled to Thebes. As for Apelles, he committed both him, his ſon, and another that was inward with him, to priſon; wherein all of them ſhortly ended their lives. Megaleas alſo, neither daring to ſtand to trial, nor knowing whither to flie, was weary of his own life, and ſlew himſelf about the ſame time.

The Ætolians, as they had begun this war upon hope of accompliſhing what they liſted in the Nonage of Philip: ſo finding that the vigour of this young young Prince tempered with the cold advice of Aratus, wrought very effectually toward their overthrow; they grew very desirous to make an end of it: Nevertheless, being a turbulent Nation, and ready to lay hold upon all advantages, when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Megaleas, together with some indignation thereupon conceived by some of the Kings Targettiers, they began to hope anew, that these troubles would be long lasting, and thereupon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhium. Of this was Philip nothing sorry. For being in good hope throughly to tame this unquiet Nation; he thought it much to concern his own honour, that all the blame of the beginning and continuing the War should rest upon themselves. Wherefore he willed his Confederates to lay aside all thought of peace, and to prepare for War against the year following, wherein he hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified he his Macedonian Souldiers, by yielding to let them winter into their own Countrey. In this return homeward, he called into judgement one Ptolomy, a companion with Apelles, and Leontius in their Treasons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians; and suffered death. These were the same Macedonians, that lately could not endure to hear of Leontius his imprisonment; yet now they think the man worthy to die that was but his adherent. So vain is the confidence, on which Rebels use to build, in their favour with the multitude.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip won some bordering Towns, from which the Dardanians, Ætolians, and other his ill neighbours, were accustomed to make rodes into his Kingdom: when he had thus provided for safety of his own; the Ætolians might well know what they were to expect. But there came again Embassadors from the Rhodians and Chians, with others from Ptolomy King of Ægypt, and from the City of Bizantium, recontinuing the former solicitation about the peace. This fashion had been taken up in mattters of Greece, ever since the Kings that reigned after Alexander, had taken upon them to set the whole Country at liberty: No sooner was any Province or City in danger to be oppressed and subdued by force of war, but presently there were found Intercessors, who pittying the effusion of Greekish blood, would importune the stronger to relinquish his advantage. By doing such friendly offices in time of need, the Princes and States abroad sought to bind unto them those people, that were howsoever weak in numbers, yet very good Souldiers. But hereby it came to pass, that the more froward sort, especially the Ætolians, whose whole Nation was addicted to falshood and robbery, durst enter boldly into quarrels with all their neighbours: being well assured that if they had the worst, The love of Greece would be sufficient for to redeem their quiet. They had, since the late Treaty of Peace, done what harm they could in Peloponnesus: but being beaten by the Achæans, and standing in fear to be more soundly beaten at home, they desired now, more earnestly than before, to make an end of the War as soon as they might. Philip made such answer unto the Embassadors, as he had done the former year; That he gave not occasion to the beginning of this War, nor was at the present afraid to continue it, or unwilling to end it: But that the Ætolians, if they had a desire to live in rest, must first be dealt withal, to signifie plainly their determination, whereto himself would return such answer as he should think fit.

Philip had at this time no great liking unto the Peace, being a young Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he daily got by the War. But it happened in the middest of this Negotiation, that he was advertised by letters out of Macedon, what a notable victory Hannibal had obtained against the Romans in the battle at Thrasymene. These letters he communicated unto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly encouraged him to take part with Hannibal: and not to sit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian War. Hereby he grew more inclinable than before unto Peace with the Ætolians: which was concluded shortly in a meeting a Nanpactus. There did Agelaus an Ætolian make a great Oration: telling, how happy it was for the Greeks, that they might at their own pleasure dispute about finishing War between themselves, without being molested by the Barbarians. For when once either the Romans or Carthaginians had subdued one the other; it was not to be doubted, that they would forthwith look Eastward, and seek by all means to set footing in Greece. For this cause he said it were good, that their Country should be at peace within it self: and that Philip, if he were desirous of War, should lay hold on the opportunity, now fitly serving to enlarge his Dominion, by winning somewhat in Italy.

Such advice could the Ætolians then give, when they stood in fear of danger threatning them at hand: but being soon after weary of rest, as being accustomed to enrich themselves by pillage, they were so far from observing and following their own good counsel, that they invited the Romans into Greece, whereby they brought themselves and the whole Country (but themselves before any other part of the Country) under servitude of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That every one should keep what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for damages past.

SECT. III.

Philip, at the perswasion of Demetrius Pharius, enters into League with Hannibal against the Romans. The tenour of the League between Hannibal and Philip.

THis being agreed upon: the Greks betook themselves to quiet courses of life; and Philip to prepare for the business of Italy, about which he consulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus passed the time away, till the great battle of Canna: after which he joyned in league with Hannibal, as hath been shewed before. Demetrius Pharius bore great malice unto the Romans; and knew no other way to be avenged upon them, or to recover his own lost Kingdom, than by procuring the Macedonian, that was in a manner wholly guided by his counsel, to take part with their enemies. It had otherwise been far more expedient for Philip, to have supported the weaker of those two great Cities against the more mighty. For by so doing, he should perhaps have brought them to peace upon some equal terms; and thereby, as did Hero, a far weaker Prince, have both ſecured his own Eſtate, and cauſed each of them to be deſirous of chief place in his friendſhip. The iſſue of the counſel which he followed, will appear ſoon after this. His firſt quarrel with the Romans; the trouble which they and the Ætolians did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, upon ſuch Conditions that might eaſily be broken, have been related in another place, as belonging unto the ſecond Punick War. Wherefore I will only here ſet down the tenour of the League between him and Carthage, which may ſeem not worthy to be read, if only in regard of the form it ſelf then uſed: though it had been over long to have been inſerted into a more buſie piece.

The Oath and Covenants between Hannibal General of the Carthaginians, and Xenophanes, Embaſſadour of Philip King of Macedon.

THis is the Leagure ratified by Oath, which Hannibal the General, and with him Mago, Myrcal, and Barmocal, as alſo the Senators of Carthage that are preſent, and all the Carthaginians that are in his Army, have made with Xenophanes the ſon of Cleomachus Athenian, whom King Philip the ſon of Demetrius hath ſent unto us, for himſelf and the Macedonians, and his Aſſociates: * Dæmon. Before Jupiter, and Juno, and Appollo, *before the God of the Carthaginians, Hercules and Tolaus: before Mars, Triton, Neptune: before the Gods accompanying Arms, the Sun, the Moon, and the Earth: before Rivers and Meadows, and Waters: before all the Gods that have power over Carthage: before all the Gods that rule over Macedon, and the reſt of Greece: before all the Gods that are Preſidents of War, and preſent at the making of this League. Hannibal the General hath ſaid, and all the Senators that are with him, and all the Carthaginians, in his Army: Be it agreed between You and Us, that this Oath ſtand for friendſhip and loving affection, that We become friends familiar, and brethren, upon Covenant; that the ſafety of the Lords the Carthaginians and of Hannibal the General, and thoſe that are with him, and of the Rulers of Provinces of the Carthaginians uſing the ſame Laws, and of the Uticans, and as many Cities and Nations as obey the Carthaginians, and of the Souldiers and Aſſociates, and of all Towns and Nations with which we hold friendſhip in Italy, Gaule, and Liguria, and with whom we ſhall hold friendſhip, or make alliance hereafter in this Region; be preſerved by King Philip and the Macedonians, and ſuch of the Greeks as are their Aſſociates, In like manner, ſhall King Philip and the Macedonians, and other the Greeks his Aſſociates, be ſaved and preſerved by the Carthaginian Armies, and by the Uticans, and by all Cities and Nations that obey the Carthaginians, and by their Aſſociates and Souldiers, and by all Nations and Cities in Italy, Gaule, Liguria, that are of our Alliance, or ſhall hereafter joyn with Us in Italy. We ſhall not take Counſel one againſt the other, nor deal fraudulently one with the other. With all readineſs and good will, without deceit or ſubtlety, We ſhall be enemies unto the enemies of the Carthaginians, excepting thoſe Kings, Towns, and Havens, with which we have already league and friendſhip. We alſo ſhall be enemies to the enemies of King Philip, excepting thoſe Kings, Cities, and Nations, with which we have already league and friendſhip. The War that We have with the Romans, have ye alſo with them, until the Gods ſhall give Us a new and happy end. Ye ſhall aid Us with thoſe things whereof we have need, and ſhall do according to the Covenants between Us. But if the Gods ſhall not give unto You and Us their help in this War againſt the Romans and their Aſſociates; then if the Romans offer friendſhip, We ſhall make friendſhip in ſuch wiſe, that ye ſhall be partakers of the ſame friendſhip, With Condition, That they ſhall not have power to make War upon You: Neither ſhall the Romans be Lords over the Corcyræans, nor over thoſe of Apollonia, nor Dyrrhachium, nor over Pharus, nor Dimalle, nor the Parthini, nor Atintania. They ſhall alſo render unto Demetrius Pharius all that belong unto him, as many as are within the Romans Dominions. But if the Romans (after ſuch peace made) ſhall make War upon You or Us; We will ſuccour one another in that War, as either ſhall have need. The ſame ſhall be obſerved in War made by any other, excepting thoſe Kings, Cities, and States, with whom we hold already league and friendſhip. To this league, if We or Ye ſhall think fit to add or detract, ſuch addition or detraction ſhall be made by our common conſent.

SECT. IV.

How Philip yielded to his natural vices, being there in ſoothed by Deemetrius Pharius. His deſire to tyrannize upon the free States his Aſſociates: With the troubles into which he thereby fell, whileſt he bore a part in the ſecond Punick War. He poiſoneth Aratus: and grows hateful to the Achæans.

HItherto Philip had carried himſelf as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wiſdom, he might have offered his friendſhip to the Romans that were like to be oppreſſed, than to the Carthaginians, who had the better hand: yet this his medling in the Punick War, proceeded from a royal greatneſs of mind, with a deſire to ſecure and increaſe his own eſtate, adding therewithall reputation to his Country. But in this buſineſs he was guided (as hath been ſaid) by Demetrius Pharius: who looking throughly into his nature, did accommodate himſelf to his deſires: and thereby ſhortly governed him as he liſted. For the vertues of Philip were not indeed ſuch as they ſeemed. He was luſtful, bloody, and tyrannical: deſirous of power to do what he liſted, and not otherwiſe liſting to do what he ought, than for ſo far forth, as by making a fair ſhew he might breed in men ſuch good opinion of him, as ſhould help to ſerve his turn in all that he took in hand. Before he ſhould buſie himſelf in Italy, he thought it requiſite in good policy, to bring the Greeks that were his Aſſociates under a more abſolute form of ſubjection. Hereunto Apelles had adviſed him before: and he had liked reaſonably well of the courſe. But Apelles was a boyſterous Counſellor, and one that referring all to his own glory, thought himſelf deeply wronged, if he might not wholly have his own way, but were driven to await the Kings opportunity at other times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to obſerve the Kings humours: and guided like a

Coach-

Coach-man, with the reins in his hand, those affections which himself did only seem to follow. Therefore he grew daily more and more in credit: so as, without any manner of contention, he supplanted Aratus; which the violence of Apelles could never do.

There arose about these times a very hot Faction among the Messenians, between the Nobility and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diverted (as happens often after a forreign War) unto domestical objects, than allayed and reduced unto a more quiet temper. In process of no long time, the contention among them grew so violent, that Philip was intreated to compound the differences. He was glad of this: resolving so to end the matter, that they should not henceforth strive any more about their Government: for that he would assume it wholly to himself. At his coming thither, he found Aratus busie among them to make all Friends, after a better manner than agreed with his own secret purpose. Wherefore he consulted not with this reverend old man: but talked in private with such of the Messenians as repaired unto him. He asked the Governours, what they meant to stand thus disputing: and whether they had not Laws to bridle the insolence of the unruly Rabble: Contrariwise, in talking with the heads of the popular Faction, he said it was strange, that they being so many, would suffer themselves to be opposed by a few; as if they had not hands to defend themselves from Tyrants. Thus whilst each of them presumed on the Kings assistance; they thought it best to go roundly to work, e're that he were gone, that should countenance their doings. The Governours therefore would have apprehended some seditious Orators, that were, they said, the stirrers up of the multitude unto sedition. Upon this occasion, the people took Arms: and running upon the Nobility and Magistrates, killed of them in a rage, almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seems, that it would be easie to worry the Sheep, when the Dogs their Guardians were slain. But his falshood and double dealing was immediately found out. Neither did the younger Aratus forbear to tell him of it in publick, with very bitter and disgraceful words. The King was angry at this. But having already done more than was commendable, or excusable: and yet further intending to take other things in hand, wherein he should need the help and countenance of his best Friends; he was content to smother his displeasure, and make as fair weather as he could. He led old Aratus aside by the hand; and went up into the Castle of Ithome, that was over Messene. There he pretended to do sacrifice: and sacrifice he did. But it was his purpose to keep the place to his own use: for that it was of notable strength, and would serve to command the further parts of Peloponnesus, as the Citadel of Corinth, which he had already, commanded the entrance into that Country. Whilst he was therefore sacrificing, and had the entrails of the Beast delivered into his hands, as was the manner; he shewed them to Aratus, and gently asked him, whether the tokens that he saw therein did signifie, That being now in possession of this place, he should quietly go out of it, or rather keep it to himself. He thought perhaps, that the old man would have soothed him a little, were it only for desire for to make amends for the angry words newly spoken by his Son. But as Aratus stood doubtful what to answer, Demetrius Pharius gave this verdict: If thou be a Soothsayer, thou maist go thy way, and let slip this good advantage; if thou be a King, thou must not neglect the opportunity, but hold the Oxe by both his Horns. Thus he spake; resembling Ithome and Acrocorinthus unto the two horns of Peloponnesus. Yet would Philip needs hear the opinion of Aratus: who told him plainly, That it were well done to keep the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith unto the Messenians: But if, by seizing upon Ithome, he must lose all the other Castles that he held, and especially the strongest Castle of all that was left unto him by Antigonus, which was his credit; then were it far better to depart with his Souldiers, and keep men in duty, as he had done hitherto, by their own good wills, than by fortifying any strong places against them, to make them of his Friends become his Enemies.

To this good advice Philip yielded at the present: but not without some dislike thenceforth growing between him and the Arati: whom he thought more froward than beseemed them, in contradicting his will. Neither was the old man desirous at all, to deal any longer in the Kings affairs, or be inward with him. For, as he plainly discovered his tyrannous purposes; so likewise he perceived, that in resorting to his house, he had been dishoneſt with his Sons Wife. He therefore staid at home: where at good leisure he might repent, that in despight of Cleomenes, his own Countrey-man, and a temperate Prince, he had brought the Macedonians into Peloponnesus.

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponnesus into Epirus, wherein Aratus refused to bear him company. In this Journey he found by experience what Aratus had lately told him, That unhoneſt counsels are not so profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers and dependants; and so they purposed to continue. But he would needs have them so to remain, whether they purposed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious unto his will, he seized upon their Town of Oricum, and laid siege to Apollonia; having no good colour of these doings: but thinking himself strong enough to do what he listed, and not seeing whence they should procure Friends to help them. Thus instead of setling the Countrey, as his intended Voyage into Italy required: he kindled a fire in it which he could never quench, until it had laid hold on his own Palace. Whilst he was thus labouring to bind the hands that should have fought for him in Italy, M. Valerius the Roman came into those parts; who not only maintained the Epirots against him, but procured the Ætolians to break the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that War; the occurrents whereof we have related before, in the place whereto it belonged. In managing whereof, though Philip did the offices of a good Captain: yet when leisure served, he made it apparent that he was a vicious King. He had not quite left his former desire, of oppressing the liberty of the Messenians; but made another journey into their own Countrey, with hope to deceive them as before. They understood him better now than before; and therefore were not hasty to trust him too far. When he saw that his cunning would not serve, he went to work by force; and calling them his Enemies, invaded them with open War. But in that War he could do little good; perhaps, because none of his Confederates were desirous to help him in such an enterprise. In this attempt upon Meſſene, he loſt Demetrius Pharius; that was his Counſellor and Flatterer, not his Perverter; as appears by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worſe that he ſped, the more angry he waxed againſt thoſe that ſeemed not to favour his injurious doing. Wherefore, by the miniſtery of Taurion, his Lieutenant, he poiſoned old Aratus; and ſhortly after that, he poiſoned alſo the younger Aratus: hoping that theſe things would never have been known, becauſe they were done ſecretly, and the poiſons themſelves were more ſure than manifeſt in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Achaia, decreed unto Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymns, and Proceſſions, to be celebrated every year twice, with a Prieſt unto him for that purpoſe; as was accuſtomed unto the Heroes, or men, whom they thought to be tranſlated into the number of the gods. Hereunto they are ſaid to have been encouraged by an Oracle of Apollo: which is like enough to have been true, ſince the help of the Devil is never failing to the increaſe of Idolatry.

Messene;

The living memory of Aratus their Patron, and ſingular Benefactor, could not but work in the Achæans a marvellous diſlike of that wicked King which had made him thus away. He ſhall therefore hear of this hereafter, when they better dare to take counſel for themſelves. At the preſent, the murder was not generally known or believed: neither were they in caſe to ſubſiſt, without his help that had committed it. The Ætolians were a moſt outragious people, great darers, and ſhameleſs robbers. With theſe the Romans made a League: whereof the Conditions were ſoon divulged, eſpecially that main point, concerning the diviſion of the purchaſe which they ſhould make, namely, That the Ætolians ſhould have the Countrey and Towns; but the Romans the ſpoil, and carry away the people to ſell for Slaves. The Achæans, who in times of greater quiet, could not endure to make ſtrait alliance with the Ætolians, as knowing their uncivil diſpoſition; were much the more averſe from them, when they perceived how they had called in the Barbarians (for ſuch did the Greeks account all other Nations, except their own) to make havock of the Country. The ſame conſideration moved alſo the Lacedæmonians to ſtand off a while, before they would declare themſelves for the Ætolians, whoſe friendſhip they had embraced in the late War. The induſtry therefore of Philip, and the great care which he ſeemed to take of the Achæans his Confederates, ſufficed to retain them: eſpecially, at ſuch time, as their own neceſſity was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged unto himſelf the Dymæans by an ineſtimable benefit: recovering their Town, after it had been taken by the Romans and Ætolians; and redeeming their people whereſoever they might be found, that had been carried away Captive, and ſold abroad for Slaves. Thus might he have blotted out the memory of offences paſt: if the malignity of his natural condition had not other-whiles broken out, and given men to underſtand, that it was the Time, and not his Vertue, which cauſed him to make ſuch a ſhew of goodneſs. Among other foul acts, whereof he was not aſhamed, he took Polycratia the Wife of the younger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might ſerve to confirm in the people their opinion, that he was guilty of the old mans death, But of ſuch faults he ſhall be told, when the Romans make War upon him the ſecond time: for, of that which happened in this their firſt Invaſion, I hold it ſuperfluous to make repetition.

SECT. V.

Of Philopœmen General of the Achæans: and Machanidas, Tyrant of Lacedæmon. A battle between them, wherein Machanidas is ſlain.

IT happens often, that the deceaſe of one eminent man, diſcovers the vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there ſtood up Philopœmen: whoſe notable Valour, and great skill in Arms, made the Nation of the Achæans redoubtable among all the Greeks, and careleſs of ſuch protection, as in former times they had needed againſt the violence of their Neighbours. This is that Philopœmen, who being then a young man, and having no command, did eſpecial ſervice to Antigonus at the battle of Sellaſia againſt Cleomenes. Thence forward until now, he had ſpent the moſt part of his time in the Iſle of Crete: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and ſeldom or never at Peace between themſelves, he bettered among them his knowledge, and practice in the Art of War. At his return home, he had charge of the Horſe: wherein he carried himſelf ſo ſtrictly, travelling with all the Cities of the Confederacy to have his followers well mounted, and armed at all pieces; as alſo he ſo diligently trained them up in all exerciſe of Service, that he made the Achæans very ſtrong in that part of their Forces. Being afterward choſen Prætor or General of the Nation, he had no leſs care to reform their Military Diſcipline throughout, whereby his Countrey might be ſtrong enough to defend it ſelf, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend upon the help of others. He perſwaded the Achæans to cut off their vain expence of bravery, in Apparel, Houſhold-ſtuff, and curious fare, and to beſtow that coſt upon their Arms: wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by ſo much were they like to prove the better Souldiers, and ſutable in behaviour, unto the pride of their furniture. They had ſerved hitherto with little light Bucklers, and ſlender Darts, to caſt afar off; that were uſeful in skirmiſhing at ſome diſtance, or for ſurpriſes, or ſudden and haſty Expeditions, whereto Aratus had been moſt accuſtomed. But when they came to handy-ſtrokes, they were good for nothing, ſo long as they were wholly driven to rely upon the courage of their Mercenaries. Philopœmen altered this: cauſing them to arm themſelves more weightily, to uſe a larger kind of ſhield, with good Swords, and ſtrong Pikes, fit for Service at hand. He taught them alſo to fight in cloſe order, and altered the form of their embattelling: not making the Files ſo deep as had been accuſtomed, but extending the Front, that he might uſe the ſervice of many hands.

Eight months were ſpent of that year, in which he firſt was Prætor of the Achæans, when Machanidas the Tyrant of Lacedæmon cauſed him to make trial, how his Souldiers had profited by his Diſcipline. This Machanidas was the ſucceſſor unto Lycurgus, a man more violent than his fore goer. He kept in pay a ſtrong Army of Mercenaries: and he kept them not only to fight for Sparta, but to hold the City in obedience to himself perforce. Wherefore it behoved him not to take part with the Achæans, that were favourers of liberty; but to strengthen himself by friendship of the Ætolians: who, in making Alliances, took no further notice of vice or vertue, than as it had reference to their own profit. The people also of Lacedæmon, through their inveterate hatred unto the Argives, Achæans, and Macedonians, were in like sort (all or most of them) inclinable to the Ætolian Faction. Very unwisely. For in seeking to take revenge upon those, that had lately hindered them from getting the Lordship of Peloponnesus; they hindered themselves thereby from recovering the Mastery of their own City. This affection of the Spartans, together with the regard of his own security, and no small hope of good that would not follow, suffered not Machanidas to be idle; but always make him ready to fall upon his Neighbours backs, and take of theirs what he could, whilst they were enforced, by greater necessity, to turn face another way. Thus had he often done, especially in the absence of Philip: whose sudden coming into those parts, or some other opposition made against him, had usually made him fail of his attempts. At the present he was stronger in men, than were the Achæans, and thought his own men better Souldiers than were theirs.

Whilst Philip therefore was busied elsewhere, he entred into the Countrey of the Mantinæans: being not without hope to do as Cleomenes had done before him; yea and perhaps to get the † Lordships of Peloponnesus; as having stronger friends, and weaper opposition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopœmen was ready to entertain him at Mantinæa; where was fought between them a great battle. The Tyrant had brought into the Field upon Carts, a great many of Engines, wherewith to beat upon the Squadrons of his Enemies, and put them in disorder. To prevent this danger, Philopœmen sent forth his light Armature a good way before him; so as Machanidas was fain to do the like. To second these, from the one and the other side came in continual supply; till at length all the Mercenaries, both of the Achæans and of Machanidas, were drawn up to the Fight: being so far advanced, each before their own Phalanx, that it could no otherwise be discerned, which pressed forward, or which recoyled, than by riling of the dust. Thus were Machanidas his Engines made unserviceable, by the interposition of his own men; in such manner as the Cannon is hindered from doing execution, in most of the battels fought in these our times. The Mercenaries of the Tyrant prevailed at length: not only by their advantage of number, but (as Polybius well observeth) by surmounting their oppposites in degree of courage; wherein usually the hired Souldiers of Tyrants, exceed those that are waged by free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant than they which live oppressed by Tyranny, since the one, by doing their best in fight, have hope to acquire somewhat beneficial to themselves, whereas the other do fight (as it were) to assure their own servitude: so the Mercenaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the fruits of his prosperity, have as good cause to maintain his quarrel as their own; whereas they that serve under a free State, have no other motive to do manfully, than their bare stipend. Further than this, when a free State hath gotten the Victory, many companies (if not all) of forreign Auxiliaries are presently cast; and therefore such good fellows will not take much pains to bring the War to an end. But the Victory of a Tyrant, makes him stand in need of more such helpers; because that after it he doth wrong to more, as having more Subjects; and therefore stands in fear of more, that should seek to take revenge upon him. The stipendaries of the Achæans, being forced to give ground, were urged so violently in their retreat by those of Machanidas; that shortly they betook themselves to flight: and could not be staid by any perswasions of Philopœmen, but ran away quite beyond the battle of the Achæans. This disaster had been sufficient to have taken from Philopœmen the honour of the day; had he not wisely observed the demeanour of Machanidas, and found in him that error which might restore the Victory. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries gave chace unto those that fled: leaving behind him in good order of battle his Lacedæmonians; whom he thought sufficient to deal with the Achæans, that were already disheartned by the flight of their companions. But when this his rashness had carried him out of sight, Philopœmen advanced towards the Lacedæmonians that stood before him. There lay between them athwart the Countrey, a long Ditch, without water at that time, and therefore passable (as it seemed) without much difficulty, especially for Foot. The Lacedæmonians adventured over it, as thinking themselves better Souldiers than the Achæans, who had in a manner already lost the day. But hereby they greatly disordered their own Battle; and had no sooner the foremost of them recovered the further bank, than they were stoutly charged by the Achæans, who drave them headlong into the Ditch again. Their first ranks being broken, all the rest began to shrink: so as Philopœmen getting over the Ditch, easily chaced them out of the Field. Philopœmen knew better how to use his advantage, than Machanidas had done. He suffered not all his Army to disband and follow the chace, but retained with him a sufficient strength, for the custody of a Bridge that was over the Ditch, by which he knew that the Tyrant must come back. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries returning from the chace, looked very heavily when he saw what was fallen out. Yet, with a lusty Troop of Horse about him, he made towards the Bridge: hoping to find the Achæans in disorder; and to set upon their backs, as they were carelesly pursuing their Victory. But when he and his Company saw Philopœmen ready to make good the Bridge against them; then began every one to look, which way he might shift for himself. The Tyrant, with no more than two in his company, rode along the Ditch side; and searched an easie passage over. He was easily discovered by his purple Cassock, and the costly trappings of his Horse. Philopœmen therefore leaving the charge of the Bridge unto another, coasted him all the way as he rode, and falling upon him at length in the Ditch it self, as he was getting over it, slew him there with his own hand. There died in this Battle on the Lacedæmonians side about four Thousand: and more than four Thousand were taken Prisoners. Of the Achæan Mercenaries, probable it is, that the loss was not greatly cared for; since that War was at an end, and for their money they might hire more when they should have need.

SECT. VI.

Philip having Peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares againſt Aſia. Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Bithynia, and their Lineages. Of the Galatians.

BY this Victory the Achæans learned to think well of themſelves. Neither needed they indeed after a while (ſuch was their diſcipline and continual exerciſe) to account themſelves in matter of War inferiour to any, that ſhould have brought againſt them no great odds of number. As for the Macedonian, he made no great uſe of them. But when he had once concluded Peace with the Romans and Ætolians, he ſtudied how to enlarge his Dominion Eaſtward; ſince the fortune of his Friends the Carthaginians declined in the Weſt. He took in hand many matters together, or very neerly together, and ſome of them not honeſt: wherein if the Achæans would have done him ſervice, they muſt by helping him to oppreſs others that never had wronged him, have taught him the way how to deal with themſelves. He greatly hated Attalus King of Pergamus, who had joy with the Romans and Ætolians in War againſt him.

This Attalus though a King, was ſcarce yet a Nobleman, otherwiſe than as he was ennobled by his own, and by his Fathers virtue. His fortune began in Philetærus his Uncle: who being guelded, by reaſon of a miſhap which he had when he was a Child, grew afterwards thereby to be the more eſteemed: as great men in thoſe times repoſed much confidence in Eunuchs, whoſe affections could not be obliged upon Wives or Children. He was entertained into the Family of Docimus, a Captain following Antigonus the firſt; and after the death of Antigonus, he accompanied his Maſter, that betook himſelf to Lyſimachus King of Thrace. Lyſimachus had a good opinion of him; and put him in truſt with his money and accounts. But when at length he ſtood in fear of this King, that grew a bloody Tyrant; he fled into Aſia, where he ſeized upon the Town of Pergamus, and nine thouſand Talents belonging to Lyſimachus. The Town and Money, together with his own Service, he offered unto Seleucus the firſt, that then was ready to give Lyſimachus his battle. His offer was kindly accepted, but never performed; for that Seleucus, having ſlain Lyſimachus, died ſhortly after himſelf, before he made uſe of Philetærus or his money. So this Eunuch ſtill retained Pergamus, with the Countrey round about it; and reigned therein as an abſolute King. He had two brethren: of which the elder is ſaid to have been a poor Carter; and the younger perhaps not much better, before ſuch time, they were raiſed by the fortune of this Eunuch. Philetærus left his Kingdom to the elder of theſe, or to the Son of the elder, called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his Kingdom; making his advantage of the diſſention between Seleucus Calinicus and Antiochus Hierax, the Sons of the ſecond Antiochus. He fought a battle with Hierax, neer unto Sardis, and won the Victory. At which time, to animate his men againſt the Gaules that ſerved under his Enemy, he uſed a pretty device. He wrote the word * Victory upon the hand of his Soothſayer, in ſuch colours as would eaſily come off: and when the hot liver of the Beaſt that was ſacrificed, had cleanly taken the Print of the Letters, He publiſhed this unto his Army as a Miracle, plainly foreſhewing that the gods would be aſſiſtant in that Battle.

* Jul. Front. Strat. l. 1. c. 11.

After this Victory, he grew a dreadful enemy to Seleucus: who never durſt attempt to recover from him, by War, the Territory that he had gotten and held. Finally, when he had reigned two and twenty years, he died by a ſurfeit of overmuch drink, and left his Kingdom to Attalus, of whom we now entreat, that was Son unto Attalus the youngeſt Brother of Philetærus. Attalus was an undertaking Prince, very bountiful, and no leſs valiant. By his own proper Forces he reſtored his Friend Ariarathes the Cappadocian into his Kingdom, whence he had been expelled. He was grievouſly moleſted by Achæus: who ſetting up himſelf as King againſt Antiochus the Great, reigned in the leſſer Aſia. He was beſieged in his own City of Pergamus: but by the help of the Tectoſages, a Nation of the Gauls, whom he called over out of Thrace, he recovered all that he had loſt. When theſe Gauls had once gotten footing in Aſia, they never wanted employment, but were either entertained by ſome of the Princes reigning in thoſe quarters, or interpoſed themſelves without invitation; and found themſelves work in quarrels of their own making. They cauſed Pruſias King of Bithynia to ceaſe from his War againſt Byzantium. Whereunto when he had condeſcended; they nevertheleſs within a while after, invaded his Kingdom. He obtained againſt them a great Victory; and uſed it with great cruelty, ſparing neither Age nor Sex. But the ſwarm of them increaſing, they occupied the Region about Helleſpont, where, in ſeating themſelves, they were much beholding unto Attalus. Nevertheleſs, preſuming afterwards upon their ſtrength, they forced their Neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute: in the ſharp exaction whereof, they had no more reſpect unto Attalus, than to any that had worſe deſerved of them. By this they compelled him to fight againſt them: and he being victorious, compelled them to contain themſelves within the bounds of that Province, which took name from them in time following, and was called Galatia. Yet continued they ſtill to oppreſs the weakeſt of their Neighbours, and to fill up the Armies of thoſe that could beſt hire them.

The Kings reigning in thoſe parts, were the poſterity of ſuch, as had ſaved themſelves and their Provinces, in the ſlothful reign of the Perſians; or in the buſie times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were very ancient. For the firſt of their line had married with Atoſſa, ſiſter unto the great King Cyrus. Their Countrey was taken from them by Perdiccas, as is ſhewed before. But the Son of that King, whom Perdiccas crucified, eſpying his time while the Macedonians were at civil wars among themſelves; recovered his Dominion, and paſſed it over to his off-ſpring. The King of Pontus had alſo their beginning from the Perſian Empire; and are ſaid to have iſſued from the royal houſe of Achæmenes. The Paphlagonians derived themſelves from Pylemenes, a King that aſſiſted Priamus at the war of Troy. Theſe, applying themſelves unto the times, were always conformable unto the ſtrongeſt. The Anceſtors of Pruſias had begun to reign in Bythinia, ſome few generations before that of the Great Alexander. They lay ſomewhat out of the Macedonians way: by whom therefore, having other employment, they were the leſs moleſted. Calantus, one of Alexanders Captains, made an expedition into their Country, where he was vanquiſhed. They had afterwards to do with a Lieutenant of Antigonus, that made them ſomewhat more humble. And thus they ſhuffled, as did the reſt, untill the reign of Pruſias, whom we have already ſometimes mentioned.

having

SECT. VII.

The Town of Chios taken by Philip, at the inſtance of Pruſias, King of Bithynia, and cruelly deſtroyed. By this and the like actions, Philip grows hateful to many of the Greeks: and is warred upon by Attalus King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodians.

Pruſias as a neighbour King, had many quarrels with Attalus; whoſe greatneſs he ſuſpected. He therefore ſtrengthened himſelf, by taking to wife the daughter of Philip; as Attalus, on the contrary ſide, entred into a ſtrict Confederacy with the Ætolians, Rhodians, and other of the Greeks. But when Philip had ended his Ætolian war, and was deviſing with Antiochus about ſharing between them two the Kingdom of Egypt, wherein Ptolomy Philopater, a friend unto them both, was newly dead; and had left his ſon Ptolomy Epiphanes, a young child, his heir: the Bythinian entreated this his Father-in-law to come over into Aſia, there to win the Town of the Ciani, and beſtow it upon him. Pruſias had no right unto the Town, nor juſt matter of quarrel againſt it: but it was fitly ſeated for him, and therewithal rich. Philip came, as one that could not well deny to help his Son-in-law. But hereby he mightily offended no ſmall part of Greece. Embaſſadors came to him whilſt he lay at the ſiege, from the Rhodians, and divers other States: intreating him to forſake the enterpriſe. He gave dilatory, but otherwiſe gentle anſwers: making ſhew as if he would have condeſcended to their requeſt, when he intended nothing leſs. At length he got the Town: where, even in preſence of the Embaſſadours, of whoſe ſolicitation he had ſeemed ſo regardful, he omitted no part of cruelty. Hereby he rendred himſelf odious to his neighbours, as a perfidious and cruel Prince. Eſpecially his fact was detected of the Rhodians, who had made vehement interceſſion for the poor Ciani: and were advertiſed by Embaſſadors of purpoſe ſent unto them from Philip, That howſoever it were in his power to win the Town as ſoon as he liſted, yet in regard of his love to the Rhodians, he was contented to give it over. And by this his clemency, the Embaſſadors ſaid, that he would manifeſt unto the world what ſlanderous tongues they were, which noiſed abroad ſuch reports, as went of his falſhood and oppreſſion. Whilſt the Embaſſadours were declaiming at Rhodes in the Theater to this effect; there came ſome that made a true relation of what had hapned, ſhewing that Philip had ſacked and deſtroyed the Town of Chios, and, after a cruel ſlaughter of the Inhabitants, had made ſlaves of all that eſcaped the ſword. If the Rhodians took this in great deſpight, no leſs were the Ætolians inflamed againſt him: ſince they had ſent a Captain to take charge of the Town; being warned before of his doings at Lyſimachia and Chalcedon (which he had withdrawn from their Confederacy to his own) what little truſt was to be repoſed in the faith of this King. But moſt of all others was Attalus moved with conſideration of the Macedonians violent ambition, and of his own eſtate. He had much to loſe; and was not without hope of getting much, if he could make a ſtrong party in Greece. He had already, as a new King followed the example of Alexanders Captains, in purchaſing with much liberality the love of the Athenians; which were notable Trumpeters of other mens vertue, having loſt their own. On the friendſhip of the Ætolians he had cauſe to preſume; having bound them unto him by good offices, many and great, in their late war with Philip. The Rhodians that were mighty at Sea, and held very good intelligence with the Egyptians, Syrians, and many other Princes and States, he eaſily drew into a ſtraight alliance with him, by their hatred newly conceived againſt Philip.

Upon confidence in theſe his friends, but moſt of all, in the ready aſſiſtance of the Rhodians, Attalus prepared to deal with the Macedonian by open war. It had been unſeaſonable to procraſtinate, and expect whereto the doings of the enemy tended; ſince his deſire to faſten upon Aſia was manifeſt, and his falſhood no leſs manifeſt, than was ſuch his deſire. They met with him ſhortly not far from Chios, and fought with him a battle at Sea wherein though Attalus was driven to run his own Ship on ground, hardly eſcaping to land: though the Admiral of the Rhodians took his deaths wound: and though Philip after the battle took harbour under a Promontory, by which they had fought, ſo that he had the gathering of the wracks upon the ſhore: Yet foraſmuch as he had ſuffered far more greater loſs of Ships, and men, than had the enemy; and ſince he durſt not in few dayes after put forth to Sea, when Attalus and the Rhodians came to brave him in his Port; the honour of the victory was adjudged to his enemies. This notwithſtanding, Philip afterwards beſieged and won ſome Towns in Caria: whether only in a bravery; and to deſpight his oppoſites: or whether upon any hopeful deſire of conqueſt, it is uncertain. The ſtratagem, by which he won Prinaſſus, is worthy of nothing. He attempted it by a mine: and finding the earth ſo ſtony, that it reſiſted his work; he nevertheleſs cammanded the Pioneers to make a noiſe under ground; and ſecretly in the night time he raiſed great mounts about the entrance of the mine, to breed an opinion in the beſieged, that the work went marvelouſly forward. At length he ſent word to the Towns-men, that by his undermining two acres of their wall ſtood only upon wooden props, to which if he gave fire, and entred by a Breach, they ſhould expect no mercy. The Prinaſſians little thought, that he had fetcht all his earth and rubbiſh by night a great way off, to raiſe up thoſe heaps which they ſaw; but rather that all had been extracted out of the Mine. Wherefore they ſuffered themſelves to be outfaced, and gave up the Town as loſt, which the enemy had no hope to win by force. But Philip could not ſtay to ſettle himſelf in thoſe parts. Attalus and the Rhodians were too ſtrong for him at Sea, and compelled him to make haſte back into Macedon; whither they followed him all the way in manner of purſuit.

SECT. VIII.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian War, ſeek matter of quarrel againſt Philip. The Athenians upon ſlight cauſe, proclaim War againſt Philip; moved hitherto by Attalus; whom they flatter. Philip wins divers Towns; and makes peremptory anſwer to the Roman Embaſſador. The furious reſolution of the Abydeni.

THeſe Aſiatique matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet ſerved well to make a noiſe in Rome; and fill the peoples heads, if not with a deſire of making war in Macedon, at leaſt with a conceit that it were expedient ſo to do. The Roman Senate was perfectly informed of the ſtate of thoſe Eaſtern Countries, and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greeks, which lay between them and the Lordſhip of Aſia. Theſe Greeks were factious, and ſeldom or never at peace. As for the Macedonians, though length of time and continual dealings in Greece ever ſince the reigns of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference between him and the Naturals: yet moſt of them abhorred his Dominion, becauſe he was originally forſooth a Barbarian: many of them hated him upon antient quarrels: and they that had been moſt beholding unto him, were nevertheleſs weary of him, by reaſon of his perſonal faults. All this gave hope, that the affairs of Greece would not long detain the Roman Armies: eſpecially ſince the diviſions of the Country were ſuch, that every petty Eſtate was apt to take Counſel apart for it ſelf, without much regarding the generality. But the poor Commonalty of Rome had no great affection to ſuch a chargeable enterpriſe. They were already quite exhauſted, by that grievous war with Hannibal: wherein they had given by Loan to the Republick all their money, neither had they as yet received, (neither did they receive untill fifteen or ſixteen years after this,) their whole ſum back again. That part of payment alſo which was already made, being not in preſent money, but much of it in Land: it behoved them to reſt a while; and beſtow the more diligence in telling their grounds, by how much they were the leſs able to beſtow coſt. Wherefore they took no pleaſure to hear, that Attalus and the Rhodians had ſent Embaſſadours to ſolicite them againſt Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Aſia: or that M. Aurelius, their Agent in Greece, had ſent letters of the ſame tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by ſetting out the preparations of this dangerous enemy, that ſolicited not only the Towns upon the Continent, but all the Iſlands in thoſe Seas, viſiting them in perſon, or ſending Embaſſadours, as one that meant ſhortly to hold war with the Romans upon their own ground. Philip had indeed no ſuch intent: neither was he much too ſtrong, either of himſelf, or by his alliance in Greece, to be reſiſted by Attalus and the Rhodians; eſpecially with the help of the Ætolians their good friends, and (in a manner) his own profeſſed enemies. But ſuch things muſt be publiſhed abroad, if only to prediſpoſe men unto the war, and give it the more honeſt colour.

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therefore could not thrive by intermeddling in the affairs of thoſe that were more mighty than himſelf. He was too unskilful, or otherwiſe too unapt, to retain his old friends: yet would he needs be ſeeking new enemies. And he found them ſuch, as he deſerved to have them; for he offered his help to their deſtruction, when they were in miſery, and had done him no harm. It behoved him therefore, either to have ſtrained his forces to the utmoſt in making war upon them; or in deſiſting from that injurious courſe, to have made amends for the wrongs paſt, by doing friendly offices of his own accord. But he, having broken that League of peace, which of all other the moſt natural, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, unleſs they think themſelves juſtly provoked; was afterwards too fondly perſwaded, that he might well be ſecure of the Romans, becauſe of the written Covenants of peace between him and them. There is not any form of Oath, whereby ſuch Articles of peace can be held inviolable, ſave only * by the water of Styx, that is, by Neceſſity: which whilſt it binds one party, or both unto performance, making it apparent, that he ſhall be a loſer that ſtarts from the Conditions; it may ſo long (and ſo long only) be preſumed, that there ſhall be no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquiſhed, the Romans never hearkened after Philip: for neceſſity made them let him alone. But when once they had a peace with Carthage; then was the River of Styx dryed up: and then could they ſwear as * Mercury did in the Comedy, by their own ſelves, even by their good ſwords, that they had good reaſon to make war upon him. The voyage of Sopater into Africk, and the preſent war againſt Attalus, were matter of quarrel as much as needed: or if this were not enough; the Athenians helped to furniſh them with more.

* Sir Francis Bacon de ſap. Veterum.

* Plaut. Amphitr.

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their own barren Territory, took ſtate upon them nevertheleſs, as in their ancient fortune. Two young Gentlemen of Acarnania entring into the Temple of Ceres, in the dayes of Initiation (wherein were delivered the myſteries of Religion, or rather of idolatrous ſuperſtition, vainly ſaid to be available unto felicity after this life) diſcovered themſelves by ſome impertinent queſtions, to be none of thoſe that were initiated. Hereupon they were brought before the officers: and though it was apparent, that they came into the place by meer error, not thinking to have therein done amiſs; yet, as it had been for ſome hainous crime, they were put to death. All their Countrey-men at home took this in ill part; and ſought to revenge it as a publick injury, by war upon the Athenians. Procuring therefore of Philip ſome Macedonians to help them, they entred into Attica: who waſted it with fire and ſword; and carried thence a great booty. This indignity ſtirred up the high-minded Athenians; and made them think upon doing more, than they had ability to perform. All which at the preſent they could do, was to ſend Embaſſadors to King Attalus; gratulating his happy ſucceſs againſt Philip, and intreating him to viſit their City. Attalus was hereto the more willing, becauſe he underſtood that the Roman Embaſſadors, hovering about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpoſe to be there at the ſame time. So he went thither, accompanied, beſides his own followers, with ſome of the Rhodians. Landing ing in the Pirœus, he found the Romans there, with whom he had much friendly conference: they rejoycing that he continued enemy to Philip; and he being no less glad, when he heard of their purpose to renew the war. The Athenians came out of their City, all the Magistrates, Priests, and Citizens, with their wives and children, in as solemn a pomp as they could devise, to meet and honour the King. They entertained the Romans that were with him, in very loving manner: but towards Attalus himself they omitted no point of observance which their flattery could suggest. At his first coming into the City, they called the people to Assembly: where they desired him to honour them with his presence, and let them hear him speak. But he excused himself, saying, That with an evil grace he should recount unto them those many benefits, by which he studied to make them know what love he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that he should deliver in writing, what he would have propounded. He did so. The points of his Declaration were; first, what he had willingly done for their sake: then, what had lately passed between him and Philip: lastly, an exhortation unto them, to declare themselves against the Macedonians, whilest he with the Rhodians and the Romans, were willing and ready to take their part: which if they now refused to do, he protested, that afterwards it would be vain to crave his help. There needed little intreaty: for they were as willing to proclaim the war, as he to desire it. As for other matters, they loaded him with immoderate honours: and obtained, That unto the ten Tribes, whereof the body of their Citizens consisted, should be added another, and called after his name; as if he were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhodians they also decreed a Crown of Gold, in reward of their vertue; and made all the Rhodians free Citizens of Athens.

Thus began a great noise of war, wherein little was left unto the Romans for their part; Attalus and the Rhodians taking all upon them. But while these were vainly mis-spending the time, in seeking to draw the Ætolians to their party: that contrary to their old manner were glad to be at quiet: Philip won the Towns of Maronea and Ænus, with many other strong places about the Hellespont. Likewise passing over the Hellespont, he laid siege unto Abydus; and won it, though he was fain to stay there long. The Town held out, rather upon an obstinate resolution, and hope of succour from Attalus and the Rhodians, than any great ability to defend it self against so mighty an Enemy. But the Rhodians sent thither only one Quadrireme Gallie: and Attalus no more than three hundred men, far too weak an aid to make good the place. The Roman Embassadors wondred much at this great negligence of them that had taken so much upon them.

These Embassadors, C. Claudius, M. Æmylius, and P. Sempronius, were sent unto Ptolomy Epiphanes King of Egypt, to acquaint him with their victory against Hannibal and the Carthaginians; as also to thank him for his favour unto them shewed in that War; and to desire the continuance thereof, if they should need it against Philip. This Egyptian King was now in the third or fourth year of his reign, which (as his father Philopater had done before him) he began a very young boy. The courtesie for which the Romans were to thank him, was that out of Egypt they had lately been supplied with corn, in a time of extream Dearth; when the miseries of War had made all their own Provinces unable to relieve them. This message could not but be welcome to the Egyptian: since it was well known, how Philip and Antiochus had combined themselves against him, conspiring to take away his Kingdom. And therefore it might in reason be hoped, that he, or his Council for him, should offer to supply the Romans with corn: since this their Macedonian Expedition concerned his Estate no less than theirs.

But as the errand was for the most part complemental; so had the Embassadors both leisure and direction from the Senate, to look unto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed that M. Æmylius, the youngest of them should step aside, and visit Philip, to try if he could make him leave the siege of Abydus; which else he was like to carry. Emylius, coming to Philip, tells him that his doings was contrary to the League that he had made with the Romans. For Attalus and the Rhodians, upon whom he made War, were Confederate with Rome: and the Town of Abydus, which he was now besieging, had a kind of dependency upon Attalus. Hereto Philip answered, That Attalus and the Rhodians had made War upon him: and that he did only requite them with the like. Do you also (said Æmylius) requite these poor Abydeni with such terrible War, for any the like Invasion by them first made upon you? The King was angry to hear himself thus taken short: and therefore he roundly made answer to Æmylius: It is your youth, Sir; and your beauty, and (above all,) your being a Roman, that makes you thus presumptuous. But I wish you to remember the League that ye have made with me, and to keep it: If ye do otherwise, I will make ye understand, that the Kingdom, and Name of Macedon is in matter of War, no less noble than the Roman. So he dismissed the Embassador; and had the Town immediately yielded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to have died every one of them, and set their Town on fire; binding themselves hereto by a fearful oath when Philip denied to accept them upon reasonable conditions. But having in desperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, lost the greatest number of their Youth; it was thought meet by the Governours and Ancients of the City, to change this resolution; and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Silver to Philip; about which, whilest they were busie, the memory of their oath wrought so effectually in the younger sort, that, by exhortation of the Priest, they fell to murdering their women, children, and themselves. Hereof the King had so little compassion, that he said, he would grant the Abydeni three dayes leisure to die: and to that end forbade his men to enter the Town; or hazard themselves in interrupting the violence of those mad fools.

SECT. IX.

The Romans decree War against Philip, and send one of their Consuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athenians their Confederates. How poor the Athenians were at this time both in quality and estate.

THis calamity of the Abydeni, was likened by the Romans unto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it neerly resembled: though Rome was not alike interessed in the quarrel. But to help themselves with pretence for the War, they had found out another Saguntum, even the City of Athens: which if the Macedonian should win, then rested there no more to do, than that he should presently embarque himself for Italy, whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum, in five moneths, but in the short space of five days sayling. Thus P. Sulpitius the Consul told the multitude, when he exhorted them to make War upon Philip; which at his first propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrhus was by him alledged; to shew, what Philip, with the power of a greater Kingdom, might dare to undertake: as also the fortunate voyage of Scipio into Africk; to shew the difference of making War abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their own Country. By such arguments was the Commonalty of Rome indeed to believe, that this War with the Macedonian was both just and necessary. So it was decreed: and immediately the same Consul hasted away toward Macedon, having that Province allotted unto him before, and all things in a readiness, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motives than the people must be acquainted with. Great thanks were given to the Athenian Embassadors, of their constancy (as was said) in not changing their faith at such times as they stood in danger of being besieged. And indeed great thanks were due to them, though not upon the same occasion. For the people of Rome had no cause to think it a benefit unto themselves; that any Greek Town refusing to sue unto the Macedonian for peace, requested their help against him. But the Senate, intending to take in hand the Conquest of the Eastern parts, had reason to give thanks unto those, that ministred the occasion. Since therefore it was an untrue suggestion, That Philip was making ready for Italy: and since neither Attalus the Rhodians, nor any other State in those quarters, desired the Romans to give them protection: these busie-headed Athenians: who falling out with the Acarnanians, and consequently with Philip, a matter of May-game, (as was shewed before) sent Embassadors into all parts of the World, even to Ptolomy of Egypt, and to the Romans, as well as to Attalus and others their neighbours; but be accepted as cause of the War, and Authors of the the benefit thence redounding.

Nevertheless as it loves to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence; the doings of P. Sulpitius the Consul were such, as might have argued Athens to be the least part of his care. He failed not about Peloponnesus, but took the ready way to Macedon, and landing about the River of Apsus, between Dyrrhachium and Appolonia, there began the War. Soon upon his coming, the Athenian Embassadours were with him and craved his help: whereof they could make no benefit whilest he was far from them. They bemoaned themselves as men besieged, and intreated him to deliver them. For which cause he sent unto them C. Claudius with twenty Gallies, and a competent number of men: but the main of his forces he retained with him, for the prosecution of a greater design. The Athenians were not indeed besieged: only some Rovers from Chalcis, in the Isle of Eubœa, and some bands of adventures out of Corinth used to take their Ships, and spoil their fields, because they had declared themselves against King Philip, that was Lord of these two Towns. The robberies done by these Pyrats and Free-booters, were by the more eloquent than wary like Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Siege. From such detriment the arrival of Claudius, and shortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, easily preserved them. As for the Athenians themselves, they that had been wont, in ancient times to undertake the conquests of Egypt, Cyprus and Cicil; to make War upon the great Persian King, and to hold so much of Greece in subjection, as made them redoubtable unto all the rest; had now no more than three Ships, and those open ones, not much better than long boats. Yet thought they not themselves a whit the worse men, but stood as highly upon the glory and vertue of their Ancestors, as if it had been still their own.

SECT. X.

The Town of Chalcis in Eubœa taken and sackt by the Romans and their Associates, that lay in Garrison at Athens. Philip attempteth to take Athens by surprise: wasteth the Country about, and makes a journey into Peloponnesus. Of Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, and his wife. Philip offers to make War against Nabis for the Achæans. He returneth home through Attica, which he spoileth again: and provides against the Enemies. Some exploits of the Romans. Divers Princes joyn with them. Great labouring to draw the Ætolians into the War.

PHilip returning home from Abydus, heard news of the Roman Consul his being about Apollonia. But e're he stirred forth to give him entertainment, or perhaps before he had well resolved, whether it were best a while to sit still, and try what might be done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist these Invaders with all his forcess he received advertisement from Chalcis of a grievous mishap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius with his Romans, finding no such work at Athens, as they had expected, or was answerable to the fame that went abroad, purposed to do somewhat that might quicken the War, and make his own imployment better. He grew soon weary of sitting as a Scar-crow, to save the Athenians grounds from spoil, and therefore gladly gladly took in hand a busines of more importance. The Town of Chalcis was very negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiers therein, for that there was no Enemy at hand: and more negligently by the Towns-men, who reposed themselves upon their Garrison. Hereof Claudian having advertisement, sailed thither by night, for fear of being descried: and arriving there a little before break of day, took it by Scalado. He used no mercy, but slew all that came in his way: and wanting men to keep it, (unless he should have left the heartless Athenians to their own defence) he set it on fire; consuming the Kings Magazines of Corn, and all provisions for War, which were plenteously filled. Neither were he and his Associates contented with the great abundance of spoil which they carried aboard their Ships, and with inlarging all those, whom Philip, as in a place of most security, kept there imprisoned: but to shew their despight and hatred unto the King, they overthrew, and break in pieces the Statues to him there erected. This done, they hasted away towards Athens: where the news of their exploit was like to be joyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetrias, about some 20 miles thence; whither then these tidings, or part of them, were brought him, though he saw that it was too late to remedy the matter; yet he made all haste to take revenge. He thought to have taken the Athenians, with their trusty Friends, busie at work in ransacking the Town, and loading themselves with spoil: but they were gone before his coming. Five thousand light-armed Foot he had with him, and three hundred Horse: whereof leaving at Chalcis only a few to bury the dead, he marched from thence away speedily toward Athens: thinking it not impossible to take his Enemies in joy of their Victory, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation, if a Foot-post that stood Scout for the City upon the Borders, had not descried him afar off, and swiftly carried word of his approach to Athens. It was mid-night when this Post came thither: who found all the Town asleep, as fearless of any danger. But the Magistrates, hearing this report, caused a Trumpet out of their Citadel to sound the Alarm, and with all speed made ready for defence. Within a few hours Philip was there; who seeing the many lights, and other signs of busie preparation usual in such a case, understood that they had news of his coming; and therefore willed his men to repose themselves till it were day. It is like, that the paucity of his followers did help well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the walls. Wherefore though Claudius were not yet returned (who was to fetch a compass about by Sea, and had no cause of haste) yet having in the Town some mercenary Souldiers, which they kept of their own, besides the great multitude of Citizens; they adventured to issue forth at a Gate, whereto they saw Philip make approach. The King was glad of this; reckoning all those his own, that were thus hardy. He therefore only willed his men to follow his example; and presently gave charge upon them. In that fight he gave singular proof of his valour: and beating down many of the Enemies with his own hands, drave them with great slaughter back into the City. The heat of his courage transported him further than discretion would have allowed, even to the very Gate. But he retired without harm taking; for that they which were upon the Towers over the Gate, could not use their casting weapons against him, without much indangering their own people that were thronging before him into the City. There was a Temple of Hercules, a place of exercise, with a Grove, and many goodly Monuments besides, neer adjoyning unto Athens: of which he spared none; but suffered the rage of his anger to extend, even unto the Sepulchres of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and some Companies of Attalus his men from Ægina; too late in regard of what was already past: but in good time to prevent him of satisfying his anger to the full, which as yet he had not done. So he departed from thence to Corinth, and hearing that the Achæans held a Parliament at Argos, he came thither to them unexpected.

The Achæans were devising upon War: which they intended to make against Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon: who being started up in the room of Machanidas, did greater mischief than any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly upon his Mercenaries: and of his Subjects had no regard. He was a cruel oppressor, a greedy extortioner upon those that lived under him; and one that in his natural condition smelt rankly of the Hangman. In these qualities, his wife Apega was very fitly matched with him, since his dexterity was no greater in spoiling the men, then hers in fleecing their wives; whom she would never suffer to be at quiet, till they had presented her with all their Jewels and Apparel. Her Husband was so delighted with her property, that he caused an Image to be made, lively representing her; and apparelled it with such costly garments, as she used to wear. But it was indeed an Engine, serving to torment men. Hereof he made use, when he meant to try the vertue of his Rhetorick. For calling unto him some rich man, of whose money he was desirous; he would bring him into the room where this counterfeit Apega stood, and there use all his art of perswasion, to get what he desired, as it were by good will. If he could not so speed, but was answered with excuses; then took he the refractory denyer by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his Wife Apega (who sate by in a Chair) could perswade more effectually. So he led him to the Image, that rose up and opened the Arms, as it were for imbracement. Those arms were full of sharp iron nails, the like whereof was also sticking in the Breasts, though hidden with her clothes: and herewith she griped the poor wretch, to the pleasure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruel death. Such, and worse (for it were long to tell all here that is spoken of him) was Nabis in his government. In his dealings abroad he combined with the Æsolians, as Machanidas and Lycurgus had done before him. By these he grew into acquaintance with the Romans; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former War. Of Philopæmens virtue he stood in fear: and therefore durst not provoke the Achæans, as long as they had such an able Commander. But when Cycliades, a far worse Captain, was their Prætor, and all, or the greatest part of their Mercenaries were discharged; Philopæmen being also gone into Crete, to follow his beloved occupation of War; then did Nabis fall upon their Territory; and wasting all the Fields, made them distrust their own safety in the Towns.

Against this Tyrant the Achæans were preparing for War, when Philip came among them, and had set down what proportion of Souldiers every City

City of their Corporation ſhould furniſh out. But Philip willed them not to trouble themſelves with the care of this buſineſs, foraſmuch as he alone would eaſe them of this War, and take the burden upon himſelf. With exceeding joy and thanks they accepted of this kind offer. But then he told them, That whilſt he made War upon Lacedæmon, he ought not to leave his own Towns unguarded. In which reſpect he thought they would be pleaſed to ſend a few men to Corinth, and ſome Companies into the Iſle of Eubœa; that ſo he might ſecurely purſue the War againſt Nabis. Immediately they found out his device; which was none other, than to engage their Nation in this War againſt the Romans. Wherefore their Prætor Cycliades made him anſwer, That their Laws forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than thoſe for which they were aſſembled. So paſſing the Decree, upon which they had agreed before, for preparing War againſt Nabis, he brake up the Aſſembly, with every mans good liking; whereas in former time, he had been thought no better than one of the Kings Paraſites.

It grieved the King to have thus failed in his purpoſe with the Achæans. Nevertheleſs, he gathered up among them a few Voluntaries, and ſo returned by Corinth back into Attica. There he met with Philocles one of his Captains, that with two thouſand men had been doing what harm he might unto the Countrey. With this addition of ſtrength, he attempted the Caſtle of Eleuſine, the Haven of Pyreus, and even the City of Athens. But the Romans made ſuch haſte after him by Sea, thruſting themſelves into every of theſe places; that he could no more wreak his anger upon thoſe goodly Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time ſingularly beautified. So he deſtroyed all the works of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble; which they had in plenty of their own: or having long ago been Maſters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where beſt choice was found. Neither did he only put all down: but cauſed his men to break the very Stones, that they might be unſerviceable to their reparation. His loſs at Chalcis being thus revenged upon Athens, he went home into Macedon: and there made proviſion, both againſt the Roman Conſul that lay about Apollonia; and againſt the Dardanians, with other his bad Neighbours, which were likely to infeſt him. Among other his cares, he forgot not the Ætolians: to whoſe Parliament, ſhortly to be held at Naupactus, he ſent an Embaſſage, requeſting them to continue in his Friendſhip. Thus was Philip occupied.

Sulpitius the Roman Conſul encamped upon the River of Apſus. Thence he ſent forth Apuſtius his Lieutenant, with part of the Army to waſt the borders of Macedon. Apuſtius took ſundry Caſtles and Towns, uſing ſuch extremity of Sword and Fire at Antipatria, the firſt good Town which he won by force, that none durſt afterwards make reſiſtance, unleſs they knew themſelves able to hold out. Returning towards the Conſul with his ſpoil, he was charged in the Rear, upon the paſſage of a brook, by Athenagoras a Macedonian Captain: but the Romans had the better, and killing many of theſe Enemies, took Priſoners many more, to the increaſe of their booty, with which they arrived in ſafety at their Camp. The ſucceſs of this Expedition, though it were not great, yet ſerved to draw into the Roman friendſhip thoſe that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. Theſe were Pleuratus, the Son of Scerdilaidas the Illyrian: Aminander King of the Athamanians, and Bato the Son of Longarus, Prince of the Dardanians. They offered their aſſiſtance unto the Conſul, who thanked them: and ſaid, That he would ſhortly make uſe of Pleuratus and Bato, when he entred into Macedon: but that the friendſhip of Aminander, whoſe Countrey lay between the Ætolians and Theſſaly, might be perhaps available with the Ætolians, to ſtir them up againſt Philip.

So the preſent care was wholly ſet upon the Ætolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embaſſadors from the Macedonian, Romans, and Athenians. Of which, the Macedonian ſpake firſt, and ſaid: That as there was nothing fallen out, which ſhould occaſion the breach of Peace between his Maſter and the Ætolians; ſo was it to be hoped, that they would not ſuffer themſelves, without good cauſe to be carried away after other mens fancies. He prayed them to conſider, how the Romans heretofore, had made ſhew, as if their War in Greece tended only to the defence of the Ætolians, and yet notwithſtanding had been angry, that the Ætolians, by making Peace with Philip, had no longer need of ſuch their Patronage. What might it be that made them ſo buſie, in obtruding their protection upon thoſe that needed it not? Surely it was even the general hatred, which theſe Barbarians bore unto the Greeks. For even after the ſame ſort had they lent their help to the Mamertines: and afterwards delivered Syracuſe, when it was oppreſſed by Carthaginian Tyrants; but now both Syracuſe and Meſſana, were ſubject unto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the ſame effect he alledged many examples, adding, That in like ſort it would happen to the Ætolians: who if they drew ſuch maſters into Greece, muſt not look hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their own, wherein to conſult about War and Peace: the Romans would eaſe them of this care, and ſend them ſuch a Moderator, as went every year from Rome to Syracuſe. Wherefore he concluded, that it was beſt for them, whilſt as yet they might, and whilſt one of them as yet could help the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, upon light occaſion, they hapned to fall out, they might as lightly be reconciled: and with whom they had three years ago made the Peace which ſtill continued; although that the very ſame Romans were then againſt it, who ſought to break it now. It would have troubled the Romans, to frame a good anſwer to theſe objections. For the Macedonian had ſpoken the very truth, in ſhewing whereunto this their Patronage, which they offered with ſuch importunity, did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were ſet on by them to ſpeak next: who had ſtore of eloquence, and matter of recrimination enough, to make Philip odious. Theſe affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embaſſador, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians; knowing in what barbarous manner his own King had, in few days paſt, made War upon the gods themſelves, by deſtroying all their Temples in Attica. Herewithal they made a pittiful rehearſal of their own calamities: and ſaid, that if Philip might have his will, Ætolia, and all the reſt of Greece, ſhould feel the ſame that Attica had felt; yea, that Athens it ſelf, together with Minerva, Jupiter, Ceres, and other of the gods, were like to have felt, if the Walls and the Roman Arms had not defended them.

Then

Then ſpake the Romans: who excuſing, as well as they could, their own oppreſſion of all thoſe, in whoſe defence they had heretofore taken Arms, went roundly to the work in hand. They ſaid, that they had of late made War in the Ætolians behalf, and that the Ætolians had without their conſent made Peace: whereof ſince the Ætolians muſt excuſe themſelves, by alledging that the Romans, being buſied with Carthage, wanted leiſure to give them aid convenient; ſo this excuſe being now taken away, and the Romans wholly bent againſt their common Enemy, it concerned the Ætolians to take part with them in their War and Victory, unleſs they had rather periſh with Philip.

It might eaſily be perceived, that they which were ſo vehement, in offering their help e're it was deſired, were themſelves carried unto the War by more earneſt motives, than a ſimple deſire to help thoſe Friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may have been the cauſe, why Dorymachus the Ætolian Prætor, ſhifted them off a while with a dilatory anſwer: though he told his Country-men, That by reſerving themſelves, till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with thoſe that had the better fortune. His anſwer was, firſt, in general terms; That over-much haſte was an enemy to good counſel: for which cauſe they muſt deliberate, e're they concluded. But coming nearer to the matter in hand, he paſſed a Decree, That the Prætor might at any time call an Aſſembly of the States, and therein conclude upon this buſineſs; any Law to the contrary notwithſtanding: whereas otherwiſe, it was unlawful to treat of ſuch affairs, excepting two of their great Parliaments, that were held at ſet times.

SECT. XI.

The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and ſkirmiſhing with them on his borders. The Ætolians invade his Dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalus and the Roman Fleet.

PHilip was glad to hear that the Romans had ſped no better in their ſolicitation of the Ætolians. He thought them hereby diſappointed in the very beginning, of one great help; and meant himſelf to diſappoint them of another. His Son Perſeus, a very boy, was ſent to keep the Streights of Pelagonia againſt the Dardanians; having with him ſome of the Kings Councel, to govern both him and his Army. It was judged, as may ſeem, that the preſence of the Kings Son, how young ſoever, would both encourage his Followers, and terrifie the Enemies, by making them at leaſt believe, that he was not weakly attended. And this may have been the reaſon, why the ſame Perſeus, a few years before this, was in like manner left upon the Borders of Ætolia by his Father; whom earneſt buſineſs called thence another way. No danger of Enemies being left on either hand; it was thought that the Macedonian Fleet under Heraclides, would ſerve to keep Attalus, with the Rhodians and Romans, from doing harm by Sea, when the Kings back was turned: who took his Journey Weſtward againſt Sulpicius the Conſul.

The Armies met in the Country of the Deſſaretii, a people in the utmoſt borders of Macedon towards Illyria, about the Mountains of Candavia; that running along from Hæmus in the North, until they joyn in the South with Pindus, incloſe the Weſtern parts of Macedon. Two or three days they lay in ſight one of the other, without making offer of battle. The Conſul was the firſt that iſſued forth of his Camp into the open Field. But Philip was not confident in the ſtrength which he had then about him; and therefore thought it better to ſend forth ſome of his light-armed Mercenaries, and ſome part of his Horſe, to entertain them with skirmiſh. Theſe were eaſily vanquiſhed by the Romans, and driven back into their Camp. Now although it was ſo, that the King was unwilling to hazard all at firſt upon a Caſt, and therefore ſent for Perſeus with his Companies, to increaſe his own Forces: yet being no leſs unwilling to loſe too much in reputation; he made ſhew a day after, as if he would have fought. He had found the advantage of a place fit for ambuſh, wherein he beſtowed as many as he thought meet of his Targettiers: and ſo gave charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captains, to provoke out the Romans to fight; inſtructing both him and his Targettiers, how to behave themſelves reſpectively, as opportunity ſhould fall out. The Romans had no miſtruſt of any ambuſh, having fought upon the ſame ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might have ſuſtained ſome notable detriment, if the Kings directions had been well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall back, they charged him ſo hotly, that they drave him to a haſty flight, and purſued him as hard as they were able. But the Captains of the Targettiers, not ſtaying to let them run into the danger, diſcovered themſelves before it was time; and thereby made fruſtrate the work to which they were appointed. The Conſul hereby gathered, that the King had ſome deſire to try the fortune of a battle: which he therefore preſented the ſecond time: leading forth his Army, and ſetting it in order, with Elephants in the Front: a kind of help which the Romans had never uſed before, but had taken thoſe of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by time. It was ſcarce above fourſcore years e're this, that Pyrrhus carried Elephants out of Greece into Italy, to affright the Romans, who had never ſeen any of thoſe Beaſts before. But now the ſame Romans (whilſt poſſibly ſome were yet alive, which had known that Expedition of Pyrrhus) came into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greeks have none. Philip had patience to let the Conſul brave him at his Trenches: wherein he did wiſely; for the Romans had greater need to fight than he. Sulpicius was unwilling to loſe time: neither could he without great danger, lying ſo near the Enemy, that was ſtrong in Horſe, ſend his men to fetch in Corn out of the Fields. Wherefore he removed 8 miles off: preſuming that Philip would not adventute to meet him on even ground: and ſo the more boldly he ſuffered his Forragers to over-run the Country. The King was nothing ſorry of this: but permitted the Romans to take their good pleaſure: even till their preſumption, and his own ſuppoſed fear, ſhould make them careleſs. When this was come to paſs, he took all his Horſe, and light-armed Foot, with which he occupied a place in the mid-way, between the Forragers and their Camp. There he ſtayed in Covert with part of his Forces, to keep the paſſages that none ſhould eſcape. The reſt he ſent abroad the Countrey, to fall upon the ſtragſtragglers: willing them to put all to the Sword, and let none home with the news to the Camp. The ſlaughter was great: and thoſe which eſcaped the hands of them that were ſent abroad to ſcowre the Fields, lighted all or moſt of them upon the King and his Companies in their flight: So as they were cut off by the way. Long it was e're the Camp had news of this. But in the end there eſcaped ſome: who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter went: yet by telling what had hapned to themſelves, raiſed a great multitude. Sulpicius hereupon ſends forth all his Horſe, and bids them help their fellows where they ſaw it needful: He himſelf with the Legions followed. The Companies of Horſe divided themſelves, accordingly as they met with advertiſements upon the way, into many parts, not knowing where was moſt of the danger. Such of them as lighted upon Philips Troops, that were canvaſſing the Field, took their task where they found it: But the main bulk of them fell upon the King himſelf; They had the diſadvantage; as coming fewer, and unprepared, to one that was ready for them. So they were beaten away; as their fellows alſo might have been, if the King had well bethought himſelf, and given over in time. But while, not contented with ſuch an Harveſt, he was too greedy about a poor gleaning; the Roman Legions appeared in ſight: which emboldened their Horſe to make a re-charge. Then the danger apparent, enforced the Macedonians to look to their own ſafety. They ran which way they could: and (as men that lie in wait for others, are ſeldom heedful of that which may befall themſelves) to eſcape the Enemy, they declined the faireſt way; ſo as they were plunged in Mariſhes and Bogs, wherein many of them were loſt. The Kings Horſe was ſlain under him: and there had been caſt away, if a loving Subject of his had not alighted, mounted him upon his own Horſe, and delivered him out of peril, at the expence of his own life, that running on Foot was overtaken and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with improvident raſhneſs; and the Conſul with as much dulneſs, for his days ſervice. A little longer ſtay would have delivered the King from theſe Enemies without any blow: ſince when all the fields about them were waſted, they muſt needs have retired back to the Sea. On the other ſide, it was not thought unlikely, That if the Romans following the King, had ſet upon his Camp, at ſuch time as he fled thither, half amazed with either being ſlain or taken, they might have won it. But that noble Hiſtorian, Livie, (as is commonly his manner) hath judiciouſly obſerved, That neither the one, nor the other, were much too blame in this days work. For the main body of the Kings Army lay ſafe in his Camp; and could not be ſo aſtoniſhed with the loſs of two or three hundred Horſe, that it ſhould therefore have abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himſelf, he was advertiſed, that Pleuratus the Illyrian, and the Dardanians, were fallen upon his Countrey: when they found the paſſage thereinto open, after Perſeus was called away from cuſtody of the Streights. This was it which made him adventure to do ſomewhat betimes; that he might ſet the Romans going the ſooner, and afterwards look unto his troubleſome Neighbours. In conſideration of this, Philip was deſirous to clear himſelf of the Romans, as ſoon as he might. And to that purpoſe he ſent unto the Conſul: requeſting a day of Truce for burial of the dead. But inſtead of ſo doing, he marched away by Night, and left Fires in his Camp to beguile the Enemy, as if he had not ſtirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when he heard of the Kings departure, was not ſlow to follow him. He overtook the Macedonians in a place of ſtrength, which they had fenced (for it was a woody ground) by cutting down Trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was moſt open. In making of ſuch places good, the Macedonian Phalanx was of little uſe; being a ſquare battle of Pikes, not fit for every ground. The Archers of Crete were judged, and were indeed, more ſerviceable in that caſe. But they were few; and their Arrows were of ſmall force againſt the Roman Shields. The Macedonians therefore helped them by flinging of Stones. But to no purpoſe. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This Victory (ſuch as it was) laid open unto the Conſul ſome poor Towns thereabout, which partly were taken by ſtrong hand, partly yielded for fear. But the ſpoil of theſe, and of the Fields adjoyning, was not ſufficient to maintain his Army; and therefore he returned back to Apollonia.

The Dardanians, hearing that Philip was come back, withdrew themſelves apace out of the Country. The King ſent Athenagoras to wait upon them home; whilſt he himſelf went againſt the Ætolians. For Damocritus the Prætor of the Ætolians, who had reſerved himſelf and his Nation unto the event of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once and again: as alſo that Pleuratus and the Dardanians were fallen upon Macedon; grew no leſs buſie on the ſudden, than before he had been wiſe. He perſwaded his Nation to take their time: and ſo, not ſtaying to proclaim War, joyned his Forces with Aminander the Athamanian; and made invaſion upon Theſſaly. They took, and cruelly ſacked a few Towns: whereby they grew confident; as if, without any danger, they might do what they liſted. But Philip came upon them e're they looked for him: and killing them as they lay diſperſed, was like to have taken their Camp, if Aminander more warie than the Ætolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retreat through his own mountainous Country.

About the ſame time the Roman Fleet, aſſiſted by Attalus and the Rhodians, had taken ſome ſmall Iſlands in the Ægean Sea. They took likewiſe the Town of Oreum in the Iſle of Euboea: and ſome other places thereabout. The Towns were given unto Attalus, after the ſame Compact that had formerly been made with the Ætolians: the goods therein found were given unto the Romans: and the People, for Slaves. Other attempts on that ſide were hindred: either by foul weather at Sea: or by want of daring, and of means.

SECT.

SECT. XII.

Villius the Roman Consul wasts a year to no effect. War of the Gaules in Italy. An Embassador of the Romans to Carthage, Masanissa and Vermina. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdom: and T. Quintius Flaminius is sent against him.

THus the time ran away: and P. Villius a new Consul, took charge of the War in Macedon. He was troubled with a mutiny of his oldest Souldiers: whereof two thousand, having served long in Sicil and Africk, thought themselves much wronged, in that they could not be suffered to look unto their own Estates at home. They were (belike) of the Legions that had served at Canne: as may seem by their complaint, of having been long absent from Italy: whither fain they would have returned, when by their Colonels they were shipped for Macedon. How Villius dealt with them, it is uncertain. For the History of his year is lost; whereof the miss is not great, since he did nothing memorable. Valerius Antius, as we find in Livie, hath adorned this Villius with a great exploit against Philip. Yet since Livie himself, an Historian to whom few of the best are matchable, could find no such thing recorded in any good Author: we may reasonably believe, that Villius his year was idle.

In the beginning of this Macedonian War, the Romans found more trouble than could have been expected with the Gauls. Their Colony of Placentia, a goodly and strong Town, which neither Hannibal, nor after him Asdrubal, had been able to force: was taken by these Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like sort Cremona was attempted: but saved her self, taking warning by her Neighbours calamity. Amilcar a Carthaginian, that stayed behind Asdrubal, or Mago in those parts: was now become Captain of the Gaules, in these their enterprises. This when the Romans heard, they sent Embassadours to the Carthaginians: giving them to understand, That if they were not weary of the Peace, it behoved them to call home, and deliver up, this their Citizen Amilcas; who made War in Italy. Hereunto it was added (perhaps lest the message might seem otherwise to have savoured a little of some fear) That of the fugitive slaves belonging to the Romans, there were some reported to walk up and down to Carthage: which if it were so, then ought they to be restored back to their Masters: as was conditioned in the late Peace. The Embassadors that were sent on this errand, had further charge to treat with Masanissa, as also with Vermina the Son of Syphax. Unto Masanissa, besides matter of Complement, they were to signifie what pleasure he might do them, by lending them some of his Numidian Horse, to serve in their War against the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe unto him the name of King; and promised thereafter to deserve it, by his readiness in doing them all good offices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter, and said, That having been, and being still (as they took it) their Enemy, He ought first of all to desire Peace; for that the name of King, was an honour that they used not to confer upon any; save only upon such as had royally deserved it at their hands. The authority to make Peace with him; was wholly committed unto these Embassadors, upon such terms as they should think fit; without further relation to the Senate and People: For they were then busied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answer, That they wholly disclaimed Amilcar: banishing him, and confiscating his goods. As for the Fugitives, they had restored as many as they could find; and would in that point, as far as was requisite, give satisfaction to the Senate. Herewithal they sent a great proportion of Corn to Rome; and the like unto the Army that was in Macedon. King Masanissa would have lent unto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian Horse: but they were contented with half the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embassadours, to give them entertainment, on the Borders of his Kingdom; and without any disputation, agreed with them upon terms of Peace.

Thus were the Romans busied in taking order for their Macedonian War, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his Gaules, they laid siege unto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor, came upon them, fought a battle with them, and overcame them. Amilcar the Carthaginian died in this battle: and the fruit of the Victory was such, as both made amend for losses past, and left the work easie to those, that afterwards should have the managing of War among those Gaules. So there was good leisure to think upon the business of Macedon: where Philip was carefully providing to give contentment unto his Subjects, by punishing a bad Counsellor whom they hated: as also to assure unto himself the Achæans, by rendring unto them some Towns that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdom, not only by exercising and training his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thereinto out of Epirus. This was in doing when Villius, having unprofitably laboured to find way into Macedon, taking a Journey (as Sulpicius had done before him) wherein he could not be supplied with Victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came advertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Consul, and had Macedon allotted him for his Province; whose coming he expected; and he very shortly arrived at the Army.

SECT. XIII.

The Romans begin to make War by Negotiation. T. Quintius wins a passage against Philip. Thessaly wasted by Philip, the Romans and Ætolians. The Achæans forsaking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A Treaty of Peace, that was vain. Philip delivers Argos to Nabis the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

THe Romans had not been wont in former times, to make War after such a trifling manner. It was their use, to give battle to the Enemy, as soon as they met with him. If he refused it, they besieged his Towns: and so forced him to try the fortune of a day, with his disadvantage in reputation, when he had long forborn it (as it would be intercepted) upon knowledge of his own weakneſs. But in this their War with Philip, they began to learn of the ſubtile Greeks, the art of Negotiation: wherein hitherto they were not grown ſo fine, as within a little while they proved. Their Treaſury was poor, and ſtood indebted, many years after this unto private men, for part of thoſe moneys that had been borrowed in the ſecond Punick War. This had made the Commonalty averſe from the Macedonian War; and had thereby driven the Senators, greedy of the enterprize, to make uſe of their cunning. Yet being weary of the ſlow pace wherewith their buſineſs went forward, they determined to increaſe their Army, that they might have the leſs need to relie upon their Confederates. So they levied eight thouſand Foot, and eight hundred Horſe (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they ſent with T. Quintius Flaminius, the new Conſul, into Macedon. Their Navie, and other means could well have ſerved, for the ſetting forth and tranſportation of a greater Army; but by ſtraining themſelves to the moſt of their ability, they ſhould (beſides other difficulties incident unto the ſuſtenance of thoſe that are too many and too far from home) have bred ſome jealouſie in their friends of their enemies, more than of their own Souldiers. This preſent augmentation of the forces was very requiſite; for that Attalus, about the ſame time, excuſed himſelf unto them by his Embaſſadour, requeſting that either they would undertake the defence of his Kingdom, againſt Antiochus who invaded it; or elſe that they would not take it uncourteouſly, that he quitted the War with Philip, and returned home, to look unto that which moſt concerned him. Their anſwer was remarkable. They ſaid, That it was not their manner to uſe the aid of their friends, longer then their friends had good opportunity, and could alſo be well contented to afford it; That they could not honeſtly take part with Attalus, their good friend, though he were againſt Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deal with Antiochus by Embaſſadors, and (as common friends unto both of the Kings) do their beſt to perſwade an atonement between them. In ſuch loving faſhion did they now carry themſelves, towards their good friend the King Antiochus; who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Army from the Kingdom of Attalus. But how little they regarded theſe terms of friendſhip, after that once they had made an end with Philip, it will very ſoon appear.

T. Quintius haſting away from Rome, came betimes into his Province, with the ſupply decreed unto him; which conſiſted for the moſt part, of old Souldiers, that had ſerved in Spain and Africk. He found Villius the old Conſul, (whom at his coming he preſenly diſcharged) and King Philip of Macedon, encamped one againſt the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the river of Apſus, or Aous. It was manifeſt, that either the Romans muſt fetch a compaſs about, and ſeek their way into Macedon, through the poor Country of the Daſſaretians; or elſe win, by force, that paſſage which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had already two years together miſ-ſpent their time, and been forced to return back without profit, for want of victuals: whereof they could neither carry with them ſtore ſufficient, nor find it on the way. But if they could once get over theſe Mountains, which divided the South of Epirus from Theſſaly, then ſhould they enter into a plentiful Country; and, which by long dependance on the Macedonian, was become (in a manner) part of his Kingdom, whereof it made the South border. Nevertheleſs, the deſire of winning this paſſage, was greater than the likelihood. For the river of Apſus running along through that valley which alone was open between the Mountains, made it all a deep Mariſh and unpaſſable Bogge: a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the main rock by mans hand, Wherefore Quintius aſſailed to climb in the Mountains: but finding himſelf diſappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his enemy, who neglected not the guard of them that was very eaſie; he was compelled to ſit ſtill, without doing any thing for the ſpace of forty dayes.

This long time of reſt gave hope unto Philip, that the War might be ended by compoſition, upon ſome reaſonable terms. He therefore ſo dealt with ſome of the Epirots, (among whom he had many friends) that He and the Conſul had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Conſul would have him to ſet all Towns of Greece at liberty, and make amends for the injuries, which he had done to many people in his late Wars. Philip was contented to give liberty to thoſe whom he had ſubdued of late; but unto ſuch, as had been long ſubject unto him and his Anceſtors, He thought it againſt all reaſon, that he ſhould relinquiſh his claim and dominion over them. He alſo ſaid, that as far forth as it ſhould appear that he had done wrong unto any Town or people whatſoever, He could well be pleaſed to make ſuch amends, as might ſeem convenient in the judgement of ſome free State, that had not been intereſſed in thoſe quarrels. But herewithal Quintius was not ſatisfied. There needed (he ſaid) no judgement or com-promiſe; foraſmuch as it was apparent that Philip had alwayes been the invader; and had not made War as one provoked, in his own defence. After this altercation, when they ſhould come to particulars: and when the Conſul was required to name thoſe Towns, that he would have to be ſet at liberty; the firſt that he named were the Theſſalians: Theſe had been ſubjects (though conditional) unto the Macedonian Kings, ever ſince the dayes of Alexander the Great, and of Philip his Father. Wherefore, as ſoon as Flaminius had named the Theſſalians; the King in a rage demanded what ſharper condition he would have laid upon him, had he been but vanquiſhed. And herewithal abruptly he flang away: refuſing to hear any more of ſuch diſcourſe.

After this the Conſul ſtrove in vain two or three dayes together, to have prevailed againſt the difficulties of that paſſage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himſelf, and could not reſolve what courſe to take: there came to him an Heards-man ſent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirots that favoured the Romans, who having long kept beaſts in thoſe Mountains, was throughly acquainted with all by-paths, and therefore undertook to guide the Romans without any danger, to a place where they ſhould have advantage of the Enemy. This guide, for fear of treacherous dealing, was faſt bound: and being promiſed a great reward, in caſe he made good his word, had ſuch Companies as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They travelled by night (it being then about the full full of the Moon) and rested in the day time, for fear of being discovered. When they had recovered the hill-tops, and were above the Macedonians, (though undiscovered by them, because at their banks) they raised a great smoak, whereby they gave notice of their success unto the Consul. Some skirmishes, whilst these were on their journey, T. Quintius had held with the Macedonians, thereby to avert him from the thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning he saw the smoke arise more and more plainly, and thereby knew that his men had attained unto the place whither they were sent, he pressed as near as he could unto the Enemies Camp, and assailed them in their strength. He prevailed as little as in former times, until the shoutings of those that ran down the hill, and charged Philip on the back, astonished so the Macedonians, that they betook themselves unto flight. The King, upon first apprehension of the danger, made all speed away to save himself. Yet anon considering, that the difficulty of the passage must needs hinder the Romans from pursuing him: he made a stand at the end of five miles, and gathered there together his broken troops, of whom he found wanting no more than two thousand men. The greatest loss was of his Camp and provisions: if not rather perhaps of his reputation: for that now the Macedonians began to stand in fear, lest being driven from a place of such advantage, they should hardly make good their party against the Enemy, upon equal ground. Neither was Philip himself much better perswaded. Wherefore he caused the Thessalians, as many of them as in his hasty retreat he could visit, to forsake their Towns and Country, carrying away with them as much as they were able, and spoiling all the rest. But all of them could not be perswaded, thus to abandon (for the pleasure of their King) their ancient habitations, and all the substance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly resisted him; which they might the better do, for that he could not stay to use any great compulsion. He also himself took it very grievously, that he was driven to make such waste of a most pleasant and fruitful Country, which had ever been well affected unto him: so that a little hindrance did serve, to make him break off his purpose, and withdraw himself home into his Kingdom of Macedon.

The Ætolians and Athamanians, when this fell out, were even in a readiness to invade Thessaly; whereinto the ways lay more open out of their several Countries. When therefore they heard for certainty, that Philip was beaten by the Romans: they foreslowed not the occasion, but made all speed, each of them to lay hold upon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while: but they had gotten so much before his coming, that he, in gleaning after their harvest, could not find enough to maintain his Army. Thus were the poor Thessalians, of whose liberty the Romans a few days since had made shew to be very desirous, wasted by the same Romans and their Confederates; not knowing which way to turn themselves, or whom to avoid. T. Quintius won Phaleria by assault: Metropolis and Piera yielded unto him. Rhage he besieged: and having made a fair breach, yet was unable to force it: so stoutly it was defended both by the Inhabitants, and by a Macedonian garrison therein. Philip also at the same time, having somewhat recollected his spirits, hovered about Tempe with his Army, thrusting men into all places, that were like to be distressed. So the Consul, having well near spent his victuals, and seeing no hope to prevail at Rhage: brake up his siege, and departed out of Thessaly. He had appointed his Ships of burden to meet him at Anticyra, an Haven Town of Phocis, on the Gulph of Corinth: which Country being friend to the Macedonian, he presently invaded; not so much for hatred unto the people, as because it lay conveniently seated between Thessaly and other regions, wherein he had business, or was shortly like to have. Many Towns in Phocis he won by assault: many were yielded up unto him for fear; and within short space he had (in effect) mastered it all.

In the mean time L. Quintius the Consuls brother, being then Admiral for the Romans in this War, joyned with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleet. They won two Cities in Eubœa; and afterward laid siege unto Cenchree, an Haven and Arcenal of the Corinthians on their Eastern Sea. This enterprise did somewhat help forward the Achæans, in their desire to leave the part of Philip; since it might come to pass, that Corinth it self, e're long time were spent; and that Cenchree, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now very shortly should be rendered unto their Nation, by favour of the Romans.

But there were other motives, inducing the Achæans to preferr the friendship of the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereto they had been long accustomed. For this King had so many ways offended them in time of peace, that thought it best course to rid their hands of him, whilst being intangled in a dangerous War, he wanted means to hinder the execution of such counsel as they should hold the safest. His tyrannous practises to make himself their absolute Lord: his poysoning of Aratus their old Governour: his false dealing with the Messenians, Epirots, and other people their Confederates, and his own dependants: together with many particular outrages by him committed: caused them long since to hold him as a necessary evil, even whilst they were unable to be without his assistance. But since by the vertue of Philopœmen, they were grown somewhat confident in their own strength: so as without the Macedonians help they could as well subsist, as having him to friend: then did they only think how evil he was; and thereupon rejoyce the more, in that he was become no longer necessary. It angred him to perceive how they stood affected: and therefore he sent murderers to take away the life of * Philopœmen. But failing in this enterprise; and being detected, he did thereby only set fire to the Wood, which was throughly dry before, and prepared to burn. Philopœmen wrought so with the Achæans, that no discourse was more familiar with them, than what great cause they had to withdraw themselves from the Macedonian. Cycliadus, a principal man among them: and lately their Prætor, was expelled by them, for shewing himself passionate in the cause of Philip; and Aristænus chosen Prætor, who laboured to joyn them in society with the Romans.

*Plut. in vi. Philopœm. Just. l. 29.

These news were very welcome to T. Quintius. Embassadors were sent from the Romans and their Confederates, King Attalus, the Rhodians and Athenians, to treat with the Achæans making promise, that they should have Corinth restored unto them if they would forſake the Macedonians. A Parliament of the Achæans was held at Sycion, to deliberate and reſolve in this weighty caſe. Therein the Romans and their adherents deſired the Achæans to joyn with them in making War upon Philip. Contrariwiſe the Embaſſadors of Philip, whom he had alſo ſent for his buſineſs, admoniſhing the Achæans of their Alliance with the King, and of their faith due unto him; requeſted them, that they would be contented to remain as Neuters. This moderate requeſt of Philips Embaſſadors did no way advance their Maſters cauſe. Rather it gave the Achæans to underſtand, That he, who could be ſatisfied with ſo little at their hands, knew himſelf unable to gratifie them in any reciprocal demand. Yet were there many in that great Councel, who remembring the benefits of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earneſtly for the preſervation of the ancient League. But in fine, the ſenſe of late injuries, and expectation of like or worſe from him in the future; prevailed againſt the memory of thoſe old good turns, which he (and Antigonus before him) had partly ſold unto them, and partly had uſed as baits, whereby to allure them into abſolute ſubjection. Neither was it perhaps of the leaſt importance; That the Romans were ſtrong, and likely to prevail in the end. So after much altercation, the Decree paſſed, That they ſhould thence-forward renounce, the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this War. With Attalus and the Rhodians they forthwith entred into ſociety; with the Romans (becauſe no League would be of force, until the Senate and people had approved it) they forbore to decree any ſociety at the preſent, until the return of thoſe Embaſſadors from Rome, which they determined to ſend thither of purpoſe. The Megalopolitans, Dymeans, and Argives, having done their beſt for the Macedoneans, as by many reſpects they were bound, roſe up out of the Councel, and departed before the paſſing of the Decree; which they could not reſiſt, nor yet with honeſty thereto give aſſent. For this their good will, and greater, which they ſhortly manifeſted, the Argives had ſo little thanks, that all the reſt of the Achæans may be the better held excuſed, for eſcaping how they might, out of the hands of ſo fell a Prince.

Soon after this, upon a ſolemn day at Argos, the affection of the Citizens diſcovered it ſelf ſo plainly, in the behalf of Philip, that they which were his Partiſans within the Town, made no doubt of putting the City into his hands, if they might have any ſmall aſſiſtance. Philoeles a Lieutenant of the Kings, lay then in Corinth, which he had manfully defended againſt the Romans and Attalus. Him the Conſpirators drew to Argos; whither coming on a ſudden, and finding the multitude ready to joyn with him, he eaſily compelled the Achæan Garriſon to quit the place.

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corinth, aud ſome other Towns, as it helped Philip a little in his reputation, ſo they gave him hope to obtain ſome good end by Treaty, whilſt as yet with his honour he might ſeek it: and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Conſul would ſhortly be choſen; who ſhould take the work out of Titus his hands, if it were not concluded the ſooner. Titus had the like reſpect unto himſelf; and therefore thought it beſt, ſince more could not be done, to pre-diſpoſe things unto a concluſion, for his own reputation; The meeting was appointed to be held upon the Sea-ſhore, in the Bay then called the Malian, or Lamian Bay, now (as is ſuppoſed) the Gulf of Ziton; in the Ægean Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus with Animander the Athamanian; an Embaſſadour of Attalus; the Admiral of Rhodes; and ſome Agents for the Ætolians and Achæans. Philip had with him ſome few of his own Captains, and Cycliadas, lately baniſhed for his ſake out of Achia. He refuſed to come on ſhore: though fearing (as he ſaid) none but the immortal Gods: yet miſdoubting ſome treachery in the Ætolians, The demands of Titus in behalf of the Romans, were, That he ſhould ſet all Cities of Greece at liberty; deliver up to the Romans and their Confederates, all priſoners which he had of theirs, and Renegadoes; likewiſe whatſoever he held of theirs in Illyria: and whatſoever about Greece or Aſia he had gotten from Ptolomy then King of Egypt, after his fathers death Attalus demanded reſtitution to be made, entire of Ships, Towns, and Temples by him taken and ſpoiled in the late War between them. The Rhodians would have again the Country of Perea, lying over againſt their Iſland, as alſo that he ſhould withdraw his garriſons out of divers Towns about the Helleſpont, and other Havens of their friends. The Achæans deſired reſtitution of Argos and Corinth: about the one of which they might, not unjuſtly, quarrel with him: the other had been long his own by their conſent. The Ætolians took upon them angerly, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, even to the whole Country, leaving it free; and withall to deliver up unto them, whatſoever he held that had at any time been theirs. Neither were they herewithall content: but inſolently declaimed againſt him, for that which he had lately done in Theſſaly; corrupting (as they ſaid) the rewards of the Victors, by deſtroying, when he was vanquiſhed, thoſe Towns, which elſe they might have gotten. To anſwer theſe malapert Ætolians, Philip commanded his Gally to be rowed nearer the ſhore. But they began to plie him afreſh: telling him that he muſt obey his betters, unleſs he were able to defend himſelf by force of Arms. He anſwered them (as he was much given to jybing) with ſundry ſcoffs; and eſpecially with one, which made the Roman Conſul underſtand what manner of companions theſe Ætolians were. For he ſaid, That he had often dealt with them; as likewiſe the beſt of the Greeks; deſiring them to abrogate a wicked law, which permitted them to take ſpoil from ſpoil: yet could he get no better an anſwer, than that they would ſooner take Ætolia out of Ætolia. Titus wondred what might be the meaning of this ſtrange Law. So the King told him, That they held it a laudable cuſtome, as often as War happened between their friends, to hold up the quarrel, by ſennding Voluntaries to ſerve on both ſides, that ſhould ſpoil both the one and the other. As for the liberty of Greece, he ſaid it was ſtrange, that the Ætolians ſhould be ſo careful thereof, ſince divers Tribes of their own, which he there named, were indeed no Græcians: wherefore he would fain know, whether the Romans would give him leave to make ſlaves of thoſe Ætolians, which were no Greeks. Titus hereat ſmiled, and was no whit offended, to hear the Ætolians well ratled up; touching whom he began to underſtand, how odious they were in all the Country. As for that general demand of ſetting all Greece at liberty, Philip acknowknowledged, that it might well beſeem that greatneſs of the Romans; though he would alſo conſider, what might beſeem his own dignity. But that the Ætolians, Rhodians, and other petty Eſtates, ſhould thus preſume, under countenance of the Romans, to take upon them, as if by their great might he ſhould be thereunto compelled: it was, he ſaid, a ſtrange and ridiculous inſolence. The Achæans he charged with much ingratiude; reciting againſt them ſome Decrees of their own; wherein they loaded both Antigonus and him, with more than humane honours. Nevertheleſs, he ſaid, that he would rendor Argos unto them: but as touching Corinth, that he would further deliberate with Titus himſelf. Thus he addreſſed himſelf wholly to the Roman General; unto whom if he could give ſatisfaction, he cared little for all the reſt. With Attalus and the Rhodians, his late War (he ſaid) was only defenſive; they having been the offerers: or if he gave them any occaſion, it was only in helping Pruſias, his Son-in-law; neither did he ſee why they ſhould rather ſeek amends at his hands, than he at theirs. For whereas they complained, that ſpoiling a Temple of Venus, he had cut down the Grove, and pleaſant walks thereabouts: what could he do more, than ſend Gardners thither with young Plants, if one King of another would ſtand to ask ſuch recompence? Thus he jeſted the matter out: but offered nevertheleſs, in honour of the Romans, to give back the Region of Peræa to the Rhodians; as likewiſe to Attalus, the Ships and Priſoners of his, whereof he had then poſſeſſion. Thus ended that days conference, becauſe it was late: Philip requeſting a Nights leiſure to think upon the Articles, which were many, and he ill provided of Counſel, wherewith to adviſe about them. For your being ſo ill provided of Counſel (ſaid Titus) you may even thank your ſelf; as having murdered all your Friends, that were wont to adviſe you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, until it was late at night; excuſing his long ſtay by the weightineſs of the things propounded, whereon he could not ſuddenly tell how to reſolve. But it was believed, that he thereby ſought to abridge the Ætolians of leiſure to rail at him. And this was the more likely, for that he deſired conference in private with the Roman General. The ſum of his diſcourſe, as Titus afterward related it, was, That he would give the Achæans both Argos and Corinth; as alſo that he would render unto Attalus and the Rhodians, what he had promiſed the day before; likewiſe to the Ætolians, that he would grant ſome part of their demands; and to the Romans, whatſoever they did challenge. This when Titus his aſſociates heard, they exclaimed againſt it, ſaying, That if the King were ſuffered to retain any thing in Greece, he would ſhortly get poſſeſſion of all which he now rendred up. The noiſe that they made came to Philips ear: who thereupon deſired a third day of meeting; and proteſted, that if he could not perſwade them, he would ſuffer himſelf to be perſwaded by them. So the third day they met early in the morning: at what time the King intreated them all, that they would with ſincere affection hearken unto good offers of Peace; and immediately conclude it, if they could like well of thoſe Conditions which he had already tendred; or otherwiſe, that they would make Truce with him for the preſent, and let him ſend Embaſſadors to Rome, where he would refer himſelf to the courteſie of the Senate.

This was even as Quintius would have it: who ſtood in doubt, leſt a new Conſul might happen to defraud him of the honour which he expected by ending of the War. So he eaſily prevailed with the reſt to aſſent hereunto: foraſmuch as it was Winter, a time unfit for ſervice in the War; and ſince, without authority of the Senate, he ſhould be unable to proceed reſolvedly either in War or Peace. Further, he willed them to ſend their ſeveral Embaſſadors to Rome, which intimating unto the Senate what each of them required, ſhould eaſily hinder Philip from obtaining any thing to their prejudice. Among the reſt, he perſwaded King Aminander to make a Journey to Rome in perſon: knowing well, that the name of a King, together with the confluence of ſo many Embaſſadors, would ſerve to make his own actions more glorious in the City. All this tended to procure that his own command of the Army in Greece might be prorogued. And to the ſame end had he dealt with ſome of the Tribunes of the people at Rome: who had already (though as yet he knew not ſo much) obtained it for him, partly by their authority, partly by good reaſons which they alledged unto the Senate.

The Embaſſadors of the Greeks, when they had audience at Rome, ſpake bitterly againſt the King, with good liking of the Senate; which was more deſirous of Victory than Satisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpoſe of the Romans, in undertaking to ſet Greece at liberty. But this (they ſaid) could never be effected: unleſs eſpecial care were taken, that the King ſhould be diſpoſſeſſed of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. In this point they were ſo vehement, producing a Map of the Country, and making demonſtration how thoſe places held all the reſt in ſervility; that the Senate agreed to have it ſo as they deſired. When therefore the Embaſſadors of Philip were brought in, and began to have made a long Oration; they were briefly cut off in the midſt of their Preface, with this one demand: Whether their Maſter would yield up Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. Hereto they made anſwer, That concerning thoſe places, the King had given them no direction or commiſſion what to ſay or do. This was enough. The Senate would no longer hearken to Philips deſire of Peace: wherein they ſaid he did no better than triſle. Yet might his Embaſſadors have truly ſaid, That neither the Ætolians, Achæans, nor any of their fellows, had in the late Treaty required by name, that Chalcis and Demetrias ſhould be yielded up. For which of them indeed could make any claim to either of theſe Towns? As for Corinth, whereto the Achæans had ſome right; (though their right were no better, than that, having ſtoln it from one Macedonian King in a Night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by bargain unto another) Philip had already condeſcended to give it back unto them. And this perhaps would have been alledged, even againſt the Greeks, in excuſe of the King, by ſome of T. Quintius his Friends; that ſo he might have had honour to conclude the War, if a ſucceſſor had been decreed unto him. But ſince he was appointed to continue General: neither his Friends at Rome, nor he himſelf, after the return of the Embaſſadours into Greece, cared to give ear unto any talk of Peace.

Philip ſeeing that his Achæans had forſaken him, and joyned with their common Enemies, thought even to deal with them in the like manner, by reconciling himſelf unto Nabis, whom they hated moſt moſt. There were not many years paſt, ſince the Lacedæmonians under Cleomenes, with little other help then their own ſtrength, had been almoſt ſtrong enough both for the Macedonians and Achæans together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force conſiſted, in a manner, wholly in his Mercenaries: for he was a Tyrant, though ſtiling himſelf King. Yet he ſorely vexed the Achæans: and therefore ſeemed to Philip, one likely to ſtand him in great ſtead, if he could be won. To this purpoſe it was thought meet, that the Town of Argos, which could not otherwiſe be eaſily defended, ſhould be conſigned over into his hands; in hope, that ſuch a benefit would ſerve to tie him faſt unto the Macedonians. Philocles the Kings Lieutenant, who was appointed to deal with Nabis, added further, That it was his Maſters purpoſe to make a ſtreight alliance with the Lacedæmonian, by giving ſome Daughters of his own in Marriage unto Nabis his Sons. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made ſome ſcruple in accepting the Town of Argos; unleſs by decree of the Citizens themſelves he might be called into it. Hereabout Philocles dealt with the Argives: but found them ſo averſe, that, in open Aſſembly of the People, they deteſted the very name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought he had thereby a good occaſion, to rob and fleece them. So he willed Philocles, without more ado, to make over the Town, which he was ready to receive. Philocles accordingly did let him with his Army into it by Night; and gave him poſſeſſion of the ſtrongeſt places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argives: who for very love had forſaken the Achæans to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant made himſelf maſter of all the Gates. A few of the principal men, underſtanding how things went, fled out of the City at the firſt tumult. Wherefore they were all baniſhed, and their goods confiſcated. The reſt of the chief Citizens that ſtayed behind, were commanded to bring forth, out of hand, all their Gold and Silver. Alſo a great impoſition of money was laid upon all thoſe that were thought able to pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were diſmiſſed without more ado. But if any ſtood long upon the matter: or played the Thieves in purloyning their own Goods: they were put to the whip; and beſides loſs of their wealth, had their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular Laws: namely, ſuch as might ſerve to make him gracious with the raſcal multitude: abrogating all debts, and dividing the lands of the rich among the poor. By ſuch art of oppreſſing the great ones, it hath been an old cuſtom of Tyrants, to aſſure themſelves of the Vulgar for a time.

As ſoon as Nabis had gotten Argos, He ſent the news to T. Quintius and others to joyn with him againſt Philip. Titus was glad of it: ſo as he took the pains to croſs over the Streights into Peloponneſus, there to meet with Nabis. They had ſoon agreed (though King Attalus, who was preſent with the Conſul, made ſome cavil touching Argos) and the Tyrant lent unto the Roman, ſix hundred of his Mercenaries of Crete: as alſo he agreed with the Achæans, upon a Truce for four months, reſerving the final concluſion of Peace between them, until the War of Philip ſhould be ended; which after this continued not long.

SECT. XIV.

The Battle at Cynoſcephalæ, wherein Philip was vanquiſhed by T. Quintius.

Titus Quintius, as ſoon as he underſtood that he was appointed to have command of the Army, without any other limitation of time, than during the will and pleaſure of the Senate; made all things ready for diligent purſuit of the War. The like did Philip: who having failed in his negotiation of Peace, and no leſs failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to be his friend in that War, meant afterwards wholly to rely upon himſelf.

Titus had in his Army about ſix and twenty thouſand: and Philip a proportionable number. But neither of them knew the others ſtrength, or what his Enemy intended to do. Only Titus heard that Philip was in Theſſaly, and thereupon addreſſed himſelf to ſeek him out. They had like to have met unawares, near unto the City of Pheræ: where the vant-currers on both ſides diſcovered each other; and ſent word thereof unto their ſeveral Captains. But neither of them were over-haſty to commit all to hazard upon ſo ſhort warning. The day following each of them ſent out three hundred Horſe, with as many light-armed Foot, to make a better diſcovery. Theſe met, and fought a long while: returning finally back into their ſeveral Camps, with little advantage unto either ſide. The Country about Pheræ was thick ſet with Trees: and otherwiſe full of Gardens and Mud-walls; which made it unproper for the ſervice of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King diſlodged, intending to remove back into Scotuſa, in the Frontier of Macedon; where he might be plentifully ſerved with all neceſſaries. Titus conceived aright his meaning: and therefore purpoſed alſo to march thitherwards; were it only to waſt the Country. There lay between them a great ledge of Hills, which hindered the one from knowing what courſe the other took. Nevertheleſs they encamped not far aſunder, both the firſt and the ſecond night; though neither of them underſtood what was become of the other. The third day was very tempeſtuous; and forced each of them to take up his lodging by chance. Then ſent they forth diſcoverers again, in greater number than before. Theſe meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at firſt the Macedonians had the worſt. But Philip anon ſent in ſuch ſtrong ſupply, that if the reſiſtance of the Ætolians had not been deſperate, the Romans their fellows had been driven back into their Camp. Yet all reſiſtance notwithſtanding, the Macedonians prevailed: ſo that Titus himſelf was fain to bring forth his Legions, that were not a little diſcouraged, by the defeat of all their Horſe, to animate thoſe which were in flight.

Plut. in vit. T. Q. Flam.

It was altogether beſides the Kings purpoſe, to put the fortune of a battle in truſt that day, with ſo much of his Eſtate as might thereupon depend. But the news came to him thick and tumultuouſly, how the Enemies fled, and how the day was his own, if he could uſe an occaſion, the like whereof he ſhould not often find. This cauſed him to alter his purpoſe: inſomuch as he embattelled his men; and climbed up thoſe Hills, which, for that the knops thereon had ſome reſemblance unto Dogs heads, were called, by a word ſignifying as much, Cynoſcephalæ. As ſoon as he was on the Hill-

Hill-top; it did him good to see that they of his own light armature were busie in fight, almost at the very Camp of the Enemies; whom they had repelled so far. He had also liberty to choose his ground, as might serve best his advantage; forasmuch as the Romans were driven from all parts of the Hill. But of this commodity he could make no great use: the roughness of the place among those Dogs heads, as they were called, serving nothing aptly for his Phalanx. Nevertheless he found convenient room, wherein to marshal the one part of his Army: and gave order unto his Captains, to follow with the rest, embattelling them as they might. Whilst he was doing this: He perceived that his Horse-men and light Armature began to shrink; as being fallen upon the Roman Legions, by force whereof they were driven to recoyle. He sets forward to help them: and they no less hastily draw unto him for succour; having the Romans not far behind them.

As the Legions began to climb the Hill; Philip commanded those of his Phalanx to charge their Pikes, and entertain them. Here Titus found an extream difficult piece of work. For this Phalanx being a great square battle of armed Pikes, like in all points to those which are now used in our modern Wars: and being in like manner used, as are ours; was not to be resisted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it self held together undissolved. The Macedonians were embattelled in very close order: so that two of them stood opposite to one of the Romans; as also the Pikes of the first ranks had their points advanced two or three Foot before their fore-man. Wherefore it is no marvel if the Romans gave back: every one of them being troubled (as it were) with ten enemies at once; and not able to come nearer to the next of them, than the length of a dozen Foot, or thereabout. Titus finding this, and not knowing how to remedy it, was greatly troubled: for that the Phalanx bare down all which came in the way. But in the mean while he observed, That they which were appointed by Philip to make his left wing, were not able through the much unevenness of the ground, to put themselves in order: so as either they kept their places on the Hill-tops; or else (which was worse) upon desire either of beholding the pastime, or of seeming to be partakers in the work, ran foolishly along by the side of their fellows, which were occupied in fight.

Of this their disorder he made great and present use. He caused the right wing of his battle to march up the Hill against these ill-ordered Troops: his Elephants leading the way, to increase the terrour. The Macedonians were readier to dispute what should be done in such a case, than well advised what to do; as having no one man appointed to command that part in chief. Indeed if they should have done their best, it could not have served; since the ground whereon they stood, made their Weapons unuseful. For let it be supposed, that Philip having six and twenty thousand in his Army (as he is said to have been equal to the Enemy in number) had four thousand Horse, four thousand Targettiers, and four thousand light-armed: so shall there remain fourteen thousand Pikes: whereof himself had embattelled the one half in a Phalanx; the other half in the left wing, are they whom Quintius is now ready to charge. The Phalanx having usually sixteen in File, must, when it consisted of seven thousand, have well-near four hundred and forty in rank: but four hundred would serve, to make a Front long enough; the other forty or seven and thirty Files might be cut off, and reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore, as Polybius doth, to every man of them three foot of ground: this Front must have occupied twelve hundred Foot, or two hundred and forty paces; that is, very near a quarter of a mile in length. Such a space of open Champian, free from incumberance of Trees, Ditches, Hillocks, or the like impediments, that must of necessity disjoyn this close battle of the Phalanx, was not every where to be found. Here at Cynoscephalæ Philip had so much room, as would only suffice for the one half of his men; the rest were fain to stand still and look about them, being hindred from putting themselves in order, by the roughness of the Dogs-heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindred from coming up unto them; nor found any difficulty in mastering those Enemies, whose Feet were in a manner bound by the discommodity of the place. The very first impression of the Elephants, caused them to give back; and the coming on of the Legions, to betake themselves to flight. A Roman Tribune or Colonel, seeing the Victory on that part assured, left the prosecution of it unto others: and being followed by twenty Ensigns or Maniples, that is, (as they might fall out) by some two thousand men, took in hand a notable piece of work; and mainly helpful to making of the Victory compleat. He considered that Philip, in pursuing the right wing of the Romans, was run on so far, as that himself with his fellows, in mounting the Hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten above the Kings head. Wherefore he turned to the left hand, and making down the Hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell upon it in the Rear. The hindermost ranks of the Phalanx, and all of them indeed, save the first five, were accustomed, when the battels came to joyning, to carry their Pikes upright; and with the whole weight of their bodies, to thrust on their fore-men: and so were they doing at the present. This was another great inconvenience in the Macedonian Phalanx. That it served neither for offence nor defence, except only in Front. For though it were so, that Alexander, when he was to fight with Darius in Mesopotamia, arranged his Phalanx in such order, that all the four sides of it were as so many Fronts looking sundry ways, because he expected that he should be encompassed round: yet is it to be understood, that herein he altered the usual form; as also at the same time he embattelled his men in loose order, that so with ease they might turn their weapons which way need should require. Likewise it is to be considered, That Alexanders men being thus disposed, were fit only to keep their own ground; not being able to follow upon the Enemy, unless their hindmost ranks could have marched backwards. But in this present case of Philip, there was no such provision for resistance. Therefore his men, being otherwise unable to help themselves, threw down their weapons and fled. The King himself that thought until now, that the fortune of the battle was every where alike, and the day his own. But hearing the noise behind him, and turning a little aside with a Troop of Horse, to see how all went; when he beheld his men casting down their weapons, and the Romans at his back on the higher ground; he presently betook himself to flight. Neither staid he afterwards in any place (except only a ſmall while about Tempe, there to collect ſuch as were diſperſed in this overthrow) until he was gotten into his own Kingdom of Macedon.

There died of the Roman Army in this battle, about ſeven hundred: of the Macedonians about eight thouſand were ſlain; and five thouſand taken Priſoners.

SECT. XV.

T. Quintius falleth out with the Ætolians, and grants Truce unto Philip, with conditions upon which the Peace is ratified. Liberty proclaimed unto the Greeks. The Romans quarrel with Antiochus.

THe Ætolians wonderfully vaunted themſelves, and deſired to have it noiſed through all Greece, that the Victory at Cynoſcephalæ was gotten (in a manner) wholly by their valour. They had gotten indeed the moſt of the booty by ſacking the Macedonian Camp, whilſt the Romans were buſied in the chaſe. Titus therefore being offended both at their vain-glory, and at their ravenous condition; purpoſed to teach them better manners, by regarding them as ſlightly, as they thought highly of themſelves. He alſo well perceived, That by uſing them with any extraordinary favour, he ſhould greatly offend the reſt of his confederates in Greece; who deteſted the Ætolians much more vehemently, than ever they had done the Macedonians. But this diſpleaſure brake not forth yet a while.

After the battle, Titus made haſte unto Lariſſa, a City in Theſſaly, which he preſently took. Before his coming, Philip had ſent thither one of his Courtiers to burn all his Letters, and paſſages whatſoever in writing, betwixt him and others: of which many were there kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of ſo much adverſity, he forgot not to provide for the ſafety of his Friends. Yet by thus doing, they of Lariſſa might well perceive, that he gave them as already loſt. Wherefore we find not that they, or any of their Neighbours, did make delay of opening their Gates to Titus. At the ſame time, the Town of Leucas, bordering upon Arcanania, was taken by the Roman Fleet, and very ſoon after, all the Arcanianians, a war-like Nation, and in hatred of the Ætolians ever true to Philip; gave up themſelves unto the Romans, hearing of the Victory at Cynoſcephalæ. The Rhodians were alſo then in hand with the Conqueſt of Perea, a Region of the Continent over againſt the Iſland; whereof they had demanded reſtitution in the late Treaty of Peace. They did herein more manly than any other of the Greeks: foraſmuch as they awaited not the good leiſure of the Romans; but with an Army of their own, and ſome help which they borrowed of the Achæans, and other their Friends, gave battle to Dinocrates the Kings Lieutenant, wherein they had the Victory, and conſequently recovered the whole Province. It angred Philip worſe then all this, that the Dardanians gathered courage out of his affliction, to invade his Kingdom; waſting and ſpoiling, as if all had been abandoned to their diſcretion. This made him gather an Army in all haſte of 6000 Foot, and 500 Horſe: wherewith coming upon them, he drave them, with little or no loſs of his own, and great ſlaughter of theirs, haſtily out of the Kingdom. Which done, he returned to Theſſalonica.

In this one enterpriſe he had ſucceſs anſwerable to his deſire: but ſeeing what bad fortune accompanied his affairs, in all other parts at the ſame time, he thought it wiſdom to yield unto neceſſity; and therefore ſent in all haſte Limnæus and Demoſthenes, with Cycliadas the baniſhed Achæan, in whom he repoſed much confidence, Embaſſadours unto Titus. Theſe had conference a long while in private, with Titus and ſome of his Roman Colonels: by whom they were gently entertained, and in very friendly wiſe diſmiſſed. It ſeems that they had Commiſſion, to refer all unto Titus his diſcretion; as Philip himſelf in few days after did. There was granted unto him a Truce for fifteen days: in which time, the King himſelf might come and ſpeak with the Roman General. In the mean ſeaſon, many ſuſpicious rumours went of Titus, as if he had been corrupted with great rewards from the King, to betray the Greeks his Confederates. Of theſe bruits the Ætolians were chief Authors: who being wont to regard neither friendſhip nor honeſty, where profit led them a wrong way, judged alike of all men elſe. But againſt the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had ſent Letters unto his Aſſociates; willing them to have their Agents ready by a time appointed, at the entrance of Tempe, where the Treaty ſhould be held. There when they were all Aſſembled, they entred into Conſultation before the Kings arrival, what ſhould be moſt expedient for the common benefit of them all, and for every ſtate in particular. The poor King Aminander beſought them all, and eſpecially the Romans, that they would think upon him; and, conſidering his weakneſs, which he confeſſed, make ſuch proviſion, that after the Romans had turned their backs, and were gone home, Philip might not wreak his anger upon him, who was not able to reſiſt. Then ſpake Alexander, one of the Ætolians: who commended Titus, foraſmuch as he had thus aſſembled the Confederates to adviſe upon their own good, and had willed them to deliver their minds freely: added, That in the main of the purpoſe, which he had in hand, he was utterly deceived: for that by making Peace with Philip, he could neither aſſure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greeks of their liberty. There was, he ſaid, none other end to be made of the War, which could agree either with the purpoſe of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the fair promiſes made by Titus himſelf unto the Greeks, than the chaſing of Philip quite out of his Kingdom. And to this effect, he made a long diſcourſe. But Titus anſwered, That this Ætolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleaſure of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the laudable cuſtoms which they generally held: for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to ſeek the utter deſtruction of any King or Nation, at ſuch time as they firſt made War with them, until by ſome rebellion they found it a matter of neceſſity, to take ſuch a rigorous courſe. And hereof he alledged the Carthaginians as a notable example: adding, That Victory, to generous minds, was only an inducement to moderation. As concerning the publick benefit of Greece, it was (he ſaid) expedient, that the Kingdom of Macedon ſhould be greatly weakned, and brought low; not that it ſhould utterly be deſtroyed: foraſmuch as it ſerved as a bar to the Thracians, Gaules, Gaules, and a multitude of other ſalvage Nations which would ſoon over-flow the whole continent of Greece, if this Kingdom were not interpoſed. Wherefore he concluded, that if Philip would yield unto thoſe demands, wherewith he had preſſed him in the former Treaty; then was there no reaſon to deny him Peace. As for the Ætolians, if they thought otherwiſe, it ſhould be at their own pleaſure, to take Counſel apart for themſelves as they thought good. Then began Phaneas, another of the Ætolians, to ſay, that all was come to nothing: for that e're long, Philip would trouble all the Greeks, no leſs than he had done in time before. But Titus interrupted him, and bade him leave his bablings: ſaying, That himſelf would take ſuch order, as that Philip, were he never ſo deſirous, ſhould thenceforth not have it in his power to moleſt the Greeks.

The next day King Philip came thither: whom Titus uſed friendly: and ſuffering him to repoſe himſelf that Night, held a Counſel the day following: wherein the King yielded unto all that had been required at his hands; offering yet further, to ſtand to the good pleaſure of the Senate, if they would have more added to the Conditions. Phaneas the Ætolian, inſulting over him, ſaid, It was to be hoped, that he would then at lengh give up to the Ætolians a many of Towns, (which he there named) bidding him ſpeak whether he would or no. His anſwer was, that they might take them all. But Titus interpoſing himſelf, ſaid, it ſhould be otherwiſe. Theſe were Theſſalonian Towns, and ſhould be all free; one of them only excepted, which not long ago had refuſed to commit it ſelf to the faith of the Romans, and therefore ſhould now be given to the Ætolians. Hereat Phaneas cried out, that it was too great an injury, thus to be defrauded of the Towns that had ſometimes belonged unto their Commonweal. Rather he willed Titus to conſider, that by an ancient Covenant between him and the Romans, all the Towns taken ought to be their own, and the Romans to have nothing ſave the Pillage and Captives. It is true, that there had been ſuch a condition in the former War: but it ceaſed to be of any validity, as ſoon as the Ætolians made Peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gave them to underſtand; asking them whether they thought it reaſonable, that all the Towns in Greece, which had let in the Romans by compoſition, ſhould be delivered into ſubjection of the Ætolians. The reſt of the Confederates were very much delighted with theſe angry paſſages between the Romans and the Ætolians: neither had they great reaſon to fear any hard meaſure; ſince Titus was ſo earneſt in the behalf of thoſe Theſſalians, to give them liberty, though they had ſtood out againſt him, even till very fear made them open their Gates. Wherefore they oppoſed not themſelves; but gave their conſent willingly unto a Truce for four Months.

The chief cauſe that moved Titus to grant Peace ſo readily to the Macedonians, beſides that laudable cuſtom by him before alledged, was, the fame of Antiochus his coming with an Army from Syria, and drawing near toward Europe. He had alſo perhaps yet a greater motive; even the conſideration that his ſucceſſor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the War ſhould happen to be protracted. And he was in the right. For when his Letters, together with Embaſſadors from the Macedonian, and ſundry States of Greece, came unto Rome, new Conſuls were choſen: who (eſpecially the one of them) ſtood very earneſtly againſt the Peace; alledging frivolous matter of their own ſuſpition, in hope to get the honour of concluding the War. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, between the Embaſſadors of Philip, offering to ſtand to whatſoever was demanded; and the Letters of Titus, preſſing them to accept this offer, on the one ſide, and the importunity of the Conſul on the other; who ſaid, that all theſe goodly ſhews were fraudulent, and that the King would rebel, as ſoon as the Army was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senators hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an Aſſembly of the People; by whoſe ſoveraign authority it was concluded, that Peace ſhould be granted to the King. So ten Embaſſadors were ſent from Rome, over into Greece: in which number were they that had been Conſuls before Titus: and it was ordained by their advice, that Titus ſhould go through with the buſineſs of Peace. Theſe would very fain have retained thoſe three important Cities of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias, until the eſtate of Greece were ſomewhat better ſetled. But finally, Titus prevailed ſo, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendred unto the Achæans; and all the other Greek Towns which Philip held, as well in Aſia as in Greece, reſtored unto liberty.

The Conditions of Peace granted unto Philip, were; That before the celebration of the next * Iſthmian Games, He ſhould withdraw his Garriſons out of all the Greek Towns which he held; and confine them over to the Romans: That he ſhould deliver up unto them all Captives that he had of theirs, and all Renegado's. Likewiſe all his Ships of War, reſerving to himſelf only five of the leſſer ſort, and one of extraordinary greatneſs, wherein ſixteen men laboured at every Oar: Further, that he ſhould pay a thouſand Talents, the one half in hand, the other in ten years following, by even portions. Hereto † Livie adds, That he was forbidden to make War out of Macedon, without permiſſion of the Senate. But I find not that he obſerved this Article; or was at any time charged with the breach of it. Four hundred Talents he had already delivered to Titus, together with his younger Son Demetrius, to remain as Hoſtage for his true dealing in this matter of Peace, at ſuch time as he lately ſent his Embaſſadors to Rome: when it was promiſed, that the Money, and his Son, ſhould be reſtored back unto him, if the Senate were not pleaſed with the agreement. Whether this money were reckoned as part of the thouſand Talents, I cannot find: and it ſeemeth otherwiſe, foraſmuch as young Demetrius, who, together with theſe four hundred Talents, was given for Hoſtage, remained ſtill in cuſtody of the Romans, as a part of the bargain which Titus formerly had made. Letters alſo were then ſent by Titus unto Pruſias King of Bithynia: giving him to underſtand, what agreement was made with Philip in behalf of the Greeks; and how the Senate held it reaſonable, that the Ciani, moſt miſerably ſpoiled and oppreſſed by Philip, to gratifie this Bithynian his Son-in-law, ſhould be reſtored to liberty, and permitted to enjoy the ſame benefit of the Romans, which other of their Nation did. What effect theſe Letters wrought, it was not greatly material; ſince the Romans were ſhortly buſied with Antiochus, in ſuch wiſe, that they had not leiſure to examine the conformity of Pruſias to their will.

* Excerpt. è Polyb. Legat. 9.

† Liv. l. 33

All Greece rejoyced at the good bargain which Titus had made with Philip. Only the Ætolians found themselves agrieved that they were utterly neglected: which was to the rest no small part of their contentment. The Bœotians continued to favour the Macedonian; and thereby occasioned much trouble unto themselves. There were some among them well-affected to the Romans: who, seeing how things were like to go, made their complaint unto Titus; saying, that they were no better than lost, for the good will which they had born unto him; unless at this time, when he lay close by them with his Army, their Prætor which was head of the opposite Faction, might be made away. Titus refused to have a hand in the execution, yet nevertheless did animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to have kept themselves undiscovered. But when the murder came out, and somewhat was confessed by those which were put to Torture: the hatred of the people brake out violently against the Romans: in such wise, that howsoever they durst not take Arms against them, yet such of them as they found straggling from their Camp, they murdered in all parts of the Country. This was detested within a while, and many of the dead bodies found. Hereupon Titus requires of the Bœotians, to have the murderers delivered into his hands; and for five hundred Souldiers, which he had lost by them, to have paid unto him five hundred talents. Instead of making any such amends, they paid him with excuses; which he would not take as good satisfaction. He sends Embassadors to the Achæans, and Athenians, informing them what had hapned: and requested them not to take it amiss, though he dealt with these their friends as they had deserved. Herewithal he falls to wasting their Country; and besiegeth two such Towns of theirs, as did seem to be most culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embassadors of the Achæans and Athenians (especially of the Achæans, who offered, if he needed them, to help him in this War; yet besought him rather to grant peace unto the Bœotians) prevailed so far with him, that he was pacified with 30 talents, and the punishments of such as were known offenders.

In like sort, though not so violently, were many States of Greece distracted: some among them rejoycing that they were free from the Macedonian; others greatly doubting, that the Roman would prove a worse neighbour. The Ætolian would have been glad of any Commotion; and therefore published rumours abroad, That it was the purpose of the Romans, to keep in their own hands all those places, wherein Philip lately had his Garrison. Little did they, or the rest of the Greeks, conceive, that this Macedonian War served as an introduction to the War to be made in Asia against King Antiochus; where grew the fruit, that was to be reaped of this and many other victories. Wherefore to stay the progress of bad rumors, when the Isthmian games were held, which in time of peace were never without great assembly of all Greece, caused proclamation to be made by sound of Trumpet to this effect, That the Senate and people of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flaminius the General, having vanquished King Philip and the Macedonians, did will to be at liberty, free from Impositions, free from Garrisons, and living at their own Laws, the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrians, Eubœans, Achæans, of Phthiotis, Magnesians, Thessalians, and Perrhæbians. The suddenness of this Proclamation astonished men: so as though they applauded it with a great shout, yet presently they cryed out to hear it again, as if they durst scarce credit their own ears. The Greeks were Crafts-masters in the Art of giving thanks: which they rendred now to T. Quintius with so great affection, as that they had well-near smothered him, by thronging officiously about him.

This good will of the Greeks, was like to be much more available to the Romans in their War against Antiochus, then could have been the possession of a few Towns, yea, or of all those Provinces, which were named in the Proclamation. Upon confidence hereof, no sooner were the Isthmian games at an end, than Titus, with the Romans that were of his Councel, gave audience to Hagesianax and Lysias, King Antiochus his Embassadors: whom they willed to signifie unto their Lord, That he should do well to abstain from the Cities in Asia, and not vex them with War: as also to restore whatsoever he had occupied, belonging to the Kings, Ptolomy of Philip. Moreover they willed him by these his Embassadors, that he should not pass over his Army into Europe; adding, That some of them would visit him in person e're it were long, to talk with him further concerning these points. This done, they fell to accomplishing their promises unto the Greeks; to the rest they gave what they had promised. But the Phocians and Locrians they gave unto the Ætolians; whom they thought it no wisdom to offend overmuch, being shortly to take a greater work in hand. The Achæans of Phthiotis, the same which had been abandoned by T. Quintius to the Ætolians in the last Treaty with Philip. The Ætolians contended very earnestly about Pharsalus and Leucas. But they were put off with a dilatory answer, and rejected unto the Senate: for howsoever somewhat the Councel might favour them, yet was it not meet that they should have their wills, as it were in despight of Titus. So the Achæans were restored Corinth, Triphylia, and Herea. So the Corinthians were made free indeed, (though the Romans yet a while kept the Acrocorinthus) for that all which were partakers of the Achæan Commonwealth, enjoyed their liberty in as absolute manner as they could desire. To Pleuratus the Illyrian were given one or two places, taken by the Romans from Philip: and upon Aminander were bestowed those Castles, which he had gotten from Philip during this War; to reign in them, and the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Athamanians. The Rhodians had been their own Carvers. Attalus was dead a little before the Victory; and therefore lost his share. Yet many that were with Titus in Councel, would have given the Towns of Oreum and Eretria, in the Isle of Eubœa, to his son and successor King Eumenes. But finally it was concluded, that these as well as the rest of the Eubœans, should be suffered to enjoy their liberty. Orestes, a little Province of the Kingdom of Macedon, bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, yet yielded unto the Romans long e're this, and since continued true to them: for which cause it was also set at liberty, and made it a free estate by it self.

These businesses being dispatcht, it remained, that all care should be used, not how to avoid the War with King Antiochus, but how accomplish it with most ease and prosperity. Wherefore fore Embassadors were sent, both to Antiochus himself, to pick matter of quarrel; and about unto others, to pre-dispose them unto the assisting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of War against this King; the Romans now had, or shortly after found: as also how their Embassadors and Agents dealt and sped abroad, I refer unto another place.

CHAP. V.

The Wars of the Romans with Antiochus the Great, and his Adherents.

SECT. I.

What Kings of the races of Seleucus and Ptolomy reigned in Asia and Egypt before Antiochus the Great.

SEleucus Nicanor, the first of his race, King of Asia and Syria, died in the end of the hundred twenty and fourth Olympiad. He was treacherously slain by Ptolomy Ceraunus, at an Altar called Argos, having (as is said) been warned before by an Oracle, to beware of Argos, as the fatal place of his death. But I never read that any mans life hath been preserved, or any mischance avoided by the predictions of such Divellish Oracles. Rather I believe, that many such predictions of the Heathen gods, have been ante-dated by their Priests; or by others, which devised them after the event.

Antiochus Soter, the son and heir of this Seleucus, was dearly beloved of his father, who surrendred unto him his own wife Stratonica, when he understood how much the young Prince was enamoured on her: Wherefore Ptolomy Ceraunus had great cause to fear, that the death of Seleucus would not be unrevenged by this his Successor: But Antiochus was contented to be pacified, either with gifts, or perhaps only with fair words, containing himself within Asia; and he had purchased in Europe, with the blood of Seleucus. It is said of this Antiochus, that although he married with the Queen Stratonica in his fathers life, yet out of modesty he forbore to embrace her, till his father was dead. So that perhaps his incestuous love was partly, if not chiefly, that cause of his not prosecuting that revenge, whereunto Nature should have urged him. Afterwards he had Wars with Antigonus Gonatus, and with Nicomedes King of Bithynia. Also Lutarius and Leonorius Kings or Captains of the Gauls, were set upon him by the same Nicomedes. With these he fought a great battle: wherein, though otherwise the enemies had all advantages against him, yet by the terrour of his Elephants, which affrighted both their horses and them, he won the victory. He took in hand an enterprise against Ptolomy Philadelphus: but finding ill success in the beginning, he soon gave it over. To this King Antiochus Soter it was, that Berosus the Chaldean dedicated his History of Assyria; the same which hath since been excellently falsified by the Friar Annius. He left behind him one son, called Antiochus Theos; and one daughter, called Apame, that was married unto the King of Cyrene. So he died about the end of the hundred twenty and ninth Olympiad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following, in the fiftieth or one and fiftieth year of the Kingdom of the Greeks, when he had reigned nineteen years.

Genebrard. l. 2. Just. Mart. in Paran.

Antiochus, surnamed Theos, or the god, had this vain and impious title given to him by flattery of the Milesians; whom he delivered from Timarchus, a Tyrant that oppressed them. He held long and difficult, but fruitless War with Ptolomy Philadelphus King of Egypt; which finally he compounded, by taking to wife Berenice the daughter of Ptolomy.

Of these two Kings, and of this Lady Berenice, S. Hierom and other interpreters have understood that Prophecy of Daniel: The Kings daughter of the South shall come to the King of the North to make an agreement; and that which followeth. Dan. 11.5.

Ptolomy Philadelphus was a great lover of Peace and Learning; and (setting apart his incestuous marriage with his own Sister Arsinoe) a very excellent Prince: howsoever, the worthiest of all that race. It was he that built, and furnished with Books the famous Library of Alexandria: which to adorn and to honour the more, he sent unto Eleazar, then high Priest of the Jews; for the Books of Moses and other Scriptures. The benefits of this King unto the Jews had formerly been very great; for he had set at liberty as many of them, as his father held in slavery throughout all Ægypt; and he had sent unto the * Temple of God in Jerusalem very rich Presents. Wherefore Eleazar, yielding unto the Kings desire, presented him with an Hebrew copy: which Ptolomy caused to be translated into Greek, by seventy two of the most grave and learned persons that could be found among all the Tribes. In this number of the 72. Interpreters, or (as they are commonly called) the Seventy, Jesus the son of Syrach, is thought by Genebrard to have been one; who that he lived in this Age, it seems to me very sufficiently proved by Jansenius, in his Preface unto Ecclesiasticus. The whole passage of this business between Philadelphus and the high Priest, was written (as [2] Josephus affirms) by Aristæus that was employed therein. Forty years Ptolomy Philadelphus was King; reckoning the time wherein he joyntly reigned with his father. He was exceedingly beloved of his people; and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towards his end he grew more voluptuous, than

(a) Jos. ant. l. 12. cap. 2. Concerning that Book which goes under the name of Aristæus; many learned men, and among the rest Lodovicus Vivis, hold suspicion that it is counterfeit, and the invention of some late Author. Surely if it were to be suspected in the time of Vivis; it may be now much more justly suspected: since a new Edition of it is come forth, purged from faults (as the Papists term those Books, wherein they have changed what they please) and set forth by Middendorpius at Colen. An. Dom. 1578.

he had been in his former years: in which time he boasted that he alone had found out the way how to live for ever. If this had been referred unto his honourable deeds, it might have stood with reason: otherwise the Gout, with which he was often troubled, was enough to teach him his own errour. He was the first of the Kings derived from Alexanders Successors, that entred into League with the Romans: as also his offspring was the last among those Royal Families, which by them was rooted up.

Antiochus Theos had another wife called Laodice, at such time as he married with Berenice the daughter of this Ptolomy. After his second marriage, he used his first wife with no better regard, then if she had been the Concubine. Laodice hated him for this: yet adventured not to seek revenge, until her own son Seleucus Callinicus was of ability to be King. This was two or three years after the death of Ptolomy Philadelphus: at what time she poysoned her husband Theos, and, by permission of Seleucus her son, murdered Berenice, together with a son that she had born to Antiochus.

Just. l. 27. Justine reports, that Berenice saved her self, together with the young Prince her child, a while in the Sanctuary at Daphne: and that not only some Cities of Asia prepared to succour her, but her brother Ptolomy Euergetes King of Ægypt, came to rescue her with an Army; though too late, for she was slain before.

With such cruelties Seleucus Callinicus, succeeding unto his Father, that had fifteen years been King, began his reign. His subjects were highly offended at his wicked nature; which they discovered in his first entrance. Wherefore it was like, that his Estate would have been much endangered, if Ptolomy Euergetes, who came against him, had not been drawn back unto his own Countrey, by some commotions there in hand. For there were none that would bear armes against Ptolomy, in defence of their own King: but rather they sided with the Ægyptian: who took Laodice the Kings mother, and rewarded her with death as she had well deserved. Wherefore Seleucus, being freed from this invasion, by occasion of those domestical troubles which recalled Euergetes home into Egypt: went about a dangerous piece of work, even to make War upon his own subjects, because of their bad affection towards him; when it had been much better, by well deserving, to have changed their hatred into love. A great Fleet he prepared: in furnishing and manning whereof he was at such charges, that he scarce left himself any other hope, if that should miscarry. Herein he embarqued himself, and putting to Sea, did meet with such a tempest, as devoured all save himself, and a very few of his friends that hardly escaped. This calamity, having left him nothing else in a manner than his naked body, turned nevertheless to his great good; as anon after it seemed. For when his subjects understood in what sort the gods (as they conceived it) had punished him for his offences: they had commiseration of his Estate; and, presuming that he would henceforth become a new man, offered unto him their service with great alacrity. This revived him, and filled him such a spirit; as thinking himself well enough able to deal with the Ægyptian, he made ready a mighty Army for that purpose. But his fortune was no better at Land, than it had been at Sea. He was vanquished by Ptolomy in a great battle: whence he escaped hardly; no better attended, than after his late Shipwrack. Hasting therefore back to Antioch, and fearing that the enemy would soon be at his heels; He wrote unto his brother Antiochus Hierax who lay then in Asia, praying him to bring succour with all speed; and promising, in recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Asia. Antiochus was then but fourteen years old, but extreamly ambitious; and therefore glad of such an occasion to make himself great, He levied a mighty Army of the Gaules; wherewith he set forward to help his brother, or rather to get what he could for himself. Hereof Ptolomy being advertised: and having no desire to put himself in danger more then he needed; took Truce with Seleucus for ten years. No sooner was Seleucus freed from this care of the Ægyptian War, but his brother Antiochus came upon him, and needs would fight with him, as knowing himself to have the better Army. So Seleucus was vanquished again; and saved himself with so few about him, that he was verily supposed to have perished in the battle. Thus did Gods Justice take revenge of those murderers by which the Crown was purchased; and setled (as might have been thought) on the head of this bloody King. Antiochus was very glad to hear of his brothers death, as if thereby he had purchased his hearts desire. But the Gaules, his Mercenaries, were gladder then he, For when he led them against Eumenes King of Pergamus, being in hope to get honour by making a Conquest in the beginning of his Reign: these perfidious Barbarians took counsel against him, and devised how to strip him of all that he had. They thought it very likely, that if there were none of the Royal house to make head against them; it would be in their power, to do what should be best pleasing to themselves, in the lower Asia. Wherefore they laid hands on Antiochus; and enforced him to ransom himself with money, as if he had been their lawful Prisoner. Neither were they so contented: but made him enter into such composition with them, as tended but little to his honour. In the mean while Seleucus had gathered a new Army: and prepared once more to try his fortune against his brother. Eumenes hearing of this, thought the season fit for himself, to make his profit of their discord. Antiochus fought with him, and was beaten: which is no great marvail, since he had reason to stand in no less fear of the Gaules, his own Souldiers, than of the enemy with whom he had to deal. After this, Eumenes won much in Asia; whilst Antiochus went against his brother. In the second battle, fought between the brethren, Seleucus had the upper hand: and Antiochus Hieraz (or Hawk) which surname was given him, because he sought his prey upon every one, without care (whether he were provoked or not) soared away as far as he could, both from his brother, and from his own Gaules. Having fetcht a great compass through the Mesopotamia and Armenia, He fell at length in Cappadocia; where his father-in-law King Artamenes took him up. He was entertained very lovingly in outward shew; but with a meaning to betray him. This he soon perceived: and therefore betook him to his wings again; though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length he resolved to bestow himself upon Ptolomy; his own conscience telling him, what evil he meant unto Seleucus his brother; and therefore what little good he was reciprocally to expect at his hands. Infidelity can find find no ſure harbour. Ptolomy well underſtood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hierax. Wherefore he laid him up in cloſe priſon: whence though by means of an Harlot, he got out; yet flying from his Keepers, he fell into the hands of Thieves, by whom he was murthered. Near about the ſame time died Seleucus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled againſt him, during his Wars with his Brother. He therefore made a Journey againſt Arſaces founder of the Parthian Kingdom: wherein his evil fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered ſo cloſely to him, that he was taken priſoner. Arſaces dealt friendly with him, and diſmiſſed him, having every way given him royal entertainment: but in returning home, he brake his Neck by a fall from his Horſe, and ſo ended his unhappy reign of twenty years. He had to wife Laodice the ſiſter of Andromachus, one of his moſt truſty Captains: which was Father unto that Achæus, who making his advantage of this affinity, became ſhortly after (as he ſtiled himſelf) a King; though rather indeed, a great troubler of the world in thoſe parts. By Laodice he had two Sons; Seleucus the third, ſurnamed Ceraunus; and Antiochus the third, called afterwards the Great.

Seleucus Ceraunus reigned only 3 years: in which time he made War upon Attalus the firſt, that was King of Pergamus. Being weak of body through ſickneſs, and in want of money, he could not keep his men of War in good order: and finally he was ſlain by Treaſon of Nicanor and Apaturius a Gaul. His death was revenged by Achæus, who ſlew the Traitors: and took charge of the Army: which he ruled very wiſely, and faithfully a while; Antiochus the Brother of Seleucus being a Child.

SECT. II.

The beginning of the Great Antiochus his Reign. Of Ptolomy Euergetes, and Philopater, Kings of Egypt. War between Antiochus and Philopater. The rebellion of Molo: an expedition of Antiochus againſt him. The re-continuance of Antiochus his Egyptian War: with the paſſages between the two Kings: the Victory of Ptolomy, and Peace concluded. Of Achæus, and his Rebellion; his greatneſs, and his fall. Antiochus his expedition againſt the Parthians, Bactrians, and Indians. Somewhat of the Kings Reigning in India, after the death of the Great Alexander.

ANtiochus was ſcarcely fifteen years old, when he began his Reign, which laſted ſix and thirty years. In his minority he was wholly governed by one Hermias, an ambitious man, and one which maligned all vertue, that he found in any of the Kings faithful Servants. This vile quality in a Counſellor of ſuch great place, how harmful it was unto his Lord; and finally unto himſelf; the ſucceſs of things will ſhortly diſcover.

Soon after the beginning of Antiochus his Reign, Ptolomy Euergetes King of Egypt died, and left his heir Ptolomy Philopater, a young Boy likewiſe, as hath elſewhere been remembred. This was that Energetes, who relieved Aratus and the Achæans: who afterwards took part with Cleomenes: and lovingly entertained him, when he was chaſed out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatus. He annexed unto his Dominion the Kingdom of Cyrene, by taking to wife Bernice, the Daughter of King Magas. He was the third of the Ptolomies; and the laſt good King of that good race. The name of Euergetes, or the doer of good, was given to him by the Egyptians; not ſo much for the great ſpoils which he brought home, after his Victories in Syria; as for that he recovered ſome of thoſe Images or Idols, which Cambyſes, when he conquered Egypt, had carried into Perſia. He was ready to have made War upon the Jews, for that Onias their high Prieſt, out of meer covetouſneſs of money, refuſed to pay unto him his yearly tribute of 20 Talents: but he was pacified by the wiſdom of Joſephus a Jew, to whom afterwards he let in Farm the Tributes and Cuſtoms that belonged unto him in thoſe parts of Syria which he held. For Cæloſyria, with Paleſtina, and all thoſe parts of the Country that lay neareſt unto Egypt, were held by the Egyptian; either as having fallen to the ſhare of Ptolomy the firſt, at ſuch time as the great Antigonus was vanquiſhed and ſlain in the battle at Ipſus; or as being won by this Euergetes, in the troubleſome and unhappy reign of Seleucus Callinicus. The Victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that laſted for many ſucceeding Ages between the Ptolomies and the Seleucidæ; were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecy before cited, which is expounded by S. Hierome. Thus Ptolomy Euergetes reigned ſix and twenty years, and died towards the end of the hundred thirty and ninth Olympiad. It may ſeem by that which we find in the Prologue unto Jeſus the Son of Syrach his book, that he ſhould have reigned a much longer time. For Siracides there ſaith, that he came into Egypt in the eight and thirtieth year, when Euergetes was King. It may therefore be, That either this King reigned long together with his Father: or that thoſe eight and thirty years, were the years of Jeſus his own age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Jews did other whiles reckon) from ſome notable accident that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Euergetes, Hermias the Counſellor, and in a manner the Protector of King Antiochus, incited his Lord unto War againſt the Egyptians, for the recovery of Cæloſyria, and the Countries adjoyning. This Counſel was very unſeaſonably given, when Molo, the Kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out in Rebellion, and ſought to make himſelf abſolute Lord of that rich Country. Nevertheleſs Hermias, being more froward than wiſe, maintained ſtiffly, that it was moſt expedient and agreeable with the Kings honour, to ſend forth againſt a rebellious Captain, other Captains that were faithful; whilſt he in perſon made War upon one that was like himſelf, a King. No man durſt gain-ſay the reſolution of Hermias, who therefore ſent Xenætas an Achæan, with ſuch Forces as he thought expedient, againſt the Rebel; whilſt in the mean ſeaſon an Army was preparing for the Kings expedition into Cæloſyria. The King having marched from Apamea to Laodicea, and ſo over the Deſarts into the Valley of Maſſias, between the Mountains of Libanus and Anti-libanus, found his way there ſtopped by Theodotus an Ætolian, that ſerved under Ptolomy. So he conſumed the time there a while to none effect: and then came news, that Xenætas, his Captain, was deſtroyed with his whole Army; and and Molo thereby become Lord of all the Countrey, as far as unto Babylon.

Xenætas, whilſt he was yet on his Journey, and drew near to the River of Tygris, received many advertiſements, by ſuch as fled over unto him from the Enemy, That the followers of Molo were, for the moſt part, againſt their wills drawn by their Commander to bear Arms againſt their King. This report was not altogether falſe; but Molo himſelf ſtood in ſome doubt leſt his followers would leave him in time of neceſſity. Xenætas therefore making ſhew, as if he had prepared to paſs the River by Boats in face of his Enemy; left in the night time ſuch as he thought meet to defend his Camp: and with all the flower of his Army went over Tygris, in a place ten miles lower than Molo his Camp. Molo heard of this, and ſent forth his Horſe to give impediment: but hearing that Xenætas could not be ſo ſtopped, He himſelf diſlodged, and took his Journey towards Media; leaving all his baggage behind him in his Camp. Whether he did this, as diſtruſting the faith of his own Souldiers; or whether thereby to deceive his Enemy: the great folly of Xenætas made his ſtratagem proſperous. For Xenætas, having born himſelf proudly before, upon the countenance of Hermias, by whom he was advanced unto this charge; did now preſume that all ſhould give way to his authority, without putting him to much trouble of uſing the Sword. Wherefore he ſuffered his men to feaſt with the proviſions which they found ready in the forſaken Camp: or rather he commanded them ſo to do, by making Proclamation, That they ſhould cheriſh up themſelves againſt the Journey, which he intended to take the next day, in purſuit of the Rebels that fled. And to the ſame purpoſe he buſied himſelf, in tranſporting the remainder of his Army, which he had left on the other ſide of Tygris. But Molo went no further that day, than he could eaſily return the ſame night. Wherefore underſtanding what good rule the Kings men kept: he made ſuch haſte back unto them, that he came upon them early in the morning; whilſt they were yet heavy with the Wine, and other good cheer that they had ſpent at Supper. So Xenætas and a very few with him, died fighting in defence of the Camp: the reſt were ſlaughtered without making reſiſtance; and many of them e're they were perfectly awake. Likewiſe the Camp on the other ſide of Tygris, was eaſily taken by Molo: the Captains flying thence, to ſave their own lives. In the heat of this Victory, the Rebel marched unto Seleucia, which he preſently took: and, maſtering within a little while the Province of Babylonia, and all the Countrey down to the red Sea, or Bay of Perſia, he haſted unto Suſa; where at his firſt coming, he won the City: but failing to take the Caſtle, that was exceeding ſtrong, returned back to Seleucia, there to give order concerning this buſineſs.

The report of theſe things coming to Antiochus, whilſt he lay (as is ſaid before) in the Vale of Mapſyas; filled him with great ſorrow, and his Camp with trouble. He took Counſel what to do in this needful caſe: and was well adviſed by Epigenes, the beſt man of War he had about him, to let alone this enterpriſe of Cœloſyria; and bend his Forces thither, where more need required them. This Counſel was put in execution with all convenient haſte. Yet was Epigenes diſmiſſed by the way, and ſoon after ſlain, by the practice of Hermias: who could not endure to hear good Counſel given, contrary to his own good liking and allowance. In the Journey againſt Molo, the name and preſence of the King was more available, than any odds which he had of the Rebel in ſtrength. Molo diſtruſted his own followers: and thought, that neither his late good ſucceſs, nor any other conſideration, would ſerve to hold them from returning to the Kings obedience, if once they beheld his perſon. Wherefore he thought it ſafeſt for him to aſſail the Kings Camp in the night time. But going in hand with this, He was diſcovered by ſome that fled over from him to the King. This cauſed him to return back to his Camp: which by ſome errour, took alarm at his return: and was hardly quieted, when Antiochus appeared in ſight. The King was thus forward in giving battle to Molo, upon confidence which he had that many would revolt unto him. Neither was he deceived in this his belief. For not a few Men or Enſigns: but all the left wing of the Enemy, which was oppoſite unto the King, changed ſide forthwith as ſoon as ever they had ſight of the Kings perſon; and were ready to do him ſervice againſt Molo. This was enough to have won the Victory: but Molo ſhortned the work, by killing himſelf; as did alſo divers of his Friends, who for fear of torments, prevented the Hang-man with their own Swords.

After this Victory, came joyful news, that the Queen Laodice, Daughter of Mithridates King of Pontus, which was married unto Antiochus a while before, had brought forth a Son. Fortune ſeemed bountiful unto the King: and therefore he purpoſed to make what uſe he could of her friendly diſpoſition while it laſted. But now in the Eaſtern part of his Kingdom, He judged it convenient to viſit his Frontiers, were it only to terrifie the Barbarians, that bordered upon him. Hereunto his Counſellor Hermias gave aſſent: not ſo much reſpecting the Kings honour, as conſidering what good might thereby happen to himſelf. For if it ſhould come to paſs, that the King was taken out of the World by any caſualty: then made he no doubt of becoming Protector to the young Prince; and thereby of lengthning his own Government. Antiochus therefore went againſt Artabanes, who reigned among the Atropatians; having the greateſt part of his Kingdom ſcituate between the Caſpian and Euxine Sea. This barbarous King was very old and fearful; and therefore yielded unto whatſoever conditions it pleaſed Antiochus to lay upon him So in this Journey Antiochus got honour, ſuch as well contented him; and then returned homewards. Upon the way, a Phyſitian of his brake with him as concerning Hermias; informing him truly how odious he was to the People; and how dangerous he would be ſhortly unto the Kings own life. Antiochus belived this, as having long ſuſpected the ſame Hermias; but not daring for fear of him to utter his ſuſpitions. It was therefore agreed, that he ſhould be made away on the ſudden: which was done, he being trained forth by a ſleight, a good way out of the Camp, and there killed without warning or diſputation. The King needed not to have uſed ſo much art in ridding his hands of a man ſo much deteſted. For howſoever he ſeemed gracious whilſt he was alive: yet they that for fear had been moſt obſequious to him, whilſt he was in caſe to do them hurt, was ready as the foremoſt, to ſpeak of him as he had deſerved, when once they were ſecure of him: yea, his Wife and Children, lying then at Apamea, were ſtoned to death by the Wives and Children dren of the Citizens; whose indignation brake forth the more outragiously, the longer that it had been concealed.

About these times, Achæus (of whom we spake before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to perish in some of these expeditions which he took in hand; was bold to set a Diadem upon his own head, and take upon him as a King. His purpose was to have invaded Syria: but the fame of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, made him quit the enterprise; and study to set some handsome colour on his former presumption. It is very strange, that Antiochus neither went against Achæus; nor yet dissembled the notice which he had taken of these his traiterous purposes: but wrote unto him, signifying that he knew all, and upbraiding him with such infidelity, as any offender might know to be unpardonable. By these means he emboldned the Traitor: who being already detected, might better hope to maintain his former actions by strong hand, than to excuse them, or get pardon by submission. Antiochus had at that time a vehement desire to recover Cœlosyria, or what else he could, of the Dominions of Ptolomy Philopater in those parts. He began with Seleucia, a very strong City near to the mouth of the River Orontes; which e're long he won, partly by force, partly by corrupting with bribes the Captains that lay therein. This was that Seleucia, whereto Antigonus the Great, who founded it, gave the name of Antigonia: but Seleucus getting it shortly after, called it Seleucia; and Ptolomy Euergetes having lately won it, might, if it had so pleased him, have changed the name into Ptolomais. Such is the vanity of men, that hope to purchase an endless memorial unto their names, by works proceeding rather from their greatness, than from their vertue; which therefore no longer are their own, than the same greatness hath continuance. Theodotus the Ætolian, he that before had opposed himself to Antiochus, and defended Cœlosyria in the behalf of Ptolomy; was now grown sorry, that he had used so much faith and diligence, in service of an unthankful and luxurious Prince. Wherefore as a Mercenary, he began to have regard to his own profit: which thinking to find greater, by applying himself unto him that was (questionless) the more worthy of these two Kings; he offered to deliver up unto Antiochus, the Cities of Tyrus and Ptolomais. Whilst he was devising about this Treason, and had already sent messengers to King Antiochus, his practice was detected, and he belieged in Ptolomais, by one of Ptolomies Captains, that was more faithful than himself. But Antiochus hasting to his rescue, vanquished this Captain who met him on the way: and afterwards got possession, not only of Tyrus and Ptolomais, with a good Fleet of the Egyptian Kings that was in those Havens: but of so many other Towns in that Country, as emboldned him to think upon making a Journey into Egypt it self. Agathocles and Sosibius bore all the sway in Egypt at that time: Ptolomy himself being loath to have his pleasures interrupted, with business of so small importance, as the safety of his Kingdom. Wherefore these two agreed together, to make provision as hastily, and yet as secretly as might be for the War: and nevertheless at the same time, to press Antiochus with daily Embassadors to some good agreement. There came in the heat of this business, Embassadors from Rhodes, Byzantium, and Cyzicus, as likewise from the Ætolians; according to the usual courtesie of the Greeks, desiring to take up the quarrel.

These were all entertained in Memphis, by Agathocles and Sosibius: who intreated to deal effectually with Antiochus. But whilst this Treaty lasted, great preparations were made at Alexandria for the War: wherein these two Counsellors perswaded themselves reasonably, that the Victory would be their own; if they could get, for money, a sufficient number of Greeks to take their parts. Antiochus heard only what was done at Memphis, and how desirous the Governours of Egypt were to be at quiet: whereunto he gave the readier belief, not only for that he knew the disposition of Ptolomy, but because the Rhodians, and other Embassadors, coming from Memphis, discoursed unto him all after one manner; as being all deceived by the cunning of Agathocles and his fellow: Antiochus therefore having wearied himself at the long siege of a Town called Dura, which he could not win: and being desirous to refresh himself and his Army in Seleucia, during the Winter which then came on, granted to the Egyptian a Truce for four months, with promise that he would be ready to hearken to equal Conditions, when they should be offered. It was not his meaning to be so courteous, as he would fain have seemed, but only to lull his Enemies asleep, whilst he took time to refresh himself; and to bring Achæus to some good order, whose Treason daily grew more open and violent. The same negligence which he thought the Egyptian would have used, he used himself, as presuming, that when time of the year better served, little force would be needful; for that the Towns would voluntarily yield unto him, since Ptolomy provided not for their defence. Nevertheless, he gave Audience to the Embassadors, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Egypt: pleasing himself well, to dispute about the justice of his quarrel which he purposed shortly to make good by the Sword, whether it were just or no. He said, that it was agreed between Seleucus his Ancestor, and Ptolomy the Son of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could win it from Antigonus, should be given in possession to Seleucus: and that this bargain was afterward ratified, by general consent of the Confederates, after the battle at Ipsus. But Ptolomies men would acknowledge no such bargain. They said that Ptolomy the Son of Lagi, had won Cœlosyria, and the Provinces adjoyning for himself: as also that he had sufficiently gratified Seleucus, by lending him Forces to recover his Province of Babylon, and the Countries about the River of Euphrates. Thus whilst neither of them greatly cared for Peace; they were in the end of their disputation, as far from concluding, as at the beginning. Ptolomy demanded restitution; Antiochus thought, that he had not as yet got ten all that was his own: Also Ptolomy would needs have Achæus comprehended in the League between them, as one of their Confederates; But Antiochus would not endure to hear of this, exclaiming against it as a shameful thing, that one King should offer to deal so with another, as to take his Rebel into protection, and seek to joyn him in Confederacy with his own Soveraign Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field again: contrary to his expectation, he was informed, That Ptolomy, with a very puissant Army, was coming up against him out of Egypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemy, he was encountred on the way by these Captains of Ptolomy, that had reſiſted him the year before. They held againſt him the paſſages of Libanus, whence nevertheleſs he drave them: and proceeding onwards in his journey, won ſo many places, that he greatly encreaſed his reputation; and thereby drew the Arabians, with divers of the bordering people, to become his followers. As the two Kings drew near together: many Captains of Ptolomy forſook his pay, and fled over to Antiochus. This notwithſtanding, the Ægyptian had the courage to meet his enemy in the field. The battle was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Ægyptians, or the Aſiatiques were the better Souldiers, (for that the ſtrength of both Armies conſiſted in Mercenaries, chiefly of the Greeks, Thracians, and Gauls;) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolomy, with Arſinoe his Siſter and Wife, rode up and down encouraging his men; the like did Antiochus on the other ſide: each of them rehearſing the brave deeds of his Anceſtors, as not having of their own, whereby to value themſelves. Antiochus had the more Elephants: as alſo his being of Aſia, had they been fewer, would have beaten thoſe of Africk. Wherefore by the advantage of thoſe beaſts, He drave the Enemies before him, in that part of the battle wherein he fought himſelf. But Ptolomy had the better men by whoſe valour he brake the Groſs of his enemies battle, and won the victory: whilſt Antiochus was heedleſly following upon thoſe, whom he had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the field above ſeventy thouſand foot, and ſix thouſand horſe; whereof though he loſt ſcarce ten thouſand foot, and not four hundred horſe; yet the fame of his overthrow took from him all thoſe places which he had lately won. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch: He began to ſtand in fear, leſt Ptolomy and Achæus, ſetting upon him both at once, ſhould put him in danger of his whole Eſtate. This cauſed him to ſend Embaſſadors to the Egyptian, to treat of peace; which was readily granted; it being much againſt the nature of Ptolomy to vex himſelf thus with the tedious buſineſs of War. So Ptolomy having ſtaïd three months in Syria, returned home into Egypt, clad with the reputation of a Conqueror; to the great admiration of his ſubjects, and all thoſe that were acquainted with his voluptuous and ſlothful condition.

Achæus was not compriſed in the league between theſe two Kings: or if he had been included therein; yet would not the Egyptian have taken the pains, of making a ſecond expedition for his ſake. The beſt was, that he thought himſelf ſtrong enough, if fortune were not too much againſt him to deal with Antiochus. Neither was he confident without great reaſon: for beſides his many victories, whereby he had gotten all that belonged unto Antiochus on this ſide of Taurus; he had alſo good ſucceſs againſt Attalus King of Pergamus: that was an able man of War, and commanded a ſtrong Army. Neither was he, as Molo the Rebel had been, one of mean regard otherwiſe, and carried beyond himſelf by apprehending the advantage of ſome opportunity: but Couſin-german to the King, as hath been ſhewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a younger daughter of the ſame Mithridates King of Pontus, which was alſo called Laodice, as was her Siſter the Queen, Antiochus his wife. Theſe things had added Majeſty unto him, and had made his followers greatly to reſpect him, even as one to whom a Kingdom was belonging. Neither made it a little for him, that Ptolomy of Ægypt held him in the nature of a friend: and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquiſhed in the battle at Raphia: and had thereby loſt all his gettings in Syria. But all theſe hopes and likelihoods came to nothing: for the King of Pontus, if he would meddle in that quarrel between ſons-in-law, had no reaſon to take part againſt the more honourable. As for the Egyptian, he was not only ſlothful, but hindred by a rebellion of his own ſubjects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of Egypt, of whom Ptolomy, contrary to the manner of his progenitors, had armed a great number to ſerve in the late expedition; began to entertain a good opinion of their own valour, thinking it not inferiour to the Macedonian. Hereupon they refuſed to ſuffer as much as formerly they had done, ſince they leſs eſteemed, than they had done, the force of the Kings mercenary Greeks: which had hitherto kept them in ſtraight ſubjection. Thus brake out a War between the King and his ſubjects: wherein though the ill-guided force of the multitude was finally broken; yet King Ptolomy thereby waſted much of his ſtrength, and much of his time, that might have been ſpent, as he thought, much better in revelling: or, as others thought, in ſuccouring Achæus. As for Antiochus, He had no ſooner made his peace with the Egyptian, than he turned all his care to the preparation of War againſt Achæus. To this purpoſe he entred into League with Attalus; that ſo he might diſtract the forces of his Rebel, and find him work on all ſides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were ſuch, that within a while he had pent up Achæus into the City of Sardes; where he held him about two years beſieged. The City was very ſtrong, and well victualled: ſo as there appeared not, when the ſecond year came, any greater likelihood of taking it, than in the firſt years ſiege. In the end, one Lagoras a Cretan found means how to enter the Town. The Caſtle it ſelf was upon a very high rock, and in a manner impregnable; as alſo the Town-wall adjoyning to the Caſtle, in that part which was called the Sawe, was in like manner ſcituate upon ſteep Rocks, and almoſt inacceſſible; that hung over a deep bottom, whereinto the dead carkaſſes of Horſes, and other beaſts, yea, and ſometimes of men, uſed to be thrown. Now it was obſerved by Lagoras, that the Ravens and other birds of prey, which haunted that place by reaſon of their food which was there never wanting, uſed to flye up unto the top of the Rocks, and to pitch upon the walls, where they reſted without any diſturbance. Obſerving this often, he reaſoned with himſelf, and concluded that thoſe parts of the wall were left unguarded, as being thought unapproachable. Hereof he informed the King: who approved his judgement, and gave unto him the leading of ſuch men, as he deſired for the accompliſhing of the enterpriſe. The ſucceſs was agreeable to that which Lagoras had afore conceived, and though with much labour, yet without reſiſtance, he ſcaled thoſe rocks, and whilſt a general aſſault was made, entred the Town in that part, which was at other times unguarded, then unthought upon. In the ſame place had the Perſians, under Cyrus, gotten into Sardes; when Cræſus thought himſelf ſecure on that ſide. But the Citizens took not warning by the example of a loſs of many ages paſt: and therefore out of memory. Achæus held ſtill the Caſtles: which not only ſeemed by nature impregnable, but was very well ſtored with all neceſſaries, and manned with a ſufficient number, of ſuch as were to him well aſſured. Antiochus therefore was conſtrained to waſte much time about it: having none other hope to prevail, than by famiſhing the incloſed. Beſides the uſual tedioufneſs of expectation, his buſineſs called him thence away into the higher Aſia, where the Bactrians, and Parthians with the Hyrcanians, had erected Kingdoms taken out of his Dominions, upon which they ſtill incroached. But he thought it not ſafe, to let Aehæus break looſe again. On the other ſide there were ſome Agents of Ptolomy the Egyptian, and good friends unto Achæus; that made it their whole ſtudy, how to deliver this beſieged Prince. If they could reſcue his perſon, they cared for no more: but preſumed that when he ſhould appear in the Countrys under Taurus, he would ſoon have an Army at command; and be ſtrong enough to hold Antiochus as hardly to work as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolis a Cretian, that was acquainted well withall the wayes in the Country, and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult paſſages among thoſe Rocks, whereon the Caſtle of Sardes ſtood. Him they tempted with great rewards, which he ſhould receive at the hands of Ptolomy, as well as of Achæus, to do his beſt for performance of their deſire. He undertook the buſineſs: and gave ſuch likely reaſons of bringing all to good effect, that they wrote unto Achæus, by one Arianus, a truſty meſſenger, whom Bolis found means to conveigh into the Caſtle. The faith of theſe Negotiators Achæus held moſt aſſured. They alſo wrote unto him in privie Characters, or Ciphers, wherewith none ſave he and they were acquainted: whereby he knew, that it was no fained device of his Enemies, in the name of his friends. As for the meſſenger, he was a truſty fellow, and one whom Achæus found by examination, heartily affected unto their ſide. But the Contents of the Epiſtle, which were that he ſhould be confident in the faith of Bolis, and of one Cambylus whom Bolis had won unto the buſineſs, did ſomewhat trouble him. They were men to him unknown: and Cambylus was a follower of Antiochus; under whom he had the command of thoſe Cretans, which held one of the Forts that blocked up the Caſtle of Sardes. Nevertheleſs other way to eſcape he ſaw none, than by putting himſelf to ſome adventure. When the meſſenger had therefore paſſed often to and fro, it was at length concluded, That Bolis himſelf ſhould come ſpeak with Achæus, and conduct him forth. There was none other than good faith meant by any of the reſt, ſave only by Bolis and Cambylus; which were Cretans, and (as all their Countrymen, *ſome few excepted, have been, and ſtill are,) falſe knaves. Theſe two held a conſultation together, that was, as (a) Polybius obſerves it, rightly Cretical: neither concerning the ſafety of him whoſe deliverance they undertook, nor touching the diſcharge of their own faith; but only how to get moſt with leaſt ado and danger to themſelves. Briefly they concluded, That firſt of all; they would equally ſhare between them ten Talents, which they had already received in hand: and then, That they would reveal the matter to Antiochus; offering to deliver Achæus unto him, if they might be well rewarded both with preſent money, and with promiſe of conſideration anſwerable to the greatneſs of ſuch a ſervice, when it ſhould be diſpatched. Antiochus hearing this promiſe of Cambylus, was no leſs glad, than were the friends of Achæus well pleaſed with the comfortable promiſes of Bolis. At length when all things were in readineſs on both ſides, and that Bolis with Arianus was to get up into the Caſtle, and conveigh Achæus thence: He firſt went with Cambylus to ſpeak with the King; who gave him very private audience; and confirmed unto him by word of mouth the aſſurance of his liberal promiſes. And after that, putting on the countenance of an honeſt man, and of one that was faithful unto Ptolomy, whom he had long ſerved, he accompanied Arianus up into the Caſtle. At his coming thither, he was lovingly entertained; yet queſtioned at large by Achæus, touching all the weight of the buſineſs in hand. But he diſcourſed ſo well, and with ſuch gravity; that there appeared no reaſon of diſtruſting either his faith or judgement. He was an old Souldier, had long been a Captain under Ptolomy, and did not thruſt himſelf into this buſineſs; but was invited by honourable and faithful men. He had alſo taken ſafe courſe, in winning (as it ſeemed) that other Country-man of his, who kept a Fort that ſtood in their way; and thereby had already ſundry times given ſafe paſſage and repaſſage unto Arianus: But againſt all theſe comfortable hopes, the importance of ſo great an adventure ſtirred up ſome diffidence. Achæus therefore dealt wiſely, and ſaid, that he would yet ſtay in the Caſtle a little longer: but that he meant to ſend away with Bolis three or four of his friends; from whom, when he received better advertiſement, concerning the likelihood of the enterpriſe, then would he iſſue forth himſelf. Hereby he took order, not to commit himſelf wholly unto the faith of a man unknown. But as Polybius well notes, he did not conſider what he played the Cretian with a man of Crete: which is to ſay, that he had to do with one, whoſe knavery could not be avoided by circumſpection. Bolis and Cambylus had laid their plots thus, That if Achæus came forth alone, then ſhould he eaſily be taken by the ambuſh prepared for him: if he were accompanied with many of his friends, then ſhould Arianus be appointed to lead the way, as one that of late had trodden it oft: and Bolis following behind, ſhould have an eye upon Achæus, to prevent him, not only from eſcaping in the tumult, but from breaking his own neck, or otherwiſe killing himſelf: to the end that being taken alive, he might be to Antiochus the more welcome Preſent. And in ſuch order came they now forth: Arianus going before as Guide: the reſt following as the way ſerved, and Bolis in the Rear. Achæus made none acquainted with his purpoſe, till the very inſtant of his departure: Then ſignified he the matter to his Wife Laodice; and comforting her with hope as well as he could, appointed four of his ſpecial friends to bear him company. They were all diſguiſed: and one of them alone took upon him to have knowledge of the Greek tongue; ſpeaking and anſwering as need ſhould require for all, as if the reſt had been Barbarians. Bolis followed them, craftily deviſing upon his buſineſs, and much perplexed. For (ſaith Polybius) though he were of Crete, and prone to ſurmiſe any thing to the miſchief of another; yet could he not ſee in the dark, nor know which of them was Achæus, or whether Achæus himſelf were there. The way was very uneaſie, and in ſome places dangerous; eſpecially to thoſe that knew it not. Wherefore they were fain to ſtay in divers places, and help one another up or down. But upon every occaſion they were all of them very officious towards Achæus; lending him their hands, and taking ſuch care of him, as eaſily gave Bolis to underſtand that he was the man: and ſo by there unſeaſonable duty, they undid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambylus lay in wait, Bolis whiſtled, and preſently claſped Achæus about the middle, holding him faſt that he could not ſtir. So they were all taken by the Ambuſh, and carried forthwith to Antiochus; who ſate up watching in his Pavilion, expecting the event. The ſight of Achæus, brought in bound unto him, did ſo aſtoniſh the King, that he was unable to ſpeak a word, and anon brake out into weeping. Yet was he before informed of the plot, which might have kept him from admiration: as alſo the next morning betimes, aſſembling his friends together, he condemned Achæus to a cruel death: which argues, that he was not moved with pity towards this unhappy man. Wherefore it was the general regard of calamities, incident unto great fortunes, that wrung from him theſe tears, as alſo the rarity of the accident, that made both him and his friends to wonder: though it be ſo, that ſuch a courſe as this of his, in imploying two miſchievous knaves againſt one Traitor, doth not rarely ſucceed well; according to that Spaniſh Proverb, A un traydor dos allevoſos. The death of Achæus brought ſuch aſtoniſhment upon thoſe which held the Caſtle, that after a while they gave up the place and themſelves unto the King; whereby he got entire poſſeſſion of all to him belonging in the leſſer Aſia.

* Among theſe few I do not except one, calling himſelf Eudæmon. John Andrew a Cretan, who in one of his late ſhameleſs Libels, wherein he traduceth our King, Religion, and Country, with all the good and worthy men of whom he could learn the names, hath by inſerting my name twice belied me, in calling me a Puritan, and one that hath been dangerous unto my Soveraign. It is an honour to be ill ſpoken of by ſo diligent a ſupporter of Treaſons, and Architect of Lies, in regard whereof I may not deny him the commendation of Creticiſm no leſs voluminous than he in multiplicity of name is beyond any the Cretians in elder times, that were alwayes Lyars, evil beaſts, and ſlow bellies. (a) Pol. hiſt. l. 8.

Some years paſſed after this, e're Antiochus was ready for his expedition againſt the Parthians and Hyrcanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obſcure beginnings, and commonly ſubject unto thoſe that ruled in Media. In the great ſhuffling for Provinces, after the death of Alexander, the Government over them was committed by Antipater, to one Philip, a man of ſmall regard: ſhortly they fell to Eumenes, then to Antigonus: and from him, together with the Medes, to Seleucus; under whoſe proſperity they continued until the Reign of Seleucus Calinicus, being ruled by Lieutenants of the Syrian Kings. The luſtful inſolency of one of theſe Lieutenants, together with the misfortune of Calinicus, that was vanquiſhed and thought to be ſlain by the Gauls, did ſtir up Arſaces, a nobleman of the Country, to ſeek revenge of injuries done, and animate them to rebel. So he ſlew the Kings Lieutenant; made himſelf King of the Parthians, and Lord of Hyrcania, fought proſperouſly with thoſe that diſturbed him in his beginnings; and took Seleucus Calinicus priſoner in battle, whom he royally entertained and diſmiſſed. Hereby he won reputation as a lawful King: and by good government of his Countrey, procured unto himſelf ſuch love of his Subjects, that his name was continued unto his ſucceſſors; like as that of the Ptolomies in Egypt, and that of the Cæſars afterwards in Rome. Much about the ſame time the Bactrians rebelled: though theſe at length, and all belonging unto the Seleucedæ beyond Euphrates, increaſed the Parthians dominion. Now Antiochus went againſt them with ſo ſtrong an army, that they durſt not meet him in plain field; but kept themſelves in woods or places of ſtrength, and defended the Straights and paſſages of mountains. The reſiſtances they made availed them not. For Antiochus had with him ſo great a multitude, and ſo well ſorted, as he needed not to turn out of the way, from thoſe that lay fortified againſt him, in Woods and Straights between their mountains; it being eaſie to ſpare of ſo great a number, as many as fetching a compaſs about, might either get above the enemies heads; or come behind, and charge them on the back. Thus did he often imploy againſt them his light armature: wherewith he cauſed them to diſlodge, and give way unto his Phalanx; upon which they durſt not adventure themſelves in open ground. Arſaces, the ſecond of the name, (for his father was dead before this) was then King of Parthia: who though he was confident in the fidelity of his own ſubjects, yet feared to encounter ſo mighty an Invader. His hope was, that the bad wayes and Deſarts would have cauſed Antiochus, when he was at Ecbatane in Media, to give over the journey, without proceeding much further. This not ſo falling out: He cauſed the Wells and Springs in the Wilderneſs, through which his Enemy muſt paſs, to be dammed up and ſpoiled. By which means, and the reſiſtance before ſpoken of, when he could not prevail, He withdrew himſelf out of the way; ſuffering his Enemy to take his pleaſure for a time, in waſting the Countrey: wherein without ſome Victory obtained, he could make no long abode. Antiochus hereby found, That Arſaces was nothig ſtrongly provided for the War. Wherefore he marched through the heart of Parthia: and then forward into Hyrcania, where he won Tambrace, the chief City of that Province. This indignity, and many other loſſes, cauſed Arſaces at length, when he had gathered an Army that ſeemed ſtrong enough, to adventure a battle. The iſſue thereof was ſuch as gave to neither of the Kings hope of accompliſhing his deſires, without exceeding difficulty. Wherefore Arſaces craved peace, and at length obtained it: Antiochus thinking it not amiſs, to make him a friend, whom he could not make a ſubject.

The next expedition of Antiochus, was againſt Euthydemus King of the Bactrians; one that indeed had not rebelled againſt him or his Anceſtors: but having gotten the Kingdom from thoſe that had rebelled, kept it himſelf. With Euthydemus he fought a battle by the River Artus, where he had the Victory. But the Victory was not ſo greatly to his honour, as was the teſtimony which he gave of his own private valour, in obtaining it. He was thought that day to have demeaned him more couragiouſly, than did any one man in all his Army. His horſe was ſlain under him; and he himſelf received a wound in his mouth, whereby he loſt ſome of his teeth. As for Euthydemus, He withdrew himſelf back unto the futhermoſt parts of his Kingdom, and afterwards protracted the War, ſeeking how to end it by compoſition. So Embaſſadors paſſed between the Kings: Antiochus complaining, That a Country of his was unjuſtly uſurped from him: Euthydemus anſwering, That he had won it from the children of the Uſurpers:

pers: and further, that the Bactrians, a wild Nation, could hardly be retained in order, save by a King of their own; for that they bordered upon the Scythians, with whom if they should join; it would be greatly to the danger of all the Provinces that lay behind them. These allegations, together with his own wearineſs, pacified Antiochus, and made him willing to grant Peace, upon reaſonable Conditions. Demetrius, the ſon of Euthydemus, being a goodly Gentleman, and employed by his father, as Embaſſador in this Treaty of Peace, was not a little available unto a good concluſion: for Antiochus liked him ſo well, that he promiſed to give him in marriage, one of his own daughters; and therewithal permitted Euthydemus to retain the Kingdom, cauſing him nevertheleſs to deliver up his Elephants; as alſo to bind himſelf by oath, to ſuch Covenants as he thought requiſite.

So Antiochus leaving the Bactrian in quiet, made a journey over Caucauſus, and came to the borders of India, where he renewed with Sophagaſenus, King of the Indians, the ſociety that had been between their Anceſtors. The Indians had remained ſubject unto the Macedonians for a little while, after Alexanders death. Eumenes in his War againſt Antigonus, raiſed part of his forces out of their Country. But when Antigonus (after his victory) turned Weſtward, and was overbuſied in a great Civil War: then did one Sandrocottus, an Indian, ſtir up his country-men to rebellion; making himſelf their Captain, and taking upon him, as protector of their liberty. This Office and Title he ſoon changed, though not without ſome contention, into the Name and Majeſty of a King. Finally he got unto himſelf (having an Army of ſix hundred thouſand men) if not all India, yet as much of it as had been Alexanders: In this eſtate he had well confirmed himſelf, e're Seleucus Nicanor could find leiſure to call him to account. Neither did he faint, or humble himſelf at the coming of Seleucus; but met him in the field, as ready to defend his own, ſo ſtrongly and well appointed, that the Macedonian was contented to make both peace and affinity with him, taking only a reward of fifty Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian Kingdoms, was continued by ſome offices of love between their children, and now renewed by Antiochus; whoſe number of Elephants were increaſed thereupon, by the Indian King, to an hundred and fifty: as alſo he was promiſed, to have ſome treaſure ſent after him; which he left one to receive. Thus parted theſe two great Kings. Neither had the Indians, from this time forwards in many generations, any buſineſs worthy of remembrance with the Weſtern countries. The poſterity of Sandrocottus is thought to have retained that Kingdom unto the dayes of Auguſtus Cæſar: to whom Porus, then reigning in India, ſent Embaſſadors with preſents, and an Epiſtle written in Greek, wherein among other things, he ſaid, That he had command over ſix hundred Kings. There is alſo found, ſcattered in ſundry Authors, the mention of ſome which held that Kingdom, in divers Ages, even unto the time of Conſtantine the Great: being all peradventure of the ſame race. But Antiochus, who in this Treaty with Sophagaſenus carryed himſelf as the worthier perſon, receiving preſents, and after marching home through Drangiana and Carmania, with ſuch reputation, that all the Potentates, not only in the higher Aſia, but on the higher ſide of Taurus, humbled themſelves unto him, and called him The Great: ſaw an end of his own greatneſs within few years enſuing, by preſuming to ſtand upon points with the Romans: whoſe Greatneſs was the ſame indeed, that his was only in ſeeming.

SECT. III.

The lewd reign of Ptolomy Philopater in Ægypt: with the Tragical end of his favourites, when he was dead. Antiochus prepares to war on the young child Ptolomy Epiphanes, the ſon of Philopater. His reſolution in preparing for divers wars at once. His voyage towards the Helleſpont. He ſeeks to hold amity with the Romans, who make friendly ſhew to him; intending nevertheleſs to have war with him. His doings againſt the Helleſpont; which the Romans made the firſt ground of their quarrel to him.

THis expedition being finiſhed, Antiochus had leiſure to repoſe himſelf a while; and ſtudy which way to convert the terrour of his puiſſance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three years Ptolomy Philopater died: leaving his ſon Ptolomy Epiphanes, a young Boy, his ſucceſſor in the Kingdom: unlikely by him to be well defended againſt a neighbour ſo mighty and ambitious. This Ptolomy ſurnamed Philopater, that is to ſay, a lover of his Father, is thought to have had that ſurname given him in meer deriſion; as having made away both his Father and Mother. His young years being newly paſt, his childhood when he began to reign, may ſeem to diſcharge him of ſo horrible a crime, as his Fathers death: yet the beaſtlineſs of all his following life, makes him not unlike to have done any miſchief, whereof he could be accuſed. Having won the battles at Raphiah, He gave himſelf over to ſenſuality, and was wholly governed by a Strumpet called Agathoclea. At her inſtigation, He murdered his own wife and ſiſter; which had adventured her ſelf with him, in that only dangerous action by him undertaken and performed with honour. The Lieutenant-ſhips of his Provinces, with all Commands in his Army, and Offices whatſoever, were wholly referred unto the diſpoſition of this Agathoclea, and her brother Agathocles, and Oenanthe a filthy bawd that was mother unto them both. So theſe three governed the Realm at their pleaſure, to the great grief of all the Country, till Philopater died; who having reigned ſeventeen years, left none other ſon than Ptolomy Epiphanes, a child of five years old, begotten on Arſione that was his ſiſter and wife. After the Kings death Agathocles began to take upon him, as protector of young Epiphanes, and Governour of the Land. He aſſembled the Macedons (which were the Kings ordinary forces in pay, not all born in Macedonia, but the race of thoſe that abode in Egypt with Ptolomy the firſt, and would not be accounted Egyptians; as neither would the Kings themſelves) and bringing forth unto them his ſiſter Agathoclea, with the young King in her armes; began a ſolemn Oration. He told them, That the deceaſed Father of this their King, had com-committed the Child into the arms of his Sister: but unto the faith of them: on whose valiant right hands, the whole state of the Kingdom did now rely. He besought them therefore that they would be faithful, and, as great need was, defend their King against the Treason of one Tlepolemus an ambitious man; who traiterously went about to set the Diadem upon his own head, being a meer stranger to the Royal blood. Herewithall he produced before them a witness, that should justifie his accusation against Tlepolemus. Now though it were so, that he delivered all this with a fained passion of sorrow, and counterfeiting tears: yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that he spake; but stood laughing, and talking one to another, what a shameless dissembler he was, to take so much upon him, as if he knew not how greatly he was hated. And so brake up the Assembly: he that had called it, being scarce aware how. Agathocles therefore, whom the old Kings favour had made mighty, but neither wise nor well qualified, thought to go to work, as had formerly been his manner; by using his authority, to the suppression of those that he distrusted. He haled out of the Temple the Mother-in-law of Tlepolemus; and cast her into prison. This filled Alexandria with rumours, and made the people (though accustomed to suffer greater things, whilst they were committed in the old Kings name) to meet in knots together, and utter one to another their minds, wherein they had conceived extream hate, against these three pernicious Mis-governours of the old King. Besides their consideration of the present injury done to Tlepolemus, they were somewhat also moved with fear of harm; which in way of requital, Tlepolemus was likely to do unto the City. For he was thought a man most unapt for Government, as afterwards he proved, yet no bad Souldier, and well beloved of the Army. It was also then in his power, to stop the provision of Victuals which was to come into Alexandria. As these motives wrought with the people, so by the remedy which Agathocles used, were the Macedons more hastily, and more violently stirred unto uproar. He secretly apprehended one of their number, whom he suspected of conspiracy against him; and delivered him unto a follower of his own, to be examined by torture. This poor Souldier was carried into an inner room of the Palace, and there stripped out of all his Apparel to be tormented. But whilst the whips were brought forth, and all things even in a readiness for that purpose, there was brought unto the Minister of Agathocles, a sad report of Tlepolemus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner, and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the room; leaving Moeragenes the Souldier alone by himself, and the doors open. He perceiving this, naked as he was, conveighed himself out of the Palace, and got unto the Macedonians, of whom he found some in a Temple thereby at Dinner. The Macedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Priviledges, as are the Turks Janizaries. Being assured therefore that one of their fellows had thus been used, they fell to Arms in a great rage, and began to force the Palace: crying out, That they would see the King, and not leave him in possession of a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the City, with loud clamours, made no less ado than the Souldiers, though to less effect. So the old Bawd Oenantha fled into a Temple: her Son and Daughter stayed in the Court, untill the King was taken from them, and they, by his permission, which he easily gave, and by appointment of those that now had him in their hands, delivered up to the fury of the people. Agathocles himself was stabbed to death, by some which therein did the Office of Friends; though in manner of Enemies. His Sister was dragg'd naked up and down the Streets; as was also his Mother, with all to them belonging; the enraged multitude committed upon them a barbarous execution of Justice: biting them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing them in pieces.

These troubles in Egypt, served well to stir up King Antiochus; who had very good leisure, though he wanted all pretence, to make War upon young Ptolomy. Philip of Macedon had the same desire to get what he could of the Childs Estate. But it hapned well, that Ptolomy Philopater in the Punick War, which was now newly ended, had done many good offices unto the Romans. Unto them therefore the Egyptians addressed themselves, and craved help against these two Kings: who, though they secretly maligned one the other; yet had entred into covenant to divide between them all that belonged unto this Orphan; whose Father had been confederate with them both. So † M. Lepidus was sent from Rome, to protect from all violence the King of Egypt; especially against Antiochus. As for the Macedonian; he was very soon found busied with War at his own Doors. Also Scopas the Ætolian, being a Pensioner to the Egyptian, was sent into Greece to raise an Army of Mercenaries. What Lepidus did in Egypt, I do not find: and therefore think it not improbable, that he was sent thither only one of the three Embassadors, in the beginning of the War with Philip, as hath been shewed before. As for Scopas; he shortly after went up into Syria with his Army; where, winning many places, among the rest of his Acts, he subdued the Jews, who seem to have yielded themselves a little before unto Antiochus, at such time as they saw him prepare for his War, and despaired of receiving help from Egypt. But it was not long e're all these Victories of Scopas came to nothing. For the very next year following, which was (according to Eusebius) the same year that Philip was beaten at Cynoscephalæ; Antiochus vanquished Scopas in battle, and recovered all that had been lost. Among the rest, the Jews, with great willingness, returned under his obedience; and were therefore by him very gently entreated.

Vide Joseph. Ant. Jud. lib. 12 cap. 3.

The Land of Egypt, this great King did forbear to invade; and gave it out, that he meant to bestow a Daughter of his own in Marriage unto Ptolomy: either hoping, as may seem, that the Country would willingly submit it self unto him, if this young Child should happen to miscarry; or else that greater purchase might be made in the Western parts of Asia, whilst Philip was held overlaboured by the Romans. It appears that he was very much distracted; hunting (as we say) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrels between Attalus, Philip, and the Greeks, promised to afford him great advantage, if he should bring his Army to the Hellespont. On the other side, the state of Egypt being such as hath been declared, seemed easily to be swallowed up at once. One while therefore he took what he could get in Syria: where all were willing (and the Jews, among the rest, though hitherto they had kept faith with the Egyptian) to yield him obedience. Another while, letting Egypt alone, he was about to make invasion upon Attalus his Kingdom; yet ſuffered himſelf eaſily to be perſwaded by the Roman Embaſſadors, and deſiſted from that enterpriſe. Having thus far gratified the Romans, he ſends Embaſſadors to the Senate, to conclude a perfect Amity between him and them. It is not lightly to be over-paſſed, That theſe his Embaſſadors were lovingly entertained at Rome; and diſmiſſed, with a Decree and anſwer of the Senate, altogether to the honour of King Antiochus. But this anſwer of the Romans was not ſincere; being rather framed according to regard of the Kings good liking, than of their own intent. They had not yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly be troubled with two great Wars at once. Wherefore, not ſtanding much upon the nice examination of what belonged unto their honour, they were content to give good words for the preſent. In the mean time Antiochus fights with Scopas in Syria, and ſhortly prepares to win ſome Towns elſewhere, belonging unto Ptolomy; yet withall he ſends an Army Weſtward, intending to make what profit he can of the diſtractions in Greece. Likewiſe it is conſiderable, as an argument of his much irreſolution, how, notwithſtanding his attempts upon both of their Kingdoms, he offered one of his Daughters to Ptolomy, and another to Eumenes the Son of Attalus, newly King of Pergamus: ſeeking each of their friendſhips at one and the ſame time, when he ſought to make each of them a ſpoil. Thus was he acting and deliberating at once; being carried with an inexplicable deſire of Repugnancies, which is a Diſeaſe of great and over-ſwelling-fortunes. Howſoever it was, he ſent an Army to Sardes by Land, under two of his Sons: willing them there to ſtay for him; whilſt he himſelf, with a Fleet of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other Veſſels, intended to paſs along by the Coaſts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in ſuch places as held for the Egyptian. It was a notable act of the Rhodians, that, whilſt the War of Philip lay yet upon their hands, they adventured upon this Great Antiochus. They ſent unto him a proud Embaſſage; whereby they gave him to underſtand, That if he paſſed forward beyond a certain Promontory in Cilicia, they would meet with him, and fight with him; not for any quarrel of theirs unto him; but becauſe he ſhould not joyn with Philip their Enemy, and help him againſt the Romans. It was inſolently done of them, neither ſeemed it otherwiſe, to preſcribe ſuch limits unto the King: yet he tempered himſelf, and without any ſhew of indignation, gave a gentle anſwer; partly himſelf to their Embaſſadors; partly unto their whole City, by Embaſſadors whieh he thither ſent. He ſhewed his deſire to renew the ancient Confederacies between his Anceſtors and them: and willed them not to be afraid, leſt his coming ſhould tend unto any hurt, either of them, or of their Confederates. As touching the Romans whom they thought that he would moleſt: they were (he ſaid) his very good Friends; whereof, he thought there needed no better proof, than the entertainment and anſwer by them newly given to his Embaſſadors.

The Rhodians appear to have been a cunning People, and ſuch as could fore-ſee what Weather was like to happen. This anſwer of the King, and the relation of what had paſſed between his Embaſſadors and the Senate, moved them not a whit, when they were informed ſhortly after, that the Macedonian War was ended at the Battle of Cynoſcephalæ. They knew that Antiochus his turn would be next; and prepared to be forward on the ſtronger ſide. Wherefore they would not be contented to ſit ſtill, unleſs the Towns on the South Coaſt of Aſia, belonging to Ptolomy their Friend and Confederate, were ſuffered to be at quiet. Herein alſo they did well; for that they had ever been greatly beholding to all the Race of the Ptolomies. They therefore in this time of neceſſity, gave what aid they could unto all the Subjects of the Egyptian in thoſe parts. In like manner did King Eumenes, the Son of Attalus, prognoſticate as concerning the War that followed between Antiochus and the Romans. For when King Antiochus made a friendly offer, to beſtow one of his Daughters upon him in Marriage: He excuſed himſelf, and would not have her. Attalus and Philetærus, his Brethren, wondred at this. But he told them, that the Romans would ſurely make War upon Antiochus; and therein finally prevail. Wherefore he ſaid, that by abſtaining from this affinity, it ſhould be in his power to joyn with the Romans, and ſtrengthen himſelf greatly with their friendſhip. Contrariwiſe, if he leaned to Antiochus, as he muſt be partaker in his overthrow; ſo was he ſure to be oppreſſed by him, as by an over-mighty Neighbour, if he hapned to win the Victory.

Antiochus himſelf wintred about Epheſus; where he took ſuch order as he thought convenient for reducing of Smyrna and Lampſacus to obedience; that had uſurped their Liberty, and obſtinately ſtrove to maintain it, in hope that the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring he ſailed unto the Helleſpont; where, having won ſome Towns that Philip had gotten not long before this, he paſſed over into Europe ſide; and in ſhort ſpace maſtered the Cherſoneſus. Thence went he to Lyſimachia: which the Thracians had gotten and deſtroyed, when Philip withdrew his Garriſon thence, to employ it in the Roman War. The Ætolians objected as a crime unto Philip, in the conference between T. Quintius, that he had oppreſſed Lyſimachia, by thruſting thereinto a Garriſon. Hereupon Philip made anſwer, That his Garriſon did not oppreſs the Town, but ſave it from the Barbarians: who took and ſack'd it, as ſoon as the Macedonians were gone. That this anſwer was good and ſubſtantial, though it were not acceptable as ſuch; might appear by the miſerable caſe, in which Antiochus found Lyſimachia at his coming thither. For the Town was utterly raſed by the Barbarians, and the people carried away into ſlavery. Wherefore the King took order to have it re-edified: as alſo to redeem thoſe that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens as were diſperſed in the Country thereabout. Likewiſe he was careful to allure thither, by hopeful promiſes, new Inhabitants, and to repleniſh the City with wonted frequency. Now to the end that men ſhould not be terrified from coming thither to dwell, by any fear of the neighbour Thracians: he took a Journey in hand againſt thoſe barbarous people, with the one half of his Army; leaving the other half to repair the City. Theſe pains he took, partly in regard of the convenient ſcituation, and former glory of Lyſimachia; partly for that he thought it highly redounding unto his own honour, to recover and eſtabliſh the Dominion in thoſe parts which his fore-father Seleucus Nicator had won from Lyſimachus, and thereby made his Kingdom of greater extent than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition

he ſhall dearly pay: and as after that Victory againſt Lyſimachus, the death of King Seleucus followed ſhortly; ſo ſhall a deadly wound of the Kingdom, founded by Seleucus, enſue very ſpeedily after the re-conqueſt of the ſame Country, which was the laſt of Seleucus his Purchaſes.

SECT. IV.

The Romans hold friendly correſpondence with Antiochus, during their War with Philip: after which they quarrel with him. The doings of Hannibal at Carthage: whence he is chaſed by his Enemies, and by the Romans: His flight unto the King Antiochus. The Ætolians murmur againſt the Romans in Greece. The War of the Romans and Achæans, with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. 10. FOr the Romans, though they were unable to ſmother their deſire of War with Antiochus, whereof notice was already taken both by their Friends and by their Enemies: yet was it much againſt their will to keep the rumour on Foot, which they meant ſhortly to make good, of this intended War, ſo long as they wanted matter of quarrel; whereof they were furniſhed, by this enterpriſe of the Kings about Lyſimachia. It was not long, ſince King Attalus, a Friend and a helper of the Romans in their War with Philip, could obtain of them none other help againſt Antiochus, than Embaſſadors to ſpeak for him, becauſe the one of theſe Kings was held no leſs a Friend than the other. Neither did there afterwards paſs between them any other offices, than very Friendly. Antiochus at the requeſt of their Embaſſadors, withdrew his Invaſion from the Kingdom of Pergamus: alſo very ſhortly after he ſent Embaſſadors to them, to make a perfect League of amity between them. This was whilſt as yet they were buſied with Philip, and therefore had reaſon to anſwer his good will with good acceptation: as they did in outward ſhew. But when the Macedonian War was at an end, and all, or moſt of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Clients unto the Romans: then was all this good correſpondence changed into terms of worſe, but more plain meaning. For T. Quintius, with his ten Counſellors ſent from Rome, requited (as hath been † ſhewed before) with a commination of War, this Kings gratulation of their Victory; as alſo his long profeſſed amity, and deſire to continue in the ſame.

† Chap. 4. Sect. ult.

Theſe ten Counſellors were able to inform T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the purpoſe of the Senate: whereof yet it ſeems that he was not ignorant before; ſince, in regard of Antiochus, he was the more inclinable unto Peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they divided themſelves to make progreſs through divers quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree, That two of them ſhould viſit King Antiochus; and the reſt, where occaſion ſerved, uſe diligence to make a party ſtrong againſt him. Neither was the Senate at Rome unmindful of the buſineſs; wherein, leſt T. Quintius, with his ten Aſſiſtants, ſhould happen to forget any thing to their parts belonging, L. Cornelius was ſent from Rome, of purpoſe to deal with the King about thoſe controverſies, that were between him and Ptolomy. What other private inſtructions Cornelius had, we may conjecture by the managing of this his Embaſſage. For coming to Selymbria: and there underſtanding that P. Villius and L. Terentius, having been ſent by Titus, were at Lyſimachia, He haſtened thither; whither alſo came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Counſellors) from Bargilla, to be preſent at the Conference. Hegeſianax and Lyſias were alſo there; the ſame, who had lately brought from Titus thoſe peremptory Conditions, which the Embaſſadors preſent ſhall expound unto their Maſter. After a few daies Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment between him and theſe Romans, was in appearance full of love. But when they came to treat of the buſineſs in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly delivered his errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reaſon to deliver back unto Ptolomy thoſe Towns of his, whereof he had lately gotten poſſeſſion. Hereunto he added, and that very carneſtly, That he muſt alſo give up the Towns of late belonging unto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could be more abſurd, than ſuch folly in the Romans, as to let Antiochus enjoy the profit of that War, wherein they had laboured ſo much, and he done nothing? Further he warned the King, that he ſhould not moleſt thoſe Cities that were free: and finally he demanded of him, upon what reaſon he was come over with ſo great an Army into Europe; for that other cauſe of his Journey there was none probable, than a purpoſe to make War upon the Romans? To this the King made anſwer, That he wondred why the Romans ſhould ſo trouble themſelves, with thinking upon the matters of Aſia: wherewith he prayed them to let him alone: even as he, without ſuch curioſity, ſuffered them to do in Italy what they thought good. As for his coming over into Europe: they ſaw well enough what buſineſs had drawn him thither; namely, the War againſt the barbarous Thracians: the re-building of Lyſimachia, and the recovery of Towns to him belonging in Thrace and Cherſoneſus. Now concerning his title unto that Country, He derived it from Seleucus: who made Conqueſt thereof, by his Victory againſt Lyſimachus. Neither was it ſo, that any of the places in controverſie between him and the other Kings, had been ſtill of old belonging to the Macedonians or Egyptians; but had been ſeized on by them, or by others from whom they received them, at ſuch time as his Anceſtors, being Lords of thoſe Countries, were hindred by multiplicity of buſineſs, from looking unto all that was their own. Finally he willed them, neither to ſtand in fear of him, as if he intended ought againſt them from Lyſimachia; ſince it was his purpoſe to beſtow this City upon one of his Sons, that ſhould reign therein: nor yet to be grieved with his proceedings in Aſia; either againſt the free Cities, or againſt the King of Egypt; ſince it was his meaning to make the free Cities beholding unto himſelf, and to joyn e're long with Ptolomy, not only in Friendſhip, but in a Bond of near Affinity. Cornelius having heard this, and being perhaps unable to refute it, would needs hear further, what the Embaſſadors of Smyrna and Lampſacus, whom he had there with him, could could ſay for themſelves. The Embaſſadors of Lampſacus being called in, began a tale, wherein they ſeemed to accuſe the King before the Romans, as it were before competent Judges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them hold their peace, foraſmuch as he had not choſen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators between him and them.

Thus the Treaty held ſome few days, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, having not laid their complaints in ſuch ſort, as they might be a convenient foundation of the War by them intended: nor yet having purpoſe to depart well ſatisfied, and thereby to corroborate the preſent Peace, were doubtful how to order the matter, in ſuch wiſe as they might neither too rudely, like boiſterous Galle-Greeks, pretend only the goodneſs of their Swords: nor yet over-modeſtly, to retain among the Greeks an opinion of their Juſtice, forbear the occaſion of making themſelves great. The King on the other ſide was weary of theſe tedious Gueſts; that would take no anſwer, and yet ſcarce knew what to ſay. At length came news, without any certain Author, That Ptolomy was dead. Hereof neither the King, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were deſirous to haſten into Egypt: Antiochus to take poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, and L. Cornelius, to prevent him thereof, and ſet the Country in good order. Cornelius was ſent from Rome Embaſſador both to Antiochus and to Ptolomy: which gave him occaſion to take leave, and prepare for his Egyptian Voyage. Both he, and his fellow Embaſſadors, had good leave to depart all together: and the King forthwith made ready, to be in Egypt with the firſt. To his Son Seleucus he committed his Army, and left him to over-ſee the building of Lyſimachia: but all his Sea-forces he took along with him, and ſailed unto Epheſus. Thence he ſent Embaſſadors to T. Quintius: whom he requeſted to deal with him in this matter of Peace, after ſuch ſort as might ſtand with honeſty, and good faith. But as he was further proceeding on his Voyage, he was perfectly informed that Ptolomy was alive. This made him bear another way from Egypt: and afterwards a Tempeſt, with a grievous Shipwrack, made him, without any further attempt on the way, glad to have ſafely recovered his Port of Seleucia. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintered: ſecure as might appear, of the Roman War.

But the Romans had not ſo done with him. During the Treaty at Lyſimachia, (at leaſtwiſe not long before or after it) one of their Embaſſadors that had been ſent unto the Macedonian, gave him counſel, as in a point highly tending to his good; not to reſt contented with the Peace which was granted unto him by the Romans, but to deſire ſociety with them, whereby they ſhould be bound to have the ſame Friends and Enemies. And this he adviſed him to do quickly, before the War brake out with Antiochus: leſt otherwiſe he might ſeem, to have awaited ſome fit occaſion of taking Arms again. They who dealt thus plainly, did not mean to be ſatisfied with weak excuſes. In like manner ſome of the Greeks were ſolicited; and particularly the Ætolians, That conſtantly and faithfully they ſhould abide in the friendſhip of the People of Rome. It was needleſs to ſay plainly whereto this entreaty tended: the froward anſwer made by the Ætolians, declares them to have well underſtood the purpoſe. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the Victory, as they had been during the War. They that ſo complained, were the moſt moderate of them. Others cryed out, that they had been wronged, and defrauded of what was promiſed unto them: upbraiding withall the Romans, as men to them beholding: not only for their Victory over Philip, but even for helping them to ſet foot in Greece, which elſe they never could have done. Hereto the Roman gave gentle anſwers: telling them that there was no more to do, than to ſend Embaſſadors to the Senate, and utter their griefs: and then ſhould all be well.

Such care took the Romans in Greece, for their War intended againſt Antiochus. The fame hereof arriving at Carthage, gave matter unto the Enemies of Hannibal, wherewith both to pick a thank of the Roman Senate, and to chaſe out of their City this honourable Man, whom they ſo greatly hated. He had of late exerciſed his virtue againſt them in the Civil Adminiſtration: and given them an overthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Judges at that time bore all the ſway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and having ſubject unto them, the Lives, Goods, and Fame of all the reſt. Neither did they uſe this their power with moderation: but conſpired in ſuch wiſe together, that whoſo offended any of them, ſhould have them all to be his Enemies: which being once known, He was ſure to be ſoon accuſed and condemed. In this their impotent rule of the City, Hannibal was choſen Prætor. By virtue of which Office, though he was ſuperiour unto them during that year: yet had it not been their manner to bear much regard unto ſuch an annual Magiſtrate, as at the years end muſt be accountable unto them, if ought were laid unto his charge. Hannibal therefore ſending for one of the Queſtors, or Officers of the Treaſury, to come and ſpeak with him: the proud Queſtor ſet lightly thereby, and would not come: For he was of the adverſe Faction to Hannibal: and men of his place were to be choſen into the Order of Judges: in contemplation whereof, he was filled already with the Spirit of future Greatneſs. But he had not to do with ſuch a tame Prætor, as were they that had occupied the place before. Hannibal ſent for him by a Purſivant; and having thus apprehended him, brought him into Judgement before a publick Aſſembly of the People. There he not only ſhewed, what the undutiful ſtubbornneſs of this Queſtor had been; but how unſufferable the inſolency of all the Judges at the preſent was: whoſe unbridled power made them to regard neither Laws nor Magiſtrates. To this Oration when he perceived that all the Citizens were attentive and favourable; He forthwith propounded a Law, which paſſed with the general good liking; That the Judges ſhould be choſen from year to year, and no one man be continued in that Office two years together. If this Law had been paſſed, before he paſſed over Iberus: it would not perhaps have been in the power of Hanno, to have brought him unto neceſſity of reforming another grievance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were fain to levy by Taxation, laid upon the whole Commonalty, as wanting money in their publick Treaſury, wherewith to defray either that, or divers other needful charges. Hannibal conſidering this, began to examine the publick Revenues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into into the Treasury, by wayes and means whatsoever: and in what sort it was thence laid out. So he found, That the ordinary charges of the Common-wealth did not exhaust the Treasury; but that wicked Magistrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greatest part of the moneys to their own use, were thereby fain to load the people with needless burdens Hereof he made such plain demonstration, That these Robbers of the common Treasure were compelled to restore, with shame, what they had gotten by knavery: and so the Carthaginians were freed from the necessity of making such poor shifts, as formerly they had used, when they knew not the value of their own Estate. But as the vertue of Hannibal was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: so they of the Roman Faction, which had since the making of the peace until now, little regarded him, began to rage extreamly: as being by him stript of their ill-gotten goods and ill-employed authority, both at once, even when they thought themselves to have been in full possession of the vanquished Carthage. Wherefore they sent letters to their friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew strong again, and Hannibal would shortly be in arms. Questionless, if oppressing the City by injustice, and robbing the Treasury, were the only way to hold Carthage in peace with Rome: these Enemies to the Barchines might well cry out, That having done their best already to keep all in quiet, they saw none other likelihood than of War. But having no other matter to alledge, than their own inventions: they said, That Hannibal was like unto a wild beast, which would never be tamed; That secret messages passed between him, and King Antiochus: and that he was wont to complain of idleness, as if it were harmful to Carthage; with what else to like effect they could imagine. These accusations they directed not unto the Senate: but addressing their letters craftily, every one to the best of his own friends at Rome, and such as were Senators; they wrought so well, that neither publick notice of their Conspiracy was taken at Carthage; nor the authority of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their malicious purpose. Only P. Scipio is said to have admonished the Fathers, that they should not thus dishonourably subscribe, and become seconds to the accusers of Hannibal: as if they would oppress, by suborning or countenancing false witnesses against him; the man, against whom in war they had not of long time prevailed, nor used their victory in such base manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not all so great minded as Scipio: they wished for some such advantage against Hannibal; and were glad to have found it. Three Embassadors they sent over to Carthage, C. Servilius, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius Marcellus: whose very names imports sufficient cause of bad affection to Hannibal. These having past the Sea, were entertained by those that had procured their coming: and being by them instructed how to carry themselves, gave out, That they were sent to end some controversies, between the Carthaginians and Masanissa. But Hannibal had kept such good espial upon the Romans, that he knew their meaning well enough: against which he was never unprepared. It were enough to say, That he escaped them by flight; but in the actions of so famous a man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearse the particularities. Having openly shewed himself, as was his manner, in the place of assembly, He went forth of the Town when it began to wax dark, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination; though such as he might well trust. He had appointed Horses to be in a readiness at a certain place: whence riding all night, He came to a Tower of his own by the Sea-side: There had he a ship furnished with all things needful; as having long expected the necessity of some such journey. So he bade Africk farewell; lamenting the misfortune of his Country, more than his own. Passing over to the Isle of Cercina; He found there in the Haven some Merchants ships of Carthage. They saluted him respectively: and the chief among them began to enquire, whither he was bound. He said, He went Embassador to Tyre: and that he intended there in the Island to make Sacrifice; whereto he invited all the Merchants, and Masters of the Ships. It was hot weather: and therefore he would needs hold his Feast upon the shore; where, because there wanted covert, He made them bring thither all their Sails and Yards to be used instead of Tents. They did so; and feasted with him till it was late at night: at which time he left them there asleep: and putting to Sea, held on his course to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, He was sure not to be pursued. For the Merchants did neither make haste to send any news of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embassadour: neither could they, without some loss of time, such of them as made most speed homeward, get away from Cercina; being busied a while in fitting their tackle. At Carthage, the miss of so great a person was diversly construed. Some guessed right, that he was fled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came news where he had been seen; and then the Roman Embassadors, having none other errand thither, accused him (with an evil grace) as a troubler of the Peace; whereby they only discovered the mischief by them intended against him, and and the malice of the Senate: missing the while their purpose, and causing men to understand, that he fled not thus without great reason.

Hannibal coming to Tyre, the Mother-City of Carthage, was there entertained Royally: as one, in whose great worth and honour the Tyrians, by reason of affinity between their Cities, thought themselves to have interest. Thence went he to Antioch; and finding the King departed, visited his Son in Daphne: who friendly welcomed him, and sent him unto his Father at Ephesus, that exceedingly rejoyced at his coming.

As Antiochus had cause to be glad in that he had gotten Hannibal: so had the Romans no great cause to be therefore sorry: otherwise than as they had much disgraced themselves, by discovery of their impotent malice, in chasing him thus out of his Country. For it would not prove alike easie unto this great Commander to make stout Souldiers of base Asiatiques; as it had been by his training and discipline, to make very serviceable and skilful men of War of the Spaniards, Africans, Gauls, and other Nations, that were hardly, though unexperienced. Or were it supposed, that one mans worth, especially being so extraordinary, could altar the nature of a cowardly people: yet was it therewithall considerable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the baseness of his Flatterers, and a thousand other such ſuch vexations, would be far more powerful in making unprofitable the vertue of Hannibal, now a deſolate and baniſhed man, than had been the villany of Hanno and his Complices, hindering him in thoſe actions, wherein he had the high Command, and was ſeconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Carthaginian, would only help to ennoble the Roman Victory: or if it further ſerved to hearten Antiochus, and make him leſs careful to avoid the war; then ſhould it further ſerve, to juſtifie the Romans in their quarrel. And ſeems indeed that it was no little part of their care, to get a fair pretence of making war. For Antiochus, as is ſaid before, having newly ſent Embaſſadors to T. Quintius, requiring that the peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, that he had any meaning to take Arms, unleſs by meer violence he were thereto inforced. Only the Ætolians were greatly ſuſpected, as a turbulent people, deſirous of innovation, and therefore practiſing with this Great King; whom they wiſhed to ſee among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appeaſe them; they had of late been anſwered with gentle words by one of the ten Counſellers, That the Senate would grant them whatſoever with reaſon they ſhould ask. But this promiſe was too large, and unadviſed. For when their Embaſſadors came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing: but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who favoured them leaſt. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to right themſelves, otherwiſe than by ſpeaking ſuch words, as might haſten the Romans out of Greece for very ſhame, who had no deſire to be thence gone.

The daily talk at Rome, was, of War with Antiochus; but in Greece, when the Romans would leave the Country. For the Ætolians were wont to upbraid the reſt of the Greeks with the vain liberty which the Romans had proclaimed, ſaying, That theſe their Deliverers had laid heavier Fetters upon them, than formerly they did wear; but yet brighter and fairer than thoſe of the Macedonian: likewiſe, that it was a gracious act of Titus, to take from the Legs of the Greeks their chain, and tie it about their Necks. There was indeed no cauſe of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romans had no other meaning than what they pretended. For Philip had made no delay, in accompliſhment of that which was laid upon him: all the Towns of Greece were at liberty, and the whole Country, at peace, both with the Romans, and within it ſelf. As for Antiochus, He made it his daily ſuit, That the Peace between him and Rome, ſuch as it was, might be confirmed and ſtrengthened by a League of more aſſurance. Nevertheleſs, T. Quintius would needs fear that Antiochus meant forthwith to ſeize upon Greece, as ſoon as he and his Army were thence departed. And in this regard, he retained ſtill in his own hands Chalcis, Demetrius, and the Acrocorinthus: by benefit of which Towns he might the better withſtand the dangerous Invaſion like to be made by Antiochus. Suitable unto the doings of Quintius, were the reports of the ten Embaſſadors, that had been ſent over to aſſiſt him; when they returned back into the City. Antiochus, they ſaid, would queſtionleſs fall upon Greece: wherein he ſhould find not only the Ætolians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, ready to give him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to do ſomewhat againſt theſe their ſuſpected Enemies: eſpecially againſt Nabis, who could worſt make reſiſtance: whilſt Antiochus was far away in Syria, and not intentive to his buſineſs. Theſe reports went not only current through the City among the Vulgar; but found ſuch credit with the chief of the Senate, that in the following year, againſt which time it was expected that Antiochus ſhould be ready to take his great enterpriſe in hand: P. Cornelius Scipio the African, deſired, and obtained, a ſecond Conſulſhip, with intention to be General in the War, againſt the King and his Hannibal. For the preſent, the buſineſs with Nabis was referred unto Titus, to deal with him as he thought good. This would be a fair colour of his longer tarrience in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment: whereof alſo he knew that many of the Greeks would not be ſorry: though for his own part, he wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entred into friendſhip with him, two or three years before this, as is already ſhewed, whileſt he had war with Philip: and had further been contented for the Romans ſake to be at peace with the Achæans: neither ſince that time had he done any thing, whereby he ſhould draw upon himſelf this War. He was indeed a deteſtable Tyrant, and hated of the Achæans: as one, that beſides his own wicked Conditions, had formerly done to them great miſchief. Titus therefore had a plauſible Theme whereon to diſcourſe before the Embaſſadors of all the Confederate Cities, which he cauſed to meet for that purpoſe at Corinth. He told them that in the War with Philip, not only the Greeks, but the Romans themſelves had each their motives apart (which he there briefly rehearſed) that ſhould ſtir them up, and cauſe them to be earneſt. But in this which he now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other Intereſt, than only the making perfect of their Honour, in ſetting all Greece at Liberty: which Noble Action was in ſome ſort maimed, or incompleat, whilſt the Noble City of Argos was left in ſubjection to a Tyrant that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged unto them, the Greeks, duly to conſider, whether they thought the deliverance of Argos a matter worthy to be undertaken: or whether otherwiſe to avoid all further trouble, they could be well contented to leave it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who in taking this work in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greeks themſelves. The Athenian Embaſſador made anſwer hereunto very eloquently, and as pleaſing as he could deviſe. He gave thanks to the Romans for what was paſt; extolled their Vertues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their propoſition: wherein unrequeſted they freely made offer to continue that Bounty, which at the vehement requeſt of their poor Aſſociates they had already of late extended unto the Greeks. To this he added, That great pity it was to hear ſuch notable Vertue and high Deſerts ill ſpoken of by ſome: which took upon them, out of their own imagination, to foretell what harm theſe their Benefactors meant to do hereafter: when as thankfulneſs would rather have required an Acknowledgement of the Benefits and Pleaſures already received. Every one found the meaning of this laſt clauſe, which was directly againſt the Ætolians: Wherefore Alexander the Ætolian roſe up, and told the Athenians their own: putting them in mind of their antient glory, in thoſe times when their City had been the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recovery of the Liberty general: from which Honour they were now so far fallen, that they became Parasites unto those whom they thought most mighty; and by their base assentation, would lead all the rest into servitude. Then spake he against the Achæans, Clients that had been a long time unto the Macedonian; and Souldiers of Philip, until they ran away from his adversity. These, he said, had gotten Corinth, and must now have War be made for their sakes, to the end that they might also be Lords of Argos: whereas the Ætolians, that had first made War with Philip, and alwayes been Friends unto the Romans, were now defrauded of some places, antiently to them belonging. Neither did he thus contain himself, but objected unto the Romans, fraudulent dealing: forasmuch as they kept their Garrisons in Demetrius, Chalcis, and the Agrocorinth; having been always wont to profess, That Greece could never be at Liberty, whilest those places were not free. Also now at last, what else did they seek by this discourse of War with Nabis, than businesses wherewith to find themselves occupied, that so they might have some seeming cause of abiding longer in the Country? But they should do well, if they meant as they spake, to carry their Legions home out of Greece, which could not indeed be free, till their departure. As for Nabis, the Ætolians themselves did promise, and would undertake, That they would either cause him to yield to reason, and relinquishing Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garrison; or else compell him by force of Arms, to submit himself to the good pleasure of all Greece, that was now at unity. These words had been reasonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common Liberty wrought so much with these Ætolians; did their own ravenous desire of oppressing others, and getting unto themselves, that worse would use it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had lost. Neither could they well dissemble this; making it no small part of their Grievance, That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had been covenanted, That the Romans should enjoy the spoil of all, but leave the Towns and Lands in possession of the Ætolians. This, and the remembrance of a thousand mischiefs by them done in former times, made the whole Assembly, especially the Achæans, cry out upon them: entreating the Romans to take such order before they went, that not only Nabis might be compelled to do right; but the Ætolian thieves be enforced to keep home, and leave their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleasure of Titus: who saw, that by discountenancing the Ætolians, He was become the more gracious with all the rest. But whether it pleased him so well that Antiochus his Embassadors did presently after lie hard upon him, to draw the peace to some good conclusion, it may be greatly doubted. He cast them off with a slight answer: telling them, That the ten Embassadors or Counsellors which had been sent unto him from Rome, to be his Assistants in these matters of weight, were now returned home, and that without them it was not in his power to conclude upon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedæmonian War, it was very soon ended. For Titus used the help of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation against Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if he should have had to do with Philip. Besides the Roman Forces, King Eumenes with a Navey, and the Rhodian Fleet, were invited to the Service: as also Philip of Macedon sent aid by Land; doing therein poorly, whether it were to get favour of the Romans; or whether to make one among the number, in seeking Revenge upon Nabis, that had done him injury. But the most forward in this Expedition were the Achæans, who set out ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse. As for the Ætolians, rather to hold good fashion, and found their dispositions, than in hope to speed, their help was required; whereof they excused themselves as well as they thought best. Thus are the Achæans now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; having removed the Ætolians from that degree of favour: like as they themselves hereafter (though not in all haste) shall be supplanted of the same Lacedæmonians, against whom they are now marching.

Some of the Argives, more bold than wise, began a conspiracy against the Lacedæmonians that held their Town; meaning to open their Gates unto the Romans. But e're Titus drew near, they were all detected and slain: excepting a very few, that escaped out of the Town. The fame of this Commotion, caused the Army to march apace toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were at quiet. But there was no stir within the Walls: the execution done upon the first movers, having terrified all the rest of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to assail Nabis in the head of his strength at Lacedæmon, than to consume time about other places; especially at Argos: for the freedom whereof since the War was made, pity it were, that the calamities of the War should thereon fall most heavily.

Nabis had in readiness an Army of fifteen thousand, wherewith to defend himself against these Invaders. Five thousand of them were Mercenaries: the rest, of his own Country, but such as were of all others the worst, as manumised slaves, malefactors and base Peasants, unto whom his Tyrannie was beneficial. Of the good and worthy Citizens he stood in doubt; and since he could not hope to win their love, his meaning was to hold them quiet by fear. He called them all to an assembly, and compassing them round in with his Army, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themselves; they might, he said, hope the better to withstand the common Enemy. But forasmuch as turbulent heads were invited by light occasions, to raise tumults, and work dangerous treasons: it seemed unto him the safest, and (withal) the mildest course to arrest before hand, and put in ward, all those whom he found most reason to suspect. So should he keep them innocent perforce; and thereby preserve not only the City and his own person from danger, but them also from the punishment, which else they might have incurred. Hereupon he cites and apprehends about fourscore of them; whom he leads away to prison, and the next night putteth them all to death. Thus was he sure that they neither should offend, nor yet break loose. As for the death of them, if it should happen to be noised abroad: what could it else do than terrifie the people; who must thereby understand, that it was a mortal crime to be suspected? And to the same purpose his cruelty extended it self unto some poor wretches: whom he accused of a meaning to flie to the Enemy. These were openly whipt through all the streets, and slain. Having thus affrighted the Citizens: He turned the more freely, all his thoughts toward the Enemy, that came on a pace. He welcomed them with a ſally: wherein, as commonly happens, the Souldiers of the Town had the better at firſt; but were at length repelled with loſs. Titus abode not many dayes before Sparta: but over-ran the Country; hoping belike to provoke the Tyrant forth to battle. The Roman Fleet at the ſame time with King Eumenes and the Rhodians, laid ſiege unto Gytheum, the only or principal Town that Nabis had. Likely they were to have taken it by force, when there appeared hope of getting it by treaſon. There were two Governours within the Town equal in authority: whereof the one, either for fear, or deſire of reward, had a purpoſe to let in the Romans. But the other finding what was in hand, and being ſomewhat more faithful, ſlue the Traitor; after whoſe death, he himſelf alone made the better defence. Yet when T. Quintius with part of his Army came thither to Gytheum: this Captain of the Town had not the heart to abide the uttermoſt, and await what either Time or his Maſter might do for him, but was contented to give up the place, yet upon Condition, to depart in ſafety to Sparta with his Garriſon. Pythagoras, the Son-in-law of Nabis, and brother unto his Wife, was come from Argos, whereof he had the Government; with a thouſand Souldiers, Mercenaries, and two thouſand Argives: it being (as may ſeem) the Tyrants purpoſe, to relieve Gytheum; which he thought would have held longer out. But when they heard that it was loſt, then began they to think upon finiſhing the War, by ſome reaſonable Compoſition. Pythagoras therefore was ſent his Embaſſador to Titus: requeſting only that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and ſpeak with him. This was granted. In that Parlee the Tyrant ſpake very reaſonable for himſelf: proving, that he ſuffered wrong, and had done none, and that by many good arguments: whereof the ſum was, That whatſoever they now did, or could object unto him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon he inferred, That neither for this keeping the Town of Argos, nor for any other cauſe by them alledged, they ought to make war upon him, ſince Argos, and all other their allegations whatſoever, had not hindered them, in time of their own need of him, from entring into that League with him: which was never broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quintius was not herewith ſatisfied. He charged him with tyranny: and gave inſtance, as eaſily he might, of divers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points foraſmuch as they knew this Nabis to be guilty, before they made Peace and Confederacy with him; it was expedient, that ſome other cauſe of this Invaſion ſhould be alledged. Whereto he ſaid further, that this Tyrant had occupied Meſſene, a Town Confederate with the Romans: That he had bargained to joyn with Philip; when he was their enemy, not only in League, but alſo in affinity: and that his Fleet had robbed many of their ſhips, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Piracy, ſince in the Articles by Titus propounded unto Nabis, there was no reſtitution mentioned, other than of ſhips, by him taken from the Greeks his neighbours, with whom he had long held War: it may ſeem to have been objected, only by way of Complement, and to enlarge the volume of thoſe complaints, that were otherwiſe very frivolous. As for Meſſene, and the bargain of Alliance made with Philip: they were matters foregoing the League, that was made between the Romans and this Tyrant: and therefore not to have been mentioned. All this it ſeems that Ariſtænus, the Prætor of the Achæans, very well perceived: who therefore doubting leſt the Romans (that were wont to talk ſo much of their own juſtice, honour, and faithful dealing) ſhould now relent, and forbear to moleſt him, who, though a wicked man, was yet their Confederate, and had never done them wrong: framed his diſcourſe to another end. He entreated Nabis to conſider well of his own eſtate: and to ſettle his fortunes, whilſt he might do it without hazard: alledging the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbour-cities, and therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to ſurrender their Eſtates, and lived in great ſecurity, honour, and happineſs, as private men. Thus they diſcourſed until night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquiſh Argos; and requeſted them, to deliver to him in writing their other commands, that he might take counſel with his friends. The iſſue of all was, that, in regard of the charges whereat the Confederates muſt be, for maintenance of an Army to lie in Leaguer all that Winter (as there was no hope of making ſhort work) before the City of Sparta: they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, upon ſuch Conditions as Titus ſhould think meet. Beſides the reſtitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending; Titus propounding many other Conditions to Nabis, and ſome of them very grievous He would not ſuffer the Lacedæmonians to have ought to do in the Iſle of Crete; no, nor to make any Confederacies, nor war, either in that Iſland or elſewhere; not to build any Town or Caſtle upon his own Lands: not to keep any other ſhipping, than two ſmall Barks; beſides many other troubleſome injunctions; with impoſition of an hundred talents in ſilver to be paid out of hand, and fifty talents yearly, for eight years next enſuing, For obſervance of theſe Covenants he demanded five hoſtages, ſuch as he himſelf ſhould name: and one of them to be the Tyrants own Son. If it had been the meaning of Titus, to withdraw the War from Nabis, becauſe it was not grounded upon juſtice: then had it been enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him; which he himſelf did offer, though it were for fear, to deliver up. But if it were thought reſonable, to diſpenſe a little with the Roman faith, in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound unto the ſtate of their beſt friends in Greece, by the extirpation of this Tyranny: then ſhould this enterpriſe, when once it was taken in hand, have been proſecuted unto the very utmoſt. As for this middle courſe which the Romans held: as it was not honourable unto them, to enrich themſelves by the ſpoil of one that had not offended them; nor pleaſing to the Achæans, who judged it ever after a great blemiſh to the noble acts of Titus: ſo did it miniſter unto the Ætolians, and to ſuch as curiouſly pried into the faults of thoſe which took upon them to be Patrons of Greece, no barren ſubject of malicious diſcourſe. For ſince Philip, a King, and deſcended of many famous Kings, might not be ſuffered by theſe Maſterly Romans, to hold any one of thoſe Countrys or Towns in Greece, that had belonged unto his Anceſtors: it was thought very ſtrange, that Lacedæmon, once the moſt famous City among all the Greeks, was by the ſame Romans left in poſſeſſion of a Tyrant, that had uſurped it but yeſterday; and he therein rooted by their authority, as their friend and Confederate. Nabis on the other ſide thought himſelf unmercifully dealt withall, by the ſelf-ſame Romans, whoſe amity he had prefered in time of a doubtful war, before the love and affinity of the Macedonian King, that had committed the City of Argos into his hands. But falſly had he dealt with the Macedonian: and falſly was he dealt with by thoſe, to whom he did betake himſelf. Among theſe Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleaſed him, ſave only that for the baniſhed Lacedæmonians, (of whom a great number were in the Roman Camp; having among them Ageſipolis the natural King of Sparta, that being a young child was driven out by Lycurgus the firſt of the Tyrants) there was made no proviſion, to have them reſtored unto their City and Eſtates; but only leave required for as many of their Wives, as would be ſo contented, to live abroad with them in baniſhment. Wherefore he forbore to give conſent unto theſe demands; and ſuſtained an aſſault or two; hoping belike that the enemies would ſoon be weary. But his fearful nature ſhortly overcame the reſolution, which the ſenſe of theſe injuries had put into him. So yielding unto all that had been propounded, He delivered the hoſtages; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward, He thought the Romans far more wicked than himſelf; and was ready upon the firſt advantage, to do them all the miſchief that he could.

The Argives had heard news that Lacedæmon was even at point of being taken. This erected them, and gave them heart to think upon their own good. So they adventured to ſet upon the Garriſon; which was much weakened, by the remove of the three thouſand carried thence by Pythagoras to help the Tyrant at Sparta. There needed unto their liberty no more, than that all of them jointly ſhould ſet their hands to the getting of it, which no ſooner they did than they obtained it. Preſently after this came T. Quintius to Argos, where he was joyfully welcomed. He was deſervedly acknowledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Citizens had laid hold without ſtaying for him; and that he might the better entitle himſelf thereto, he cauſed the liberty of the Argives to be proclaimed at the Nemæan games; as ratifying it by his authority. The City was annexed again to the Councel of Achaia; whereby the Achæans were not more ſtrengthned, than the Argives themſelves were ſecured from danger of relapſe, into the ſame extremities out of which they had newly eſcaped.

After this, Titus found little buſineſs, or none wherewith to ſet on work his Army in Greece. Antiochus was about to ſend another Embaſſage to Rome, deſiring peace and friendſhip of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance wholly diſpoſed unto quiet, Scipio and the African, that was choſen Conſul at Rome, could not have his deſire, of being ſent Commander into Greece. The unſincere meaning of Antiochus and the tumultuous diſpoſition of the Ætolians, were held as conſiderations worthy of regard: yet not ſufficient cauſes of making war. Neither appeared there any more honeſt way, of confuting the Ætolians, and of throughly perſwading all the Greeks (which was not to be neglected, by thoſe that meant to aſſure unto themſelves the patronage of Greece) that the good of the Country was their ſole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leaving the Nation unto it ſelf, till occaſion ſhould be ripe, and call them over again. Wherefore after Titus had ſpent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, either found, or at any near diſtance appearing, he called an Aſſembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: where he meant to bid them farewell. There he recounted unto them all that paſſed ſince his coming into thoſe parts; and willed them to value the Roman friendſhip, according to the difference of eſtate, wherein the Romans found and left them. Hereto he added ſome wholeſome counſel; touching the moderate uſe of their liberty, and the care which they ought to have of living peaceably and without faction. Laſtly he gave up Acrocorinthus to the Achæans withdrawing thence the Roman Garriſon, and promiſing to do the like (which very ſoon he did) at Chalcis and Demetrias; that ſo it might be known, what lyars the Ætolians were, who had accuſed the Romans, of a purpoſe to retain thoſe places. With joyful acclamations did the Greeks teſtifie their good liking of that which Titus had ſaid and done: as alſo (at his requeſt) they agreed, to ranſome and enlarge all Romans, that had been ſold into their Country by Hannibal.

Thus Titus Crowned his actions in Greece with an happy end: and by leaving the Country before his departure, was urged, left therein behind him the memory of his vertue and benefits, untainted by jealouſie and ſuſpition of any evil meaning. At his coming to the City, He had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodlieſt of all that Rome had until that day beheld. Three daies together the ſhew of the pomp continued: as being ſet out with the ſpoils of a Country, more abundant in things worthy of ſuch a ſpectacle, than any wherein the Romans had before made War. All ſorts of Arms, with Statues and curious pieces of Braſs or Marble, taken from the Enemy, were carried in the firſt daies Pageant. The ſecond day, was brought in all the treaſure of Gold and Silver: Some in the rude Maſs unwrought; ſome in divers ſorts of Coin; and ſome in Veſſels of ſundry kinds, that were the more highly prized by the workmanſhip. Among theſe were ten ſhields, all of Silver; and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himſelf entered the City in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and fourteen Crowns of Gold, beſtowed upon him by divers Cities. There were alſo led the beaſts for Sacrifice, the Priſoners, and the hoſtages: among which, Demetrius the Son of King Philip, and Armenes the Son of Nabis, were Principal. After him followed his Army; and (which added much grace, and good liking to the ſhew) the Roman Captives, by his procurement redeemed from ſlavery in Greece.

Not long after this triumph, He procured audience of the Senate for many Embaſſages, that were come out of Greece and Aſia. They had all very favourable anſwers, excepting thoſe of King Antiochus: whom the Senate would not hear, but referred over to T. Quintius, and the ten that had been his Counſellors; becauſe there buſineſs was ſaid to be ſomewhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embaſſadors wondered. They ſaid unto Titus and his Aſſociates, that they could not diſcern wherein conſiſted any perplexity of their meſ-

ſage. For all treaties of peace and friendſhip, were either between the Victor and the vanquiſhed; between thoſe, that having warred together, were upon equal terms of advantage; or between thoſe, that had lived alwaies in good agreement, without any quarrel. Unto the Victor, they ſaid, that the vanquiſhed muſt yield; and patiently endure the impoſition of ſome Covenants, that elſe might ſeem unreaſonable. Where War had been made, and no advantage gotten: there was it uſual to demand and make reſtitutions of things and places claimed, gotten or loſt; accordingly as both parts could agree. But between thoſe which had never fallen out, there ought no Conditions of eſtabliſhing friendſhip to be propoſed: ſince it was reaſonable, that each part ſhould hold their own; and neither carry it ſelf as ſuperiour to the other, in preſcribing ought that might be troubleſome. Now of this laſt kind, was the league and friendſhip that had been ſo long in concluſion, betwixt Antiochus and the Romans. Which being ſo: they held it ſtrange, that the Romans ſhould thus inſiſt on points no way concerning them, and take upon them to preſcribe unto the King, what Cities of Aſia he ſhould ſet at liberty; from what Cities they would give him leave to exact his wonted Tributes; either putting or not putting his Garriſons into them, as the Senate ſhould think fit. Hereto Quintius anſwered, that ſince they went ſo diſtinctly to work, He would alſo do the like. Wherefore he propounded unto them two Conditions, and gave them their choice whether to except; Either that it ſhould be lawful for the Romans to take part in Aſia with any that ſhould ſeek their friendſhip; Or if King Antiochus miſliked this, and would have them forbear to meddle in Aſia, that then he ſhould abandon whatſoever he had gotten in Europe. This was plain dealing, but no reaſonable nor pertinent anſwer, to that which the Kings Embaſſadors had propounded. For if the Romans might be hired to abſtain from Aſia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately won in Europe, then did not the affairs of Smyrna, Lampſacus, or any other Aſiatiques, whom they were pleaſed to reckon as their Confederates, bind them in honour to make War with a King that ſought their love, and had never done them injury. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great ſhame be ſo baſe, as to deliver up unto them the City of Lyſimachia, whereon he had of late been at ſo much coſt; in building it up even from the foundation, and re-peopling it with Inhabitants, that had all been diſperſed, or captive to the Barbarians. And ſo much the Embaſſadors with great indignation alledged: ſaying, That Antiochus deſired friendſhip of the Romans; but ſo, as it might ſtand with his honour. Now in point of honour the Romans took upon them as if their cauſe were far the ſuperiour. For it was, they ſaid, their purpoſe to ſet at liberty thoſe Towns which the King would oppreſs and hold in ſubjection: eſpecially ſince thoſe Towns were of Greekiſh blood and language; and fell, in that regard under the patronage which Rome had afforded unto all Greece beſides. By this colour they might ſoon have left Antiochus King of not many ſubjects on the hither ſide of Euphrates. Neither did they forbear to ſay, That unleſs he would quit what he held in Europe, it was their meaning not only to protect thoſe which relied upon them in Aſia, but therein to make new Alliances: namely (as might be underſtood) with ſuch as were his ſubjects. Wherefore they urged his Embaſſadors to come to a point, and tell them plainly which of theſe two Conditions their King would accept. For lack of a pleaſing anſwer, which the Embaſſadors could not hereto make, little wanted of giving preſently defiance to the King. But they ſuffered themſelves to be intreated, and were contented once again to ſend over P. Villius, and others that had been already with the King at Lyſimachia; by whom they might receive a final anſwer, whether theſe demands made by Quintius and his Aſſociates would be accepted, yea, or no. By this reſpite of time, and the fruitleſs Treaties enſuing, Antiochus got the leiſure of two years; or thereabouts, to prepare for War; finding in the Romans all that while, no diſpoſition to let him live in peace.

SECT. V.

Of the long Wars which the Romans had with the Gauls, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. Portius Cato. Injuries done by Maſaniſſa to the Carthaginians, that ſue to the Romans for juſtice in vain.

THE Inſubrians, Bojians, and other of the Ciſalpine Gaules, together with the Ligurians; made often and (in a manner) continual war upon the Romans in Italy, even from ſuch time as Hannibal and his brother Mago departed thence, until ſuch time as they themſelves were utterly ſubdued: which was not, before the Romans were almoſt at the very height of the Empire. Theſe Nations, having ſerved under Mago for wages, and afterwards having gotten Amilcar a Carthaginian, to be Leader unto them all, as hath already been ſhewed; by this their fellowſhip in Arms, grew to be ſuch willing partakers each of others fortune, that ſeldom afterwards either the Gauls or Ligurians did ſtir alone: but that their Companions, hearing it, were ready to ſecond them. How the Romans firſt prevailed, and got large poſſeſſion in Gallia Ciſalpina, now called Lumbardie: it hath been long ſince rehearſed between the firſt and ſecond Punick Wars. As alſo it hath ſince appeared, how they loſt the greateſt part of their hold in that Country, by means of Hannibal his paſſage there through. Neither is it likely that the re-conqueſt would have been more difficult or tedious unto the Romans, than was the firſt purchaſe: if, beſides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed unto this war, had not been diſtracted by the Ligurians: that alwaies made them to proceed warily, having an eye to the danger at their backs. The Ligurians were a ſtout Nation, light and ſwift of body; well practiſed in laying ambuſhes, and not diſcouraged with any overthrow, but forthwith ready to fight again. Their Country was mountainous, rough, woody, and full of ſtraight and dangerous paſſages. Few good Towns they had: but many Caſtles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: ſo as without much labour, they could neither be taken or beſieged. They were alſo very poor; and had little or nothing that might give contentment unto a victorious Army that ſhould ſpoil their Land. In theſe reſpects, they ſerved excellently well to train up the Roman Souldiers to hardneſs and military patience: teaching them (beſides other exerciſes ercises of War) to endure much, and live contented with a little. Their quarrel to Rome, grew partly from their love unto the Gaules, their neighbours and companions: partly from their delight in robbing and spoiling the Territory of their borderers, that were subject unto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the War which they had begun, seems to have been grounded upon the Condition of all Salvages: To be friends or foes, by custom, rather than by Judgement: and to acknowledge no such vertue in Leagues, or formal conclusions of peace, as ought to hinder them from using their advantage, or taking revenge of injuries when they return to mind. This quality is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Wars between them and any of their neighbours, do use commonly this answer, It hath still been the custom for us and them, to fight one against the other.

Divers overthrows, though none that were great, these Ligurians gave unto the Romans: but many more and greater they received. Often they sought peace, when they found themselves in distress, and brake it again as often, when they thought it profitable so to do. The best was, that as their Countrey was a good place of exercise unto the Romans, so out of their own Country they did little harm: not sending any great Armies far from home; perhaps, because they knew not how to make War, save on their own ground.

The Country of Spain, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italy that became subject unto the Romans: so was it the last of all their Provinces, which was wholly and throughly by them subdued. It is likened in figure by some Geographers unto an Oxe-hide: and the Romans found in it the property of that Oxe-hide which Calanus the Indian shewed unto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For trading upon any side of it, the further parts would rise from the ground. And thus was it with Spain. Seldom did it happen that those parts from which the Roman Armies lay fartheſt, were not up in rebellion. The Spaniards were a very hard Nation, and easily stirred up to arms; but had not much knowledge in the art of war, nor any good Captains. They wanted also (which was their principal hindrance) good intelligence among themselves: and being divided into many small Signiories, that had little other communion than of language, they seldom or never provided in general for the common good of their Country; but made it their chief care, each of them to look unto their own Territory. Such private respects made them often to fall asunder, when many had united themselves together, for chasing out of the Romans. And these were the causes of their often overthrows: as desire of liberty, rather then complaint of any wrong done to them, was the cause of their often taking arms.

The Carthaginians had been accustomed, to make evaculation of this Cholerick Spanish humour; by employing, as Mercenaries in their wars abroad, those that were most likely to be unquiet at home. They had also taken Souldiers from one part of the Country, and used them in another: finding means to pay them all, out of the profits which they raised upon the whole Country; as being far better husbands, and of more dexterity than were the Romans, in that kind. But contrariwise, the Romans, using the service of their own Legions, and of their sure friends the Latines, had little business for the Spaniards; and therefore were fain to have much business with them. Spain was too far distant, and withall too great for them to send over Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the course that they took in Italy. Wherefore it remained, that they should always maintain such Armies in the Country, as might serve to hold in obedience perforce; and such heedful Captains as might be still ready to oppose the Barbarians in their first Commotion. This they did, and thereby held the Country; though seldom in peace.

Very soon after the departure of Scipio, there was raised War in Spain against the Romans, even upon the same general ground, that was the foundation of all the Spanish Wars following. It was thought unreasonable, that the Spaniards should one while help the Carthaginians against the Romans, and another while the Romans against the Carthaginians; basely forgetting to help themselves against those that were strangers, yet usurped the Dominion over them. But the forces which Scipio had left behind him in that Country, being well acquainted with the manner of War in those parts, suppressed this rebellion by many Victories: and, together with subjection, brought peace upon the Country; which lasted five years. This Victory of the Romans, though it happily ended the War: yet left it still remaining the cause of the War; which after five years brake out again. The Spaniards fought a battle with the Roman Pro-consul, whom they slew; and had a great Victory, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happy success of their Wars in Greece, made the Romans think it enough to send thither two Prætors, and with each of them some two Legions. These did somewhat: yet not so much, but that M. Portius Cato, who was Consul the year following, and sent unto that Province; found at his coming little less to do, than the reconquering of all Spain. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one mind: some were faithful to Rome; and some were idle beholders of the pains that others took. Yet when Cato had won a great Victory upon the chiefest of them, they rose against him in many parts of the Country, and put him unto much new trouble. Whilst he was about to make a journey against those that were as yet unsubdued: some of the lately vanquished, were even ready to rebell. He therefore disarmed them; which they took so heavily, that many of them slew themselves for very grief. Hearing of this, and well understanding that such desperation might work dangerous effects: He called unto him the principal among them: and commending unto them peace and quietness, which they never had disturbed but unto their own great loss, He prayed them to devise what course might be taken for holding them assured unto Rome, without further trouble. None of them could, or would give counsel in a matter of this nature. Having therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding their invention barren in this kind of Subject; He gave express charge, That upon a day appointed they should throw down the Walls of all their Towns. Afterwards he carryed the war about from place to place; and with singular industry finished it in short time. Neither thought he it any disgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an Army of the Celtiberians, against other of their Countrymen: excusing the indignity, such as it seemed, seemed, with a jest, That if he were vanquished and slain, then should he need to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victory, He could pay them with the enemies money. Finally, He brought the War to so good end, that in long time after, though Spain were often troublesome, yet was it in no danger of being lost. He increased also the publick Revenues in that Province, by causing some Mines of Iron and Silver to be wrought, that had before lain unregarded. Herein he did benefit the common-wealth by a vertue much agreeable to his own peculiar disposition.

For this M. Cato was not only very notable in the Art of War, which might well be then termed the occupation of the Romans, but so well furnished with all other useful qualities, that very little was wanting in him which might seem requisite to the accomplishment of a perfect man. He was very skilful in the Roman Laws, a man of great Eloquence, and not unprofitable in any business either private or publick. Many books he wrote; whereof the principal were, of the Roman Antiquities, and of Husbandry. In matter of Husbandry he was notable, and thereby most increased his substance; being of a mean birth, and the first of his house. Strong of body he was, and exceeding temperate: so as he lived in perfect health to very old age. But that which most commended him unto the better sort of the Romans, was his great sincerity of life, abstinence from bribes, and fashioning himself to the antient laudable Customes of the City: Herein he had merited singular commendations, if the vehemency of his nature had not caused him to malign the vertue of that noble Stipio the African, and some other worthy men; that were no less honest than himself, though far less rigid, and more gallant in behaviour. Otherwise, he was a very good Citizen, and one of such temper, that he could fashion himself to all occasions; as if he were never out of his Element. He loved business so well, or rather hated vice so earnestly; that even unto the end of his life, He was exercised in defending himself, or accusingothers. For at the age of fourscore and six years, he pleaded in his own defence: and four years after, he accused Sorgius Galba unto the people. So began the Nobility of Cato his family; which ended in his great grand-child M. Cato the Utican: one that being of like vertue and fervency, had all his good purposes dasht, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of such nobility and greatness as this his Ancestor had continually vexed.

The Spanish Wars, after Cato his departure out of the Country, though they were not very dangerous, yet were they many: and the Country seldom free from insurrection, in one part or other. The Roman Prætors therefore, of which two every year were sent over Commanders into Spain (that was divided into Governments) did rarely fail of such work, as might afford the honour of Triumph. One slew thirteen thousand Spaniards in a battle: another took fifty Towns: and a third enforced many States of the Country to sue for peace. Thus every one of them, or most of them, did some laudable service; and yet so, that commonly there were of Men, Towns, and People, new that rebelled, instead of the old that were slain, taken, or reclaimed. At the causes hereof, I have already pointed; and therefore think it enough to say, That the business in Spain required not the imployment of a Roman Consul, from such time as Cato thence departed, untill the Numantian War broke out, which was very long after.

In all other Countries to the West of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had peace; but so had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barchine House promised all felicity which Rome could grant, unto themselves and their obedient City: Masaniſſa fell to disputing with the sword, about the title to the best part of their Lands. He began with Emporia, a fruitful Region about the lesser Syrtis: wherein, among other Cities, was that of Leptis, which daily payed a Talent unto Carthage for Tribute. This Country the Numidian challenged, and by winning some part of it, seemed to better his claim unto the whole. He had a great advantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any War, without leave obtained from their Masters the Romans. They had none other way of redress, than by sending to Rome their Complaint of his doings. And surely they wanted not good matter to alledge, if the Judges had been impartial. For besides that Scipio, in limiting out to them their bounds, had left them the possession of this Country: Masaniſſa himself, now very lately pursuing a Rebel that fled out of his Kingdom, desired leave of the Carthaginians, for himself to pass through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwise been questionable) that the Country was theirs. This notwithstanding, Masaniſſa had herewith to justifie his proceedings, especially unto the Roman Senate. He gave the Fathers to understand by his Embassadours, what faithless people the Carthaginians were, and how ill affected to the State of Rome. There had lately been sent unto him from Hannibal, one that should perswade them to take part with Antiochus. This man they had examined upon some suspition of his errand; yet neither arresting him nor his ship, had thereby afforded him means to escape. Hence the Numidians concluded, that certainly it was their purpose to rebell; and therefore good policy to keep them down.

As for the Country of Emporia: it had alwaies, he said, been theirs that were able to hold it by strong hand: and so belonged sometime unto the Numidian Kings: though now of late it was in possession of the Carthaginians. But if the truth were known, the Citizens of Carthage had not any very warrantable title unto any more ground, than that whereon their City stood: or scarcely to so much. For they were no better than strangers in Africk, that had gotten leave there to build upon so much ground, as they could encompass with an Oxe hide cut into small throngs, Whatsoever they held without such a compass, was purchased by fraud, and wrongfull encroachments. This considered, Masaniſſa requested of the Senate, that they would not adjudge unto such usurpers, the Country sometimes appertaining to the Ancestors of him their assured friend. The Romans having heard these allegations on both sides, found the matter so doubtful, that they could not on the sudden tell what to determine. Wherefore, because they would do nothing rashly: they sent over three Embassadours, of whom P. Scipio the African was one of the chief, to decide the controversie: yet secretly giving them instructions, to leave all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embassadors followed their directions, and left all doubtful. So was it likely, that Masaniſſa with a strong Army should quickly quickly prevail againſt thoſe that could no more than talk of their right, and exclaim againſt the wrong. By ſuch Arts were the Carthaginians held, not only from ſtirring in favour of King Antiochus, if they had thereto any diſpoſition: but were prepared by little and little, unto their final deſtruction: that came upon them, when the Romans had leiſure to expreſs the utmoſt of their hatred.

SECT. VI.

The Ætolians labour to provoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis, to War upon the Romans, by whom they hold themſelves wronged and diſgraced. Nabis beſiegeth Gyttheum, and waſting ſome part of Achæa. The exact skill of Philopœmen in advantage of ground: whereby he utterly vanquiſheth Nabis. Antiochus being denied peace of the Romans, joyns with the Ætolians. The Ætolians ſuprize Demetrius, and by killing Nabis, their Confederate, ſeize upon Sparta. But they are driven out by the Citizens: who at Philopœmen his perſwaſions annex themſelves to the Achæans.

ALl Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed: it grieved much the Ætolians to think, that they who had promiſed unto themſelves the whole ſpoil of Philip, and the higheſt reputation among the Greeks; were not only diſappointed of their covetous hopes, but quite forſaken by their ancient depandants; and of all other the moſt unregarded. Yet was there made a great acceſs to their Eſtate; by adding much unto them, of that which had been taken from the Macedonian. This might well have ſufficed them, if their deſires had not been immoderate; and their indignation more vehement, than their deſire. But they were not ſo pleaſed with that which they had, ſince they thought it no more than part of their due: as they were vexed with the denial of that which they claimed, and with finding themſelves to be wholly diſeſteemed, wherein they thought that they had unſufferable wrong. Wherefore they deviſed, in a Parliament which they ſhortly held, by what means they beſt might right themſelves; and give the Romans ſorrowful knowledge of the difference between their enmity and friendſhip. To this purpoſe they ſoon agreed, as concurring all in one affection; That they would not only perſwade Antiochus to make war upon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refuſed peace; but that they would deal with the King of Macedon their ancient enemy, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon, to joyn all together in a new Confederacy: whoſe joynt forces could not in all likelihood, but far ſurmount thoſe of the Romans Achæans, Rhodians, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterpriſe, which the Ætolians took in hand; and well beſeeming them, for they were great darers. They ſent Embaſſadors to all theſe Kings, with perſwaſions, as they thought moſt forcible. But Philip was irreſolute; and Antiochus willing to try firſt all other courſes. Nabis the Lacedæmonian, who neither (as Philip) had loſt much, nor (as Antiochus) was in fear of any War; yet ſhewed himſelf of all other the moſt forward: and not ſtaying ſo much as to ſeek any good pretence, began immediately to lay ſiege unto Gyttheum, that had been lately taken from him by the Romans. The Achæans, to whoſe care chiefly Titus at his departure had commended the Affairs of Peloponneſus, were not ſlow to admoniſh Nabis of his duty: neither would they have ſtaid long from repreſſing his violence by open war; had not ſome of them thought it wiſdom to ask Counſel of the Romans, and particularly of T. Quintius, before they engaged themſelves in a buſineſs of ſuch importance. Whilſt thus they ſpent the time in ſending Embaſſadors, and were adviſed by Quintius, to let all alone, and to wait for the coming of the Roman Forces, that would ſhortly be amongſt them: Nabis was bold to give juſter cauſe of complaint, by waſting their own Territory.

Philopœmen was then the Prætor of the Achæans, who had long been abſent in Crete; making War there, for his minds ſake and recreation. Unto him the Achæans, referred themſelves, giving him leave to order the War at his pleaſure; either ſtaying till the Romans came, or doing otherwiſe, as he ſhould think beſt. He made all haſte to relieve Gyttheum by Sea; fearing leſt the Town, and the Achæans Carriſon within it, ſhould be loſt, if he uſed any delay. But Philopœmen was ſo bad a Sea-man, that he knew not a ſtrong Ship from a rotten. He made a Quadrireme Gally his Admiral, that had fourſcore years agoe been counted a gallant Veſſel in the Navie of Antigonus Gonatus. Neither was the reſt of his Fleet ſo good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedæmonian. Only it fell out well, that he committed himſelf to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with her Wings, than with her Talons. For his Admiral Gally was ſtemmed at the firſt; and being rotten with age, ſprang ſo many leaks, and took in water ſo faſt, that ſhe was fain to yield without further reſiſtance. When the reſt of the Fleet ſaw what was become of their Admiral, all were preſently diſcouraged, and ſaved themſelves with what ſpeed they could. But Philopœmen was not herewith daunted. If he had failed in Sea-ſervice, which was none of his Occupation, He ſaid, that he would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Army from the ſiege of Gyttheum, to ſtop the Achæans, if they ſhould invade his Country. But upon theſe which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopœmen came unexpected; that Nabis would have been ready for them ſo ſoon. Or if he ſhould come from Gyttheum with any part of his Forces: yet was it thought that he muſt over-take them, and charge them in Rere. They marched therefore almoſt ſecurely, in a long troop, reaching ſome five miles; having Horſe, and the greateſt part of their Auxiliaries at their backs, to bear off any ſudden impreſſion. But Nabis, who formerly underſtood, or at leaſt ſuſpected, what courſe they would take, appeared in the front of them with all his Army; encamped there where they meant to have lodged. It was the cuſtome of Philopœmen, when he walked, or travelled abroad with his friends, to mark the ſcituation of the Country about him; and to diſcourſe what might befal an Army marching the ſame way. He would ſuppoſe, that having with him there ſuch a number of Souldiers, ordered and ſorted in ſuch manner, and marching towards

ſuch a place; he were upon that ground encountred by a greater Army, or better prepared to fight. Then would he put the queſtion, Whether it were fit for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a ſtand? What piece of Ground it were meet for him to ſeize upon? and what manner he might beſt do it? In what ſort he ſhould order his men? Where beſtow his Carriages, and under what Guard? In what ſort encamp himſelf? And which way march the day following. By ſuch continual meditation he was grown ſo perfect, that he did never meet with any difficulty, whence he could not explicate himſelf and his followers: At this time he made a ſtand: and having drawn up his Rere, He encamped near unto the place where he was; within half a mile of the Enemy. His Baggage with all thereto belonging, he beſtowed on a Rock; encompaſſing them round with his Souldiers. The ground was rough, the wayes bad, and the day almoſt quite ſpent; ſo as Nabis could not at the preſent greatly moleſt him. Both Armies were to water at one Brook; whereto the Achæans lay the nearer. This watering therefore was firſt to miniſter the like occaſion of skirmiſh. Philoræmen underſtood this; and laid an ambuſh in place convenient; whereinto the Mercenaries of Nabis fell, and were ſlaughtered in great numbers. Preſently after this, he cauſed one of his own Auxiliaries to go to the Tyrant as a fugitive, and tell him, That the Achæans had a purpoſe to get between him and Lacedæmon; whereby they would both debar his return into the City, and withal encourage the People to take Arms for the Recovery of their Freedom. The Tyrant hearing this, marched haſtily away; and left his Camp, which hardly otherwiſe would have been forced. Some Companies he made to ſtay behind, and ſhew themſelves upon the Rampart, thereby to conceal his departure. But Philohæmen was not ſo to be beguiled. He eaſily won the Camp, and gave chaſe to Nabis: whoſe followers being overtaken, had no courage to turn about and make head. The enemies being thus diſperſed, and fled into woods where they lay in covert all that day: Philopæmen conceived aright, that their fear and neceſſity would teach them to creep homewards, and ſave themſelves when it grew dark. Wherefore in the evening, when he had gathered together all thoſe of his light armature, which had followed the chaſe whilſt it was day, he led forth the reſt that had well refreſhed themſelves, and occupied the two moſt ordinary paſſages unto Lacedæmon. So Nabis his men, when it was dark night, perceiving in Philopæmens Camp great ſtore of lights; thought that all had been at reſt: and therefore adventured to make an eſcape home. But they were ſo way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirty days together after this, did Philopæmen waſte the Country round about, whilſt Nabis durſt not iſſue forth of his Town; and then returned home, leaving the Tyrant in a manner without forces.

The Roman Embaſſadors were then in Greece, and T. Quintius among them, labouring to make their party ſtrong againſt Antiochus and Nabis, whom they knew to be ſolicited by the Ætolians. Very fair countenance they alſo made unto Philip; and with comfortable promiſes drew him to make ſhew, whatſoever he thought, of good correſpondence. They promiſed to reſtore unto him his Son: and were contented to let him hope, that he ſhould receive other favours at their hands; and regain poſſeſſion of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for War againſt Antiochus in Greece, whileſt their Embaſſadors that were with him in Aſia, denied otherwiſe to grant him Peace, than if he would yield unto one of the Conditions, by them ſo often propounded. The long abſence of this King in Syria, where he had accompliſhed the marriage between Ptolomy and his Daughter; together with the death of young Antiochus the Kings Son, which hapned during the Treaty, and hindered, or ſeemed to hinder the King from giving audience in perſon to the Embaſſadors; cauſed them to return home to Rome; as uncertain of their anſwer as at their ſetting forth. One thing that might have been, and partly was, beneficial unto them, they brought to paſs during their abode in Epheſus; either by cunning, or (as Livy rather think) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they diſcourſed often with him, and blamed him for having thus fled unto Antiochus upon a cauſeleſs ſuſpition wherein he held the Romans; that honoured his vertue, and intended him no harm. Many have affirmed that P. Scipio was one of theſe Embaſſadors; and that he, among other diſcourſes with Hannibal, demanded one, Which of all the famous Captaines that had lived, Hannibal judged to be the moſt worthy? So Hannibal gave to Alexander of Macedon the firſt place: to Pyrrhus the ſecond: and the third he challenged unto himſelf. But Scipio, who thought his own title better than that it ought to be ſo forgotten, asked yet further, What wouldſt thou have ſaid then Hannibal; if thou hadſt vanquiſhed me? To whom the Carthaginian replied, Then would not I have given the firſt place to Alexander, but have claimed it as due unto himſelf. Now whether this were ſo or otherwiſe, the often and friendly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embaſſadors, made him ſuſpected of Antiochus; who therefore did forbear a while to uſe his counſel. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceived this change in the King, and plainly deſiring him to tell the cauſe thereof, heard what it was; he eaſily recovered his former grace and credit. For he told how his Father had cauſed him to ſwear at the Altars, when he was a little Boy, that he ſhould never be friend unto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vain ſurmizes: but to know thus much, that ſo long as he thought upon War with Rome, ſo long would Hannibal do him all good ſervice: whereas contrariwiſe, if he intended to make peace, then ſhould it behoove him to uſe the counſel of ſome other man.

The Ætolians, and their Friends, were leſs buſie all this while, in making their party ſtrong againſt the Romans, than were the Romans in muſtering up their friends in Greece. They had ſo often dealt with Antiochus, vaunting much of their own forces, and arrogating to themſelves the honour of the Victory againſt Philip, that finally they prevailed with him; eſpecially when the Roman Embaſſadors had left him without hope of peace, unleſs he would buy it at too dear a rate. They dealt in like ſort with the Macedonian. But in vain. He underſtood the Romans and himſelf too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improve their own Forces to the uttermoſt: as knowing that all the burthen muſt lie upon Antiochus and themſelves without help from any, ſave only from ſome few that were diſcontented in Greece. Whilſt they were about this, and had with them an Embaſſadors of the King Antiochus, that animated them to a resolution, the Athenian Embassadors, whom Titus had requested to be at their meeting, stayed their vehemency a little; by exhorting them not to conclude rashly, without first hearing the Romans, that lay near at hand. For want of a ready Answer hereto, they were contented to approve the motion. Titus hearing this, thought the business worthy of his presence. For since Antiochus had now declared himself against the Romans, it would be no small piece of service, to withdraw from his friendship, those by whose encouragement he had made the adventure. Wherefore he came to their Panætolium, or great Assembly of the Nation; where he forgot nothing that might serve to appease them. He willed them to consider the weight of the enterprise which they took in hand; whereby Greece was like to become a Champaign-field, on which to the ruine of the Country, the Romans and King Antiochus, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Mastery: the Ætolians, as Masters in that kind of Fence, setting them on, and becoming * the Sticklers. As for those grievances which did thus exasperate them, and urge them to such violent courses, he willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better they might do, to send Embassadors to Rome, that should either plead their Right in the Senate, or (if their Right unto the places which they claimed, were not good) make request to have what they desired: than thus to set the World in an uproar, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what he said or could say, it skilled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embassador of the King, whose help they had sought, wait so long for an answer, and stay doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it news unto them to hear those comfortable words; that by sending to Rome, they might happen to obtain what they desired; either as their Right, or else by way of Favour. For with such Terms had they been feasted once already: and were by the Senate rejected unto Titus: who having it in his own power, gave them no satisfaction; yet would now again refer them to the Senate. This were only loss of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore, without more ado they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the Great should be intreated to come over into Greece, as well to set the Country at liberty, as also to decide the Controversies dependeng between the Romans and the Ætolians. Such a Decree they would not have made, had they not understood the Kings mind before. Having made it, they forgot no point of bravery, whereby to vaunt themselves to the Kings Embassadors, and against the Romans. Titus desired of their Prætor to let him see a Copy of this new Decree. The Prætor answered, That then he had other things to do: but that this Decree, and their further answer, they would shortly let him know, if he came to their Camp in Italy upon the River of Tibris. Gentler words would have done better, as the Ætolians are like to understand hereafter. But having thus begun, they meant henceforth to go roundly to work. The care of the War they referred unto the more private Council of their Nation; that no occasion might slip, in waiting for the Authority of a General Assembly. The Apocleti (so were the privy Council of Ætolia called) went as hotly to work, as any of the youngest heads could have done. They laid a Plot how to get into their hands at one time the Towns of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they sent men for the purpose. Demetrias they took upon the sudden; entring some of them as Friends, to conduct home a principal man of the City: who for speaking words against T. Quintius, had been driven to flee thence; but was by intercession of those that loved him, again recalled. His Ætolian Companions, that were not many, seized upon a Gate; whereat they let in a Troop which they had left not far behind them: and so fell to murdering the chief of the Roman Faction. At Chalcis they sped not so well. Thither also they had a banished man to bring home: but they came so strong, that their purpose was discovered, and the Town prepared to defend it self against them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this Hostility, they gave a gentle answer, saying, That they came not thither as Enemies, but only to deliver the Town from the Romans; who more insolently domineered over it, than ever the Macedonians had done. By which Rhetorick they prevailed no more than they could do by plain force. For the Towns-men replyed, That they neither found any abridgement of their liberty, nor needed any Garrison to keep them from the Romans, from whom they neither feared any danger, nor received injury. So this business was dasht. The attempt upon Sparta was more strange and desperate. Nabis their good Friend was Lord of the Town, stiling himself King, but more truly by all Men called Tyrant. He had well-near lost all, by means of the overthrow which Philopœmen had lately given him: since he durst not stir abroad; and daily expected the mischief that on all sides threatned him. Wherefore he sent Messengers, one after another, to the Ætolians; requesting them, That as he had not been slow to stir in their behalf, but adventured himself upon the utmost of danger, when all others were backward; so they would be pleased to send him what help they might, since his bad fortune had caused him presently to need it. It hath been often said, That the ravenous Ætolians were only true to themselves, and regarded neither faith nor friendship, otherwise, than as it might conduce to their own ends. And so dealt they now. For since Nabis his Mercenary Forces, which upheld his Tyranny, were in a manner consumed: they thought it expedient for their Estate, and by so doing, to assure Lacedæmon unto themselves. To this purpose they sent thither Alexamenus, one whom they thought a man fit for such a work. To him they gave a thousand Foot, and thirty Horse, chosen for the purpose. These thirty were by Democritus the Prætor, brought into the Counsel of the Apocleti, where they were commanded to be no wiser than they should be, nor to think that they were sent to make War with the Achæans, or to do ought else, save only what Alexamenus should command them; which were it never so desperate, and in seeming against all reason; yet must they understand, that unless they performed it, they should have no good welcome home. So Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom he encouraged with brave words, telling him that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to cover all the Land and Sea with his mighty Armies; and that the Romans were, like to find other manner of work, than of late with Philip: since the Elephants of this Great King, without other help, would suffice to tread them down. As for the Ætolians, he ſaid that if need ſhould ſo require, they would preſently ſend away to Lacedæmon all the Forces that they could raiſe: But that they were very deſirous at the preſent, to make as goodly a muſter as they could, before the great King; which cauſed them to ſend him thither afore with no greater company. Hereupon he willed Nabis to take heart; bring forth his men, that had been long pent up in the City; and train them without the Walls: as if ſhortly he ſhould employ them in work of Conqueſt, rather than Defence. Nabis was glad of this: and daily exerciſed his men in the field: riding up and down with this Alexamenus, and no more than three or four Horſe about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exerciſe, Alexamenus made it his faſhion, to ſtep aſide alone to his Ætolians, and ſay ſomewhat as he thought fit: which done, he ſtill returned again to Nabis. But when he ſaw time for the great work which he had in hand; he then went aſide to his thirty Horſemen, and bade them remember the task enjoyned them at their ſetting forth; telling them, That they were all in caſe of baniſhed men, unleſs they would anon come up to him, and help him to finiſh that which they ſhould ſee him take in hand. Herewithall the Tyrant began to draw near them: and Alexamenus making towards him, charged him on the ſudden, and ſtruck him down. The thirty Ætolians never ſtood to deliberate upon the matter, but all flew in; and, before any ſuccour could arrive, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Preſently upon the fact committed, the Tyrant his Mercenaries ran unto the dead body: where, inſtead of ſeeking revenge, they ſtood fooliſhly gazing as beholders. Alexamenus with his Ætolians, haſted into the City, and ſeized on the Palace: where he fell to ranſacking the Treaſure; and troubled himſelf with none other care, as though all were already done. Such of his followers as were diſperſed in the Town, did alſo the like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens: who ſeeing themſelves free by the death of the Tyrant, could not endure to ſee thoſe that had ſlain him, begin to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the Town was ſhortly in Arms: and for lack of another Captain, they took a little Boy of the Royal Stock, that had been brought up with Nabis his Children, whom they mounted upon a good Horſe, and made him their Chief. So they fell upon the Ætolians that were idly ſtraggling about; and put them all to the Sword. Alexamenus with not many of his Company, were ſlain in keeping the Citadel: and thoſe few that eſcaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magiſtrates; who ſold them as bond-ſlaves. In this doubtful eſtate of things at Lacedæmon, Philopœmen came thither: who calling out the chief of the City, and ſpeaking ſuch words unto them as Alexamenus ſhould have done after he had ſlain the Tyrant: eaſily perſwaded them for their own good and ſafety, to incorporate themſelves with the Achæans. Thus by the enterpriſe, no leſs diſhonourable than difficult, of the Ætolians: and the ſmall, but effectual travel of Philopœmen, the Achæans made a notable purchaſe: and Lacedæmon that had hitherto been governed by Kings, or by Tyrants that called themſelves Kings, became the Member of a Common-wealth, whereof the Name had ſcarce any reputation, when Sparta ruled over all Greece.

SECT. VII.

Antiochus, perſwaded by Thoas the Ætolian, comes over into Greece ill attended. Sundry paſſages between Him, the Ætolians, Chalcidians, and others. He wins Chalcis, and thereby the whole Iſle of Eubœa. The vanity of the Kings Embaſſadors and the Ætolians, with the civil Anſwer of Titus to their diſcourſe, before the Achæans. That it concerned the Greeks to have deſired Peace between the Romans and Antiochus, as the beſt aſſurance of their own Liberty. Of many petty Eſtates that fell to the King. Of Aminander; and an idle vanity by which King Philip was loſt. Hannibal gives good counſel in vain. Some Towns won in Theſſaly. The King retires to Chalcis, where he marrieth a young Wife, and revels away the reſt of Winter. Upon the coming of the Roman Conſul, all forſake Antiochus. He with two Thouſand Ætolians, keeps the Straights of Thermopylæ. He is beaten, and flees into Aſia; leaving all Greece unto the Victors.

ANtiochus was troubled much in Aſia, with Smyrna and Lampſacus, that would not hearken to any Compoſition. He thought it neither ſafe nor honourable, to leave them Enemies behind him: and to win them by force, was more than hitherto he was able. Yet was he deſirous with all ſpeed convenient, to ſhew himſelf in Greece: where he had been told, that his preſence would effect wonders. It was ſaid, that in all the Country there was a very ſmall number, which bore hearty affections unto the Romans: That Nabis was already up in Arms: That Philip was like a Bandog in a Chain, deſiring nothing more, than to break looſe: and that the Ætolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could have done, were ready to conſer upon him the greatneſs, which they had unworthily beſtowed upon inſolent Barbarians. Of all this, the leaſt part was true. Yet that which was true, made ſuch a noiſe, as added credit unto all the reſt. Whilſt therefore the King was thinking to ſend Hannibal into Africk, there to moleſt the Romans, and ſo give him the better leiſure of uſing his own opportunities in Greece: Thoas the Ætolian came over to him, and bade him lay all other care aſide; for that his Country-men had already taken Demetrias, a Town of main importance, that ſhould give him entertainment, whence he might proceed as became the greatneſs of his vertue and fortune. This did deſerve to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal, Thoas was bold to tell the King, firſt, that it was not expedient for him to divide his Forces at ſuch a time, when the very reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might ſerve to lay open unto him all places, without need of uſing violence: and ſecondly, That in any ſuch great enterpriſe there could not be choſen a more unfit man to be employed in the Kings Service, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he ſaid that the King ſhould as greatly feel the loſs of a Fleet or Army, periſhing under ſuch a notable Commander, if his fortune were bad, as if the ſame had miſcarried under one of meaner quality: whereas, nevertheleſs, if Hannibal prevailed, Hannibal alone ſhould have all the honour, and not Antiochus. In this regard he was of opinion that ſuch a renowned Warriour ſhould be always nearer unto the Kings Perſon, to give advice: which being followed, as often as it was found commodious, the good ſucceſs would wholly redound unto the honour of him that had the ſoveraign Command, even of the King himſelf. Antiochus gladly hearkened unto this admonition; being jealous of the Vertue, that ſhined brighter than the Majeſty of his own fortune. And thereupon he laid aſide the determination, which tended more to the advancement of his deſires, than did any thing elſe by him then, or after thought upon.

Preſently after this, He made ready for Greece. Before his ſetting forth, in a frivolous pomp of ceremony, he went up from the Sea-ſide to Ilium; there to do ſacrifice to Minerva of Troy. Thence paſſing over the Ægean Sea, He came to Demetrias. Eurylochus the Magnetian; the ſame whom the Ætolians had lately waited on home, when by that pretext they won Demetrias; was now the chief man, and ruler of his Nation. He therefore with his Country-men, in great frequency, came to do their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this, and took it as a ſign of good luck, to be ſo entertained at the beginning. But it may be ſuſpected, That the Magnetians found not the like cauſe of joy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Army ſomewhat like to that of Xerxes: they ſaw three hundred Ships; of which no more than forty were ſerviceable for the Wars, with an Army of ten thouſand Foot, five hundred Horſes, and ſix Elephants. The Ætolians no ſooner heard of his coming, than they called a Parliament, and made a Decree whereby they invited him into their Country. He knew before that they would ſo do; and was therefore well onward on his way towards them, when they met with him that brought the Decree. At his coming to Lamia, the Ætolians gave him as joyful entertainment as they could deviſe. Being brought into their Council, he made an Oration: wherein he deſired them to hold him excuſed, that he came not followed with a greater Army. This was, he ſaid, in true eſtimation, a ſign of his good will: in that he ſtaid not to make all things ready, but haſted unto their aid, even whilſt the ſeaſon was unfit for Navigation. Yet it ſhould not be longer, e're the hope of all thoſe which had expected him, would be ſatisfied unto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies, and all the Sea-Coaſt with his Fleets. Neither would he ſpare for any Charge, Travel, or Danger, to follow the buſineſs which he had undertaken: even to drive the Romans and their Authority out of Greece, leaving the Countrey free indeed, and the Ætolians therein the Chief. Now as the Armies that were following him, ſhould be very great; ſo was it his meaning, that all Proviſions to them belonging ſhould be correſpondent; becauſe he would not be any way burdenſome unto his Confederacs. But at the preſent he muſt needs intreat them, having thus haſtily come over unto their aid, unprovided of many neceſſaries, that they would help him with Corn and other Victuals whereof he ſtood in need. So he left them to their conſultation: the concluſion whereof was, after a little diſpute, (for a vain motion was made by ſome, that the differences between the Romans and them, ſhould be put by Compromiſe to the deciſion of Antiochus) that they would yield unto the Kings deſire, and aſſiſt him with all their Forces. Here we may obſerve how vain a thing it is for an abſolute Prince to engage himſelf, as did Antiochus, in a buſineſs of dangerous importance, upon the promiſed aſſurance of a State that is meerly popular. For if the vehemency of Thoas, and ſome other of that Faction, had not prevailed in this Council; the Ætolians, for gain of two or three Towns, yea, for hope of ſuch gain that might have deceived them, were like to have abandoned this King their Friend, unto the diſcretion of the Romans. And what remedy had there been, if this had ſo fallen out? He could have bemoaned himſelf to Thoas, and complained of the wrong: but he muſt have been contented with this anſwer, That the fault was in thoſe of the oppoſite ſide, whom Thoas would therefore have pronounced to be very wicked men. It happened much better for the preſent, though in the future it proved much worſe, both for him, and for the Ætolians. He was choſen General of all their Forces: and thirty Commiſſioners were appointed to be about him, as a Council of War for the Nation. Theſe armed ſuch, as readily they could, whilſt it was in diſpute where they ſhould begin the War. Chalcis was thought the meeteſt place to be firſt undertaken: whither if they came ſuddenly, they ſhould not peradventure need to uſe much force. The King had brought with him into Ætolia but a thouſand Foot, leaving the reſt behind him at Demetrias. With theſe he haſted away directly toward Chalcis; being over-taken by no great number of the Ætolians, which accompanied him thither. At his coming, the Magiſtrates, and ſome of the Chief Citizens, iſſued forth to parley with him. There the Ætolians began, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had only in words and falſe ſemblance, ſet Greece at liberty. But ſuch liberty as might be true and uſeful, they ſaid, would never be obtained; until by removing the neceſſity of obeying their pleaſure that were moſt mighty, every ſeveral Eſtate had where to find redreſs, of any preſſure. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King well able to counterpoiſe, yea to overweigh the Romans: who nevertheleſs deſired them only, ſo to joyn with them in League, as that if either the Romans or He ſhould offer them wrong, they might keep it in their power, to ſeek redreſs at the others hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the ſame anſwer, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedom was not imaginary, but abſolute; for which they were to thank the Romans; without whoſe good liking they would enter into no new confederacy. That which they ſpake of themſelves, they could likewiſe affirm of all the Greeks: for-aſmuch as none of them paid any Tribute, was kept under by any Garriſon, or lived otherwiſe than by their own Laws, and without being tied unto conditions which diſpleaſed them. Wherefore they wondred why the King ſhould thus trouble himſelf to deliver Cities that were already free. But ſince he and the Ætolians requeſted their friendſhip; they beſought both him and the Ætolians, to do a friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leaving them in ſuch good caſe as they were. With this anſwer the King departed:

parted: for he was not as then, ſtrong enough to force them. But very ſoon after, he brought thither, a great power, which terrified them, and made them yield: before all the ſuccours could arrive, which Titus had ſent for their defence.

The chief City of Eubœa being thus gotten, all the reſt of the Iſland ſhortly yielded to Antiochus. Four or five hundred Roman Souldiers, that came over late to have defended Chalcis, repoſed themſelves at Delium, a little Town of Bœotia, lying over againſt the Iſland; where was a Temple and Grove, conſecrated unto Apollo, that had the priviledge of an inviolable Sanctuary. In this place were ſome of them walking, and beholding the things there to be ſeen, whilſt others were buſied as they found cauſe, without fear of any danger; as being in ſuch a place, and no War hitherto proclaimed. But Menippus, one of Antiochus his Captains, that had wearied himſelf in many vain Treaties of Peace, took advantage of their careleſneſs, and uſed them with all extremity of War. Very few of them eſcaped; fifty were taken, and the reſt ſlain. Hereat Quintius was grieved: yet ſo, as it pleaſed him well to conſider, that his Romans had now more juſt cauſe than before, to make War upon the King.

Antiochus liked well theſe beginnings, and ſent Embaſſadors into all quarters of Greece; in hope, that his reputation ſhould perſwade very many to take his part. The wiſer ſort returned ſuch anſwer, as the Chalcidians had done. Some reſerved themſelves until he ſhould come among them: knowing that either if he came not, he muſt hold them excuſed for not daring to ſtir: or if he came, the Romans muſt pardon their juſt fear, in yielding to the ſtronger. None of thoſe that lay far off, joyned with him in true meaning, ſave the Eleans, that always favoured the Ætolians, and now feared the Achæans. Little reaſon there was, that he ſhould think to draw the Achæans to his party. Nevertheleſs he aſſayed them upon a vain hope, that the envy which Titus was ſaid to bear unto Philopœmens virtue, had bred a ſecret diſlike between that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both he and the Ætolians ſent Embaſſadors to the Council at Ægium, that ſpared not brave words, if the Achæans would have been ſo taken. The Kings Embaſſadors told of great Armies and Fleets that were coming; reckoning up the Dahans, Medians, Elimeans, and Caducians: names that were not every day heard of, and therefore as he thought the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydonians, Tyrians, Aradians, and Pamphilyans were; ſuch indeed as could not be reſiſted. Now concerning money, and all war-like furniture: it was, he ſaid, well known, that the Kingdoms of Aſia had always thereof great plenty. So as they were much deceived: who conſidering the late War made with Philip, did think that this with Antiochus would prove the like: the caſe was too far different. Yet this moſt powerful King, that for the liberty of Greece, was come from the utmoſt parts of the Eaſt; requeſted no more of the Achæans, than that they would hold themſelves as neutral, and quietly look on, whilſt he took order with the Romans. To the ſame effect ſpake the Ætolian Embaſſador, and further added, That in the Battle at Cynoſcephalæ, neither Titus had done the part of a General, nor the Romans of good Souldiers: but that both he and his Army had been there deſtroyed, had they not been protected by vertue of the Ætolians, which carried the day. Titus was preſent at the Council, and heard all this: to which he made as fit anſwer, as could have been deſired. He told the Achæans, That neither the Kings Embaſſador, nor the Ætolian, did ſo greatly labour to perſwade thoſe unto whom they addreſſed their Orations, as to vaunt themſelves the one unto the other. So as a man might well diſcern what good correſpondence in vanity it was, that had thus linked the King and the Ætolians together. For even ſuch brags as here they made before the Achæans, who knew them to be Lyars, had the Ætolians alſo made unto King Antiochus: Proclaiming the Victory over Philip to be meerly their Act: and the whole Country of Greece to be dependent on them. Interchangeably had they been feaſted by the King, with ſuch tales as his Embaſſador told even now; of Dahans, and Aradians, and Elimeans, and many others: that were all but a company of Syrians, ſuch as were wont to be ſold about for Bond-ſlaves, and good for little elſe. Theſe divers names of raſcal People, were he ſaid, like to the diverſity of Veniſon, wherewith a Friend of his at Chalcis, (no ſuch Vaunter as were theſe Embaſſadors) had ſometime feaſted him. For all that variety, whereat he wondred, was none other, as his Hoſt then merrily told him; than ſo many pieces of one tame Swine, dreſt after ſeveral faſhions, with variety of ſawces. Setting therefore aſide this vanity of idle pomp: it were good to make judgement of the Great King by his preſent doing. He had, notwithſtanding all this great noiſe, no more than ten thouſand men about him: for which little Army he was fain in a manner to beg Victuals of the Ætolians: and take up money at Uſury to defray his charges. And thus he ran up and down the Country; from Demetrias to Lamia; thence back to Chalcis; and being there ſhut out, to Demetrias again. Theſe were the Fruits of lies: wherewith, ſince both Antiochus and the Ætolians had each deluded other; meet it was that they ſhould, as perhaps already they did, repent, whilſt wiſer men took heed by their example. To a favourable Auditory much perſvaſion is needleſs. The Achæans did not love ſo well the Ætolians, as to deſire that they ſhould become Princes of Greece: but rather wiſhed to ſee them, of all other, made the vileſt abjects. Wherefore they ſtood not to hearken after news, what Antiochus did, how he ſped in Eubœa, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaimed War againſt him, and againſt the Ætolians.

How the hatred between theſe two Nations grew inveterate; ſufficiently appears in the ſtory fore-going. Now have they gotten each their Patrons; the one, the Romans; the other, King Antiochus. Herein did each of them unwiſely: though far the greater blame ought to be laid on the turbulent ſpirits of the Ætolians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Country at reſt: there was nothing more greatly to have been deſired, than that they might never find occaſion to return with an Army thither again. And in this reſpect ought the Greeks to have ſought, not how Smyrna and Lampſacus might recover their Liberty, (which had never been held a matter worth regarding, until now of late) but how the powers of the Eaſt and Weſt, divided and kept aſunder by their Country, as two Seas by an Iſthmus, or neck of Land, might be kept from over-flowing the Bar that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their ſeeking to make free thoſe baſe Aſiatiques, who originally were Greekiſh; than the general applauſe, wherewith all the Nation entertained this their loving offer. Yet were Lyſimachia, and the Towns in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a very great cauſe of fear, that ſhould move them to take Arms even in their own defence. But if all Greece would have made interceſſion, and requeſted that things might continue as they were, promiſing joyntly to aſſiſt the Romans with their whole Forces both by Land and Sea, whenſoever King Antiochus ſhould make the leaſt offer to ſtir againſt them: then had not only this quarrel been at an end; but the Roman Patronage over the Country, had been far from growing, as ſoon after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Achæans were at this time, in a manner the only Nation of Greece, that freely and generouſly declared themſelves altogether for the Romans, their Friends and Benefactors. All the reſt gave doubtful anſwers of hope unto both ſides: or if ſome few, as did the Theſſalians, were firm againſt Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrel, nor ſhewed themſelves his Enemies, till he preſſed them with open force. The Bœotians willingly received him, as ſoon as he entred upon their borders, not ſo much for fear of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans, by whom they had been ſomewhat hardly uſed. Aminander the Athamanian, beſides his old friendſhip with the Ætolians, was caught with a bait, which it may be doubted, whether he did more fooliſhly ſwallow, or Antiochus caſt out. He had married the Daughter of an Arcadian, that was an idle-headed man, and vaunted himſelf to be deſcended from Alexander the Great: naming his two Sons, in that regard, Philip and Alexander. Philip, the elder of theſe Brethren, accompanied his Siſter to the poor Court of Athamania: where having made his folly known, by talking of his Pedegree; He was judged by Antiochus and the Ætolians, a man fit for their turns. They made him believe, that in regard of his high Parentage, and the famous memory of Alexander his Forefather; it was for their purpoſe, to do their beſt for the conqueſt of Macedon to his behoof: ſince no man had thereto ſo good title as he. But for the enabling them hereunto; it behoved him to draw Aminander to their party, that ſo they might the ſooner have done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleaſed herewith; and by perſwaſions of himſelf or of his Siſter, effected as much as they deſired. But the firſt piece of ſervice done by this imaginary King (whether it proceeded from his own phrenſie, in hope to get love of the Macedonians that ſhould be his Subjects: or whether from ſome vanity in King Antiochus that employed him) wrought more harm to his Friends, than he and Aminander were able to do good. There were two thouſand men committed to his leading: with which he marched unto Cynoſcephalæ, there to gather up the bones of the ſlaughtered Macedonians; whom their King had ſuffered all this while to lie unburied. The Macedonians troubled not themſelves to think on this charitable act, as if it were to them any benefit at all: but King Philip took it in high indignation; as intended meerly unto his deſpight. Wherefore he preſently ſent unto the Romans; and gave them to underſtand, that he was ready with all his power to aid them wherein ſoever they ſhould be pleaſed to uſe him.

The Ætolians, Magnetians, Eubœans, Bœotians, and Athamanians, having now all joyned with him: Antiochus took counſel of them about the proſecution of the War in hand. The chief queſtion was, Whether it were meet for him to invade Theſſaly, that would not hearken to his perſwaſions: or whether to let all alone until the Spring: becauſe it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, and ſome another; confirming each his own ſentence, with the weightieſt reaſons which he could alledge: as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting: who had been long caſt aſide, as a Veſſel of no uſe, but was now required to deliver his opinion. He freely told the King, That what he ſhould now utter, was even the ſame which he would have ſpoken, had his counſel at any time before been asked ſince their coming into Greece. For the Magnetians, Bœotians, and other their good Friends, which now ſo willingly took their parts: what were they elſe than ſo many poor Eſtates, that wanting force of their own, did adjoyn themſelves for fear unto him, that was ſtrongeſt for the preſent: and would afterwards, when they ſaw it expedient, be as ready to fall to the contrary ſide, alledging the ſame fear for their excuſe? Wherefore he thought it moſt behooveful to win King Philip of Macedon unto their party: who (beſides that being once engaged, he ſhould not afterwards have power to recoyle, and forſake them all at his pleaſure) was a mighty Prince; and one that had means to ſuſtain the Roman War with his proper Forces. Now that Philip might be eaſily perſwaded to join with them, the benefit likely to redound unto himſelf, by their ſociety, was a very ſtrong Argument: though indeed what need was there, of proving by inference the likelihood of this hope: For, ſaid He, Theſe Ætolians here preſent; and namely, this Thoas being lately Embaſſadour from them into Aſia, among other motives which he then uſed to excite the King unto this Expedition, inſiſted mainly on the ſame point. He told us that Philip was moved beyond all patience, with the Lordly inſolence of the Romans: likened that King to ſome wild Beaſt, that was chained or lockt up within ſome grate, and would fain break looſe. If this be ſo: let us break his chain, and pull down the grate, that he may regain his liberty, and ſatisfie his angry ſtomack, upon thoſe that are common enemies to us and him. But if it prove otherwiſe, and that his fear be greater than his indignation: then ſhall it behoove us to look unto him; that he may not ſeek to pleaſe his good maſters the Romans, by offending us. Your Son Seleucus is now at Lyſimachia, with part of your Army; if Philip will not hearken to your Embaſſage; let Seleucus be in readineſs to fall upon Macedon, and find him work to defend his own on the other ſide, without putting us here to trouble. Thus much concerning Philip, and the preſent War in Greece. But more generally for the managing of this great enterpriſe, wherein you are now embarked againſt the Romans, I told you my opinion at the beginning: whereto had you then given ear, the Romans by this time ſhould have heard other news, than that Chalcis in Eubœa was become ours. Italy and Gaul ſhould have been on fire with War; and little to their comfort, they ſhould have underſtood, that Hannibal was again come into Italy. Neither do I ſee what ſhould hinder us even now from taking the ſame courſe. Send for all your Fleet and Army hither (but in any caſe let Ships of Burden come along with them, loaden with ſtore of Victuals: For, as the caſe now ſtands, we have here too few hands and too many mouths) Wherefore let the one half be imployed againſt Italy; whilſt you in perſon with the other half, tarrying on this ſide the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the affairs of Greece, and therewithal make countenance; as if you were even ready to follow us into Italy: yea, and be ready to follow us indeed, if it ſhall be requiſite. This is my advice; who though perhaps I am not very skilful in all ſorts of War; yet how to war with the Romans, I have been inſtructed by long experience, both to their coſt and mine own. Of this Counſel which I give, I promiſe you my faithful and diligent ſervice for the execution: but what Counſel ſoever you pleaſe to follow, I wiſh it may be proſperous. Many were pleaſed with the great ſpirit of the man, and ſaid, he had ſpoken bravely: but of all this was nothing done; ſave ouly that one was ſent into Aſia; to make all things ready there. In the mean while they went in hand with Theſſaly; about which they had before diſputed. There when they had won one Town by force, many other places, doubting their own ſtrength, were glad to make ſubmiſſion. But Lariſſa that was chief of the Country, ſtood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King, that lay before the walls with his whole Army. This their faith and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M. Bæbius, a Roman Pro-prætor, did ſend help thither. Likewiſe Philip of Macedon profeſſed himſelf enemy unto Antiochus, whereby the fame of the ſuccour coming to Lariſſa, grew ſuch, as wrought more than the ſuccour could have done, had it arrived. For Antiochus perceiving many fires on the Mountain tops afar off; thought that a great Army of Romans and Macedonians had been coming upon him. Therefore excuſing himſelf by the time of the year; He brake up his Siege, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in love with a young Maiden, Daughter unto a Citizen of the Town; whom, without regard of the much diſproportion that was between them, both in years and fortune, He ſhortly married; and ſo ſpent the Winter following as delightfully as he could, without thinking upon War in hand. His great Men and Captains followed his example; and the Souldiers as readily imitated their Captains: in ſuch wiſe, that when he took the field, he might evidently perceive in what looſe manner of diſcipline his Army had paſſed the Winter. But M. Acilius Galabrio, the Roman Conſul, ſhall meet him very ſhortly, and help him to reclaim them from this looſneſs of nuptial Revels, by ſetting them to harder exerciſe.

M. Acilius was choſen Conſul with P. Cornelius Scipio Naſica. The War againſt Antiochus fell to him by lot; whereas otherwiſe, He was no way ſo honourable, as Naſica, his Colleague: unto whom fell a charge, of far leſs credit and importance. Naſica, beſides the great Nobility of his Family, had been long ſince, in time of the Punick War, Crowned with the title of The beſt man in Rome: when the Senate for very fear and ſuperſtition, durſt not have ſo pronounced him, had they not ſo thought him, as being commanded by Oracle, that none other man than the very beſt, ſhould entertain an old ſtone, which the Devil then taught them to call The Mother of the Gods. But no prerogative of Birth, Virtue, or good opinion, gave ſuch advantage to the better man, as to make choice of his own Province: or arrogate more unto himſelf, than his lot ſhould afford him. This unpartial diſtribution of employments, helped well to maintain peace and concord. P. Scipio was therefore appointed to make War againſt the Boians; wherein he purchaſed the honour of a Triumph, nothing ſo glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchaſed with harder ſervice, requiring the more ability in matter of War. But M. Acilius went over into Greece, with ten thouſand foot, two thouſand Horſe, and fifteen Elephants. Ptolomy King of Egypt, notwithſtanding his late Alliance with King Antiochus; and Philip King of Macedon; had lately ſent Embaſſadors to Rome, making offer to come each of them in perſon with all his Forces into Ætolia, there to aſſiſt the Conſul in this War. Ptolomy ſent alſo Gold and Silver, toward the defraying of charges, as one that meant none other than good earneſt. But he was too young, and dwelt too far off. So his money was returned unto him with thanks; and his loving offer as lovingly refuſed. Unto Philips Embaſſadors, anſwer was made, that that his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would think themſelves beholding to him, for the aſſiſtance that he ſhould give to Acilius the Conſul. Maſaniſſa likewiſe, and the Carthaginians, did ſtrive, which of them ſhould be moſt forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promiſed a great quantity of Grain, which they would ſend partly to Rome, partly to the Army in Greece. And herein Maſaniſſa far out-went the poor City of Carthage; as alſo in that he offered to lend the Conſul five hundred Horſe, and twenty Elephants. On the other ſide, the Carthaginians undertook to ſet out a Fleet at their own charges: and to bring in at one payment, all the Tribute-money which was behind, and ought to be diſcharged by many yearly penſions. But the Romans did neither think it good, to let them arm a Fleet: nor would let them redeem themſelves out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corn, it was accepted, with condition that they ſhould be contented to receive the price of it.

The haſty and ridiculous iſſue of this War, that began with ſuch noiſe and preparations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great between the Roman and the Aſiatique Souldiers. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few Towns of Acarnania, after the ſame manner as he had prevailed in other parts of Greece; partly by fair words, and treaſon of the Rulers: partly by terrour, that was like to prove their excuſe when they ſhould again forſake him. But King Philip and Bæbius having recovered many places; and the Roman Conſul being arrived, againſt whom none made reſiſtance; he was glad to withdraw himſelf. Aminander fled out of his Athamania: which the Macedonian took and enjoyed; as in recompence of his good ſervice to the Romans. Philip the Brother of Aminanders Wife, was taken by the Conſul; made a mocking-ſtock, and ſent away priſoner to Rome. The Theſſalians uſed much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yielding to the King. All their Cities one after another, gave up themſelves: the Garriſons of Antiochus, compounding only for their own lives, and departing unarmed: yet ſo, that a thouſand of them ſtayed behind, and took pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplex Antiochus; who having withdrawn himſelf to Chalcis, and hearing how things went, cryed out upon his Friends: and ſaid, That they had betrayed him.

He

He had taken a great deal of toyl during one half of a Winter, and ſpent the other half in ſuch Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which, in time of need, he found all the promiſes of the Ætolians meerly verbal: and himſelf reduced into terms of great extremity. He therefore admired Hannibal as a wiſe man, yea, a very Prophet, that had fore-ſeen all this long before. Nevertheleſs, he ſent word to the Ætolians, that they ſhould now make ready all their forces: as conſidering their own need to be no leſs than his. But the Ætolians had cauſe to think, that they themſelves were ſhamefully diſappointed by Anticchus; who having promiſed to do great wonders, was in all this while ſeconded by no greater numbers out of Aſia, than ſo many as would fill up the ſame ten thouſand which he firſt brought over. Yet came there ſome of them, though fewer than at any time before, which joyned with him. Hereat the King was angry: and could get no better ſatisfaction, than that Thoas and his fellows had done their beſt in vain, to have made all the Nation take Arms. Since therefore neither his own men came to him out of Aſia, nor his friends of Greece would appear in this time of danger: He ſeized upon the Straights of Thermopylæ; as meaning to defend them againſt the Romans, until more help ſhould come. Of the Straights of Thermopylæ, there hath been ſpoken enough before, upon many occaſions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas againſt the huge Army of Xerxes. Wherefore it may eaſily be conceived, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and ſo came onwards into Theſſaly, were unable to paſs that Ledge of Mountains, dividing the one half of Greece; unleſs they could win this difficult entrance. But there was great difference between Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of theſe, with an handful of men, defended this paſſage two or three days together, againſt a world of men coming to invade the Country. The latter, having taken upon him to do great miracles, and effect what he liſted himſelf in Greece: did commit himſelf unto the ſafety of this place, when he was charged by not many more than he had in his own Army. There whilſt he lay, He ſent earneſt meſſengers one after another to the Ætolians, entreating them not to forſake him thus: but at leaſtwiſe now to help, and keep the tops of the Mountains, leſt the Romans, finding any by-path, ſhould come down upon him. By this opportunity, he got of them two thouſand, that undertook to make good the few paſſages: by which only, and not without extream difficulty, it was poſſible for the Enemy to aſcend. The Roman Conſul in like ſort prepared to force the Straights; without ſtaying to expect King Philip: that was hindred by ſickneſs from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them been Conſuls. Theſe he ſent forth by night with two thouſand men, to try whether by any means they could get up to the Ætolians. He himſelf encouraged his Army; not only by telling them with what baſe conditioned Enemies they had to deal: but what rich Kingdoms Antiochus held, that ſhould bountifully reward them if they were Victors. This was on the day before the battle. All that night Cato had a ſore journey (for what happened unto L. Valerius it is uncertain, ſave only that he failed in his intent) and ſo much the worſe, for that he had no skilful guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tyred, with climbing up ſteepy Rocks, and crooked waies: He commanded them to repoſe themſelves; whilſt he, being a very able man of body, took in hand the diſcovery, accompanied with no more than one of like metal to himſelf. After a great deal of trouble, he found at length a Path: which he took to be, as indeed it was, the beſt way leading unto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men; and held on the ſame path till toward break of day. It was a place not haunted, becauſe in time of peace, there was a fair way thorow the Straights below, that required no ſuch trouble of climbing; neither had this entrance of the Thermopylæ been ſo often the Seat of War, as might cauſe any Travellers to ſearch out the paſſages of thoſe deſolate Mountains. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though it were the beſt; yet did it lead him to a bog at the end, which would ſuffer him to paſs no further. So he ſtay'd there until day-light: by which he diſcovered both the Camp of the Greeks underneath him; and ſome of the Ætolians that were very near unto him, that were keeping the watch. He therefore ſent forth a luſty Crew of his men, whom he thought fitteſt for that ſervice; and willed them by any means to get him ſome Priſoners. This was effected: and he thereby underſtood, that theſe Ætolians were no more than ſix hundred; as alſo that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So he preſently ſet upon the Ætolians, overthrew them, ſlew a great part of them, and chaſed the reſt, that by flying to their Camp, guided him unto it. The fight was already begun between the Armies below: and the Romans, that had eaſily repelled the Kings men, and driven them into their Camp, found it, in a manner, a deſperate piece of work to aſſault the Camp it ſelf, which occupied the whole breadth of the Straights was notably fortified; and not only defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were beſt at that kind of ſervice; but by Archers and Slingers that were placed over them on the Hill-ſide, and poured down a ſhowr of weapons on their heads. But Cato his approach determined the matter. It was thought, at firſt, that the Ætolians had been coming to help the Kings men: but when the Roman Arms and Enſigns were diſcovered, ſuch was the terrour, that none made offer of reſiſtance: but all of them forſook the Camp and fled. The ſlaughter was not great: for that the badneſs of the way did hinder the Roman Army from making purſuit. Yet this daies loſs drove Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis; and from thence with the firſt opportunity, got him back into Aſia.

All the Cities that had imbraced the friendſhip of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertain the Romans, and entreat for pardon: ſetting open their gates; and preſenting themſelves unto the Conſul, in manner of ſuppliants. Briefly, in few daies all was recovered that Antiochus had gained: the Ætolians only ſtanding out, becauſe they knew not what elſe to do. Neither did the Conſul give them any reſpite. At his return from Chalcis, he met with King Philip, that having recovered health, came to joyn with him againſt Antiochus: over whom, ſince the Victory was already gotten, He did gratulate unto the Romans their good ſucceſs; and offered to take part with them in the Ætolian War. So it was agreed, That the Conſul ſhould beſiege Heraclea; and Philip, Lamia; at the ſame time. Each of them plied his work hard; eſpecially Philip, who fain fain would have taken Lamia before the Consul should come to help him. But it could not be. For his Macedonians that used to work by Myne, were over-much hindered by the stony ground. Yet was Lamia even ready to be taken, when the Consul, having won Heraclea, came thither, and told Philip, that the spoil of these Towns was a reward unto those that had fought at Thermopylæ. Herewith Philip must be contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Acilius, that could so ill endure to see Philip in likelihood of thriving by the Romans victory, got not Lamia himself: until such time as another Consul was ready to ease him of his charge.

The loss of Heraclea did so affright the Ætolians, that they thought no way safer than to desire Peace. Yet had they sent unto King Antiochus, presently after his flight: intreating him not to forsake them utterly, but either to return with all those Forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece; or if any thing with-held him from coming in person, at leastwise to help them with money and other aid. They prayed him to consider, that this did not only concern him in honour; but appertained unto his own safety: since it would be much to his hurt, if the Ætolians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any Enemies at their backs, might set upon him in Asia. He well considered of this, and found their words true. Therefore he delivered unto Nicander, one of their Embassadors, a sum of money, that might defray the charges of the War: promising that e're long he would send them strong aid, both by Land and Sea. Thoas, another of their Embassadors, He retained with him; who willingly stayed, that he might urge the King to make his word good. But when Heraclea was taken from them; then did the Ætolians lay aside all hope of amending their fortune by the help of Antiochus; and made suit unto the Consul to obtain peace, upon any reasonable condition. The Consul would scarce vouchsafe to give them audience, but said, He had other business in hand; only he granted them ten daies of Truce, and sent L. Valerius Flaccus with them to Hypata, willing them to make him acquainted with as much as they would have delivered unto himself. At their coming to Hypata, they began, as men favouring their own cause, to alledge how well they had deserved of the Romans. Whereto Flaccus would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memory of such good offices past, was quite obliterated by the malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore he willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to do so even betimes, than to stay till they were reduced unto terms of more extremity. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselves unto the faith of the Romans; and to that effect sent Embassadors to the Consul. This phrase of committing unto the faith, signified, in their using of it, little else than the acknowledgement of a fault done, and the craving of pardon. But the Romans used those words in another sense; and counted them all one, as yielding to discretion. Wherefore when the Consul heard them speak in this manner: He asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to their words. They answered that it was: and shewed him the Decree of their Nation lately made to this purpose. Then, said he, I command you first of all, That none of you presume to go into Asia, upon any business, private or publick: then, That ye deliver up unto me Dicæarchus the Ætolian, Menestratus the Epirot, Amminander the Athamanian, and such of his Country-men as have followed him in revolting from us. Whilst he was yet speaking; Phameas the Embassador interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the custom of the Greeks, who had yielded themselves unto his faith; not unto slavery. What? (said the Consul) Do ye stand to plead Custom with me, being now at my discretion? Bring hither a chain. With that, chains were brought; and an Iron collar, by his appointment, fitted unto every one of their necks. This did so affright them, that they stood dumb, and knew not what to say. But Valerius and some others entreated the Consul, not to deal thus hardly with them, since they came as Embassadors; though since their condition was altered. Phameas also spake for himself; and said, That neither he, nor yet the Apocleti, or ordinary Councel for the Nation, were able to fulfill these Injunctions; without approbation of the general Assembly. For which cause he entreated yet further ten daies respite; and had granted unto him Truce for so long.

This surceasance of War, during ten, and other ten daies together, began presently after the taking of Heraclea; when Philip had been commanded from Lamia, that else he might have won. Now because of the indignity herein offered unto that King, and to the end that he might not return home with his Army, like one that could not be trusted in employment: especially the Romans being like hereafter to have further need of him in the continuance of this War; He was desired to set upon the Athamanians, and some other petty Nations their Borderers, whilst the Consul was busie with the Ætolians: taking for his reward, all that he could get. And he got in that space all Athamania, Perrhæbia, Aperantia, and Dolopia. For the Ætolians hearing what had befallen their Embassadors, were so enraged, That although they were very ill provided for War, yet they could not endure to hear more talk of Peace. And it happened, that Nicander about the same time was come back from Antiochus, with money and hopeful promises: the Romans abiding still about Heraclea; and Philip having lately risen from before Lamia, yet not being far gone thence. His money Nicander conveighed into Lamia, by very unusual dexterity. But he himself being to pass further to the Assembly of the Ætolians, there to make report of his Embassage; was very much perplexed about this his Journey, which lay between the Roman and Macedonian Camps. Yet he made the adventure: and keeping as far as he could from the Roman side, fell upon a Station of Macedonians; by whom he was taken, and led unto their King. He expected no good: but either to be delivered unto the Romans, or used ill enough by Philip. But it seems, that the King had not hitherto concocted well the indignity of his being sent away from Lamia. For he commanded his Servants to treat Nicander friendly: and he himself being then at Supper, did visit him as soon as he rose up: giving him to understand, That the Ætolians did now reap the fruits of their own madness; forasmuch as they could never hold themselves contented, but would needs be calling strangers into Greece. They had pleased themselves well, in their acquaintance first with the Romans, and then with King Antiochus: but himself, being their Neighbour, they could never well endure. It was now therefore, he said, high time for them to have regard unto his friendship, whereof hitherto they never made any tryal: for surely their good affection, one unto the other, would be much more available unto each of them, than their mutual catching of advantages; whereby they had wrought themſelves much diſpleaſure. Thus much the King willed Nicander to ſignifie unto his Country-men; and privately to hold in mind the courteſie which he then did him, in ſending him ſafe home. So giving him a Convoy to guard him to Hypata, he lovingly diſmiſſed him. For this benefit, Nicander was alwaies after very dutifully affected to the Crown of Macedon: ſo as in the War of Perſeus he made himſelf ſuſpected unto the Romans, and therefore was had away to Rome, where he ended his life.

When the Conſul underſtood, that the Ætolians refuſed to make their ſubmiſſion, in ſuch wiſe as he required it: he forthwith meant to proſecute the War againſt them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head againſt him at Naupactus: whither he therefore directly marched, to try what they could or durſt. The ſiege of Naupactus was of greater length than the Romans had pre-conceived it: for it was a ſtrong City, and well manned. But Acilius ſtood upon point of honour; wherein he thought that he ſhould have been a loſer by riſing from before it without Victory. So he ſtay'd there well-near all the following time of his Conſulſhip; whilſt the Macedonian King, and the Achæans, made far better uſe of the Roman Victory. Philip, as is ſaid before, being allowed to take in ſuch places as had revolted unto Antiochus, and were not hitherto reclaimed, won the ſtrong City of Demetrius, and with an haſty courſe of Victory, ſubdued the Athamanians and others. The Achæans called to account the Eleans and Meſſenians; which had long been addicted to the Ætolian ſide; and followed it, in taking part with Antiochus. The Eleans gave good words; whereby they ſaved themſelves from trouble a while. The Meſſenians being more ſtout, before they were invaded, had none other help when the Achæan Prætor waſted their Country, than to offer themſelves unto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth: to whom they ſent word, That at his Commandment their Gates ſhould be opened; but that unto the Achæans it was not their meaning to yield. A meſſage from Titus to the Achæan Prætor, did ſuffice to call home the Army, and finiſh the War: as alſo the peremptory Command of the ſame Titus, cauſed the Meſſenians to annex themſelves unto the Achæans, and become part of their Commonweal. Such was now the Majeſty of a Roman Embaſſador. Titus did favour the Achæans; yet could not like it well, that either they or any other ſhould take too much upon them. He thought it enough, that they had their liberty, and were ſtrong enough to defend it againſt any of their Neighbours. That they ſhould make themſelves great Lords, and able to diſpute with the Romans upon even terms, it was no part of his deſire. They had lately bought the Iſle of Zacynthus; which had once been Philips, and was afterward given by him to Aminander, who ſent a Governour thither. But when Aminander in this preſent War, was driven out of his own Kingdom by Philip; then did the Governour of Zacynthus offer to ſell the Iſland to the Achæans; whom he found ready Chapmen. Titus liked not of this: but plainly told them, That the Romans would be their own Carvers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their Enemies; as a reward of the Victory which they had obtained. It was bootleſs to diſpute. Wherefore the Achæans referred themſelves unto his diſcretion. So he told them that their Commonwealth was like a Tortoiſe, whereof Peloponeſus was the ſhell: and that, holding themſelves within that compaſs, they were out of danger; but if they would needs be looking abroad, they ſhould lie open to blows, which might greatly hurt them. Having ſettled things thus in Peloponeſus, he went over to Naupactus: where Glabrio the Conſul had lain two months, that might have been far better ſpent. There, whether out of compaſſion which he had upon the Ætolians, or out of diſlike of King Philips thriving ſo faſt: he perſwaded the Conſul to grant unto the beſieged, and to the whole Nation, ſo long Truce, that they might ſend Embaſſadors to Rome; and ſubmitting themſelves, crave pardon of the Senate. Moſt like it is that Naupactus was in great danger: elſe would not the Ætolians have made ſuch earneſt ſuit as they did unto Titus, for procuring of this favour. But if Glabrio had been ſure to carry it in any ſhort ſpace, it may well be thought he would not have gone away without it; ſince the winning of that Town, wherein was then the whole flower of the Nation, would have made the promiſed ſubmiſſion much more humble and ſincere. When they came unto Rome, no entreaty could help them to better Conditions, than one of theſe two; That either they ſhould wholly ſubmit themſelves to the good pleaſure of the Senate; Or elſe pay a thouſand Talents, and make neither Peace nor War with any; further than as the Romans ſhould give approbation. They had not ſo much money: neither could they well hope to be gently dealt withall, if they ſhould give themſelves away unto diſcretion; which, what it ſignified, they now underſtood. Wherefore they deſired to have it ſet down, in what points, and how far forth they ſhould yield unto the good pleaſure of the Senate. But hereof they could get no certain anſwer: ſo that they were diſmiſſed as Enemies, after long and vain attendance.

Whilſt the Ætolians were purſuing their hopes of Peace, the Conſul had little to do in Greece, and therefore took upon him gravely to ſet things in order among the tractable Achæans. He would have had them to reſtore the baniſhed Lacedæmonians home into their Counttey; and to take the Eleans into the fellowſhip of their Commonwealth. This the Achæans liked well enough: but they did not like it, that the Romans ſhould be meddling in all occurrences. Wherefore they deferred the reſtitution of the baniſhed Lacedæmonians: intending to make it an Act of their own meer grace. As for the Eleans, they were loth to be beholding to the Romans, and thereby to diſparage the Achæans: into whoſe Corporation they were deſirous to be admitted, and ſaw that they ſhould have their deſire, without ſuch compulſive mediation.

The Roman Admiral C. Livius, much about the ſame time, fought a battle at Sea with Polyxenidas, Admiral to the King Antiochus. King Eumenes brought help to the Romans, though it was not great: and five and twenty Sail of Rhodians came after the battle, when they were following the Chaſe. The Kings Fleet was the better of Sail, but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidas being vanquiſhed in fight, was yet out of danger; as ſoon as he betook himſelf to a ſpeedy retreit.

And ſuch end had the firſt years war between King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many many of the Greeks as had followed the vain hopes of the Ætolians were glad to excuſe themſelves by fear; thinking themſelves happy when by Embaſſadors they had obtained pardon. On the contrary ſide, Philip of Macedon, Arch-enemy of late unto the Romans, did now ſend to gratulate this their Victory: and, in recompence of his good affection, had reſtored unto him Demetrius his younger Son; whom ſome few years they had kept as an Hoſtage. Alſo King Ptolomy of Egypt, gratulating the Roman Victory, ſent word how greatly all Aſia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which regard he deſired the Senate not to foreſlow time; but to ſend an Army, as ſoon as might be, into Aſia: promiſing that his aſſiſtance, wherein ſoever it pleaſed them to uſe it, ſhould not be wanting. This Ptolomy was the Son-in-law of King Antiochus: but he was the friend of fortune. He underſtood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of the contention, that the Romans were like to have the upper hand. The ſame did Antiochus now begin to ſuſpect, who had thought himſelf a while as ſafe at Epheſus, as if he had been in another world: but was told by Hannibal, That it was not ſo far out of Greece into Aſia, as out of Italy into Greece, and that there was no doubt but the Romans would ſoon be there, and make him try the chance of a battle for his Kingdom.

SECT. VIII.

Lucius Scipio, having with him Publius the African his elder Brother, for his Lieutenant, is ſent into Greece. He grants long Truce to the Ætolians, that ſo he might at leiſure paſs into Aſia. Much troubleſome buſineſs by Sea, and divers fights. An invaſion upon Eumenes his Kingdom; with the ſiege of Pergamus, raiſed by an handful of the Achæans. L. Scipio the Conſul comes into Aſia: where Antiochus moſt earneſtly deſireth peace, and is denyed it. The battle of Magneſia: wherein Antiochus being vanquiſhed, yieldeth to the Romans good pleaſure. The conditions of the peace. In what ſort the Romans uſed their Victory. L. Cornelius Scipio, after a moſt ſumptuous Triumph over Antiochus, is ſurnamed The Aſiatique, as his Brother was ſtiled the African.

Lucius Cornelius Scipio, the Brother of P. Scipio the African, was choſen Conſul at Rome with C. Lælius. Lælius was very gracious in the Senate: and therefore being deſirous (as generally all Conſuls were) of the more honourable employment, offered to refer to the arbitrement of the Senate, if L. Cornelius would be ſo pleaſed, the diſpoſition of their Provinces; without putting it to the hazard of a Lottery. Lucius having talked with his Brother Publius, approved of the motion. Such a queſtion had not of long time been put unto the Fathers: who therefore were the more deſirous to make an unblameable Decree. But the matter being otherwiſe ſomewhat indifferent, P. Scipio the African ſaid openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his Brother to the War againſt Antiochus, He himſelf would follow his Brother in that War, as his Lieutenant. Theſe words were heard with ſuch approbation, that the Controverſie was forthwith at an end. For if Antiochus relyed upon Hannibal, and ſhould happen to be directed wholly by that great Captain, what better man could they oppoſe than Scipio: that had been Victorious againſt that ſame great Worthy? But indeed a worſer man might have ſerved well the turn. For Hannibal had no abſolute command, nor ſcarce any truſt of great importance: excepting now and then in conſultation; where his wiſdom was much approved, but his liberty and high ſpirit as much diſliked. It is worthy of remembrance, as a ſign of the freedom that he uſed in his cenſures, even whilſt he lived in ſuch a Court. Antiochus muſtered his Army in preſence of this famous Captain: thinking, as may ſeem, to have made him wiſh, that he had been ſerved by ſuch brave men in Italy. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horſes, and Elephants, with ſuch coſtly furniture of Gold, Silver, and Purple, as glittered with a terrible bravery on a Sun-ſhine day. Whereupon the King, well pleaſing himſelf with that goodly ſpectacle, asked Hannibal what he thought; and whether all this were not enough for the Romans. Enough (ſaid Hannibal) were the Romans the moſt covetous men in all the world: meaning that all this coſt upon the backs of cowardly Aſiatiques, was no better than a ſpoil to animate good Souldiers. How little this anſwer pleaſed the King, it is eaſie to gueſs. The little uſe that he made of this Carthaginian, teſtifies that his diſlike of the man, cauſed him to loſe the uſe of his ſervice, when he ſtood in greateſt neceſſity thereof.

The Scipio's made all haſte away from Rome as ſoon as they could. They carried with them, beſides other Souldiers newly preſt to the War, about five thouſand Voluntaries, that had ſerved under P. Africanus. There was alſo a Fleet of thirty Quinquereme Gallies, and twenty Triremes newly built, appointed unto L. Æmilius Regillus, that was choſen Admiral the ſame year for that Voyage. At their coming into Greece, they found the old Conſul Glabrio beſieging Amphyſſa a City of the Ætolians. The Ætolians after that they were denyed Peace, had expected him once again at Naupactus. Wherefore they not only fortified that Town, but kept all the paſſages thereto leading; which heedleſly, as in a time of confuſion, they had left unregarded the laſt year. Glabrio knowing this, deceived their expectation, and fell upon Lamia: which being not long ſince much weakened by Philip, and now by him attempted on the ſudden; was carried at the ſecond aſſault. Thence went he to Amphyſſa: which he had almoſt gotten, when L. Scipio, his ſucceſſor, came with thirteen thouſand Foot, and five hundred Horſe, and took charge of the Army. The Town of Amphyſſa was preſently forſaken by the Inhabitants: but they had a Caſtle, or higher Town, that was impregnable; whereinto they all retired. The Athenian Embaſſadors had dealt with P. Scipio in behalf of the Ætolians: entreating him to ſtand their friend, and help them in obtaining ſome tolerable condition of Peace. He gave them gentle words, and willed them to perſwade the Ætolians, that they ſhould faithfully, and with true meaning deſire it. This was gladly taken. But many meſſages paſſing to and fro: though Publius continued to put them in good hope; yet the Conſul made ſtill the ſame anſwer, with which they had been chaſed from Rome. The Concluſion was, That they ſhould ſue for a longer time of reſpite from War: whereby at more leiſure they might attend ſome better diſpoſition of the Senate; or any helpful commodity which time ſhould afford. So they obtained half a years truce: after which, the Winter was like to afford them another half years leiſure of breathing. Hereof were they not more glad than was P. Scipio: who thought all time loſt, which with-held the War from paſſing over into Aſia.

The buſineſs of Ætolia being thus laid aſide, and the old Conſul Glabrio ſent home into Italy, the Scipio's marched into Theſſaly; intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon and Thrace unto the Helleſpont. Yet they conſidered, that hereby they muſt commit themſelves unto the loyalty of King Philip: who might either do them ſome miſchief by the way, if he were diſpoſed to watch a notable advantage; or at the leaſt, would he be unfaithful; though he were not ſo couragious, yet might he take ſuch order with the Thracians, that even for want of Victuals, if by no greater inconvenience, they ſhould be diſgracefully forced to return. He had promiſed them the utmoſt of his furtherance: wherein, whether he meant ſincerely, they thought to make ſome trial; by cauſing a Gentleman to ride Poſt unto him, and obſerve his doings as he ſhould take him on the ſudden. The King was merry at a Feſt, and drinking when the Meſſenger came: whom he lovingly bade welcome; and ſhewed him the next day, not only what proviſion of Victuals he had made for the Army, but how he had made Bridges over the Rivers, and mended the bad ways by which they were to paſs. With this good news Gracchus returned back in haſt unto the Scipio's: who entring into Macedon, found all things in a readineſs, that might help to advance their Journey. The King entertained them Royally, and brought them on their way, even to the Helleſpont: where they ſtayed a good while, until their Navy was in readineſs to tranſport them into Aſia.

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this year; though, for the moſt part, little of importance. Polyxenidas, the Admiral of Antiochus, was a baniſhed Rhodian: true to the King, and deſirous of revenge upon his Country-men, that had expelled him. He, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samos, the Romans and Eumenes having not as yet put to Sea, thought to do ſomewhat upon thoſe that were ſo early in their diligence, before their fellows ſhould arrive to help them. Yet went he craftily to work, and ſent word, as in great ſecrecy, to the Rhodian Admiral, That if the ſentence of his baniſhment might be repealed, He would, in requital thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many paſſages to and fro, this was believed: and the Rhodian Admiral grew ſo careleſs, expecting ſtill when he ſhould receive a watch-word from Polyxenidas that he himſelf was taken by Polyxenidas in his own Haven. The Kings Fleet ſetting forth from Epheſus by night; and for fear of being diſcovered, reſting one day in harbour by the way, came the ſecond night to Samos: where, by morning it was ready to enter the Haven. Pauſiſtratus the Rhodian Admiral ſeeing this, thought it his beſt way of reſiſtance to beſtow his men on the two head-lands or points of the Haven; ſo to guard the mouth of it: for that he ſaw no likelihood of defending himſelf by Sea. But Polyxenidas had already landed ſome Companies in another part of the Iſland: which falling upon the back of Pauſiſtratus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his men aboard. This could not be without great confuſion: ſo as the enemies took him out of all order, and ſunk or boorded all his Navy, five excepted, that by a ſudden device made ſhift to eſcape. Each of them hung out a burning Creſcent upon two Poles, at the Beak-head; and then rowed forwards directly upon the Enemy: who having not bethought himſelf what ſhift to make againſt ſuch unexpected danger of firing, was content to give way unto theſe deſperate Gallies; for fear leſt they ſhould burn, together with themſelves, a part of the Kings Fleet.

Not long after this, the Romans had ſome loſs by Tempeſt: whereof Polyxenidas could not take ſuch advantage as he had hoped: becauſe, putting to Sea for that purpoſe, he was driven back again by the like foul Weather. But the Rhodians, to ſhew that they were not diſcouraged, ſet forth twenty other Gallies: the Romans alſo, with King Eumenes, repaired their Fleet; and all of them together, in great bravery preſented battle to Polyxenidas before the Haven of Epheſus. When he durſt not accept it: they went from place to place, attempting many things, as either they were entreated by the Rhodians, or perſwaded by ſome appearing hopes of doing good. Yet performed they little or nothing: for that one while they were hindred by Storms at Sea; and another while by ſtrong reſiſtance made againſt them at Land.

Eumenes with his Fleet was compelled to forſake them; and return home to the defence of his own Kingdom. For Antiochus waſted all the grounds about Elea and Pergamus: and leaving his Son Seleucus to beſiege the Royal City of Pergamus, did with the reſt of his Army ſpoil the whole Country thereabout. Attalus the Brother of King Eumenes, was then in Pergamus; having with him no better men to defend the City, than were they that lay againſt it. Wherefore he had reaſon to ſtand in fear; being too much inferiour in number. There came to his aid a thouſand foot, and an hundred horſe of the Achæans: old Souldiers all, and trained up under Philopœmen, whoſe Scholar, in the art of War, Diophanes their Commander was. This Diophanes beholding from the Walls of Pergamus, which was an high Town, the demeanour of the enemy; began to diſdain that ſuch men as they ſhould hold them beſieged. For Seleucus his Army which was encamped at the Hill-foot, ſeeing that none durſt ſally forth upon them, grew ſo careleſs: as otherwiſe than by ſpoiling all behind their backs, they ſeemed to forget that they were in an Enemies Country. Diophanes therefore ſpake with Attalus: and told him that he would go forth to viſit them. Attalus had no liking to this adventure; for he ſaid, that the match was nothing equal. But the Achæan would needs have his will: and iſſuing forth, encamped not far from the enemy. They of Pergamus thought him little better than mad. As for the beſiegers; they wondred at firſt what his meaning was: but when they ſaw that he held himſelf quiet, they made a jeſt of his boldneſs; and laughed to ſee with what an handful of men he looked ſo ſtoutly. So they returned unto their former negligence and diſorders. Which Diophanes perceiving, He commanded all his men to follow him, even as faſt as they well might: and he himſelf, with a hundred horſe, brake out on the ſudden upon the ſtation that was next at hand. Very few of the Enemies had their horſes ready ſadled, but more few, or none had the hearts to make reſiſtance: ſo as he drove them all out of their Camp; and chaſed them as far as he might ſafely adventure, with great ſlaughter of them and no loſs to his own. Hereat all the Citizens of Pergamus (who had covered the walls of the Town, men and women, to behold this ſpectacle) were very joyful; and highly magnified the virtue of theſe Achæans. Yet would they not therefore iſſue forth of their Gates, to help the Achæans in doing what remained to be done. The next day Seleucus encamped half a mile further from the Town, than he had done before: and againſt him went forth Diophanes the ſecond time; who quietly reſted a while in his old ſtation. When they had ſtayed many hours, looking who ſhould begin: Seleucus in fair order as he came, withdrew himſelf toward his lodging that was further off. Diophanes moved not whilſt the enemy was in ſight; but as ſoon as the ground between them hindred the proſpect, he followed them in all haſt, and ſoon overtaking them with his Horſe, charged them in the Reer; ſo as he brake them, and purſued them at the heels, to their very Trenches. This boldneſs of the Achæans, and the baſeneſs of his own men, cauſed Seleucus to quit the ſiege, little to his honour. Such being the quality of theſe Aſiatiques, Philopœmen had cauſe to tell the Romans, That he envied their Victory. For when Antiochus lay feaſting at Chalcis after his marriage, and his Souldiers betook themſelves to Riot, as it had been in a time of great ſecurity: a good man of War might have cut all their Throats, even as they were tipling in their Victualling Houſes; which Philopœmen ſaid, that he would have done, had he been General of the Achæans, and not as he then was, a private man.

Antiochus was full of buſineſs: and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deal of travel, brought almoſt nothing to paſs. He had been at Pergamus: into which Eumenes, leaving the Romans, did put himſelf with a few of his Horſe and light Armature. Before Pergamus he left his Son, as before hath been ſhewed, and went to Elæa: whither he heard that Æmylius the Roman Admiral was come to bring ſuccour to Eumenes. There he made an Overture of Peace; about which to conſult, Eumenes was ſent for by Æmylius, and came from Pergamus. But when it was conſidered, that no concluſion could be made without the Conſul: this Treaty brake off. Then followed the overthrow newly mentioned, which cauſed Seleucus to give over the Siege of Pergamus. Afterwards, four or five Towns of ſcarce any worth or note were taken by the King, and the Syrian Fleet, being of ſeven and thirty Sail, was beaten by the Rhodian, which was of like number. But of this Victory the Rhodians had no great cauſe to rejoyce: for that Hannibal the Carthaginian, who, together with Apollonius a Courtier of Antiochus, was Admiral of the Syrians, did them in a manner as great hurt as they could do to Apollonius; and having his Victory taken out of his hands by Apollonius his flight, yet made ſuch a retreat, that the Rhodians durſt not far adventure upon him. Now of theſe Actions which were but as Prefaces unto the War, the laſt and greateſt was a Victory of the Romans by Sea, againſt Polyxenidas the Kings Admiral. The battle was fought by Myonneſus a Promontory in Aſia: where Polyxenidas had with him fourſcore and nine Gallies; and five of them greater than any of the Romans. This being all the ſtrength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanity of thoſe brags, wherewith Antiochus vaunted the laſt year, That his Armada ſhould cover all the Shores of Greece. The Romans had eight and fifty Gallies; the Rhodians two and twenty: the Roman being the ſtronger built, and more ſtoutly manned; the Rhodians more light-timbred, and thin planckt, having all advantage of ſpeed, and good Sea-men. Neither forgot they to help themſelves by the ſame device, with which five of their Gallies had lately eſcaped from Samos. For with Fire in their Prows they ran upon the Enemy: who declining them for fear, laid open his ſide: and was thereby in greater danger of being ſtemmed. After no long fight, the Kings Navy hoyſted Sail, and, having a fair Wind, bore away toward Epheſus as faſt as they could. Yet forty of their Gallies they left behind them: whereof thirteen were taken, all the reſt burnt or ſunk. The Romans and their fellows loſt only two or three Ships: but got hereby the abſolute Maſtery of the Sea.

The report of this miſadventure, may ſeem to have taken from Antiochus all uſe of reaſon. For as if no hope had been remaining to defend thoſe places that he held in Europe, he preſently withdrew his Garriſons from Lyſimachia: which might eaſily have been kept, even till the end of Winter following, and having reduced the beſiegers (if the ſiege had been continued obſtinately) unto terms of great extremity, He alſo gave over the Siege of Colophon: and laying aſide all thoughts, ſave only of defence, drew together all his Army; and ſent for help to his Father-in-law, King Ariarathes the Cappadocian.

Thus the Roman Conſul, without impediment, not only came to the Helleſpont, but had yielded unto him all places there, belonging to Antiochus on Europe ſide. The Fleet was alſo then in a readineſs to tranſport him over into Aſia: where Eumenes had taken ſuch care before that he landed quietly at his own good eaſe; even as if the Country had been his already. The firſt news that he heard of the Enemy, was by an Embaſſador that came to ſue for Peace. This Embaſſador declared in his Maſters name, That the ſame things which had hindered him from obtaining Peace of the Romans heretofore, did now perſwade him, that he ſhould eaſily come to good agreement with them. For in all diſputations heretofore, Smyrna, Lampſacus, and Lyſimachia, had been the places about which they varied. Seeing therefore the King had now already given over Lyſimachia, and was further purpoſed not to ſtrive with the Romans about Lampſacus and Smyrna: what reaſon was there, why they ſhould need to trouble him with War? If it was their deſire that any other Towns upon the Coaſt of Aſia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, ſhould be alſo ſet at liberty, or otherwiſe delivered into their hands: the King would not refuſe to gratifie them therein. Briefly, let them take ſome part of Aſia, ſo as the bounds dividing them from the King, might not be uncertain, and it ſhould be quietly put into their hands. If all this were not enough, the King would likewiſe bear half the Charges whereat they had been in this War. So praying the Romans to hold themſelves contented with theſe good offers, and not to be too inſolent upon confidence of their fortune, he expected their anſwer. Theſe offers, which which to the Embaſſador ſeemed ſo great, were judged by the Romans to be very little. For they thought it reaſonable, that the King ſhould bear all the Charges of the War, ſince it began through his own fault: and that He ſhould not only depart out of thoſe few Towns which he held in Æolis and Ionia; but quite out of Aſia the leſs, and keep himſelf on the other ſide of Mount Taurus. When the Embaſſador therefore ſaw that no better bargain could be made, He dealt with P. Scipio in private: and to him he promiſed a great quantity of Gold, together with the free reſtitution of his Son, who (it is uncertain, by what miſchance) was taken priſoner, and moſt honourably entertained by the King. Scipio would not hearken to the offer of Gold: nor otherwiſe to the Reſtitution of his Son, than upon condition, That it might be with making ſuch amends for the benefit, as became a private man. As for the publick buſineſs: He only ſaid thus much, That ſince Antiochus had already forſaken Lyſimachia, and ſuffered the War to take hold on his own Kingdom; there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yield to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, ſaid he, tell your King in my name, That I would adviſe him to refuſe no Condition whereby he may have Peace.

The King was not any whit moved with his advice. For ſeeing that the Conſul demanded of him no leſs than if he had been already ſubdued: little reaſon there was, that he ſhould fear to come to battle; wherein he could loſe, as he thought, no more, than by ſeeking to avoid it he muſt give away. He had with him threeſcore and ten thouſand Foot, and twelve thouſand Horſe; beſides two and fifty Indian Elephants, and many Chariots armed with Hooks or Sythes, according to the manner of the Eaſtern Countries. Yet was he nothing pleaſed to hear that the Conſul drew near him apace, as one haſtening to fight. But howſoever he was affected: He made ſo little ſhew of fear, that hearing P. Scipio to lie ſick at Elæa, He ſent thither unto him his Son without ranſome: as one both deſirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his ſickneſs, and withall not deſirous to retain the young Gentleman for a pledge of his own ſafety. Thus ought his bounty to be conſtant. Otherwiſe it might be ſuſpected that herein he dealt craftily. For ſince he could have none othor ranſome of Scipio, than ſuch as an honourable man, that had no great ſtore of wealth, might pay: better it was to do ſuch a courteſie before the battle, as would afterwards have been little worth; than to ſtay until the Romans, perhaps Victorious, ſhould exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the Recovery of his Son; ſo as the joy thereof was thought to have been much available unto his health. In recompence of the Kings humanity, He ſaid only thus much unto thoſe that brought him this acceptable Preſent, I am now able to make your King none other mends, than by adviſing him not to fight until he ſhall hear that I am in the Camp. What he meant by this, it is hard to conjecture. Antiochus reſolved to follow his Counſel; and therefore withdrew himſelf from about Thyatira, beyond the River of Phrygius or Hyllus, unto Magneſia by Sypilus: where encamping, he fortified himſelf as ſtrongly as he could. Thither followed him L. Scipio the Conſul, and ſat down within four miles of him. About a thouſand of the Kings Horſe, moſt of them Gallo-Greeks, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whom at firſt they ſlew ſome; and were anon, with ſome loſs, driven back over the River. Two dayes were quietly ſpent, whilſt neither the King nor the Romans would paſs the water. The third day the Romans made the adventure: wherein they found no diſturbance; nor were at all oppoſed, until they came within two miles and an half of Antiochus his Camp. There, as they were taking up their Lodging, they were charged by three thouſand Horſe and Foot: whom the ordinary Corps de Guarde repelled. Four dayes together after this, each of them brought forth their Armies; and ſet them in order before the Trenches, without advancing any further. The fifth day the Romans came half way forward, and preſented battle; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Conſul took advice what was to be done: For either they muſt fight upon whatſoever diſadvantage, or elſe reſolve to abide by it all Winter, far from any Country of their Friends, and therefore ſubject unto many difficulties: unleſs they would ſtain their honour by returning far back, to Winter in a more convenient place; and ſo defer the War until the next Spring. The Roman Souldier was throughly perſwaded of that Enemies baſe temper. Wherefore it was the general Cry, That this great Army ſhould be aſſailed, even in the Camp where it lay: as if rather there were ſo many Beaſts to be ſlaughtered, than Men to be fought with. Yet a day or two paſſed in diſcovering the Fortifications of Antiochus, and the ſafeſt way to ſet upon him. All this while P. Scipio came not. Wherefore the King, being loth to diſhearten his men, by ſeeming to ſtand in fear of the Enemy, reſolved to put the matter to trial. So when the Romans took the Field again, and ordered the Battels: He alſo did the like; and advanced ſo far, that they might underſtand his meaning to fight.

The Roman Army conſiſted of four Legions, two Roman, and two Latine: in each of which were five thouſand and four hundred men. The Latines, as uſually, were in the points; the Roman, in the mean battle. All of them, according to their wonted form, were divided into Maniples. The Haſtati had the leading: after them followed the Principes; at ſuch diſtance as was uſual; and laſt of all, the Triarii. Now beſide theſe, there were about three thouſand Auxiliaries; partly Achæans, and partly ſuch as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equal Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Utmoſt of all (ſave ſome five hundred Cretians, and of the Trallians) were almoſt three thouſand Horſe: of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the reſt being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the bank of the River: yet four Troops of Horſe were placed there, though ſuch help ſeemed in a manner needleſs. Two thouſand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians were left to guard the Camp. The Conſul had with him ſixteen African Elephants, which he beſtowed in his Rere: foraſmuch as had they come to fight with thoſe of Antiochus, they only would have ſerved to diſcourage his men, as being ſure to be beaten: the Indian being far the greater, and more courageous Beaſts: whereof Antiochus had likewiſe much advantage in number.

The Kings Army being compounded of many Nations, diverſly appointed, and not all accuſtomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the ſeveral kinds, in ſuch wiſe as each might be of moſt uſe. The main ſtrength of his

Foot

Foot consisted in sixteen thousand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. These he placed in the midst, and divided into ten Battalions: every one having two and thirty in File, and fifty in Front. Between every Battalion were two Elephants, goodly Beasts, and such as being adorned with Frontals, high Crests, Towers on their Backs, and besides him that governed the Elephant, four men in every Tower, made a gallant and terrible shew. On the right hand of these were fifteen hundred Horse of the Gallo-Greeks: then three thousand Barb'd Horse, called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choice of the Country, and accompanied by some others. All which Troops of Horse divided in their several kinds, do seem to have followed one another in depth, rather then to have been stretched out in Front. Adjoyning unto these, were sixteen Elephants together in one flock. A little further to the right hand, was the Kings own Regiment; called the Argyraspides, or Silvershields, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like so valiant as those of the same name, that had served under Great Alexander: then, twelve hundred Archers on Horse-back, three thousand light-armed Foot, two thousand and five hundred Archers of Mysia, with four thousand Slingers and Archers of the Cirtæans, and Elymæans. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greeks, and Barb'd Horse: as also two thousand Horse that were sent from Ariarathes, with two thousand and seven hundred of divers Nations: and a Regiment of a thousand Horse more lightly armed, that were called The Kings Troop; being Syrians, Phrygians, and Lydians. In Front of all these Horse were the Chariots armed with Hooks or Sythes, and the Dromedaries, whereon sate Arabians with long Rapiers, that would serve to reach from those high Camels. Beyond these were, as in the right wing, a rabble of many Nations, Carians, Cicilians, Pamphilians, Pisidians, Cyrtæans, Elymæans, and many others, having also with them sixteen Elephants. Antiochus himself commanded in the right wing: Seleucus in the left: and three of his principal Captains commanded over the Phalangiers.

The first onset was given by the Dromedaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one, being like to terrifie the Horse; the other, to break the Squadrons of the Foot; Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, easily made frustrate the danger threatned by them both. For with shoutings, and noises, and some wounds, they were driven out of the Field; and running back upon their own men, did the same harm which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horse following this advantage, charged upon the left Wing: Whereas they found no resistance; some being out of order; others being without courage. It is shameful to rehearse, and so strange, that it may hardly seem credible: that the Phalangiers, with such variety of Auxiliaries, made little or no resistance; but all of them fled, in a manner as soon as they were charged. Only the King, Antiochus himself, being in the left wing of his own Battle: and seeing the Latines, that stood opposite unto him, weakly flanked with Horse, gave upon them couragiously, and forced them to retire. But M. Æmilius, that had the Guard of the Roman Camp, issued forth with all his power to help his fellows: and what by perswasion, what by threats, made them renew the Fight. Succour also came from the right Wing, where the Romans were already Victorious: whereof when Antiochus discovered the approach; He not only turned his Horse about, but ran away upon the spur without further tarriance. The Camp was defended a little while: and with no great Valour; though by a great multitude that were fled into it. Antiochus is said to have lost in this Battle fifty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse; besides those that were taken. Of the Romans there were not slain above three hundred Foot, and four and twenty Horse: of Eumenes his followers five and twenty.

Antiochus fled to Sardes, and from thence to Apamea, the same night; hearing that Seleucus was gone thither before. He left the custody of Sardes, and the Castle there, to one whom he thought faithful. But the Towns-men and Souldiers were so dismayed with the greatness of the Overthrow; that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Towns in those parts, without expecting Summons, yielded up themselves by Embassadours, whom they sent to the Romans, whilst they were on the way. Neither were many days spent, e're Antiochus his Embassadour was in the Camp: having none other Errand, than to know what it would please the Romans to impose upon the King his Master. P. Scipio was now come to his Brother, who obtained leave to make the answer, because it should be gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, That he should quite abandon his Dominions on this side Taurus. For their Charges in that War, they required fifteen thousand Talents: five hundred in hand; two thousand and five hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome should have confirmed the Peace; and the other twelve thousand in twelve years next ensuing, by even portions. Likewise they demanded four hundred Talents for Eumenes; and some store of Corn that was due to him upon a reckoning. Now besides twenty Hostages which they required, very earnest they were to have Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thoas the Ætolian, with some others, who had stirred up the King to this War, delivered into their hands. But any wise man might so easily have perceived that it would be their purpose to make this one of their principal demands; as no great Art was needful to beguile their malice. The Kings Embassador had full Commission to refuse nothing that should be enjoyned. Wherefore there was no more to do, than to send immediately to Rome for the Ratification of the Peace.

There were new Consuls chosen in the mean while at Rome, M. Fulvius, and Cn. Manlius Volso. The Ætolians desired Peace, but could not obtain it: because they would accept neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, That one of the Consuls should make War upon the Ætolians; the other upon Antiochus in Asia. Now, though shortly there came news, that Antiochus was already vanquished in Battle, and had submitted himself unto all that could be required at his hands: yet since the State of Asia was not like to be so throughly settled by one Victory, but that many things might fall out worthy of the Romans care, Cn. Manlius, to whom Asia fell by Lot, had not his Province changed.

Soon after this, came the Embassadors of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodians and some others; yea, by King Eumenes in person; whose presence added a goodly lustre to the business in hand. Concerning the Peace to be made with King Antiochus, there was no disputation:

tion: it was generally approved. All the trouble was about the distribution of the purchase. King Eumenes reckoned up his own deserts, and comparing himself with Masanissa, hoped that the Romans would be more bountiful to him, than they had been to the Numidian, since they had found him a King indeed, whereas Masanissa was only such in title; and since, both he and his Father had always been their Friends, even in the worst of the Roman Fortune. Yet was there much ado to make him tell what he would have: He still referring himself to their courtesie, and they desiring him to speak plain. At length he craved that they would bestow upon him, as much of the Country by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpose to keep in their own hands. Neither thought he it needful, that they should trouble themselves with the care of giving Liberty to many of the Greek Towns that were on Asia side. For since the most of those Towns had been partakers with the King in his War; it was no reason that they should be Gainers by his overthrow. The Rhodians did not like of this. They desired the Senate to be truly Patrons of the Grecian Liberty; and to call to mind, that no small part of Greece it self had been subject unto Philip, and served him in his War: which was not alledged against them as a cause why they should not be made free, after that Philip was overcome. But the main point whereon they insisted, was this, That the Victory of the Romans against King Antiochus, was so great, as easily might satisfie the desires of all their Friends. The Senate was glad to hear of this; and very bountifully gave away so much, that every one had cause to be well-pleased.

Such end had the War against King Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio returning home, had granted unto him the honour of a Triumph: the Pomp whereof exceeded in Riches, not only that of Titus Quintus Flamminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld until that day. Now forasmuch as the surname of The African had been given unto P. Scipio, it was thought convenient by some to reward L. Scipio with the title of The Asiatique: which the fortune of his Victory had no less deserved; though the Virtue requisite to the purchase thereof, was no way correspondent.

SECT. IX.

The Ætolians, and the Gallo-Greeks, vanquished by the Roman Consuls, Fulvius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtains a Triumph: being charged (among other objections) with attempting to have passed the bounds appointed as fatal to the Romans by Sibyl. Of Sibyls Prophecies; the Books of Hermes; and that Inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipio's: and that beginning and Faction among the Roman Nobility.

Marc. Fulvius, and Cn. Manlius had the same charge divided between them, which L. Cornelius Scipio, now stiled Asiaticus, had lately undergone. It was found more than one mans work, to look at once to Greece and to Asia. And for this reason was it apparent, that L. Scipio had granted so long a Truce to the Ætolians. But since, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughty little Nation had not sought to humble it self to the Roman Majesty, it was now to be brought unto more lowly terms than any other of the Greeks. The best was, that so great a Storm fell not unexpected upon the Ætolians. They had foreseen the danger, when their Embassadors were utterly denied Peace at Rome: and they had provided the last Remedy; which was to entreat the Rhodians and Athenians to become Intercessors for them. Neither were they so dejected with any terrible apprehensions, that they could not well devise, even upon helping themselves by repurchase of Countries lost, where they spied advantage.

Poor King Aminander lived in exile among them, whilst Philip of Macedon kept, for him, possession of his Lands and Castles. But the Athamanians (besides that many of them bore a natural affection to their own Prince) having been long accustomed to serve a Mountain Lord, that conversed with them after an homely manner; could not endure the proud and insolent manner of command, used by the Captains of Philip his Garrisons. They sent therefore some few of them to their King, and offered their service towards his restitution. At the first there were only four of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fifty, which undertook the work. Yet assurance that all the rest would follow, made Aminander willing to try his fortune. He was at the Borders with a thousand Ætolians, upon the day appointed: at what time his two and fifty Adventurers, having divided themselves into four parts, occupied, by the ready assistance of the multitude, four of the chief Towns in the Country to his use. The fame of this good success at the first; with divers Letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to do their best in helping forward the Action, made the Lieutenants of Philip unable to think upon resistance. One of them held the Town of Theium a few days, giving thereby some leisure unto his King to provide for the rescue. But when he had done his best, he was forced thence, and could only tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was lost. Philip had brought from home six thousand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march, he left all save two thousand behind him, and so came to Athenæum, a little Athamanian Castle, that still was his, as being on the Frontier of Macedon. Thence he sent Zeno, who had kept Theium a while, to take a place lying over Argithea, that was chief of the Country. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither he, nor the King, had the boldness to descend upon Argithea; for that they might perceive the Athamanians, all along the Hill-sides, ready to come down upon them, when they should be busie. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a safe retrait: especially when Aminander came in sight with his thousand Ætolians. The Macedonians were called back from-wards Argithea, and presently withdrawn by their King towards his own Borders. But they were not suffered to depart in quiet at their pleasure. The Athamanians and Ætolians way-laid them, and pursued them so closely, that their retreit was in manner of a plain flight, with great loss of Men and Arms, few of those escaping, that were left behind, as to make a countenance of holding somewhat in the Country, until Philip his return.

The

The Ætolians having found the buſineſs of Athamania ſo eaſie, made an attempt in their own behalf, upon the Amphilochians and Aperantians. Theſe had belonged unto their own Nation, and were lately taken by Philip; from whom they diligently revolted, and became Ætolians again. The Dolopians lay next; that had been ever belonging to the Macedonian, and ſo did purpoſe ſtill to continue. Theſe took Arms at firſt: but ſoon laid them away; ſeeing their Neighbours ready to fight with them in the Ætolian quarrel, and ſeeing their own King ſo haſtily gone, as if he meant not to return.

Of theſe Victories the joy was the leſs; for that news came of Antiochus his laſt overthrow, and of M. Fulvius the new Conſul his haſting with an Army into Greece. Aminander ſent his excuſes to Rome, praying the Senate not to take it in deſpight, that he had recovered his own from Philip with ſuch help as he could get. Neither ſeems it that the Romans were much offended to hear of Philip his loſſes: for of this fault they neither were ſharp correctors, nor earneſt reprovers. Fulvius went in hand with the buſineſs about which he came, and layed Siege to Ambracia, a goodly City, that had been the chief ſeat of Pyrrhus his Kingdom. With this he began, for that it was of too great importance to be abandoned by the Ætolians: yet could not by them be relieved, unleſs they would adventure to fight upon equal ground. To help the Ambracians, it was not in the Ætolians power: for they were, at the ſame time, vexed by the Illyrians at Sea, and ready to be driven from their new Conqueſt, by Perſeus the Son of Philip, who invaded the Countries of the Amphilochians and Dolopians. They were unable to deal with ſo many at once; and therefore as earneſtly ſought peace with the Romans, as they ſtoutly made head againſt the reſt. In the mean while the Athenian and Rhodian Embaſſadours came, who beſought the Conſul to grant them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made ſtrong reſiſtance, and would not be terrified by any violence of the Aſſailants, or danger that might ſeem to threaten. The Conſul had no deſire to ſpend half his time about one City, and ſo be driven to leave unto his ſucceſſor the honour of finiſhing the War. Wherefore he gladly hearkened unto the Ætolians, and bade them ſeek Peace with a faithful intent, without thinking it over-dear, at a reaſonable price; conſidering with how great a part of his Kingdom their friend Antiochus made the ſame purchaſe. He alſo gave leave to Aminander, offering his Service as a Mediatour, to put himſelf into Ambracia, to try what good his perſwaſions might do with the Citizens. So after many demands and excuſes, the concluſion was ſuch as was grievous to the weaker, but not unſufferable. The ſame Embaſſadours of the Athenians and Rhodians, accompanied thoſe of the Ætolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of Peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needful in this interceſſion, for that Philip had made a very grievous complaint about the loſs of thoſe Countries, which they had lately taken from him. Hereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it did not hinder the Peace, which thoſe good Mediatours of Rhodes and Athens, did earneſtly ſolicite. The Ætolians were bound to uphold the Majeſty of the People of Rome, and to obſerve divers Articles, which made them leſs free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any People of Greece; they having been the firſt that called theſe their Maſters into the Countrey. The Iſle of Cephalenia was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themſelves (as not long ſince they had gotten Zacynthus from the Achæans, by ſtiffly preſſing their own right) that ſo they might have poſſeſſion along the Coaſt of Greece, whilſt they ſeemed to forbear the Country. But concerning thoſe places, whereto Philip, or others might lay claim, there was ſet down an order ſo perplexed, as would neceſſarily require to have the Romans Judges of their Controverſies, when they ſhould ariſe. And hereof good uſe will be ſhortly made: when want of employment elſewhere, ſhall cauſe a more Lordly Inquiſition to be held, upon the affairs of Macedon and Greece.

Cn. Manlius, the other Conſul, had at the ſame time War in Aſia, with the Gallo-Greeks and others. His Army was the ſame that had followed L. Scipio; of whoſe Victory, his acts were the conſummation. He viſited thoſe Countries on the hither ſide of Taurus, that had ſcarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among theſe there were ſome petty Lords or Tyrants, ſome free Cities, and ſome that were together at Wars, without regard of the great alteration that happened in Aſia. From every of theſe he got ſomewhat; and by their quarrels, found occaſion to viſit thoſe Provinces, into which he ſhould elſe have wanted an errand. He was even loaden with booty, when, having fetcht a compaſs about Aſia, he came at length upon the Gallo-Greeks. Theſe had long domineered over the Country: though of late times, it was rather the fame and terrour of their fore-paſſed acts, than any preſent virtue of theirs, which held them up in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately ſuch trial, when they ſerved under King Antiochus, as made them to acknowledge themſelves far the worſe men. Wherefore they thought it no ſmall part of their ſafety, that they dwelt upon the River Halys, in an In-land Country, where thoſe Enemies were not very like to ſearch them out. But when ſuch hopes failed; and when ſome Princes of their own Nation, that had been Friends of Eumenes, exhorted the reſt to yield: then was no counſel thought ſo good, as to forſake their Houſes and Country, and with all that they could carry or drive, to betake themſelves unto the high Mountains of Olympus and Margana. Theſe Mountains were exceeding hard of aſcent, though none ſhould undertake the cuſtody. Being therefore well manned and victualled for a long time, as alſo the natural ſtrength being helpt by ſuch fortification as promiſed greateſt aſſurance: it was thought, that the Conſul would either forbear the attempt of forcing them, or eaſily be repelled; and that finally, when he had ſtayed there awhile, Winter, and much want, ſhould force him to diſlodge. Yet all this availed not. For whereas the Gallo-Greeks had been careleſs of furniſhing themſelves with caſting weapons, as if ſtones would have ſerved well enough for that purpoſe: the Romans, who came far otherwiſe appointed, found greater advantage in the difference of Arms, than impediment in diſadvantage of Ground. Archers and Slingers did eaſily prevail againſt Caſters of Stones; eſpecially being ſuch as were theſe Gallo-Greeks, neither exerciſed in that manner of Fight, nor having prepared their Stones before-hand, but catching up what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than thoſe of a fit ſize. Finally the Barbarians, wanting de-fenſive Arms, could not hold out againſt the Arrows and Weapons of the Roman light Armature: but were driven from a piece of ground, which they had undertaken to make good, up into their Camp on the top of the Mountain; and being forced out of their Camp, had none other way left, than to caſt themſelves headlong down the ſteep Rocks. Few of the men eſcaped alive: all their Wives, Children, and Goods, became a prey unto the Romans. In the very like manner were the reſt of that Nation overcome ſoon after, at the other Mountain: only more of them ſaved themſelves by flight, as having fairer way at their backs.

Theſe Wars being ended: Fulvius and Manlius were appointed by the Senate, each of them to retain as Pro-conſul, his Province for another year. Fulvius, in his ſecond year, did little or nothing. Manlius gave Peace to thoſe whom he had vanquiſhed; as likewiſe to Ariarathes the Cappadocian, and ſome others, not by him vanquiſhed, but ſubmitting themſelves for fear of the Roman Arms. He drew from them all, what profit he could: and laid upon them ſuch conditions, as he thought expedient. He alſo did finiſh the League of Peace with Antiochus; where he ſwore, and received the Kings Oath by Embaſſadours, whom he ſent for that purpoſe. Finally, having ſet in order the matters of Aſia, he took his way toward the Helleſpont, loaden with ſpoil, as carrying with him (beſides other treaſures) all that the Gallo-Greeks had in ſo many years extorted from the wealthy Provinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Army of Manlius return home rich in money alone, or Cattle, or things of needful uſe, which the Roman Souldiers had been wont to take as the only good purchaſe; but furniſhed with ſumptuous Houſhold-ſtuff, and ſlaves of price, excellent Cooks, and Muſicians, for Banquets; and in a word, with the ſeeds of that Luxury which finally over-grew and choaked the Roman virtue.

The Country of Thrace lay between Helleſpont and the Kingdom of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his journey homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that he paſſed through them, without any ſuch booty as might provoke them; or perhaps rather, becauſe Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians ſhould not ſtir. But when Manlius came along with a huge train of baggage, the Thracians could not ſo well contain themſelves. Neither was it thought, that Philip took it otherwiſe than very pleaſantly, to have this Roman Army robbed, and well beaten on the way. He had cauſe to be angry, ſeeing how little himſelf was regarded, and what great rewards were given to Eumenes. For he underſtood, and afterwards gave the Romans to underſtand, that Eumenes could not have abiden in his own Kingdom, if the People of Rome had not made War in Aſia: whereas contrariwiſe, Antiochus had offered unto himſelf three thouſand Talents, and fifty Ships of War, to take part with him and the Æolians; promiſing moreover to reſtore unto him all the Greek Cities, that had been taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference between him and Eumenes, when the War began: He thought it no even dealing of the Romans, after their Victory, to give away not only the half of Aſia, but Cherſoneſus, and Lyſimachia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas upon himſelf they beſtowed not any one Town. It agreed not indeed with his Nobility to go to Rome, and beg Provinces in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodians had lately done. He had entertained lovingly the two Scipio's, whom he thought the moſt honourable men in Rome; and was grown into near acquaintance with Publius, holding correſpondence with him by Letters, whereby he made himſelf acquainted with the Wars in Spain and Africk. This perhaps he deemed ſufficient, to breed in the Romans a due reſpect of him. But Eumenes took a ſurer way. For the Scipio's had not the diſpoſing of that which they won from Antiochus: as neither indeed had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates aſſiſting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which thoſe Delegates were choſen, and inſtructed how to proceed. When Philip therefore ſaw theſe upſtart Kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as baſe companions, advanced ſo highly, and made greater than himſelf: yea, himſelf unregarded, contemned, and expoſed to many wrongs: then found he great cauſe to wiſh, that he had not ſo haſtily declared himſelf againſt Antiochus, or rather that he had joyned with Antiochus and the Ætolians, by whom he might have been freed from his inſolent Maſters. But what great argument of ſuch diſcontentedneſs, the Macedonian had, we ſhall very ſhortly be urged to diſcourſe more at large. At the preſent it was believed, that the Thracians were by him ſet on to aſſail the Romans paſſing through their Country. They knew all advantages, and they fell, unexpected, upon the Carriages that were beſtowed in the midſt of the Army; whereof part had already paſſed a dangerous Wood through which the baggage followed; part was not yet ſo far advanced. There was enough to get, and enough to leave behind: though both the getting and the ſaving, did coſt many lives, as well of the Barbarians, as of the Romans. They fought until it grew night: and then the Thracians withdrew themſelves; not without as much of the booty as was to their full content. And of ſuch trouble there was more, though leſs dangerous, before the Army could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the Kingdom they had a fair march into Epirus; and ſo to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece.

To Manlius, and to Fulvius, when each of them returned to the City, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction: eſpecially to Manlius, whom ſome of the ten Delegates appointed to aſſiſt him, did very bitterly tax as an unworthy Commander. Touching the reſt of their accuſation, it ſufficeth that he made good anſwer, and was approved by the chief of the Senate. One Clauſe is worthy of more particular conſideration. Reprehending his deſire to have hindered the Peace with Antiochus, They ſaid, That with much ado he was kept from leading his Army over Taurus, and adventuring upon the Calamity threatned by Sybils Verſes, unto thoſe that ſhould paſs the Fatal Bounds. What calamity or overthrow this was, wherewith Sybils Prophecy threatned the Roman Captain, or Army, that ſhould paſs over Taurus, I do not conceive. Pompey was the firſt that marched with an Army beyond thoſe limits: though the Victories of Lucullus had opened unto him the way, and had before-hand won, in a ſort, the Countries on the other ſide of the Mount; which Lucullus gave to one of Antiochus his Race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But we find not, that either Lucullus or Pompey, ſuffered any loſs, in preſuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sybil. Indeed the accom-accomplishment of this Prophecy, fell out near about one time, with the restitution of Ptolomy King of Egypt, that was forbidden unto the Romans by the same Sybil. It may therefore seem to have had reference unto the same things that were denounced as like to happen upon the reduction of the Egyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sybil had in them any truth, and were not, as Tully noteth, sowed at randome in the large Field of Time, there to take root, and get credit by event; I will not here dispute. But I hold this more probable, than that the restitution of Ptolomy to his Kingdom by Gabinius the Roman, should have any way betokened the coming of our Saviour: as some both ancient and modern Christian Writers have been well pleased to interpret Sybil in that Prophecy. Of the Sybilline Predictions, I have sometimes thought reverently: though not knowing what they were (as I think few men know) yet following the common belief and good authority. But observation of the shameful Idolatry, that upon all occasions was advanced in Rome by the Books of Sybil, had well prevailed upon my credulity, and made me suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the judgement of Eusebius: when that learned and excellent work of Master Casaubon upon the Annals of Cardinal Baronius, did altogether free me from mine error; making it apparent, That not only those Prophecies of Sybil, wherein Christ so plainly was shewed, but even the Books of Hermes, which have born such reputation, were no better than counterfeited pieces, and at first entertained (whosoever devised them) by the indiscreet zeal of such as delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strengthened with forreign proofs. And in the same Rank I think, we ought to place that notable History, reported by Eusebius from no mean Authors, Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus in Rome; namely, of an Altar to him erected, with an inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, that is, To Simon the Holy God. For what can be more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publick, should have been quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetonius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Philosophers and Poets would not have suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it been true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then lived and flourished, would have abstained from speaking any word of an argument so famous. Wherefore I am perswaded, that this Inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, was, by some bad Criticisme, taken amiss in place of Semoni Sango: a title four hundred years older than the time of Simon Magus. For the Goods of one Vitruvius a Rebel, had many Ages before been consecrated Semoni Sango, that is, To the Spirit or Demi-god-Sangus, in whose Chappel they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman Letters, or by some spoil that time had wrought upon them; it might easily come to pass, that the words should be mis-read, Simoni Sancto, and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sangus, thereupon should frame the conjecture, which now passeth for a true History. Such conjectures, being entertained without examination, find credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their fashion is amended, and made more Historical, than was conceived by the Author. But it cannot be safe, to let our Faith (which ought to stand firm upon a sure foundation) lean over-hardly on a well-painted, yet rotten post.

Euseb. Eccl. hist. c. 13.

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbered among a few of the richest, which ever the City beheld. Out of that which he brought into the Treasury, was made the last payment of those moneys which the Commonwealth had borrowed from private men in the second Punick War. So long was it, that Rome had still some feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memory, of any danger. This Triumph of Manlius was deferred by him, even so long as he well could: for that he thought it not safe, to make his entrance into the City, until the heat of an inquisition, then raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipio's were called one after another, into judgement, by two Tribunes of the People; men, only by this accusation, known to Posterity. P. Scipio the African, with whom they began, could not endure that such unworthy men should question him, of purloining from the Common Treasury, or of being hired with Bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargain for his Country. When therefore his day of answer came; he appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great Train of his Friends and Clients, with which he passed through the midst of the Assembly, and offered himself to speak. Having audience, he told the People, That upon the same day of the year he had fought a great Battle with Hannibal, and finished the Punick War by a signal Victory. In memory whereof, he thought it no fit season to brabble at the Law; but intended to visit the Capitol, and there give thanks to Jupiter, and the rest of the gods, by whose grace, both at that day and at other times, he had well and happily discharged the most weighty business of the Commonweal. And hereto he invited with him all the Citizens: requesting them, That if ever since the seventeenth year of his life, until he now grew old, the honourable places by them conferred upon him, had prevented the capacity of his age, and yet his deserts had exceeded the greatness of those honourable places: then would they pray, that the Princes and great Ones of their City might still be like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: so as all the People, even the Officers of the Court followed Scipio, leaving the Tribunes alone, with none about them excepting their own Slaves and a Cryer, by whom ridiculously they cited him to judgement, until for very shame, as not knowing what else to do, they granted him, unrequested, a further day. After this, when the African perceived that the Tribunes would not let fall their Suit, but enforce him to submit himself to a disgraceful trial: he willingly relinquished the City, and his unthankful Romans, that could suffer him to undergo so much indignity. The rest of his time he spent at Liternum: quietly with a few of his inward Friends, and without any desire of seeing Rome again. How many years he lived, or whether he lived one whole year in this voluntary banishment; it is uncertain. The report of his dying in the same year with Hannibal and Philopœmen, as also of his private behaviour at Liternum, render it probable, that he out-lived the Tribune-ship of his Accusers; who meant to have drawn him back to his answer, if one of their Colleagues (as one of them had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding) had not caused them to desist. Howsoever it was; the same Tribunes went more sharply to work with L. Scipio the Asiatique. They Propounded a Decree unto the People, touching money received of Antiochus, and not brought into the common Treasury; that the Senate should give charge unto one of the Prætors, to inquire and judicially determine thereof. In favour of this Decree, an Oration was made by Cato, the supposed Author of these contentions, and instigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect Virtue, temperate, valiant, and of singular industry; frugal also, both of the publick, and of his own; so as in this kind he was even faulty: for though he would not be corrupted with Bribes, yet was he unmerciful and unconscionable, in seeking to increase his own wealth, by such means as the Law did warrant. Ambition was his vice; which being poisoned with envy, troubled both himself and the whole City; whilst he lived. His mean birth caused him to hate the Nobility, especially those that were in chief estimation. Neither did he spare to bite at such as were of his own rank, men raised by desert, if their advancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabrio, whose Lieutenant he had been at Thermopylæ, was his Competitor for the Censorship, and likely to carry it, he took an Oath against him, which was counted as no better than malicious perjury, That he had not brought into the common Treasury some Vessels of Gold and Silver, gotten in the Camp of Antiochus. Now the hatred which he bare unto the Scipio's, grew partly, (besides his general spight at the Nobility) from his own first rising, wherein he was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from some check that was given unto himself, in the African Voyage by P. Scipio, whose Treasurer he then was. For when Cato did utter his dislike of the Consuls bad Husbandry (judging Magnificence to be no better) in some peremptory manner; Scipio plainly told him, That he had no need of such double diligence in his Treasurer. Wherefore either not caring what lies he published, or for want of judgement, thinking unworthily of the virtue that was far above him, Cato filled Rome with untrue Reports against his General; whose noble deeds confuted sufficiently the Author of such false Tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded, nor thought upon by the Scipio's, whilst it was nourished by their Enemy, brake out upon advantage, especially against L. Scipio: his Brother being dead, or out of the way. A severe inquiry and judgement being appointed of purpose against Scipio, matters were so carried, that he was soon condemned in a sum of money, far exceeding his ability to pay. For Non-payment his body should have been laid up in Prison: but from this rigour of the Law, he was freed by Tiberius Gracchus, the same Tribune who had caused the suit against the African to be let fall. In his Estate, which was confiscated to the use of the City, when there neither appeared any sign of his having been beholding to Antiochus, nor was found so much as what he had been condemned to pay; then fell his Accusers, and all whose hands had been against him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His Kindred, Friends, and Clients, made such a Collection for him, as would have set him in better Estate than before, if he had excepted it. He took no more than such of his own Goods, as were of necessary use, being redeemed for him by his nearest Friends.

And thus began the Civil War of the Tongue in the Roman pleadings: which had either not been, or not been much regardable until now, since the Punick War. Security of danger from abroad, and some want of sufficient Employment, were especial helps to the kindling of this Fire; which first caught hold upon that Great Worthy, to whose Virtue Rome was indebted, for changing into so great security her extream danger. But these factious contentions did no long while contain themselves within heat of words, and cunning practice. For when the Art of leading the multitude in such quarrelsome business, grew to perfection, they that found themselves overmatched by their Adversaries at this kind of weapon, began to make opposition first with Clubs and Stones, afterwards with Swords; and finally, proceeded from Frayes and Murders in the Streets, unto battle in the open Field. Cornelia, Daughter of Scipio the African, a Lady of rare Virtue, that in honour of her two Sons was more commonly named, Mother of the Gracchi, saw those her two Sons, whilst they were but young, slaughtered in Rome, together with some of their Friends: by those whom they opposed, and their death not revenged by order of Law, but rather approved by the Senate. At these times the Senators began to take upon them Authority, more than was to them belonging. They conferred upon the Consuls all the whole power of the City, under this form, Let the Consuls provide, that the Common-weal receive no detriment. By this Decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemy to the State, they thought to have won a great advantage over the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracchus, and of Saturnius, a popular man; whom by such Authority, they did put out of the way; it was not long e're Marius a famous Captain of theirs, was so condemned; who by force of Arms returned into the City; and murdered all the principal Senators: whereupon began the Civil Wars; which giving unto Sylla, who prevailed therein, means to make himself absolute Lord of Rome, taught Cæsar, a man of higher Spirit, to affect and obtain the like Soveraign Power, when by the like Decree of the Senate, he was provoked. It is true, that never any Consul had finally cause to rejoyce, of his having put in execution such Authority to him committed by the Senate. But as the fury of the multitude, in passing their Laws, by hurling of Stones, and other violence, made the City stand in need of a Soveraign Lord: so the vehemency of the Senate, in condemning as Enemies, those that would not submit themselves, when they were over-topped by Voices in the House, did compell Cæsar, or give him at least pretence, to right himself by Arms: wherewith prevailing against his Adversaries, he took such order, that neither Senate nor People, should thenceforth be able to do him wrong. So by intestine discord, the Romans consuming all or most of their principal Citizens, lost their own freedom, and became Subjects unto the arbitrary government of One: suffering this change in three Generations, after this beginning of their insolent Rule, wherein they took upon them as the highest Lords on earth, to do even what they listed. Yet had not Rome indeed attained hitherto unto compleat Greatness, nor believed of her self; as if she had, whilst a King sate crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and upholding the Reputation of a former Empire. Wherefore this consummation of her honour was thought upon betimes. How it was effected, the sequel will discover.

CHAP. VI.

The Second MACEDONIAN War.

SECT. I.

The Condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were Associates of the Romans, when the War with Antiochus was finished. The Romans quarrel with Philip. They deal insolently with the Achæans. The Macedonian, being unready for War, obtains Peace at Rome, by his Son Demetrius: of whom thenceforth he becomes jealous.

AFter the Overthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Common-weal of the Achæans, and all other the States of Greece, were governed by the same Laws and Magistrates as formerly had been, before the arrival of the Romans in those parts: yet in very truth (the publick Declaration excepted) they were none other than absolute Vassals to the People of Rome. For of those five Prerogatives belonging to a Monarch, or unto Soveraign Power, in whomsoever it rest; namely, To make Laws, To create Magistrates, To arbitrate Peace and War, to beat Money, and, To reserve (as the French call it) le dernier Ressort, or the last Appeals, the Romans had assumed four; and the greatest of them so absolutely, that is, The Appeal, or last resort, as every petty injury offered to each other by the fore-named Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embassadours, or Commissioners, in those places whence the Complaint came, or otherwise by the Senators themselves within Rome; from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King or Common-weals declined, He or they were beaten, and inforced to obedience; or had their Estates and Regalities utterly dissolved. Nevertheless it is true, that they had their own Laws, and Officers of their own ordaining: yet so, as neither the Laws were of force, when the Romans interposed their will to the contrary, neither was their election of Magistrates so free, as that they had not therein especial regard unto the good pleasure of these their Masters.

And to such degree of servitude the several Estates of Greece did bow very gently: either as being thankful for their deliverance from a Yoke more sensibly grievous; or, as being skilful in the Art of Flattery, and therein taking delight, since therein consisted their chief hope of thriving; or as being more fearful of displeasing the strongest, than mindful of their own honour. But Eumenes living further off, and being most obsequious unto the Romans, was not of long time questioned about any of his doings: his conformity unto them in matter of War and Peace, together with the diversion of their thoughts another way, giving him leave to hold his own even as he listed, until they should otherwise dispose of him. Neither was it a little available to him, that his Kingdom bordered upon the Nations by them not throughly subdued. For upon the same reason (as well as upon his own high deserts) were they very loving unto Masanissa, and to his House, until Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion settled in Africk: as likewise afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others, holding people in subjection unto themselves, by the Ministry of Kings: especially of such Kings, as were useful and obsequious unto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper, and shewed himself not forgetful of his own former greatness, the honour of his Race, or the high reputation of his Kingdom. But such Magnanimity was none otherwise construed by the Romans, than as want of due reverence to their Estate, and a valuation of himself against them: which in the pride of their fortune, they could not endure. Wherefore notwithstanding that he had lately given passage to their Armies thorow his Country, prepared the ways for them, and furnished them both with Victuals and other things needful, to transport them over the Hellespont into Asia, against Antiochus: yet upon the complaint of Eumenes and the States of Thessaly and Thrace, he was commanded to abandon the Cities of Ænus and Maronea, with all Pieces and places demanded by any of his Neighbours; whereof many of them he had lately conquered, by direction or licence, even from the Romans themselves.

These Towns of Ænus and Maronea had been part of Lysimachus his Kingdom: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the North-west, extended his Dominion very far. He is thought to have made himself Lord of Transylvania: In which Province it is said, * That innumerable Medals of Gold have been found in the age of our Grandfathers, each of them weighing two or three Crowns, and stamped with his Image on the one side, on the other side with Victory. Of all these Lordships, the possession, or rather the title (for he lived not to settle his Estate in Europe) fell to Seleucus Nicanor by right of War, wherein he vanquished and slew Lysimachus: as also, by the like right Ptolomy Ceraunus thought them his own, when he had murdered Seleucus. But the inundation of the Gaules, which the Kingdom of Macedon could not sustain, did shortly and easily wash away from that Crown, together with the most part of Thrace, all those heaps of Land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the Son of Demetrius and his Successors: though not much; for they were otherwise busied. The fury of the Gaules being over-past, those Countries which lately had been oppressed by them, recovered their Liberty; and not only held it, but learned, some of them, especially the Dardanians and wild Thracians, to find their advantages, and make use of them, even upon Macedon. Against the mischiefs commonly done done by theſe, King Philip did provide the moſt convenient remedies: by ſhutting up the ways, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his Kingdom; and by occupying Lyſimachia, with ſome other Towns in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarks of his own Country, againſt the Barbarians. Now, although it behoved him thus to do, for the defence of his own Eſtate: yet foraſmuch as theſe Towns were, in a manner, at abſolute liberty, his poſſeſſion of them was thought to partake more of violence than of Juſtice. And in this reſpect he was formerly accuſed by the Ætolians, of wrongful uſurpation and oppreſſion, in his having occupied Lyſimachia. Hereto he made a good anſwer. That his Garriſon did only ſave it from the Thracians: who, as ſoon as he thence withdrew his men, did ſeize upon the Town, and ruine it. The like perhaps he might have ſaid, touching Ænus and Maronea; That they were places unable to defend themſelves, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might have entrance into his Kingdom. But this Plea had not availed him, in the diſputation about Lyſimachia: and in the preſent queſtion, the Romans were not without their own title; ſince Antiochus had gotten all the Country thereabout, whilſt Philip was buſied in his former War: and ſince they, by their Victory, had gotten unto themſelves all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he only ſubmitted his right nnto the good pleaſure of the Senate: referring it unto their diſpoſition, Whether Ænus and Maronea ſhould be ſet at liberty: whether left in his hand, or whether beſtowed upon Eumenes; who begged them as an Appendix to Lyſimachia and Cherſoneſus, that were already his by their gift. What they would determine, he might eaſily perceive by the demeanour of their Embaſſadours towards him: who ſitting as Judges between him and all that made complaint upon him, gave ſentence againſt him in every controverſie. Nevertheleſs he ſent Embaſſadors to Rome, there to maintain his Right unto theſe Towns; wherein he thought, that equity (if it might prevail) was wholly on his ſide. For he had holpen their Conſuls in the War againſt Antiochus and the Ætolians: wherein, whatſoever he had gotten for himſelf, was now taken from him by their Embaſſadors: and would they now deprive him of thoſe two Towns, lying ſo fitly for the guard of his Kingdom, which he had gotten to himſelf out of the ruines of Antiochus, like as out of his own ruines, Antiochus had gotten in thoſe quarters a great deal more? By ſuch allegations either he was likely to prevail, or at leaſt to gain time, wherein he might bethink himſelf what he had to do. It was not long e're he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equal to him, than had been their Embaſſadours. Wherefore, conſidering how inſolently the Maronites had behaved themſelves, in pleading againſt him for their Liberty, he took counſel of his own paſſion; and (as by nature he was very cruel) gave order to Gnomaſtus, that was Warden of the Sea-coaſts, to handle theſe Maronites in ſuch ſort, as they might have little joy of the liberty by them ſo earneſtly deſired. Onomaſtus employed Caſſander, one of the Kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thracians by night, that they might ſack the Town, and uſe all cruelties of War. This was done: but ſo ill taken by the Roman Embaſſadors, who had better notice than could have been feared, of theſe proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more ſtrictly, than became his Majeſty, to an accompt. He would have removed the blame from himſelf, and laid it even upon the Maronites: affirming, that they, in heat of their Factions, being ſome inclinable to him, otherſome to Eumenes, had fallen into ſuch outrage, that they had cut one anothers Throats. And hereof he willed the Embaſſadors to enquire among the Maronites themſelves: as well knowing, that they who ſurvived, were either his own Friends: or ſo terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durſt not utter an offenſive word. But he found the Romans more ſevere, and more thorowly informed in the buſineſs, than to reſt contented with ſuch an anſwer. He was plainly told, That if he would diſcharge himſelf of the Crime objected, he muſt ſend Onomaſtus and Caſſander to Rome, there to be examined as the Senate ſhould think fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet he collected his Spirits, and ſaid, That Caſſander ſhould be at their diſpoſition: but concerning Onomaſtus, who had not been at Maronea, nor near to it, he requeſted them not to preſs him, ſince it ſtood not with his honour ſo lightly to give away his Friends. As for Caſſander, becauſe he ſhould tell no tales; He took order to have him poiſoned by the way. By this we ſee, that the Doctrine which Machiavel taught unto Ceſar Borgia, to imploy men in miſchievous actions, and afterwards to deſtroy them when they have performed the miſchief, was not of his own invention. All Ages have given us examples of this goodly policy, the latter having been apt Scholars in this Leſſon to the more ancient: as the Reign of Henry the Eighth here in England, can bear good witneſs; and therein eſpecially the Lord Cromwell, who periſhed by the ſame unjuſt Law that himſelf had deviſed, for the taking away of another mans life.

Such actions of Philip made an unpleaſant noiſe at Rome, and were like to have brought upon him the War which he feared, before he was ready to entertain it. Wherefore he employed his younger Son Demetrius as Embaſſadour unto the Senate: giving him Inſtructions how to make anſwer to all Complaints, and withall to deliver his own Grievances in ſuch wiſe, that if ought were amiſs, yet might it appear that he had been ſtrongly urged to take ſuch courſe. The ſum of his Embaſſage was, To pacifie the Romans, and make all even for the preſent. Demetrius himſelf was known to be very acceptable unto the Senate, as having been well approved by them, when he was Hoſtage in Rome: and therefore ſeemed the more likely to prevail ſomewhat; were it only, in that regard would be born unto his perſon.

Whilſt this buſineſs with the Macedonian hung in ſuſpence, and whilſt he, by his readineſs to make ſubmiſſion, ſeemed likely to divert from himſelf ſome other way the Roman Arms: the ſame Embaſſadors, that had been Judges between him and his Neighbours, made their progreſs thorow the reſt of Greece; and took notice of the Controverſies, which they found between ſome Eſtates in the Country. The greateſt cauſe that was heard before them, was the complaint of the baniſhed Lacedæmonians againſt the Achæans. It was objected unto the Achæans, That they had committed a grievous ſlaughter upon many Citizens of Lacedæmon: That unto this cruelty they had added a greater, in throwing down the Walls of the City: as alſo further, in changing the Laws, and abroabrogating the famous Inſtitutions of Lycurgus. Hereto Lycortas the Prætor of the Achæans, made anſwer, That theſe baniſhed Lacedæmonians, who now took upon them to accuſe the Nation that had once protected them, were notoriouſly known to be the men, who had themſelves committed that Murder, whereof ſhameleſly they laid the blame upon others: the Achæans having not only called thoſe unto judgement, that were ſuppoſed to be chief Authors of a Rebellion againſt both them and the Romans: and theſe Plaintiffs having ſlain them, upon private, though juſt hatred, as they were coming to make anſwer for themſelves. Concerning their throwing down the Walls of Lacedæmon, he ſaid it was moſt agreeable to Lycurgus his Ordinance: who, having perſwaded his Citizens to defend their Town and Liberty by their proper virtue, did inhibit unto them all kind of Fortifications: as the Retraits and Neſts either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedæmon had woful experience) of Tyrants and Uſurpers. Further he ſhewed, how the ſame Tyrants that had built theſe Walls, and hemmed in the Spartans, had alſo quite aboliſhed Lycurgus his Ordinances; and governed the City by their own lawleſs Will. As for the Achæans; they communicated their own Laws, which they held for the beſt, or elſe would ſoon change them, and take better, unto the Lacedæmonians; whom they found without Laws, or any tolerable form of Policy. For concluſion, Lycortas plainly told App. Claudius, the chief of the Embaſſadours, That he and his Country-men held it ſtrange, being Friends and faithful Allies of the Romans, to ſee themſelves thus conſtrained, to anſwer and give account of their actions, as Vaſſals and Slaves unto the People of Rome. For if they were indeed at Liberty: why might not the Achæans as well require to be ſatisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capua, as the Romans did buſie themſelves, to take account how things went at Lacedæmon? For if the Romans would ſtand upon their Greatneſs; and intimate, as they begun, that the Liberty of their Friends was nothing worth, longer than ſhould pleaſe themſelves to ratifie it: then muſt the Achæans have recourſe unto thoſe Agreements that were confirmed by Oath, and which, without perjury could not be violated; as reverencing, and indeed fearing the Romans, but much more, the immortal gods. To this bold anſwer of Cycortas, Appius found little to reply. Yet taking ſtate upon him, he pronounced more like a Maſter than a Judge, that if the Achæans would not be ruled by fair means, and earn thanks whilſt they might; they ſhould be compelled with a miſchief, to do what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This altercation was in the Parliament of the Achæans, which groaned to hear the Lordly words of Appius. Yet fear prevailed above indignation: and it was permitted unto the Romans to do as they liſted. Hereupon the Embaſſadours reſtored ſome baniſhed and condemned men: but the Roman Senate, very ſoon after, did make void all judgements of death or baniſhment, that had been laid by the Achæans upon any Citizen of Lacedæmon; as likewiſe they made it a matter of diſputation, whether or no the City and Territory of Lacedæmon ſhould be ſuffered to continue a member of the Achæan Common-wealth: or, taken from them, and made, as it had been, an Eſtate by it ſelf. By bringing ſuch a matter into queſtion, the Romans well declared, that they held it to depend upon their own will, how much or how little any of their Confederates ſhould be ſuffered to enjoy: though by contributing Sparta to the Councel of Achaia, they diſcovered no leſs, as to them ſeemed, the love which they bare unto the Achaians, than the power which they had over them.

Into ſuch ſlavery had the Greeks, and all Kings and Common-weals whatſoever, bordering upon any part of the Mediterranean Seas, reduced themſelves, by calling in the Romans to their ſuccour. They wanted not the good counſel and perſwaſions of many wiſe and temperate men among them; they had alſo the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gauls, and Africans, all ſubdued by the Romans; and, by ſeeking Patronage, made meer Vaſſals; to inſtruct them, what in the like caſe they ſhould expect: yet could not the true reaſons of Eſtate and Policy ſo prevail with them, but their private paſſions, and neighbouring hatred, which hath evermore bought Revenge at the price of ſelf-ruine, brought them from the honour which they enjoyed, of being free Princes and Cities, into moſt baſe and fearful ſervility.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who, though he ſaw the Greeks very far from daring to ſtir againſt thoſe, by whom both he and they were kept in awe; yet was he not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Romans, by freeing from his ſubjection, had made his implacable enemies) in hearty affection all the Country would be his, whenſoever he ſhould take Arms, as ſhortly he was like to do. Young Demetrius, coming home from Rome, brought with him the deſired Ratification of Peace; though qualified with much indignity ſoon following. He had been lovingly uſed at Rome, and heard with great favour in the Senate. There, being confounded with the multitude of Objections, whereto his youth, unskilful in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make anſwer: it was permitted unto him, to read ſuch brief notes as he had received from his Father, and out of thoſe the Senate were contented to gather ſatisfaction; more for Demetrius his own ſake, as they then ſaid, and wrote into Macedon, than for any goodneſs in the Defence. Such pride of theirs, in remitting his faults at the intreaty of his Son, together with ſome inſolence of his Son, growing (as appeared) from this favour of the Romans; did increaſe in Philip his hatred unto Rome, and bred in him a jealouſie of his too forward Son. To ſet him forward in theſe paſſions, there came dayly new Embaſſadors from Rome; ſome bringing one Commandment, ſome another; and ſome requiring him to fulfill thoſe things which had been impoſed upon him by their fore-goers. Neither were there wanting that obſerved his countenance: and when he had fulfilled all that was required at his hands; yet laid it to his charge, that he had done things unwillingly, and would be obedient no longer than he needs muſt. With theſe Embaſſadours young Demetrius was converſant: rather perhaps out of ſimplicity, and for that they made much of him, than for any ambitious reſpect; yea a great deal more than was pleaſing to his Father. So the rumour grew current through all Macedon, That Perſeus, the Elder Son of the King, ſhould not ſucceed unto his Father, but that the Diadem ſhould be conferred upon Demetrius, if not by ſome other pretence, yet by meer favour of the Romans: This offended, not only Perſeus, but Philip himſelf: who ſuſpected his younger Son, as more

Roman

Roman than his own; and accordingly miſconſtrued all his doings. But e're we proceed unto the bitter fruits of this jealouſie, it will not be amiſs to ſpeak of ſome memorable accidents that were in the mean time.

SECT. II.

The death of Philopœmen, Hannibal, and Scipio. That the Military profeſſion is of all other the moſt unhappy: notwithſtanding ſome examples, which may ſeem to prove the contrary.

THE Romans wanting other matter of quarrel in the Continent of Greece, had of late been ſo peremptory with the Achæans; that they ſeemed not unlikely to take part againſt them in any controverſie that ſhould be moved. Hereupon the Meſſenians, who againſt their will were annexed unto the Achæan Common-wealth, having long been of a contrary Faction thereto; grew bold to withdraw themſelves from that Society, with purpoſe to ſet up again the Eſtate of their own, ſevered from communion with any other. This was the device of ſome that were powerful in their City; who finding the multitude only inclinable to their purpoſe, and not over-ſtrongly affected in the buſineſs, were careful to ſeek occaſion of reducing things to ſuch paſs, that all their Citizens might be entangled in a neceſſity of ſtanding out, and of not returning to the Achæan League. And hereupon they began to do ſome acts of Hoſtility, whereby blood ſhould be drawn, and either ſide ſo far exaſperated, that little hope of agreement would be left. Upon the fame of their commotion and proceedings; Philopœmen, then Prætor of the Achæans, levied ſuch Forces as he could in haſte, and went againſt them. Many principal Gentlemen of the Achæans, eſpecially of the Megalopolitans, were ſoon in a readineſs to wait upon him. Beſides theſe, which were all, or for the moſt part, Horſe; He had ſome Auxiliaries out of Thrace and Crete, that uſually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, he met with Dinocrates, Captain of the Meſſenians, whom he charged, and forced to run. But whilſt his Horſe-men were too earneſt in following the chaſe; there arrived by chance a ſupply of five hundred from Meſſene, which gave new courage unto thoſe that fled. So the Enemies began to make head again: and with the help of thoſe, who very ſeaſonably came to their aid, compelled Philopœmens Horſe-men to turn back; Philopœmen himſelf had long been ſick of an Ague, and was then very weak: yet the greatneſs of his courage would not ſuffer him to be negligent of their ſafety, which had ſo willingly adventured themſelves under his conduct. He took upon him to make the Retreit: and ſuffering his Horſe-men to paſs along by him in a narrow Lane, he often turned about againſt the Meſſenians; whom, the reputation and the knowledge of his great worth, did terrifie from approaching over near to him. But it fell out unhappily, that being caſt to the ground by a fall off his Horſe, and being withall in very weak plight of body, he was unable to get up again. So the Enemies came upon him, and took him; yet ſcarce believed their fortune to be ſo good, although their eyes were witneſſes. The firſt meſſenger that brought this news to Meſſene, was ſo far from being believed, that he was hardly thought to be in his right wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the City ran forth to meet him, and behold the ſpectacle ſeeming ſo incredible! They cauſed him to be brought into the Theatre, that there they might ſatisfie themſelves with beholding him. The greateſt part of them had compaſſion on his misfortune: and in commemoration both of his virtue, and of the ſingular benefits by him done unto them, eſpecially in delivering them from Nabis the Tyrant; began to manifeſt their good will for his delivery. Contrariwiſe, Dinocrates and his Faction were deſirous haſtily to take away his life: becauſe they held him a man implacable, and one that would never leave any diſgrace, or injury done to him, unrevenged. They durſt not one truſt another with the keeping of him: but committed him into a ſtrong Vault under ground, that had been made for the cuſtody of their Treaſure. So thither they let him down faſt bound, and with an Engine laid an heavy ſtone upon the mouth of the Vault. There he had not ſtayed long, e're his Enemies had concluded his preſent death. The Hangman of the City was let down unto him with a cup of Poiſon, which Philopœmen took in his hand: and asking no more than whether the Horſe-men were eſcaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was ſafe; when he heard an anſwer to his mind, he ſaid it was well: and ſo with a chearful countenance, drank his laſt draught. He was ſeventy years old, and weakned with long ſickneſs, whereby the Poiſon wrought the ſooner, and eaſily took away his life. The Achæans, when they miſſed him in their flight, were marvailloufly offended with themſelves, for that they had been more mindful to preſerve their own lives, than to look unto the ſafety of ſo excellent a Commander. Whilſt they were deviſing what to do in ſuch a caſe: they got advertiſement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently afflicted: ſo as Embaſſadours were forthwith diſpatched unto Meſſene, craving his enlargement: and yet preparation made withall, to obtain it by force, in caſe that fair means would not ſerve. Lycortas was choſen General of the Army againſt Meſſene, craving his enlargement: and yet preparation made withall, to obtain it by force, in caſe that fair means would not ſerve. Lycortas was choſen General of the Army againſt Meſſene: who coming thither, and laying Siege to the Town, enforced it in ſhort ſpace to yield. Then Dinocrates knowing what he was to expect, laid hands upon himſelf, and made an end of his own life. The reſt of thoſe that had been partakers in the Murder: were compelled to wait in Bonds upon the aſhes of Philopœmen that were carryed home in ſolemn pomp to Megalopolis; where they were all of them ſlain at his Funeral, as Sacrifices to his Ghoſt whom they had offended. Q. Martius a Roman Embaſſadour, was then in Greece; whence, upon one occaſion or other, the Roman Embaſſadours were ſeldom abſent. He would have intermeddled in this buſineſs of Meſſene, had not Lycortas made ſhort work, and left him nothing to do.

About the ſame time was T. Quintius Flaminius ſent Embaſſadour to Pruſias King of Bythinia: not ſo much to withdraw him from proſecuting the War againſt Eumenes, as to entreat him that he would deliver Hannibal, the moſt ſpightful enemy in all the world unto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Pruſias (therein unworthy worthy of the Crown he wore) did readily condescend: or rather (as Livie thinks) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliver him alive to Flaminius. For upon the first conference between the King and Flaminius, a Troop of Souldiers were directed to guard and environ the Lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captain having found cause before this to suspect the faith of Prusias, had devised some secret Sallies under ground to save himself from any treasonable and sudden assault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-closed, he had recourse to his last remedy: which he then was constrained to practice, as well to frustrate his enemies of their triumphing over him, as to save himself from their torture and mercilesse hands; who, as he well knew, would neither respect his famous enterprizes, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he saw no way to escape, nor counsel to resort unto, he took the poison into his hand, which he alwaies preserved for a sure Antidote against the sharpest Diseases of adverse fortune; which being ready to swallow down, he uttered these words: I will now (said he) deliver the Romans of that fear which hath so many years possest them; that fear, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old Man. This Victory of Flaminius, over me, which am disarmed, and betrayed into his hands, shall never be numbred among the rest of his heroical deeds: No, it shall make it manifest to all the Nations of the World, how far the ancient Roman virtue is degenerate and corrupted. For such was the nobleness of their Forefathers, as when Pyrrhus invaded them in Italy, and was ready to give them battle at their own door, they gave him knowledge of the Treason intended against him by poison; whereas these of a latter race, have employed Flaminius, a man who hath heretofore been one of their Consuls, to practice with Prusias, contrary to the honour of a King, contrary to his Faith given, and contrary to the Laws of Hospitality, to slaughter or deliver up his own Guest. He then cursing the person of Prusias, and all his, and desiring the immortal gods to revenge his Fidelity, drank off the poison and dyed.

In this year also (as good Authors have reported) to accompany Philopœmen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African; these being all of them, as great Captains as ever the World had; but not more famous than unfortunate. Certainly, for Hannibal, whose Tragedy we have now finished, had he been Prince of the Carthaginians, and one who by his authority might have commanded such supplies, as the War which he undertook, required; it is probable, that he had torn up the Roman Empire by the Roots. But he was so strongly crost by a cowardly and envious Faction at home, as his proper virtue, wanting publick force to sustain it, did lastly dissolve it self in his own, and in the common misery of his Country and Commonweal.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the envy of our equals, and jealousie of our Masters, be they Kings or Common-weals, that there is no profession more unprosperous than that of Men of War, and great Captains, being no Kings. For besides the envy and jealousie of Men, the spoils, rapes, famine, slaughter of the innocent, vastations and burnings, with a world of miseries laid on the labouring man, are so hateful to God, as with good reason did Monluc the Marshal of France confess, That, were not the mercies of God infinite, and without restriction, it were in vain for those of his profession to hope for any portion of them: (seeing the cruelties by them permitted and committed, were also infinite. Howsoever, this is true, That the Victories which are obtained by many of the greatest Commanders, are commonly either ascribed to those that serve under them, to Fortune, or the cowardice of the Nation against whom they serve. For the most of others, whose Virtues have raised them above the level of their inferiours, and have surmounted their envy: yet have they been rewarded in the end, either with disgrace, banishment, or death. Among the Romans we find many examples hereof; as Coriolanus, M. Livius, L. Æmylius, and this our Scipio, whom we have lately buried. Among the Greeks we read not of many that escaped these rewards. Yea long before these times, it was a Legacy that David bequeathed unto his Victorious Captain Joab. With this fear Alexander feasted Permenio, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Cassander. Hereunto Valentinian the Emperour invited Ætius: who, after many other Victories, overthrew Attelia of the Hunnes, in the greatest battle for the well fighting and resolution of both Armies, that ever was strucken in the World, for there fell of those that fought, beside run-awaies, an hundred and fourscore Thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told unto the Emperour by Proximus, That in killing of Ætius he had cut off his own right hand with his left: for it was not long after, that Maximus (by whose perswasion Valentinian slew Ætius, murdered the Emperour; which he never durst attempt, Ætius living. And, besides the loss of that Emperour, it is true, That with Ætius, the glory of the Western Empire was rather dissolved, than obscured. The same unworthy destiny, or a far worse had Belisarius; whose undertakings and victories were so difficult and glorious, as after-ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his eyes torn out of his head by Justinian: and he died a blind beggar. Narses also, to the great prejudice of Christian Religion, was disgraced by Justin. That rule of Cato against Scipio, hath been well observed in every Age since then, to wit, That the Common-weal cannot be accounted free, which standeth in awe of any one man. And hence have the Turks drawn another Principle; and indeed, a Turkish one, That every Warlike Prince should rather destroy his greatest men of War, than suffer his own glory to be obscured by them. For this cause did Bajazet the second dispatch Bassa Acomat; Selim strangle Bassa Mustapha; and most of those Princes bring to ruine the most of their Visiers. Of the Spanish Nation, the great Gonsalvo, who drave the French out of Naples: and Ferdinando Cortese, who conquered Mexico; were crowned with Nettles, not with Lawrel. The Earls of Egmond and Horn had no heads left them to wear Garlands on. And that the great Captains of all Nations have been paid with this Copper Coin; there are examples more than too many. On the contrary, it may be said, That many have acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great ability in matter of War. This I confess. Yet must it be had withall in consideration, that these high places have been given or offered unto very few, as rewards of their Military virtue; though many have usurped them, by the help and favour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it unregardable, That the Tyrants, which have oppressed the liberty of free Cities: and the Lieutenants of Kings or Empetours, which have traiterouſly caſt down their Maſters, and ſtepped up into their ſeats; were not all of them good men of War: but have uſed the advantage of ſome commotion, or many of them by baſe and cowardly practices, have obtained thoſe dignities, which undeſervedly were aſcribed to their perſonal worth. So that the number of thoſe that have purchaſed abſolute greatneſs by the greatneſs of their warlike virtue; is far more in ſeeming than in deed. Phocas was a Souldier, and by the help of the Souldiers he got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius: but he was a Coward; and, with a barbarous cruelty, ſeldom found in any other than Cowards, he ſlew firſt the Children of Mauritius, a Prince that never had done him wrong, before his face; and after them Mauritius himſelf. This his bloody aſpiring was but as a Debt, which was paid unto him again by Heraclius: who took from him the Imperial Crown, unjuſtly gotten; and ſet it on his own head. Leontius laid hold upon the Emperour Juſtine, cut off his Noſe and Ears, and ſent him into baniſhment: but Gods vengeance rewarded him with the ſame puniſhment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whoſe charge he had left his own men of War. Juſtine having recovered forces, lighted on Tiberius, and barbed him after the ſame faſhion. Philippicus commanding the Forces of Juſtine, murdered both the Emperour and his Son. Anaſtaſius, the Vaſſal of this new Tyrant, ſurpriſed his Maſter Philippicus, and thruſt out both his eyes. But with Anaſtaſius, Theodoſius dealt more gently: for having wreſted the Scepter out of his hands, he enforced him to become a Prieſt. It were an endleſs and a needleſs work to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodoſius, how many others have been repaid with their own cruelty, by men alike ambitious and cruel; or how many hundreds, or rather thouſands, hoping of Captains to make themſelves Kings, have by Gods Juſtice miſerably periſhed in the attempt. The ordinary, and perhaps the beſt way of thriving by the practice of Arms, is to take what may be gotten by the ſpoil of Enemies, and the liberality of thoſe Princes and Cities, in whoſe ſervice one hath well deſerved. But ſcarce one of a thouſand have proſpered by this courſe. For that obſervation, made by Solomon, of unthankfulneſs in this kind, hath been found belonging to all Countries and Ages: A little City, and a few men in it, and a great King came againſt it, and compaſſed it about, and builded Forts againſt it: And there was found a poor and wiſe man therein, and he delivered the City by his wiſdom: but none remembred this poor man. Great Monarchs are unwilling to pay great thanks, leſt thereby they ſhould acknowledge themſelves to have been indebted for great benefits: which the unwiſer ſort of them think to favour of ſome impotency in themſelves. But in this reſpect they are often times couzened and abuſed; which proves that weakneſs to be in them indeed, whereof they ſo glad'y ſhun the opinion. Contrariwiſe, free Eſtates are bountiful in giving thanks, yet ſo, as thoſe thanks are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Captains have made, by enriching themſelves with the ſpoil of the Enemy, they are very inquiſitive to ſearch into it; and to ſtrip the well-deſervers out of their gettings: yea moſt injuriouſly to rob them of their own, upon a falſe ſuppoſition; that even they whoſe hands are moſt clean from ſuch offences, have purloyned ſomewhat from the common Treaſury. Hereof I need not to produce examples: that of the two Scipio's being ſo lately recited.

Eccleſ. 9. 14, & 15.

In my late Soveraigns time, although for the Wars, which for her own ſafety, ſhe was conſtrained to undertake, her Majeſty had no leſs cauſe to uſe the ſervice of Martial men both by Sea and Land, than any of her Predeceſſors for many years had: yet according to the deſtiny of that profeſſion, I do not remember that any of hers, the Lord Admiral excepted, her eldeſt, and moſt proſperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwiſe honoured, for any ſervice by them performed. And, that her Majeſty had many adviſed, valiant, and faithful men, the proſperity of her affairs did well witneſs, who in all her days never received diſhonour by the Cowardice or Infidelity of any Commander, by her ſelf choſen and imployed.

For as all her old Captains by Land died poor men, as Malbey, Randol, Drewry, Reade, Wilford, Layton, Pellam, Gilbert, Conſtable, Burchier, Barkeley, Bingham, and others: ſo thoſe of a later and more dangerous imployment, whereof Norrice and Vere were the moſt famous, and who have done as great honour to our Nation (for the means they had) as ever any did; thoſe (I ſay) with many other brave Colonels, have left behind them (beſides the reputation which they purchaſed with many travels and wounds) nor title nor eſtate to their poſterity. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Berty, L. Willowghby of Ersby, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the World their Titles and Eſtates.

That her Majeſty in the advancement of her men of War did ſooner believe other men than her ſelf, a diſeaſe unto which many wiſe Princes, beſides her ſelf, have been ſubject; I ſay, that ſuch a confidence, although it may ſeem altogether to excuſe her Noble Nature, yet can it not but in ſome ſort accuſe her of weakneſs. And exceeding ſtrange it were, were not the cauſe manifeſt enough, that where the proſperous actions are ſo exceedingly prized, the Actors are ſo unproſperous, and ſo generally neglected. The cauſe, I ſay, which hath wrought one and the ſame effect in all times, and among all Nations, is this, that thoſe which are neareſt the perſon of Princes (which Martial-men ſeldom are) can with no good grace commend, or at leaſt magnifie a profeſſion far more Noble than their own, ſeeing therein they ſhould only mind their Maſters of the wrong they did unto others, in giving leſs honour and reward to men of far greater deſerving, and of far greater uſe than themſelves.

But his Majeſty hath already paid the greateſt part of that debt. For beſides the relieving by Penſions all the poorer ſort, he hath honoured more Martial men than all the Kings of England have done for this hundred years.

He hath given a Coronet to the L. Tho. Howard for his chargeable and remarkable ſervice, as well in the year 1588. as at Caliz, the Iſlands, and in our own Sea; having firſt commanded as a Captain, twice Admiral of a Squadron, and twice Admiral in Chief. His Majeſty hath changed the Baronies of Montjoy and Burley into Earldoms; and created Sidney Vicount, Knolles, Ruſſel, Carew, Danvers, Arundel of Warder, Gerald, and Chicheſter, Barons for their Governments and Services in the Netherlands, France, Ireland, and elſewhere.

SECT.

SECT. III.

Philip, making provision for War against the Romans, deals hardly with many of his own Subjects. His Negotiation with the Bastarnæ. His cruelty. He suspecteth his Son Demetrius. Demetrius accused by his Brother Perseus; and shortly after slain by his Fathers appointment. Philip repenteth him of his Sons death, whom he findeth to have been innocent: and intending to revenge it on Perseus, he dieth.

Quintius Martius the Roman Embassadour, who travelled up and down, seeking what work might be found about Greece, had received instruction from the Senate, to use the utmost of his diligence in looking into the Estate of Macedon. At his return home, that he might not seem to have discovered nothing, he told the Fathers, That Philip had done whatsoever they enjoyned him: yet so, as it might appear, that such his obedience would last no longer, than meer necessity should enforce him thereunto. He added further, That all the doings and sayings of that King, did wholly tend unto Rebellion, about which he was devising. Now it was so indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithful obsequiousness to the Romans, and foresaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdom into their own hands; which safety of their honour, if they could find convenient means; or otherwise (as to him seemed apparent) by what means soever. He was in an ill case: as having been already vanquished by them; having lost exceedingly both in strength and reputation; having Subjects that abhorred to hear of War with Rome; and having neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto urged, would adventure to take his part: yet he provided as well as he could devise, against the necessity which he daily feared. Such of his own People as dwelt in the maritime Towns, and gave him cause to suspect that they would do but bad service against the Romans, he compelled to forsake their dwelling, and removed them all into Emathia. The Cities and Country, whence these were transplanted, he filled with a multitude of Thracians, whose faith he thought a great deal more assured against those Enemies that were terrible to the Macedonians. Further, he devised upon alluring the Bastarnæ, a strong and hardy Nation, that dwelt beyond the River of Danubius, to abandon their seat, and come to him with all their multitude: who, besides other great rewards, would help them to root out the Dardanians, and take possession of their Country. These were like to do him notable service against the Romans; being not only stout fighting men, but such, as being planted in those quarters by him, would bear respect unto him alone. The least benefit that could be hoped by their arrival, must be the utter extirpation of the Dardanians; a People always troublesome to the Kingdom of Macedon, whensoever they found advantage. Neither was it judged any hard matter, to perswade those Bastarnæ, by hope of spoil, and other incitements, unto a more desperate Expedition, through Illyria, and the Countries upon the Adriatick Sea, into Italy it self. It was not known who should withstand them upon the way: rather it was thought, that the Scordisci, and peradventure some others through whose Country they were to pass, would accompany them against the Romans, were it only in hope of spoil. Now to facilitate the remove of these Bastarnæ from their own habitations, into the Land of the Dardanians, upon the border of Macedon; a long and tedious journey unto them, that carried with them their Wives and Children: Philip with gifts did purchase the good will of some Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countries through which they were to pass. And thus he sought means to strengthen himself with the help of the wild Nations, which neither knew the Romans, nor were known unto them; since he was not like to find assistance from any civil Nation, about the whole compass of the Mediterranean Seas. But these devices were long e're they took effect: so as the Bastarnæ came not before such time as he was dead; his death being the overthrow of that purpose. In the mean time he neglected not the training of his men to War, and the exercise of them in some small Expedition against those wild People that bordered upon him, and stood worst effected toward him.

But these his counsels and proceedings were miserably disturbed by the calamities that fell upon him, both in his Kingdom, and in his own House. The Families and whole Townships, which he had caused much against their wills to forsake their ancient dwellings, and betake themselves to such new habitations, as he in his discretion thought meeter for them, were vehemently offended at the change. Yet their anger at first contained it self within words: he having done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwise than by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long lived: which also he did unwillingly, being himself over-ruled by necessity, that seemed apparent. This evil therefore would soon have been determined, had not his cruel and vindicative nature made it worse. He could not pardon words proceeding from just sorrow: but imputed all to traiterous malice; and accordingly sought revenge where it was needless. In his rage he caused many to dye: among whom were some eminent men; and few or none of them deservedly. This increased the hatred of the People, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curses. Which grew the more general, when the King in a barbarous and base fury, mistrusting all alike whom he had injured, thought himself unlike to be safe, until he should have massacred all the Children of those Parents, whom tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his unmanly pleasure, some accidents, more tragical then perhaps he could have desired, gave men cause to think (as they could not in reason think otherwise) that, not witout vengeance poured on him from Heaven, he felt the like misery in his own Children. It is hard to say what the Romans intended, in the extraordinary favour which they shewed unto Demetrius, the Kings younger Son. It may well be (though it may be also suspected) that they had no purpose to make and nourish dissention between the brethren, but only to cherish the virtue and towardliness of Demetrius; like as we find it in their Histories. But their notable favour towards this young Prince, and his mutual respect of them, bred extream jealousie in the Fathers head. If any custom of the Romans, the manner of their life, the fashion of their Apparel, or the unsightly contriving and building (as then it was) of the Town of Rome, were jested at in ordinary discourse and Table-talk; Demetrius was sure to be presently on fire, defending and praising them, even in such points as rather needed excuse. This, and his daily conversation with their Embassadours as often as they came, gave his Father cause to think, that he was no fit partaker of any counsel held against them. Wherefore he communicated all his devices with his elder Son Perseus: who fearing so much lest his Brother should step between him and the succession, converted wholly unto his destruction, that grace which he had with his Father. Perseus was then thirty years old; of a stirring spirit, though much defective in Valour. Demetrius was younger by five years, more open and unwary in his actions, yet thought old and crafty enough, to entertain more dangerous practices than his free speeches discovered. The jealous head of the King having entertained such suspitions, that were much increased by the cunning practice of his elder Son, a slight occasion made the Fire break out, that had long lain smothered. A Muster and ceremonious lustration of the Army, was wont to be made at certain times with great solemnity. The manner of it at the present was thus. They cleft in twain a Bitch; and threw the Head and Forepart, with the Entrails, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way which the Army was to pass: This done, the Arms of all the Kings of Macedon, from the very first Original, were born before the Army. Then followed the King between his two Sons: after him came his own Band, and they of his Guard; whom all the rest of the Macedonians followed. Having performed other Ceremonies, that Army was divided into two parts: which under the Kings two Sons, charged each other in manner of a true Fight; using Poles, and the like, instead of their Pikes and accustomed Weapons. But in this present Skirmish there appeared some extraordinary contention for the Victory: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captains did over-earnestly seek each to get the upper hand, as a betokening of their good success in a greater trial. Some small hurt there was done, and wounds given, even with those stakes, until Perseus his side at length recoyled. Perseus himself was sorry for this, as it had been some bad presage: but his Friends were glad, and thought, that hereof might be made good use. They were of the craftier sort: who, perceiving which way the Kings favour bent, and how all the courses of Demetrius led unto his own ruine, addressed their Services to the more malicious and crafty head. And now they said, that this Victory of Demetrius would afford matter of complaint against him; as if the heat of his ambition had carryed him beyond the rules of that solemn passime. Each of the Brethren was that day to feast his own Companions, and each of them had spies in the others Lodging, to observe what was said and done. One of Perseus his Intelligencers behaved himself so indiscreetly, that he was taken and well beaten by three or four of Demetrius his Men, who turned him out of doors. After some store of Wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would go visit his Brother, and see what chear he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting such of them as had ill handled his Brothers man: yet he would leave none of his train behind, but forced them all to bear him company. They, fearing to be ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themselves secretly to prevent all danger. Yet there was such good espial kept, that this their coming Armed was forthwith made known to Perseus: who thereupon tumultuously locked up his doors, as if he stood in fear to be assaulted in his House. Demetrius wondred to see himself excluded, and fared very angerly with his Brother. But Perseus bidding him be gone as an Enemy, and one whose murdrous purpose was detected, sent him away with an entertainment no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the King. The elder Brother accused the younger unto the Father of them both. Much there was alledged, and, in effect, the same that hath been here recited, save that by misconstruction all was made worse. But the main point of the accusation, and which did aggravate all the rest, was, That Demetrius had undertaken this Murder, and would perhaps also dare to undertake a greater, upon confidence of the Romans; by whom he knew that he should be defended and born out. For Perseus made shew, as if the Romans did hate him; because he bore a due respect unto his Father, and was sorry to see him spoiled, and daily robbed of somewhat by them. And for this cause he said it was, that they did animate his Brother against him: as also that they sought how to win unto Demetrius the love of the Macedonians. For proof hereof he cited a Letter, sent of late from Titus Quintius to the King himself: whereof the contents were, That he had done wisely in sending Demetrius to Rome; and that he should yet further do well to send him thither again, accompanied with a greater and more honourable train of Macedonian Lords. Hence he enforced, That this counsel was given by Titus, of purpose to shake the allegiance of those, that should wait upon his Brother to Rome; and make them, forgetting their duties to their old King, become Servants to this young Traitor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made answer, by rehearsing all passages of the day and night foregoing, in such manner as he remembred them, and had conceived of them: bitterly reprehending Perseus, that converted matters of passime, and what was done or spoken in Wine, to such an accusation, whereby he sought his innocent Brothers death. As for the love which the Romans did bear him, he said that it grew, if not by his own virtue, at leastwise from their opinion thereof: so as by any impious practice, he were more like to lose it wholly, than to increase it. In this wretched pleading there wanted no such passions, as are incident to Fathers, Children, and Brethren, besides those that are common to all Plaintiffs and Defendants, before ordinary Judges. The King pronounced like a Father, though a jealous Father, That he would conclude nothing upon the excess or errour, whatsoever it were, of one day and night, nor upon one hours audience of the matter, but upon better observation of their lives, manners, and whole carriage of themselves both in word and deed. And herein he may seem to have dealt both justly and compassionately. But from this time forward he gave himself over wholly to Perseus: using so little conference with his younger Son, that when he had matters of weight in hand, such especially as concerned the Romans, he liked neither to have him present, nor near unto him. Above all, he had especial care to learn out what had passed between Demetrius and T. Quintius, tius, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpose he sent Embassadors to Rome, Philocles and Apelles; men whom he thought no way interessed in the quarrels between the Brethren, though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they saw the more in grace. These brought home with them a Letter, said to be written by Titus (whose Seal they had counterfeited) unto the King. The contents whereof were, A deprecation for the young Prince; with an intimation, as by way of granting it, That his youthful and ambitious desires had caused him to enter into practices unjustifiable, against his elder Brother, which yet should never take effect: for that Titus himself would not be Author, or Abettor of any impious device. This manner of excuse did forcibly perswade the King to think his Son a dangerous Traitor. To strengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom he gave Demetrius in custody, made shew as if he had pitied the Estate of the unhappy Prince, and so wrung out of him his secret intentions, which he shortly discovered unto Philip. It was the purpose of Demetrius to fly secretly to Rome; where he might hope not only to live in safety from his Father and Brother, but in greater likelihood, than he could find at home, of bettering such claim as he had in reversion unto the Crown of Macedon. Whatsoever his hopes and meanings were, all came to nought through the falshood of Didas; who, playing on both hands, offered unto the Prince his help for making the escape, and in the mean while revealed the whole matter to the King. So Philip resolved to put his Son to death, without further expence of time. It was thought behoveful to make him away privily, for fear lest the Romans should take the matter to heart, and hold it as a proof sufficient, at least, of the Kings despight against them, if not of his meaning to renew the War. Didas therefore was commanded to rid the unhappy Prince of his life. This accursed Minister of his Kings unadvised sentence, first gave poison to Demetrius: which wrought neither so hastily, nor so secretly, as was desired. Hereupon he sent a couple of Ruffians, to finish the tragedy: who villainously accomplished their work, by smothering that Prince, in whose life consisted the greatest hope of Macedon.

In all the race of Antigonus there had not been found a King, that had thus cruelly dealt with any Prince of his own blood. The houses of Lysimachus and Cassander fell either with themselves, or even upon their heels; by intestine discord and jealousies, grounded on desire of Soveraign rule, or fear of losing it. By the like unnatural hatred, had almost been cut off the lines of Ptolomy and of Seleucus: which, though narrowly they escaped the danger, yet were their Kingdoms thereby grievously distempered. Contrariwise, it was worthy of extraordinary note, how that upstart-family of the Kings of Pergamus had raised it self to marvellous greatness, in very short space, from the condition of meer slavery: whereof a principal cause was, the brotherly love maintained by them, with singular commendation of their piety. Neither was Philip ignorant of these examples, but is said to have propounded the last of them to his own Children, as a pattern for them to imitate. Certainly he had reason so to do: not more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, wherewith King Antigonus his Tutor had faithfully cherished him in his minority. But he was himself of an unmerciful nature; and therefore unmeet to be a good perswader unto kindly affection. The Murders by him done upon many of his Friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the satiating of his blood-thirsty Appetite, he delightfully had committed upon many innocents, both Strangers and Subjects of his own; did now procure Vengeance down from Heaven, that rewarded him with a draught of his own poison. After the death of his Son, he too late began to examine the crimes that had been objected; and to weigh them in a more equal ballance. Then found he nothing that could give him satisfaction, or by good probability induce him to think, that malice had not been contriver of the whole process. His only remaining Son Perseus could so ill dissemble the pleasure which he took in being freed from all danger of competition: as there might easily be perceived in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause, than the remove of those dangers which he had lately pretended. The Romans were now to be less feared than at other times; when he, as having accomplished the most of his desires, left off his usual trouble of mind, and carefulness of making provision against them. He was more diligently courted than in former times, by those that well understood the difference between a rising and a setting Sun. As for old Philip, he was left in a manner desolate, some expecting his death, and some scarce enduring the tediousness of such expectation. This bred in the King a deep Melancholly; and filled his head with suspitious imagination; the like whereof he had never been slow to apprehend. He was much vexed: and so much the more, for that he knew neither well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complain. One honourable man, a Cousin of his, named Antigonus, continued so true to Philip, that he grew thereby hateful to Perseus: and thus becoming subject unto the same jealous impressions which troubled the King, became also partaker of his secrets. This Counsellor, when he found that the anger conceived against Perseus would not vent it self, and give ease to the King, until the truth were known whether Demetrius were guilty or no of the Treason objected; as also that Philocles and Apelles (the Embassadours which had brought from Rome that Epistle of Flaminius, that served as the greatest evidence against Demetrius) were suspected of Forgery in the business: made diligent enquiry after the truth. In thus doing he found one Xychus, a man most likely to have understood what false dealing was used by those Embassadors. Him he apprehended, brought to the Court, and presented unto the King: saying, that this fellow knew all, and must therefore be made to utter what he knew. Xychus, for fear of torture, uttered as much as was before suspected: confessing against himself, that he had been employed by the Embassadours in that wicked piece of business. No marvel if the Fathers passions were extreme, when he understood that by the unnatural practice of one Son, he had so wretchedly cast away another, far more virtuous and innocent. He raged exceedingly against himself, and withall against the Authors of the mischief. Upon the first news of this discovery, Apelles fled away, and got into Italy; Philocles was taken: and either forasmuch as he could not deny it when Xychus confronted him, yielded himself guilty; or else was put to torture. Perseus was now grown stronger, than that he should need to fly the Country: yet not so stout as to adventure himself into his Fathers prepreſence. He kept on the Borders of the Kingdom towards Thrace, whilſt his Father wintred at Demetrias. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his ungracious Son, took a reſolution, to Aliene the Kingdom from him, and conſer it upon Antigonus. But his weak body, and exceſſive grief of mind, ſo diſabled him in the Travel thereto belonging, that e're he could bring his purpoſe to effect, he was conſtrained to yield to nature. He had reigned about two and forty years: alwayes full of trouble; as vexed by others, and vexing himſelf with continual Wars; of which that with the Romans was moſt unhappy, and few or none of the reſt found the concluſion, which a wiſe Prince would have deſired, of bringing forth together both honour and profit. But for all the evil that befell him, he might thank his own perverſe condition: ſince his Uncle, King Antigonus, had left unto him an Eſtate, ſo great, and ſo well ſettled, as made it eaſie for him, to accompliſh any moderate deſires, if he he had not abhorred all good counſel. Wherefore he was juſtly puniſhed by feeling the difference between the imaginary happineſs of a Tyrant, which he affected, and the life of a King, whereof he little cared to perform the duty. His death, even whilſt yet it was only drawing near, was fore-ſignified unto Perſeus, by Caligines the Phyſician, who alſo concealed it a while from thoſe that were about the Court. So Perſeus came thither on the ſudden, and took poſſeſſion of the Kingdom: which in fine he no leſs improvidently loſt, than he had wickedly gotten.

SECT. IV.

How the Baſtarnæ fell upon Dardania. The behaviour of Perſeus in the beginning of his Reign. Some Wars of the Romans: and how they ſuffered Maſaniſſa cruelly to oppreſs the Carthaginians. They quarrelled with Perſeus. They allow not their Confederates to make War without their leave obtained. The Treaſon of Callicrates, whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further quarrels to Perſeus. He ſeeks Friendſhip of the Achæans, and is withſtood by Callicrates. The Romans diſcover their intent of Warring upon him.

IMmediately upon the death of Philip, came the Baſtarnæ into Thrace; where order had been taken, long before, both for the free paſſage, and for the indempnity of the Country. This Compact was friendly obſerved, as long as no other was known, than that Philip did live to recompence all that ſhould be done, or ſuſtained, for his Service. But when it was heard, that a new King reigned in Macedon; and not heard withall, that he took any care what became of the enterpriſe: then was all daſht and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford ſo good markets unto theſe ſtrangers, as formerly they had done. On the other ſide, the Baſtarnæ would not be contented with reaſon, but became their own Carvers. Thus each part having loſt their rich hopes repoſed in Philip, grew careful of thriving in the preſent; with little regard of right or wrong. Within a while they fell to blows; and the Baſtarnæ had the upper hand, ſo as they chaſed the Thracians out of the plain Countries. But the Victors made little uſe of their good fortune. For whether by reaſon of ſome overthrow, received by them in aſſaulting a place of ſtrength; or whether becauſe of extream bad weather, which is ſaid to have afflicted them as it were miraculouſly: all of them returned home, ſave thirty thouſand, which pierced on into Dardania. How theſe thirty thouſand ſped in their Voyage, I do not find. It ſeems that by the careleſs uſing of ſome Victories, they drew loſs upon themſelves: and finally took that occaſion, to follow their companions back into their own Country.

As for Perſeus, he thought it not expedient, in the novelty of his Reign, to embroil himſelf in a War ſo dangerous, as that with the Romans was likely to prove. Wherefore he wholly gave his mind to the ſettling of his Eſtate, which well done, he might afterwards accommodate himſelf, as the condition of his affairs ſhould require, either for War or Peace. To prevent all danger of Rebellion, he quickly took away the life of Antigonus. To win love of his People, he ſate perſonally to hear their cauſes in Judgement, (though herein he was ſo over-diligent and curious, that one might have perceived this his virtue of Juſtice to be no better than fained) as alſo he gratified them with many delightful ſpectacles, magnificently by him ſet forth. Above all, he had care to avoid all neceſſity of War with Rome: and therefore made it his firſt work, to ſend Embaſſadours thither, to renew the League; which he obtained, and was by the Senate ſaluted King, and Friend unto the State. Neither was he negligent in ſeeking to purchaſe good will of the Greeks, and other his Neighbours, but was rather herein ſo exceſſively bountiful, that it may ſeem a wonder how in few years, to his utter ruine, he became ſo griping and tenacious. His fear was indeed the maſtring paſſion, which over-ruled him, and changed him into ſo many ſhapes, as made it hard to diſcern which of his other qualities were naturally his own. For proof of this, there is requiſite no more, than the relation of his actions paſt and following.

The Romans continued, as they had long, buſie in Wars againſt the Spaniards and Ligurians; People often vanquiſhed, and as often breaking forth into new Rebellion. They alſo conquered Iſtria; ſubdued the rebelling Sardinians; and had ſome quarrels, though to little effect, with the Illyrians and others. Over the Carthaginians they bore (as ever ſince the Victory) a heavy hand: and ſuffered Maſaniſſa to take from them what he liſted. The Carthaginians, like obedient Vaſſals to Rome, were afraid, though in defence of their own, to take Arms: from which they were bound by an Article of Peace, except it were with leave of the Romans. Maſaniſſa therefore had great advantage over them, and was not ignorant how to uſe it. He could get poſſeſſion by force, of whatſoever he deſired, e're their complaining Embaſſadors could be at Rome: and then were the Romans not hardly entreated to leave things as they found them.

So had he once dealt before, in taking from them the Country of Emporia: and ſo he did uſe them again and again: with pretence of title, where he had any; otherwiſe, without it. Gala the Father of Maſaniſſa had won ſome Land from the Carthaginians: which afterward Syphax won from from Gala, and within a while, reſtored to the right owners, for love of his Wife Sophonisba, and of Aſdrubal his Father-in-law. This did Maſaniſſa take from them by force: and by the Romans (to whoſe judgement the caſe was referred) was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficial it was for their Eſtate, to uſe all manner of ſubmiſſive obedience to Rome. They had ſcarcely digeſted this injury, when Maſaniſſa came upon them again, and took from them above ſeventy Towns and Caſtles, without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embaſſadors, they made lamentable complaint unto the Roman Senate. They ſhewed how grievouſly they were oppreſſed by reaſon of two Articles in their League: That they ſhould not make War out of their own Lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romans. Now although it were ſo that they might lawfully withſtand the violence of Maſaniſſa, invading their Country, howſoever he was pleaſed to call it his: yet ſince he was Confederate with the Romans, they durſt not preſume to bear defenſive Arms againſt him, but ſuffered themſelves to be eaten up, for fear of incurring the Romans indignation. Wherefore they intreated, that they might have fairer Juſtice; or be ſuffered to defend their own by ſtrong hand; or at leaſt, if right muſt wholly give place to favour, That the Romans yet would be pleaſed to determine, how far forth Maſaniſſa ſhould be allowed to proceed in theſe outrages. If none of theſe Petitions could be obtained, then deſired they, that the Romans would let them underſtand, wherein they had offended ſince the time that Scipio gave them Peace; and vouchſafe to inflict on them ſuch puniſhment as they themſelves in honour ſhould think meet: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to ſuffer at once what ſhould be appointed by ſuch Judges, than continually to live in fear, and none otherwiſe draw breath, than at the mercy of this Numidian Hang-man. And herewithall the Embaſſadors threw themſelves proſtrate on the ground, weeping; in hope to move compaſſion.

Here we may behold the fruits of their envy to that valiant houſe of the Barchines; of their irreſolution in proſecuting a War ſo important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy; and of their half-penny-worthing in matter of expence when they had adventured their whole Eſtate in the purchaſe of a great Empire. Now are they Servants, even to the ſervants of thoſe men, whoſe Fathers they have often chaſed, ſlain, taken and ſold as Bond-ſlaves in the Streets of Carthage, and in all Cities of Africk and Greece. Now have they enough of that Roman Peace, which Hanno ſo often and ſo earneſtly deſired. Only they want Peace with Maſaniſſa, once their Mercenary, and now their Maſter, or rather their tormentor, out of whoſe cruel hands, they beſeech their Maſters to take the office of correcting them. In ſuch caſe are they, and adore the Romans, whom they ſee flouriſh in ſuch proſperity as might have been their own. But the Romans had far better entreated Varro, who loſt the battle at Cannæ; than Hannibal that won it was uſed by the Carthaginians: they had freely beſtowed, every man of them, all his private riches upon the Common-wealth; and employed their labours for the publick, without craving recompence: as alſo they had not thought it much, though being in extream want, to ſet out an Army into Spain, at what time the enemy lay under their own Walls. Theſe were no Carthaginian virtues: and therefore the Carthaginians, having fought againſt their betters, muſt patiently endure the miſeries belonging to the vanquiſhed. Their pitiful behaviour bred peradventure ſome commiſeration; yet their tears may ſeem to have been miſtruſted, as proceeding no leſs from envy to the Romans, than from any feeling of their own calamity. They thought themſelves able to fight with Maſaniſſa: which eſtimation of their Forces was able to make them, after a little while, enter into compariſons with Rome. Wherefore they obtained not ſuch leave as they ſought, of defending their own right by Arms: but contrariwiſe, when without leave obtained, they preſumed ſo far, the deſtruction of Carthage was thought an eaſie puniſhment of that offence. At the preſent, they received a gentle anſwer; though they had otherwiſe little amends. Guluſſa the Son of Maſaniſſa was then in Rome, and had not as yet craved audience. He therefore was called before the Senate; where he was demanded the reaſon of his coming; and had related unto him the complaint made by the Carthaginians againſt his Father. He anſwered, That his Father not being throughly aware of any Embaſſadors thither ſent from Carthage, had therefore not given him inſtructions how to deal in that buſineſs. Only it was known, that the Carthaginians had held Councel divers Nights, in the Temple of Æſculapius: whereupon he himſelf was diſpatched away to Rome, there to intreat the Senate, that theſe common Enemies of the Romans, and of his Father, might not be over-much truſted; eſpecially againſt his Father, whom they hated moſt maliciouſly, for his conſtant faith to the People of Rome. This anſwer gave little ſatisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replyed that for Maſaniſſa his ſake, they had done, and would do, whatſoever was reaſonable, but that it ſtood not with their Juſtice, to allow of this his violence, in taking from the Carthaginians, thoſe Lands, which by the Covenants of the League were granted unto them freely to enjoy. With this mild rebuke they diſmiſſed Gulusſa; beſtowing on him friendly preſents (as alſo they did on the Carthaginians) and willed him to tell his Father, that he ſhould do well to ſend Embaſſadors, more fully inſtructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian War was even ready to begin: at which time the Romans were not willing too much to offend, either the Carthaginians (for fear of urging them unſeaſonably to Rebellion) or Maſaniſſa, at whoſe hands they expected no little help. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Maſaniſſa: by the Carthaginians, partly for fear, partly for hope of better uſage in the future; by Maſaniſſa, in way of thankfulneſs; though if it had happened (which was unlikely) that they ſhould be vanquiſhed; he made none other account, than that all Africk round about him, and Carthage therewithall, ſhould be his own.

In the midſt of all theſe cares, the Romans had not been unmindful of Perſeus. They viſited him daily with Embaſſadors; that is, with honourable ſpies to obſerve his behaviour. Theſe he entertained kindly at firſt, until (which fell out e're long) he perceived whereto their diligence tended. Firſt they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania: neither would they take any ſatisfaction, until the Baſtarnæ were thence gone; though he proteſted, that he had not ſent for them. Afterward they pried narrowly into his his doings: and were no leſs ill contented with good offices, by him done, to ſundry of his neighbours, than with thoſe wrongs, which (they ſaid) he did unto other ſome. Where he did harm to any; they called it making War upon their Friends. Where he did good; they called ſuch his bounty, ſeeking Friends to take his part againſt them. The Dolopians, his Subjects, (upon what occaſion it is uncertain) rebelled, and with exquiſite torments ſlew Euphranor, whom he had appointed their Governour. It ſeems that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a People without ſtrength to reſiſt the Macedonian: and therefore unlikely to have preſumed far, unleſs either they had been extreamly provoked; or elſe were ſecretly animated by the Romans. Whatſoever it was that bred this courage in them, Perſeus did ſoon allay it, and reclaim them by ſtrong hand. But the Romans took very angerly this preſumption of the King: even as if he had invaded ſome Country of their Italian Confederates, and not corrected his own Rebels at home. Fain they would have had him to draw in the ſame yoke with the Carthaginians; whereunto had he humbled once his neck, they could themſelves have done the part of Maſaniſſa; though Eumenes, or ſome other fit for that purpoſe, had been wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That the Conditions of the League between them were ſuch as made it unlawful both to his Father heretofore, and now to him, to take Arms without their licence firſt obtained.

To the ſame paſs they would alſo fain have reduced the Greeks, and generally all their Adherents, even ſuch as had entred into League with them upon equal terms: whom they uſually rewarded with a frown, whenſoever they preſumed to right themſelves by force of Arms, without ſeeking firſt the Oracle at Rome. Hereof the Achæans had good experience: whoſe confidence in their proper ſtrength, made them otherwhiles bold to be their own Carvers; and whoſe hope of extraordinary favour at Rome, cauſed them the more willingly to refer their cauſes to arbitrement. For when they went about to have chaſtiſed the Meſſenians by War; T. Quintius rebuked them, as too arrogant, in taking ſuch a work in hand, without his authority: yet by his authority he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Semblably at other times were they reprehended, even with Lordly Threats, when they took upon them to carry any buſineſs of importance, by their own power, without ſtanding unto the good grace of the Romans. Who nevertheleſs upon ſubmiſſion, were apt enough to do them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their abſolute liberty, as by which they were not like to thrive; eſpecially in uſurping the practick of Arms, which belonged only to the Imperial City. In learning this hard Leſſon, they were ſuch untoward Schollars, that they needed, and not long after felt, very ſharp correction. Yet was there no ſmall part of blame to be imputed unto their Maſters. For the Roman Senate, being deſirous to humble the Achæans, refuſed not only to give them ſuch aid as they requeſted, and as they challenged by the tenour of the League between them; but further, with a careleſs inſolency, rejected this honeſt and reaſonable petition, That the Enemy might not be ſupplied from Italy, with Victuals or Arms. Herewith not content, the Fathers, as wearied with dealing in the affairs of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argives, Lacedæmonians, or Corinthians, would revolt from the Achæans; they themſelves would think it a buſineſs no way concerning them.

This was preſently after the death of Philopœmen: at what time it was believed, that the Common-wealth of Achaia was like to fall into much diſtreſs: were it not upheld by countenance of the Romans. All this notwithſtanding; when Lycortas Prætor of the Achæans had utterly ſubdued the Meſſenians far ſooner than was expected; and when as not only no Town rebelled from the Achæans; but many entered into their Corporation; then did the Romans with an ill-favoured grace, tell the ſame Embaſſadors, to whoſe petition they had made ſuch bad anſwer (and who as yet were not gone out of the City,) That they had ſtraightly forbidden all manner of ſuccour to be carried to Meſſene. Thus thinking, by a fained gravity, to have ſerved their own turns, they manifeſted their condition, both to ſet on the weaker againſt the ſtronger and more ſuſpected, and alſo to aſſume unto themſelves a Soveraign power, in directing all matters of War, which diſſemblingly they would have ſeemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their Confederates: not permitting any of them to make War, whether offenſive or defenſive; though it were againſt meer ſtrangers; without interpoſing the authority of the Senate and People of Rome: unleſs peradventure, ſometimes they winked at ſuch violence, as did help towards the accompliſhment of their own ſecret malice. Now theſe Roman Arts, howſoever many (for gainful or timerous reſpects) would ſeem to underſtand them; yet were generally diſpleaſing unto all men endued with free Spirits. Only the Athenians, once the moſt turbulent City in Greece, having neither Subjects of their own that might rebell, nor power wherewith to bring any into ſubjection, for want of more noble arguments, wherein to practice their eloquence, that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flattering the moſt mighty. So they kept themſelves in grace with the Romans, remaining free from all trouble, until the War of Mithridates: being men unfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratulators of the Roman Victories, and Pardon-cravers for the vanquiſhed. Such were the Athenians become. As for thoſe other Common-weals and Kingdoms, that with over-nice diligence, ſtrove to preſerve their Liberties and Lands from conſuming by piece-meal: they were to be devoured whole, and ſwallowed up at once. Eſpecially the Macedonian, as the moſt unpliant, and wherein many of the Greeks began to have affiance, was neceſſarily to be made an example, how much better it were to bow, than to break.

Neither Perſeus, nor the Romans, were ignorant, how the Greeks at this time ſtood affected. Perſeus, by reaſon of his near Neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce between them and his Subjects, could not want good information of all that might concern him, in their affairs. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopœmen had long ſince foretold, of the miſerable ſubjection, whereinto Greece was likely to be reduced, by the Roman Patronage. Indeed they not only perceived the approaching danger, but as being tenderly ſenſible of their liberty, felt themſelves grieved with the preſent ſubjection, whereto already they were become come obnoxious. Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publick, to fall out with the Romans; yet all of them had the care to chooſe among themſelves none other Magiſtrates, than ſuch as effected the good of their Country, and would for no ambition, or other ſervile reſpect, be flatterers of the greatneſs which kept all in fear. Thus it ſeemed likely, that all domeſtical conſpiracies would ſoon be at an end; when honeſty, and love of the Common-weal, became the faireſt way to preferment. Of this careful proviſion for the ſafety of Greece, the Romans were not throughly advertiſed: either becauſe things were diligently concealed from their Embaſſadors; whom all men knew to be little better than ſpies; or becauſe little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by ſuch Traitors (of whom every City in Greece had too many) as were men unregarded among their own people, and therefore more like to ſpeak maliciouſly than truly; or perhaps becauſe the Embaſſadors themſelves being all Senators, and capable of the greateſt Office or Charge, had no will to find out other mattter of trouble, than was fitting to their own deſires of employment. But it is hard to conceal that which many know, from thoſe that are feared or flattered by many. The Achæans being to ſend Embaſſadors to Rome, that ſhould both excuſe them, as touching ſome point wherein they refuſed to obey the Senate; and inform the Senate better in the ſame buſineſs: choſe one Callicrates, among others, to go in that Embaſſage. By their making choice of ſuch a man, one may perceive the advantage, which miſchievous wretches; who commonly are forward in purſuing their vile deſires, have againſt the plain ſort of honeſt men, that leaſt earneſtly thruſt themſelves into the troubleſome buſineſs of the weal-publick. For this Callicrates was in ſuch wiſe tranſported with ambition, that he choſe much rather to betray his Country, than to let any other be of more authority than himſelf therein. Wherefore inſtead of well diſcharging his credence, and alledging what was meeteſt in juſtification of his People, he uttered a quite contrary tale; and ſtrongly encouraged the Romans, to oppreſs both the Achæans, and all the reſt of Greece, with a far more heavy hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to look unto the ſettling of their Authority, among his froward Countrimen: if they meant not wholly to forego it. For now there was taken up a cuſtom, to ſtand upon points of Confederacy, and Laws: as if theſe were principally to be had in regard, any injunction from Rome notwithſtanding.

Hence grew it, that the Achæans, both now, and at other times, did what beſt pleaſed themſelves, and anſwered the Romans with excuſes: as if it were enough to ſay, That by ſome condition of League, or by force of ſome Law, they were diſcharged or hindred from obeying the Decrees of the Senate, This would not be ſo, if he, and ſome other of his opinion might have their wills: who ceaſed not to affirm, That no Columns, or Monuments, erected, nor no ſolemn Oath of the whole Nation, to ratifie the obſervance of Confederacy or Statute, ought to be of force, when the Romans willed the contrary. But it was even the fault of the Romans themſelves, that the multitude refuſed to give ear unto ſuch perſwaſions. For howſoever in popular Eſtates, the ſound of liberty uſed to be more plauſible, than any diſcourſe tending againſt it: yet if they which undertook the maintenance of an argument, ſeeming never ſo bad, were ſure by their ſo doing, to procure their own good; the number of them would increaſe apace, and they become the prevalent faction. It was therefore, ſtrange how the Fathers could ſo neglect the advancement of thoſe, that ſought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman Majeſty. More wiſely, though with ſeditious and rebellious purpoſe, did the Greeks; who many times, yea and ordinarily, conferred great honours, upon men otherwiſe of little account or deſert, only for having uttered ſome brave words againſt the Romans. The Fathers hearing theſe and the like reaſons, wherewith he exhorted them to handle roughly thoſe that were obſtinate, and by cheriſhing their Friends, to make their party ſtrong; reſolved to follow this good counſel, in every point; yea to depreſs all thoſe that held with the right, and to ſet up their own followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not only dealt thenceforth more peremptorily with the Achæans, than had been their manner in former times; but wrote at the preſent unto all Cities of Greece, requiring them to ſee that their mandate (which was concerning the reſtitution of thoſe that were baniſhed out of Lacedæmon) ſhould be fulfilled Particularly in behalf of Callicrates, that adviſed men to be ſuch, and ſo affected, as he was, in their ſeveral Common-weals. With this diſpatch, Callicrates returned home a joyful man: having brought his Country into the way of ruine, but himſelf into the way of preferment. Nevertheleſs he forbore to vaunt himſelf of his eloquence uſed in the Senate. Only he ſo reported his Embaſſage, that all men became fearful of the danger, wherewith he threatned thoſe that ſhould preſume to oppoſe the Romans. By ſuch Arts he obtained to be made Prætor of the Achæans: in which Magiſtracy, as in all his courſes following, he omitted nothing, that might ſerve to manifeſt his ready obſequiouſneſs unto thoſe whom he had made his Patrons.

Now, as the Romans by threatning terms won many flatterers, and loſt as many true Friends: ſo Perſeus on the other ſide, thinking by liberal gifts, and hopeful promiſes, to aſſure unto himſelf thoſe that ill could brook his Enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honeſter than his Enemies had. Thus were all the Cities of Greece diſtracted with Factions: ſome holding with the Romans; ſome with the Macedonian, and ſome few, reſpecting only the good of the Eſtates wherein they lived. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignity not ſufferable, That a King, no better than their Vaſſal, ſhould dare to become head of a faction againſt them. This therefore muſt be reckoned in the number of the Treſpaſſes: whereof if not any one alone, yet all of them together, ſhall afford them juſt occaſion to make War upon him. Perſeus having finiſhed his buſineſs among the Dolopians, made a Journey to Apollo his Temple at Delphi. He took his Army along with him: yet went, and returned, in ſuch peaceable and friendly wiſe, that no place was the worſe for his journey, but the good affection towards him generally increaſed thereby. With thoſe that were in his way, he dealt himſelf; to ſuch as lay further off, he ſent Embaſſadors or Letters: praying them, That the memory of all wrongs whatſoever, done by his Father, might be buried with his Father; ſince his own meaning was to hold friendſhip ſincerely with all his Neighbours. The Romans perhaps could have been pleaſed better, if he had behaved himſelf after a contrary faſhion, and done ſome acts of Hoſtility in his paſſage. Yet, as if he ought not to have taken ſuch a journey, without their licence; this alſo was made a valuable matter, and caſt into the heap of his faults. He laboured greatly to recover the love of the Achæans: which his Father had ſo loſt, that by a ſolemn decree, they forbade any Macedonians to enter their territories. It was jealouſie perhaps, no leſs than hatred, which cauſed them, at the firſt, to make ſuch a Decree. For howſoever Philip had by many vile acts, eſpecially by the death of the two Arati, given them cauſe to abhor him, yet in the publick adminiſtration of their Eſtate, he had, for the more part, been to them ſo beneficial, that not without much ado, and at length, without any general conſent, they reſolve to forſake him. Wherefore it was needful, even for preſervation of concord among them, to uſe all circumſpection, that he might not, by his agents, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a Country towards him ſo doubtfully affected: eſpecially when by hearkening to his meſſages, they might make themſelves ſuſpected by their new Friends; but the continuance of this Decree, beyond the time of War, and when all danger of innovation was paſt, was uncivil, if not inhumane; as nouriſhing deadly hatred, without leaving means of reconciliation. And hereof the Achæans reaped no good fruit. For, although they were not, in like ſort, forbidden the Kingdom of Macedon: yet underſtanding what would be due to them, if they ſhould adventure thither, none of them durſt ſet foot therein. Hence it came to paſs, that their bond-men, knowing a ſafe harbour, out of which their Maſters could not fetch them, ran daily away in great numbers: exceedingly to the loſs of ſuch, as made of their Slaves very profitable uſe. But Perſeus took hold upon this occaſion: as fitly ſerving to pacifie thoſe, whoſe enmity fain he would have changed into love. He therefore apprehended all theſe Fugitives, to ſend them home again: and wrote unto the Achæans, That as for good will unto them, he had taken pains to reſtore back their Servants, ſo ſhould they do very well to take order for keeping them, that hereafter they might not run away again. His meaning was readily underſtood, and his Letters kindly accepted by the greater part; being openly rehearſed by the Prætor, before the Councel. But Callicrates took the matter very angerly; and bade them be adviſed what they did: for that this was none other, than a plain device, to make them depart from the friendſhip of the Romans. Herewithall he took upon him ſomewhat liberally, to make the Achæans before-hand acquainted with the War, that was coming upon Perſeus from Rome. He told them how Philip had made preparations for the ſame War; how Demetrius had been made away, becauſe of his good affection to the Romans; and how Perſeus had, ſince his being King, done many things, tending to the breach of Peace. Briefly, He rehearſed all thoſe matters, which were afterwards alledged by the Romans; the invaſion of the Baſtarnæ upon the Dardanians; the Kings journey againſt the Dolopians; his voyage to Delphi; and finally, his peaceable behaviour, which was (he ſaid) a dangerous temptation of men to his party. Wherefore he adviſed them to expect the event of things, and not over-haſtily to enter into any degree of friendſhip with the Macedonians. Hereto good anſwer was made by the Prætors brother: That Callicrates was too earneſt in ſo light a matter; and that, being neither one of the Kings Cabinet, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himſelf too well acquainted with all that had paſſed, or was like to follow. For it was well known, that Perſeus had renewed his League with the Romans; that he was by them ſaluted King, and friend to the Eſtate: and that he had lovingly entertained their Embaſſadors: This being ſo; why might not the Achæans, as well as the Ætolians, Theſſalians, Epirots, and all the Greeks, hold with him ſuch correſpondence, as common humanity required? Nevertheleſs Callicrates was grown a man ſo terrible, by his Roman acquaintance, that they durſt not over-ſtiffly gainſay him. Therefore the matter was referred unto further deliberation: and anſwer made the whilſt, That ſince the King had only ſent a Letter without an Embaſſador, they knew not how to reſolve. Better it was to ſay thus, than, that they were afraid to do as they thought moſt reaſonable and convenient. But when Perſeus herewith not contented, would needs urge them further, and ſend Embaſſadors: then were they fain, without any good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, and deny to give audience: which was proof ſufficient (to one that could underſtand) of the condition wherein they lived. For hearkening to this advice of Callicrates; they were ſoon after highly commended by a Roman Embaſſador: whereby it became apparent, that the Romans intended War upon the Macedonian; though hitherto no cauſe of War was given. Liv. lib. 42

SECT. V.

How Eumenes King of Pergamus was buſied with Pharnaces, the Rhodians, and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom he accuſeth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and contemns his enemies the Rhodians; with the cauſes thereof. The unuſual ſtoutneſs of the Macedonian Embaſſadours. Perſeus his attempt upon Eumenes. The brotherly love between Eumenes and Attalus. Perſeus his device to poiſon ſome of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree War againſt him, and ſend him defiance. Other things concerning the juſtice of this War.

Eumenes King of Pergamus had been troubled about theſe times, by the Kings Pharnaces and Mithridates, his Neighbours. He had taken the right courſe, in making firſt his complaint to the Romans: by whom he was animated with comfortable words, and promiſe, That they, by their Authority, would end the buſineſs to his content. But in concluſion, by the help of the Kings Pruſias and Ariarathes, he ended the War himſelf; and brought his enemies to ſeek and accept peace, on ſuch conditions as pleaſed him to give them. After this, being at good leiſure; he began to conſider how the affairs of Macedon ſtood under Perſeus. His hatred to Perſeus was very Pol. Leg. 56, & 59.

very great: and therefore he was glad to understand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the same his Enemy was as great, and withall notorious. Now, besides his ancient and hereditary quarrel with the Macedonian; it vexed him exceedingly, That his own honours (whereof the Greeks, prodigal in that kind, had heaped immoderate store on his Father and him) began to wax every where stale; whilst Perseus, either by his currying favour, or by the envy born to the Romans, had gotten their best liking and wishes. For despight of this indignity, He stirred up the Lycians against the Rhodians his old friends: and in helping these rebels, was so violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, in open War. But small pleasure found he in these poor and indirect courses of revenge.

The Lycians could not be saved by his Patronage from severe and cruel chastisement, given to them by the Rhodians. This rendered him contemptible: as likewise, his acts of Hostility, little different from robberies, made him hateful to those which loved him before. As for his honours in the Cities of Greece; they not only continued falling into neglect; but were abrogated by a decree of the Achæans, as too unmeasured, mis-beseeming them to give, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his deservings. All this (which he need not to have regarded, had he not been too vainly ambitious) befell him; especially for his being over-serviceable to the Romans, and for his malice to that noble Kingdom; which if it fell, the liberty of Greece was not like to stand. Now for the redress hereof, he thought it vain to strive any longer with bounty, against such an Adversary, as by hopeful promises alone, without any great performance, had over-topped him in the general favour. And therefore he resolved even to overturn the foundations of this popularity, by inducing the Romans utterly to take away from the eyes of men this Idol, the Macedonian Kingdom, which all so vainly worshipped. Neither would it prove a difficult matter, to perswade those that were already desirous: rather he was like to be highly thanked, for setting forward their wishes; and perhaps to be recompenced with some piece of the Kingdom, as he had been rewarded, for the like service, when Antiochus was vanquished.

Polyb. Leg. 74.

Liv. lib. 42

To this end he made a second voyage to Rome: where, though he had little to say, which they knew not before, yet his words were heard with such attention, as if they had contained some strange novelty; and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turn the ballance, that before was equal. The death of Demetrius, the expedition of the Bastarnæ into Dardania, that of Perseus himself against the Dolopian, and to Delphi, the great estimation of the Macedonian in Greece, his intermedling in business of his Neighbours, his riches and his great provisions, were all the material points of Eumenes his discourse. Only he descended unto particulars, having searched into all (as he professed) like unto a Spy. He said, that Perseus had thirty thousand foot, and five thousand Horse of his own, mony in a readiness to entertain ten thousand Mercenaries for ten years, Arms to furnish a number thrice as great: The Thracians his friends at hand, ready, at a call, to bring him Souldiers as many as he should require; and that he prepared Victuals for ten years, because he would not be driven, either to live upon spoil, or to take from his own Subjects. Herewithall he prayed them to consider, that King Seleucus the Son and Successor of Antiochus the Great, had given his Daughter Laodice in marriage to Perseus; Perseus not wooing, but Seleucus offering the match; That King Prusias of Bythinia, by earnest suit, had gotten to Wife the Sister of Perseus, and that these marriages were solemnized with great concourse of Embassages from all quarters. Neither spared he to tell them, (though seeming loth to utter it plainly) That even the envy to their Estate was the cause, why many that could not endure to hear of amity with Philip, were now grown marvellously well affected to his Son. All this, and some facts of Perseus, which might either be denyed or justified, (as that he had procured the death of some which were friends to the Romans, and that he had expelled Abrybolis the Illyrian, who invaded Macedon, out of his Kingdom, or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplifie unto the most; saying, That he thought it his duty to forewarn them: since it would be to himself a great shame, if Perseus got the start of him, and were in Italy making War upon the Romans, e're Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger.

It were too great folly to believe that the Romans stood in fear of Perseus, lest he should set upon them in Italy. Nevertheless, forasmuch as they loved not to make War without fair pretence, not only of wrong done to them or their Associates, but of further hurt intended: great thanks were given to Eumenes, who had every way furnished them with such goodly colour, to beautifie their intendment. Now though it were so, that he told them little else than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his coming, made all seem greater. For if upon any relation made by their own Embassadors, or upon tales devised by their flatterers and spies, they had warred against Perseus, e're he had committed any open act of Hostility against them; their injustice and oppression would have been most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done, were so notorious, and the danger threatning them so terrible, that such a Prince as Eumenes came out of his own Kingdom, as far as from Asia, to bid them look to themselves; who could blame them, if they took the speediest order to obtain their own right and security? Toward this justification of the War, and magnifying the necessity that enforced them thereto, their more than usual curiosity, in concealing what Eumenes had uttered in the Senate, when they could not but understand that his errand was well known, helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embassadors were at Rome, provided of answers to the words, which they knew before-hand that he would speak; and with matter of recrimination. The vanity, either of him, or some about him, seems to have disclosed all: when the weariness of the Fathers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable shew of some fearful apprehension; against which, it behoved their wisdom to neglect no possible remedy. Wherefore careless Audience was given to the Rhodian Embassadors; who accused Eumenes as one more troublesome to Asia, than Antiochus had ever been, and a provoker of the Lycians to Rebellion. The Rhodians had with great pomp conveighed by Sea unto Perseus, his Bride Laodice; which friendly Office, as the Macedonian bountifully requited, so the Romans despightfully accepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as already vanquished, were settling themselves in their obedience to the

the People of Rhodes, Embaſſadors came from Rome with ſtrange news, which gave new life to the Rebellion. For the Senate pronounced, That Livdib.41 it ſtood not with the manner of the Romans, to alien quite from their own protection, any People or Nation by them vanquiſhed: and that the Lycians were by them aſſigned unto thoſe of Rhodes, not as meer Vaſſals, but as Dependants and Aſſociates. For proof hereof, they referred themſelves unto the Commentaries of the ten Embaſſadors; whom they had ſent to diſpoſe of things in Aſia, after the Victory againſt Antiochus. Hereat Eumenes, Maſaniſſa, the Ætolians, and all other Kings or Eſtates that were beholding to Rome, for increaſing the number of their Subjects, had cauſe to find themſelves agrieved, if they well conſidered the matter: ſince by force of this or the like Decree, thoſe their Subjects might eaſily be made their Fellows, whenſoever it ſhould pleaſe the Senate: though it were ſo that all men knew the preſent meaning of the Senate: which was only to plague the Rhodians for their good will to Perſeus, by ſetting them and the Lycians together by the Ears. The Fathers could therefore ſee no reaſon to diſlike Eumenes, upon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embaſſadors, which indeed more nearly touched themſelves. Rather they honoured the King ſo much the more: for that others (as they would needs take it) conſpired againſt him, becauſe of his love to Rome.

But the Macedonian Embaſſage they heard not ſo careleſly as angrily: though peradventure it well contented them to find cauſe of anger: for whereas at other times all care had been taken, to pacifie them with gentle words and excuſes: now heard they plainer language, and were told, That King Perſeus deſired much to give them ſatisfaction, concerning any deed or word of his, that might ſavour of Hoſtility; but that, if his travel in this kind proved vain, then would he be ready to defend himſelf by Arms, and ſtand to the chance of War, which often falls out contrary to expectation. Theſe big words may ſeem to have proceeded from the vehemency of Harpalus, that was chief of the Embaſſadors; rather than from inſtruction given by the King, with whoſe faint heart they agreed not. Yet was there good reaſon, why Perſeus himſelf might, at this time, think to ſpeed better by a ſhew of daring, than he was like to do by any ſubmiſſion. For the eyes of all Greece being now caſt upon him, as on the greateſt hope of deliverance from the Roman ſervitude; it was not expedient that he ſhould leſſen, or perhaps utterly cut off, the general expectation, and the good affection born to him, which thereon depended, by diſcovering his too much weakneſs of ſpirit, unanſwerable to a work of ſuch importance. Wherefore he, or his Embaſſador for him, was bold to ſet a good countenance on a game not very bad, but ſubject (in appearance) to fortune, which might have been his, had he known how to uſe it.

Now that this bravery (as better it may be termed than courage) proceeded from the Kings own heat; it appears by his daring to adventure ſoon after on a practice that more juſtly might anger the Romans, and give them fairer ſhew of reaſon to make War upon him. It was known that Eumenes, in returning home, would take Delphi in his way, and there do ſacrifice to Apollo. Perſeus deadly hating him, and thirſting after his blood, reſolved to way-lay him, and by making there of him a ſacrifice, to rid his own hands of a moſt miſchievous Enemy. So there were appointed three or four ſtout Ruffians to do the Murder: who placing themſelves behind a broken mud-wall, on the ſide of a very narrow path leading up from the Sea to the Temple, did thence aſſault the King; whom they ſorely bruiſed with great Stones, and left for dead. They might have finiſhed their work, ſuch was the opportunity of the place which they had choſen; but fear of being apprehended, made them, without ſtaying to ſee all ſure, flee in ſuch haſte, that they killed one of their own Companions, who could not hold pace with them; becauſe he ſhould not diſcover them. Eumenes was conveighed away to the little Iſle of Ægina, where he was cured: being all the while kept ſo ſecretly, that the fame of his Death was current in Aſia. Hence it came, that his Brother Attalus took upon him as King, and either took, or would have taken to wife (ſuppoſing it be-like a matter of State) Stratonica the daugher of King Ariarathes, whom he then thought the Widow of Eumenes. It may well be numbred among the rare Examples of brotherly love, That when the King returned alive home, Attalus going forth to meet him and do his duty, as in former times, received none other check, than, That he ſhould forbear to marry with the Queen, until he were well aſſured of the Kings death. More than this, Eumenes never ſpake of theſe matters; but bequeathed at his death, unto the ſame Brother, both his Wife and Kingdom. As likewiſe Attalus forbore to attempt any thing to the prejudice of the King his Brother: though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in ſpecial favour, when Eumenes fell into their hatred) were in good readineſs to have transferred the Kingdom from his Brother to him. By ſuch concord of Brethren was the Kingdom of Pergamus raiſed and upheld; as might alſo that of Macedon have been, if Demetrius had lived, and employed his grace with the Romans, to the benefit of Perſeus.

It is likely that Perſeus was very glad, when he underſtood that his Miniſters had both accompliſhed his will, and had ſaved all from diſcovery. But as he was deceived in the main point, and heard ſhortly after, that Eumenes lived, ſo was he beguiled in that other hope, of the concealment; which he vainly eſteemed the leſs material. For he had written to one Praxo, a Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertain the men whom he ſent about this buſineſs: and ſhe, being apprehended by C. Valerius, a Roman Embaſſador, then attending upon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light. Valerius alſo brought with him to Rome, out of Greece, one Rammius a Citizen of Brunduſium; who coming newly from the Court of Macedon, loaden with a dangerous ſecret, had preſently ſought out the Embaſſador, and thereof diſcharged himſelf. Brunduſium was the ordinary Port for Ships paſſing between Italy and Greece. There had Rammius a fair Houſe; wherein he gave entertainment, being a wealthy man, to Embaſſadors, and other honourable perſonages, both Romans and Macedonians, journying to and fro. By occaſion of ſuch his Hoſpitality, he was commended to Perſeus, and invited into Macedon with Friendly Letters; as one, whoſe many courteſies to his Embaſſadors, the King was ſtudious to requite. At his coming, he was much made of; and ſhortly, with more familiarity than he expected or deſired, made partaker of the Kings Secret. The ſum of all was, That he muſt needs do a turn, in giving to ſuch of the Romans as the King ſhould hereafter name, a poyſon of rare quality; lity; ſure in operation, yet not to be perceived either in the taking or afterward. He durſt not refuſe to accept this Employment: for fear leſt the virtue of this Medicine ſhould be tried upon himſelf. But being once at liberty, he diſcovered all. Rammius was but one man, and one whom the King had never ſeen before, nor was like to ſee again: and therefore, beſides that the Kings denial ought to be as good as ſuch a fellows affirmation, the accuſation was improbable. Thus did Perſeus, in time ſhortly following, anſwer for himſelf; and in like ſort concerning the attempt upon Eumenes: denying to have had any hand, either in the one or other; yet withall profeſſing, That ſuch objections were not to be made unto a King, to prove the Rightfulneſs of making War upon him, but rather unto a ſubject pleading for his life in judgement. But howſoever the Romans neglected the getting of ſtronger proof which might have been eaſie) than any that we find by them produced: yet the baſe and cowardly temper of Perſeus was very ſuitable to theſe practices. Neither did the Senate greatly ſtand to diſpute the matter with him: theſe his treacheries being held inexcuſable. And as for his Royal Eſtate, wherein he ſuppoſed that they ought not to touch him for ſuch private offences, it gave him no priviledge: they judging him to have offended in the nature of a King. Herein ſurely they wanted not good reaſon. For if he might not lawfully make War upon Eumenes their Confederate; that is, if he might not ſend men to waſte the Kingdom of Pergamus, or to beſiege the Towns: might he ſend Ruffians to murder the King? If it were no leſs breach of the League to deſtroy the Senators by fire or famine, than by violence of the Sword, was it lawful for him to do it by poyſon? Wherefore they preſently decreed War againſt him; and ſent Embaſſadors to denounce it unto him, unleſs he would yield to make ſuch amends as they ſhould require. He ſeemed at this time to have been ſo confident in the general favour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances, that if he deſired not War, yet he did not fear it: or at leaſt he thought by ſhew of courage, to make his Enemies more calm. He cauſed the Embaſſadors to dance attendance, till being weary they departed without audience. Then called he them back, and bade them do their Errand. They made a tedious rehearſal of all matters, which they had long been collecting againſt him, and wherewith Eumenes had charged him: adding thereto, that he had entertained long and ſecret conference in the Iſle of Samothrace, with Embaſſadors ſent to him out of Aſia, about ſome ill purpoſe. In regard of all which, they peremptorily required ſatisfaction; as was their manner when they intended to give defiance. Better they might have ſtood upon the evidence, brought againſt him by Rammius and Praxo. For if thoſe accuſations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground whereon to build: of which otherwiſe they were deſtitute; it being no fault in a King, to be ſtrong, well-beloved, and well-befriended. Perſeus anſwered, for the preſent, in a rage; calling the Romans greedy, proud, inſolent, and underminers of him by their daily Embaſſadors, that were no better than meer ſpies. Finally, he promiſed to give them in writing their full anſwer: which was to this effect; That he would no longer ſtand to the League made between them and his Father; and renewed by himſelf indeed only for fear, but wiſhed them to deſcend to more equal conditions; whereupon he, for his part, would adviſe, as they might alſo do for theirs.

In the form of the League between Philip and the Romans, as is ſet down by Polybius, we find no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconvenience in the future; excepting thoſe which he immediately performed. But Livy inſerts a clauſe, whereby he was expreſly forbidden to make any War abroad, without leave of the Romans. It is moſt likely, that all the Roman Confederates were included in this Peace: whereby every one of the Neighbours round about Macedon, entring ſhortly into League with Rome, did ſo bind the Kings hands, that he could no more make War abroad, than if he had been reſtrained by plain Covenant. And thus might that ſeem an Article of the Peace, which never was agreed upon, but only was inferred by conſequence. Now if the Romans would urge this point further, and ſay, that the Macedonian might not bear Defenſive Arms, without their permiſſion; then had Perſeus very juſt reaſon to find himſelf agrieved. For ſince they had allowed his Father, without controll, to make War in Thrace, (whilſt they themſelves were unacquainted with the Thracians) elſewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why they ſhould now interpret the bargain after another faſhion? Was it now become unlawful for him to chaſtiſe his own Rebels? or to repay an Illyrian that invaded Macedon? By ſuch allegations he maintained the right of his cauſe in very mild ſort; when it was too late. At the preſent, by diſclaiming the League as unjuſt, he miniſtred occaſion unto the Embaſſadors, to give him defiance. Having heard the worſt of their meſſage, he commanded them to be gone out of his Kingdom in three days. But either he ſhould have been leſs vehement, or more conſtant in his reſolution. For if his heart could ſerve him to undertake the War, he ſhould courageouſly have managed it, and have fallen to work immediately, whilſt the Enemy was unprepared; not have loſt the opportunity, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worſe Peace than the former.

SO long had the Romans been ſeeking occaſion to take in hand this Macedonian War, that well they might have been ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behind hand in Proviſions. But it was on a ſudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences to make the War: whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together ſeemed more than ſufficient. This opportunity of making their Cauſe honeſt in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwiſe they were unprepared for the Action. Wherefore knowing, or having reaſon to believe, that their own ſtrengths were ſuch as would prevail in the end; they haſtily embraced the fair occaſion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of time. Neither was this their unreadineſs a ſmall help, towards examining the Greeks and others; who muſt afterwards dearly pay for any backwardneſs found in their good will. There was not indeed any cauſe to fear, that all of the Greeks, or other Eaſtern People ſhould conſpire together, and take part with the Macedonian: ſuch was the diſſention between the ſeveral Eſtates; howſoever the generality of them were inclin'd the ſame way. Nevertheleſs, Embaſſadors were ſent to deal with them all; and to crave their help againſt Perſeus, or rather to demand it, in no leſs ample manner, than heretofore they had yielded it againſt Philip and Antiochus, in Wars pretending the Liberty of Greece. The Embaſſadors uſed as gentle words for faſhion ſake, as if they had ſtood in doubt that their requeſt might happen to be denied. But the Greeks were now well acquainted with ſuch Roman courteſie: and underſtood that not only ſuch as made refuſal, but even they who might ſeem to have granted half unwillingly, were like to hear other manner of words, when once this buſineſs was ended. Wherefore none of them were ſcrupulous in promiſing the beſt of their help to the Romans: the * Achæans and Rhodians, which were chief among them, being rather doubtful, even when they had done their beſt, leſt it ſhould be ill taken, as if they had halted in ſome part of their duty. It is ſtrange that men could be ſo earneſt to ſet up the ſide, whereof they gladly would have ſeen the ruine. The vulgar ſort was every where addicted to Perſeus; of the Nobles and Rulers, if ſome were vehemently Roman, they wanted not oppoſers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea, the wiſeſt, and moſt honeſt, who regarded only the benefit of their Country, wiſhed better to Perſeus than to the Romans. And of this number Polybius the chief of Hiſtorians was one: who though He † judged the Victory of Perſeus like to prove hurtful unto Greece, yet wiſhed he the Romans ill to thrive, that ſo the Greeks might recover perfect Liberty: for his endeavours in which courſe, he was at length tyrannically handled, as ſhall be ſhewed hereafter. This conſidered, it appears that an extraordinary fear, and not only reverence of the Imperial City, made the Achæans, and other Eſtates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occaſion of this their fear may be juſtly imputed unto the timorous demeanour of Perſeus himſelf. He had undertaken a War, whereof the benefit ſhould redound, not only to his own Kingdom, but unto all that were oppreſſed by the Romans. Yet no ſooner were ſome few Companies brought over-ſea, to make a countenance of meaning ſomewhat againſt him, than he began to ſpeak the Enemy fair, and ſue for Peace at Rome. Since therefore it was known, that every ſmall thing would ſerve to terrifie him: and conſequently, that it ſhould at all times be in the Romans Power, by giving him any tollerable conditions of Peace, to take revenge at leiſure upon thoſe which had aſſiſted him: little cauſe was there why any ſhould adventure to partake with him. He made indeed a great noiſe; leading about his Army; taking by force or compoſition ſome few Towns, and ſoliciting all to joyn with him. But wiſe men could not be ſo beguiled. For at the ſame time, he ſought all means of pacification: and to that end, made humble ſuit unto the Roman Embaſſadors. Q. Martius, the chief of thoſe Embaſſadors, and a man of more fineneſs in cunning than was uſual among the Romans, made ſhew of inclination to the Kings deſire; and gave out ſuch comfortable words, that the King entreated and obtained a meeting at the River Peneus. There did Martius very gently rebuke the King, and charge him with thoſe crimes that are before mentioned. Whereto though Perſeus made none other anſwer, than the ſame which they could have made for him; yet the Embaſſadors, and eſpecially Martius, took it in good part, as therewith ſatisfied: and adviſed him to give the like ſatisfaction to the Senate. That this might conveniently be done, a Truce was agreed upon. Thus had Martius his deſire; which was to make the King loſe time. For Perſeus had all things then in a readineſs, and might have done much, e're the Roman Army could be in Greece. But by the interpoſition of this Truce, he no way increaſed his Forces; he ſuffered a moſt convenient ſeaſon of winning upon the Enemy, to ſlip away; and obtained in recompence nothing elſe, than leiſure and vain hope. Yet was he pleaſed herewith: as it had been with ſome Victory: publiſhing a Copy of the Diſputation between him and the Romans, whereby he gave men to underſtand how much he had the better, and what great hope there was of Peace. He ſent Embaſſadors alſo to the Rhodians, of whoſe good will to him he was beſt perſwaded; not only to let them know how much he was ſuperiour in cauſe; but to intreat them, that they would take upon them, as Moderators, to compound the differences between him and the Romans, if perhaps notwithſtanding the goodneſs of his cauſe, he ſhould be denied Peace. Theſe were poor helps. For hereby it appeared, that his late ſtanding upon point of Honour, was no better than meer vanity; his own ſafety being the utmoſt of his ambition. This his fearfulneſs might ſeem excuſable, and the blame thereof to appertain unto the Greeks; who deceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in a time of neceſſity, that was partly their own: had it not been his Office, who took upon him as their Champion, to give ſuch a manly beginning to the War, as might encourage all others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, men grew daily more and more averſe from him; and were careful not to put their Sholders to a falling Wall. The Rhodians, among whom he had many ſtout Partizans, deſired him not to crave any thing at their hands, in which they might ſeem to do againſt the good liking of the Romans. The Bœotians alſo, who had entred of late into a ſtrict ſociety with the Macedonian; renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans:

* Pol. Leg. 72, 73, & 80.

† Pol. Leg. 77.

Romans: to whom further, in a ſort, they yielded themſelves as Vaſſals. Neither was Martius contented to accept their ſubmiſſion under a general form; but cauſed their ſeveral Towns to make covenant apart, each for it ſelf; to the end, that being thus diſtracted into many little Common-weals, they might not (were they never ſo deſirous to rebel) have ſuch force to do hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated into one, under the City of Thebes: This work, of ſeparating the Bœotians from Thebes their Head, was more than Ageſilaus could effect, or Epaminondas would ſuffer, then when all Greece followed the Lacedæmonians. So far more available to Thebes, being deſtitute of help from abroad, was the virtue of Epaminondas, and a few brave Citizens, than was the ſociety with King Perſeus, againſt a number not ſo great as followed the Lacedæmonians.

Martius brought this to effect, whilſt the King ſat ſtill, as being bound by the Truce: and having done this, he turned to the City; where, vaunting what he had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though ſome reproved it as diſhoneſt) employed again by the Senate; with commiſſion to deal as he ſhould think expedient. Touching the Embaſſadors which Perſeus had ſent; audience was given to them, for that they ſhould not plainly ſee how their Maſter was deluded; but neither excuſe nor intreaty would ſerve their turn: the Senate being reſolved before-hand what to do. It was enough that they were admitted into the City, and had thirty days reſpite allowed them to depart out of Italy: whereas they, who came laſt on the ſame errand, did their meſſage without the Walls, in the Temple of Bellona (the uſual place of giving audience to open Enemies, or to ſuch Commanders as might not, by reaſon of ſome Cuſtom, enter the City) and had only the ſhort warning of Eleven days, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poor courteſie ſerve alone to hide the craft of Marcius, as if he had meant none other then good earneſt: but it was a likely mean both to keep a long while from Perſeus the knowledge of his buſineſs, and to ſtagger his reſolution, when he ſhould need it moſt firm.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius the Roman Conſul was at Apollonia, in a manner as ſoon as the Macedonian Embaſſadors were with their King at Pella. Which though it were enough to have rouzed Perſeus, and have made him lay aſide all Cowardly hope of getting Pardon, yet was he content to deliberate a while, Whether it were not better to offer himſelf Tributary to the Romans, and to redeem their good will with ſome part of his Kingdom, that ſo he might enjoy the reſt; than to put all at once to hazard. But finally, the ſtouteſt counſel prevailed; which alſo was the wiſeſt, and ſo would have proved, had it been ſtoutly and wiſely followed. He now began, as if the War had not begun until now, to do what ſhould have been done long afore. He cauſed all his Forces to be drawn together; and appointed their Randezvouz at Citium, a Town in Macedon. All being in readineſs, he did Royal Sacrifice, with an hundred Beaſts, to I know not what Minerva, that was peculiarly honoured in his Country: and then with all his Courtiers, and thoſe of his Guard, ſet forward to Citium. His Army he found conſiſting of nine and thirty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, whereof about twelve thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, were ſtrangers, of ſundry Nations, moſt part Thracians; the reſt of his own Macedonians. Theſe he animated with lively ſpeeches; laying before them the glory of their Anceſtors, the inſolency of the Romans, the goodneſs of his Cauſe, the greatneſs of his Proviſions, and the many advantages which they had of the Enemy, eſpecially in numbers. They anſwered him chearfully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all Cities of Macedon there came likewiſe Meſſengers, offering to help him with Money and Victuals, according to their ſeveral Abilities. He gave them thanks: but anſwered, That his own proviſions would abundantly ſuffice, willing them only to furniſh him with Carts, for his Engines and Munition.

Out of his own Kingdom he iſſued forth into Theſſaly: knowing that the Romans were to paſs thorow that Country, in their Journey towards him. Some Towns of Theſſaly opened their Gates unto him, without making offer to defend themſelves; ſome he balked, thinking them too ſtrong or well-manned; and ſome he wan by force. Of theſe laſt was Nyle; a Town thought impregnable, and therefore, not more ſtoutly than proudly defended by the Inhabitants, who gave contumelious language to the Aſſailants. It was taken by reaſon of a Sally; which the Towns-men raſhly made, and being driven back, received the Macedonians, that entered pell mell with them at the Gate. All cruelty of War was practiſed here: to the greater terrour of the obſtinate. So Velatiæ and Connus (Towns of much importance, eſpecially Connus, which ſtood in the ſtraights of Oſſa, leading into Tempe) yielded at the firſt. Having well fortified this paſſage, the King marched onwards to Sicurium, a Town ſeated on the foot of Mount Oſſa; where he reſted a while, expecting news of the Enemy.

Licinius the Conſul brought with him only two Roman Legions: being promiſed other ſtrength of Auxiliaries, which was thought ſufficient. Eumenes & Attalus his Brother came to him in Theſſaly, with four thouſand Foot, and a thouſand Horſe. Thither alſo came, from every part of Greece, ſuch aid as the ſeveral Eſtates could afford: or thought expedient to ſend, which from the moſt of them was very little. Of the Kings abroad, Maſaniſſa ſent thither his Son Miſagenes, with a thouſand Foot, as many Horſe, and two and twenty Elephants. Ariarathes the Cappadocian, by reaſon of his Affinity with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had ſent to Rome his young Son, there to be brought up: yet he did little or nothing in this War; perhaps becauſe Eumenes himſelf began within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwiſe adviſed than he had been in the beginning. Pruſias was content to be a looker on: as being allied to Perſeus, and yet fearing the Romans. Antiochus and Ptolomy (though Ptolomy was then young, and under Tutors) had buſineſs of their own; the Syrian meaning to invade the Egyptian: yet each of them promiſed help to the Romans, which they cared not to perform. Gentius the Illyrian was inclinable to the Macedonian, yet made good countenance to the Romans, for fear. It was a pretty trick wherewith M. Lucretius, the Roman Admirals Brother, ſerved him, for this his counterfeit good will. This King had four and fifty Ships, riding in the Haven of Dyrrachium, uncertain to what purpoſe: all which Lucretius took away, after a very kind ſort; making ſhew to believe, That for none other end than to ſerve the eaſe the Senate makes Proviſion, having heard their Complaints. The flattering Alabanders.

SO long had the Romans been ſeeking occaſion to take in hand this Macedonian War, that well they might have been ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behind hand in Proviſions. But it was on a ſudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences to make the War: whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together ſeemed more than ſufficient. This opportunity of making their Cauſe honeſt in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwiſe they were unprepared for the Action. Wherefore knowing, or having reaſon to believe, that their own ſtrengths were ſuch as would prevail in the end; they haſtily embraced the fair occaſion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of time. Neither was this their unreadineſs a ſmall help, towards examining the Greeks and others; who muſt afterwards dearly pay for any backwardneſs found in their good will. There was not indeed any cauſe to fear, that all of the Creeks, or other Eaſtern People ſhould conſpire together, and take part with the Macedonian: ſuch was the diſſention between the ſeveral Eſtates; howſoever the generality of them were inclin'd the ſame way. Nevertheleſs, Embaſſadors were ſent to deal with them all; and to crave their help againſt Perſeus, or rather to demand it, in no leſs ample manner, than heretofore they had yielded it againſt Philip and Antiochus, in Wars pretending the Liberty of Greece. The Embaſſadors uſed as gentle words for faſhion ſake, as if they had ſtood in doubt that their requeſt might happen to be denied. But the Greeks were now well acquainted with ſuch Roman courteſie: and underſtood that not only ſuch as made refuſal, but even they who might ſeem to have granted half unwillingly, were like to hear other manner of words, when once this buſineſs was ended. Wherefore none of them were ſcrupulous in promiſing the beſt of their help to the Romans: the * Achæans and Rhodians, which were chief among them, being rather doubtful, even when they had done their beſt, leſt it ſhould be ill taken, as if they had halted in ſome part of their duty. It is ſtrange that men could be ſo earneſt to ſet up the ſide, whereof they gladly would have ſeen the ruine. The vulgar ſort was every where addicted to Perſeus; of the Nobles and Rulers, if ſome were vehemently Roman, they wanted not oppoſers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea, the wiſeſt, and moſt honeſt, who regarded only the benefit of their Country, wiſhed better to Perſeus than to the Romans. And of this number Polybius the chief of Hiſtorians was one: who though He † judged the Victory of Perſeus like to prove hurtful unto Greece, yet wiſhed he the Romans ill to thrive, that ſo the Greeks might recover perfect Liberty: for his endeavours in which courſe, he was at length tyrannically handled, as ſhall be ſhewed hereafter. This conſidered, it appears that an extraordinary fear, and not only reverence of the Imperial City, made the Achæans, and other Eſtates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occaſion of this their fear may be juſtly imputed unto the timorous demeanour of Perſeus himſelf. He had undertaken a War, whereof the benefit ſhould redound, not only to his own Kingdom, but unto all that were oppreſſed by the Romans. Yet no ſooner were ſome few Companies brought over-ſea, to make a countenance of meaning ſomewhat againſt him, than he began to ſpeak the Enemy fair, and ſue for Peace at Rome. Since therefore it was known, that every ſmall thing would ſerve to terrifie him: and conſequently, that it ſhould at all times be in the Romans Power, by giving him any tollerable conditions of Peace, to take revenge at leiſure upon thoſe which had aſſiſted him: little cauſe was there why any ſhould adventure to partake with him. He made indeed a great noiſe; leading about his Army; taking by force or compoſition ſome few Towns, and ſolliciting all to joyn with him. But wiſe men could not be ſo beguiled. For at the ſame time, he ſought all means of pacification: and to that end, made humble ſuit unto the Roman Embaſſadors. Q. Martius, the chief of thoſe Embaſſadors, and a man of more fineneſs in cunning than was uſual among the Romans, made ſhew of inclination to the Kings deſire; and gave out ſuch comfortable words, that the King entreated and obtained a meeting at the River Peneus. There did Martius very gently rebuke the King, and charge him with thoſe crimes that are before mentioned. Whereto though Perſeus made none other anſwer, than the ſame which they could have made for him; yet the Embaſſadors, and eſpecially Martius, took it in good part, as therewith ſatisfied: and adviſed him to give the like ſatisfaction to the Senate. That this might conveniently be done, a Truce was agreed upon. Thus had Martius his deſire; which was to make the King loſe time. For Perſeus had all things then in a readineſs, and might have done much, e're the Roman Army could be in Greece. But by the interpoſition of this Truce, he no way increaſed his Forces; he ſuffered a moſt convenient ſeaſon of winning upon the Enemy, to ſlip away; and obtained in recompence nothing elſe, than leiſure and vain hope. Yet was he pleaſed herewith: as it had been with ſome Victory: publiſhing a Copy of the Diſputation between him and the Romans, whereby he gave men to underſtand how much he had the better, and what great hope there was of Peace. He ſent Embaſſadors alſo to the Rhodians, of whoſe good will to him he was beſt perſwaded; not only to let them know how much he was ſuperiour in cauſe; but to intreat them, that they would take upon them, as Moderators, to compound the differences between him and the Romans, if perhaps notwithſtanding the goodneſs of his cauſe, he ſhould be denied Peace. Theſe were poor helps. For hereby it appeared, that his late ſtanding upon point of Honour, was no better than meer vanity; his own ſafety being the utmoſt of his ambition. This his fearfulneſs might ſeem excuſable, and the blame thereof to appertain unto the Greeks; who deceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in a time of neceſſity, that was partly their own: had it not been his Office, who took upon him as their Champion, to give ſuch a manly beginning to the War, as might encourage all others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, men grew daily more and more averſe from him; and were careful not to put their Sholders to a falling Wall. The Rhodians, among whom he had many ſtout Partizans, deſired him not to crave any thing at their hands, in which they might ſeem to do againſt the good liking of the Romans. The Bœotians alſo, who had entred of late into a ſtrict ſociety with the Macedonian; renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans:

* Pol. Leg. 72, 73, & 80.

† Pol. Leg. 77.

Romans: to whom further, in a ſort, they yielded themſelves as Vaſſals. Neither was Martius contented to accept their ſubmiſſion under a general form; but cauſed their ſeveral Towns to make covenant apart, each for it ſelf; to the end, that being thus diſtracted into many little Commonweals, they might not (were they never ſo deſirous to rebel) have ſuch force to do hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated into one, under the City of Thebes: This work, of ſeparating the Bœotians from Thebes their Head, was more than Ageſilaus could effect, or Epaminondas would ſuffer, then when all Greece followed the Lacedæmonians. So far more available to Thebes, being deſtitute of help from abroad, was the virtue of Epaminondas, and a few brave Citizens, than was the ſociety with King Perſeus, againſt a number not ſo great as followed the Lacedæmonians.

Martius brought this to effect, whilſt the King ſat ſtill, as being bound by the Truce: and having done this, he turned to the City; where, vaunting what he had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though ſome reproved it as diſhoneſt) employed again by the Senate; with commiſſion to deal as he ſhould think expedient. Touching the Embaſſadors which Perſeus had ſent; audience was given to them, for that they ſhould not plainly ſee how their Maſter was deluded; but neither excuſe nor intreaty would ſerve their turn: the Senate being reſolved before-hand what to do. It was enough that they were admitted into the City, and had thirty days reſpite allowed them to depart out of Italy: whereas they, who came laſt on the ſame errand, did their meſſage without the Walls, in the Temple of Bellona (the uſual place of giving audience to open Enemies, or to ſuch Commanders as might not, by reaſon of ſome Cuſtom, enter the City) and had only the ſhort warning of Eleven days, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poor courteſie ſerve alone to hide the craft of Marcius, as if he had meant none other then good earneſt: but it was a likely mean both to keep a long while from Perſeus the knowledge of his buſineſs, and to ſtagger his reſolution, when he ſhould need it moſt firm.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius the Roman Conſul was at Apollonia, in a manner as ſoon as the Macedonian Embaſſadors were with their King at Pella. Which though it were enough to have rouzed Perſeus, and have made him lay aſide all Cowardly hope of getting Pardon, yet was he content to deliberate a while, Whether it were not better to offer himſelf Tributary to the Romans, and to redeem their good will with ſome part of his Kingdom, that ſo he might enjoy the reſt; than to put all at once to hazard. But finally, the ſtouteſt counſel prevailed; which alſo was the wiſeſt, and ſo would have proved, had it been ſtoutly and wiſely followed. He now began, as if the War had not begun until now, to do what ſhould have been done long afore. He cauſed all his Forces to be drawn together; and appointed their Randezvouz at Citium, a Town in Macedon. All being in readineſs, he did Royal Sacrifice, with an hundred Beaſts, to I know not what Minerva, that was peculiarly honoured in his Country: and then with all his Courtiers, and thoſe of his Guard, ſet forward to Citium. His Army he found conſiſting of nine and thirty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, whereof about twelve thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, were ſtrangers, of ſundry Nations, moſt part Thracians; the reſt of his own Macedonians. Theſe he animated with lively ſpeeches; laying before them the glory of their Anceſtors, the inſolency of the Romans, the goodneſs of his Cauſe, the greatneſs of his Proviſions, and the many advantages which they had of the Enemy, eſpecially in numbers. They anſwered him chearfully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all Cities of Macedon there came likewiſe Meſſengers, offering to help him with Money and Victuals, according to their ſeveral Abilities. He gave them thanks: but anſwered, That his own proviſions would abundantly ſuffice, willing them only to furniſh him with Carts, for his Engines and Munition.

Out of his own Kingdom he iſſued forth into Theſſaly: knowing that the Romans were to paſs thorow that Country, in their Journey towards him. Some Towns of Theſſaly opened their Gates unto him, without making offer to defend themſelves; ſome he balked, thinking them too ſtrong or well-manned; and ſome he wan by force. Of theſe laſt was Nyle; a Town thought impregnable, and therefore, not more ſtoutly than proudly defended by the Inhabitants, who gave contumelious language to the Aſſailants. It was taken by reaſon of a Sally; which the Towns-men raſhly made, and being driven back, received the Macedonians, that entered pell mell with them at the Gate. All cruelty of War was practiſed here: to the greater terrour of the obſtinate. So Velatiæ and Connus (Towns of much importance, eſpecially Connus, which ſtood in the ſtraights of Oſſa, leading into Tempe) yielded at the firſt. Having well fortified this paſſage, the King marched onwards to Sicurium, a Town ſeated on the foot of Mount Oſſa; where he reſted a while, expecting news of the Enemy.

Licinius the Conſul brought with him only two Roman Legions: being promiſed other ſtrength of Auxiliaries, which was thought ſufficient. Eumenes & Attalus his Brother came to him in Theſſaly, with four thouſand Foot, and a thouſand Horſe. Thither alſo came, from every part of Greece, ſuch aid as the ſeveral Eſtates could afford: or thought expedient to ſend, which from the moſt of them was very little. Of the Kings abroad, Maſaniſſa ſent thither his Son Miſagenes, with a thouſand Foot, as many Horſe, and two and twenty Elephants. Ariarathes the Cappadocian, by reaſon of his Affinity with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had ſent to Rome his young Son, there to be brought up: yet he did little or nothing in this War; perhaps becauſe Eumenes himſelf began within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwiſe adviſed than he had been in the beginning. Pruſias was content to be a looker on: as being allied to Perſeus, and yet fearing the Romans. Antiochus and Ptolomy (though Ptolomy was then young, and under Tutors) had buſineſs of their own; the Syrian meaning to invade the Egyptian: yet each of them promiſed help to the Romans, which they cared not to perform. Gentius the Illyrian was inclinable to the Macedonian, yet made good countenance to the Romans, for fear. It was a pretty trick wherewith M. Lucretius, the Roman Admirals Brother, ſerved him, for this his counterfeit good will. This King had four and fifty Ships, riding in the Haven of Dyrrachium, uncertain to what purpoſe: all which Lucretius took away, after a very kind ſort; making ſhew to believe, That for none other end than to ſerve the Romans, Romans, their good friend Gentius had ſent thither this Fleet. But whatſoever Gentius thought in the beginning; he fooliſhly loſt both his Kingdom and himſelf, in the end of this War; by offering, rather than giving his help to Perſeus.

With none other company than what he brought over the Sea, Licinius came into Theſſaly; ſo tyred with a painful Journey, through the Mountainous Country of Athamania, which ſtood in his way from Epirus; that if Perſeus had been ready, attending his deſcent into the Plains, the Romans muſt needs have taken a great overthrow. He refreſhed himſelf and his wearied Army, by the River Peneus; where he encamped, attending his Auxiliaries, that came in as faſt as they could. It was not any ſlender help, that could enable him to deal with Perſeus. Therefore he reſolved to abide where he then was, and keep his Trenches, until his numbers were ſufficiently increaſed: contenting himſelf in the mean while, to have gotten quiet entrance into the Country. The Land of Theſſaly, in which theſe two Armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece beſides: as having been freed by them from a more heavy yoke of bondage to the Macedonian, when there was little hope or expectation of ſuch a benefit. It was generally rich, fruitful, and abounding in all things needful to mans life. In the midſt of it, but ſomewhat more to the Eaſt, was that beautiful Valley of Tempe, ſo exceedingly full of all delights, that the name was often uſed at large to ſignifie the moſt pleaſant and goodly places. This Valley of it ſelf was not great; but adding to it thoſe huge Mountains Oſſa and Olympus (famous in Poeſie) with their Spurs or Branches, by which it was on all ſides encloſed; it occupied the better part of Theſſaly. And this way were the Romans to enter into Macedon; unleſs they would make an hungry Journey thorow the Country of the Daſſaretians, as in the former War with Philip, they had long, in vain, attempted to do. Perſeus therefore had no ſmall advantage, by being Maſter of the Straights leading unto Tempe: though far greater he might have had, if by miſ-ſpending of time he had not loſt it. For if in defending the ragged paſſages of theſe Mountains, he were able to put the Romans often to the worſe; yea, to win upon them (for a while) every year more than other, both in ſtrength and reputation: queſtionleſs he might have done far greater things, had he ſeized upon the Straights of Aous, which his Father once kept, and defended all the Country behind the Mountains of Pindus. Surely, not without extreme difficulty, muſt the Romans have either travelled by Land, with all their Carriages and Impediments, through places wherein was no relief to be found; or elſe have committed their Armies, and all things thereto needful, unto the mercy of the Seas that were very dangerous; if they would have ſought other way into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: upon neither of which courſes they once deviſed, notwithſtanding any trouble which they found in this preſent War. It may perhaps be ſaid, that the Greeks, and others, whom the King muſt have left on his back, would have made him unable to defend any places too far from his own home. But they were all, excepting the Theſſalians, better affected now to him, than they had been to his Father in the former War. The Ætolians, upon whom the Athamanians depended, grew into ſuſpicion with the Romans (as we ſhall find anon) even as ſoon as they met with Perſeus. The Bœotians, how politickly ſoever Martius had wrought with them, adventured themſelves deſperately in the Macedonian quarrel: what would they have done, if he at firſt had done his beſt? The Rhodians, Illyrians, yea, and Eumenes himſelf, after a while began to waver, when they ſaw things go better with Perſeus, than they had expected. So that if inſtead of diſcouraging his Friends, by ſuing baſely for Peace; he had raiſed their hopes, by any brave performance in the beginning; and increaſed the number of his well-willers; yea, and bought down with money (as he might have done) ſome of his Enemies, and among them Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head: then might the Romans perhaps have been compelled to forſake their imperious patronage over Greece; and to render the Liberty by them given, entire; which otherwiſe was but imaginary. Such benefit of this War, ſince it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reaſon have been expected at firſt, from greater advantages. But as a fearful company running from their Enemies, till ſome River ſtay their flight; are there compelled by meer deſperation to do ſuch acts, as done, while the battle laſted, would have won the Victory: ſo fell it out with Perſeus. In ſeeking to avoid that danger of that War, whereof he ſhould have ſought the honour; he left his Friends that would have ſtood by him, and gave them cauſe to provide for their own ſafety: yet being overtaken by neceſſity, he choſe rather to ſet his back to the Mountains of Tempe, and defend himſelf with his proper Forces; than to be driven into ſuch miſery, as was inevitable, if he have a little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that he kept his footing in Theſſaly, it is hard to ſhew particularly, for that the Hiſtory of thoſe things is much periſhed. Wherefore we muſt be contented with the ſum.

The Conſul having no deſire to fight, until ſuch time as all his Forces were arrived; kept within his Trenches, and lay ſtill encamped by the River of Peneus, about three miles from Lariſſa. That which perſwaded the Conſul to protract the time, did contrariwiſe incite the King, to put the matter unto a haſty trial. Wherefore he invited the Romans into the Field; by waſting the Land of the Pheræans their Confederates. Finding them patient of this indignity; he grew bold to adventure even unto their Trenches: out of which, if they iſſued, it was likely that his advantage in Horſe would make the Victory his own. At his coming they were troubled; for that it was ſudden: yet no way terrified; as knowing themſelves to be ſafely lodged. They ſent out a few of King Eumenes his Horſe, and with them ſome light-armed Foot, to entertain Skirmiſh. The Captain, and ſome other of theſe were ſlain: but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius nor Eumenes, found it reaſonable to hazard battle. Thus, day after day, a while together, Perſeus continued offering battle: which they ſtill refuſed. Hereby his boldneſs much increaſed; and much more his reputation: to the grief of thoſe, who being ſo far come to make a Conqueſt, could ill digeſt the ſhame that fell upon them by their enduring theſe Bravadoes. The Town of Sycurium, where Perſeus then lay, was twelve miles from the Romans: neither was there any convenient watering in that long march, which uſed to take up four hours of the morning, but he was fain to bring water along with him in Carts, that his men might not be both weary and and thirsty when they came to fight. For remedy of these inconveniencies, he found out a Lodging seven miles nearer to the Enemy: whom he visited the next day by the Sun-rising. His coming at such an unusual hour, filled the Camp with Tumult: insomuch as though he brought with him only his Horse and light Armature, that were unfit to assail the Trenches, yet the Consul thought it necessary, and resolved to give check to his pride. Wherefore he sent forth his Brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many brave Captains, with all his power of Horse, his Velites, and all the rest of his light Armature to try their fortune: he himself remaining in the Camp, with his Legions in readiness. The honour of this morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the Victory in a manner intire (though the Thessalians made a good retreit) with little loss of his own. But he discovered his weakness e're night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly do, to counsel given by one of his own temper. For whereas the Romans were in great fear, lest he should assault their Camp; and to that purpose, upon the first news of his success, his Phalanx was brought unto him by the Captains, though unsent for: he nevertheless took it for sound advice, which indeed was timorous and base, To work warily, and moderate his Victory; by which means it was said, That either he should get honest conditions of Peace, or at leastwise many Companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like that his good fortune would exalt the Hope and Courage of his Friends. Yet, had it been greater, and had he won the Roman Camp, his Friends would have been the more, and the bolder. But over-great was his folly, in hoping then for Peace: And in suing for it, even when he had the Victory; what else did he, than proclaim unto all which would become his patakers, That neither good nor bad fortune should keep him from yielding to the Romans, whensoever they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the joy of his Victory would admit none of the Considerations. He had slain of the Roman Horse two hundred, and taken of them Prisoners the like number. Of their Foot he had slain about two thousand: losing of his own no more than twenty Horse, and forty Foot. The Roman Camp, after this disaster, was full of heavines and fear: it being much doubted that the Enemy would set upon it. Eumenes gave counsel to dislodge by night, and remove to a surer place beyond the River Peneus. The Consul, though ashamed to profess, by so doing, in what fear he stood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the Loss past, than by standing on proud terms, to draw upon himself a greater Calamity. So he passed the River in the dead of the Night, and encamped more strongly on the further side. The Ætolians were sorely blamed for this loss: as if rather a traiterous meaning, than any true fear, had occasioned their flight, wherein the rest of the Greeks followed them. Five of them that were men of especial mark, had been observed to be the first which turned their backs: an observation likely to cost them dear, at a time of better leisure. As for the Thessalians, their virtue was honoured with reward: so as the Greeks might learn by Examples of either kind, that if they would shun indignation, or incur favour, then must they adventure no less for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would do for their own Liberty. Thus fared it with the Consul and his Army. Perseus came the next day to correct the former days errour; which how great it was, they not until then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of safety; whither they could never have attained, if the King had either pressed his Victory, or given better heed to them that night: his light Armature being alone sufficient to have routed them whilst they were conveying to themselves to the other side of Peneus. But it was vain to tell what might have been done, since there was no remedy. The Romans were beaten, even the flower of their City, The Gentlemen of Rome; out of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generals themselves, Prætors, Consuls and all that bore Office or Command among them; yea, they were beaten so shamefully, that they stole away by night, and suffered him to gather up the spoils of them without resistance, as yielding themselves overcome. With such brave words did the King set out the Glory of his Action; dividing the spoils among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to have made his honour sound. He came nearer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopselus, a place in a mid-way between Tempe and Larissa: as if it were his meaning to press them somewhat harder. Nevertheless he was easily perswaded to use the occasion; which he seemed to have, of obtaining Peace. Therefore he sent unto the Consul, and offered to yield unto the same Conditions wherein his Father had been bound to the Romans; if the War might so take end. It were needless here again to shew the folly of this his course. Towards the accomplishment of this desired Peace, there was in the Consul no greater power than to grant a Truce, whilst Embassadors might go to Rome: it resting in the Senate and People to approve the conditions, and ratifie the League. And of such a Truce granted by Martius, he had lately found no small discommodity redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answer, That other hope of Peace there was none; save that Perseus would yield both his Kingdom and Person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius to be so resolute in Adversity. On the other side, it argued a very faint heart in Perseus, that having receiv'd an answer so peremptory he still persisted, making vain offers of greater tribute. Finding that the Peace which he so much desired, could not be purchased with mony, the King withdrew himself back to Sycurium. There he lay hearkening what the Enemy did; whose Forces were well repaired by the coming of Misagenes the Son of Masanissa, with the aid before mentioned. This distance between the King and them, caused the Romans to wax the more bold in making their Harvest: about which business they ranged over all the Fields. Their careless demeanour gave him hope to do some notable exploit: which he attempted, both upon their Camp, and upon those that were abroad. The Camp he thought to have fired on the sudden: but the alarm being taken in good season, he failed in the enterprise. As for the Forragers; he had a good hand upon them, if he could have withdrawn it, and given over in time. But whilst he strove to force a Guard, he was visited by the Consul; by whom either in a Skirmish of Horse, or (for the report is divers) in a great Battle, he was overcome. This misadventure, whether great or small, caused Perseus, after a few days, to fall back into Ma- cedon; as being naturally given to fear danger, even where none was; whereby what loss he felt, will appear hereafter. He left all behind him, save only Tempe, weakly guarded: and consequently an easie prey to the Romans.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went straight unto Connus; hoping to have taken it, and so to have gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the work too hard, he returned back unto the Perræbians and others; from whom he won some Towns, and among the rest, Larissa. There were sundry Towns thereabout, bearing the same name of Larissa: so that this which the Consul took, may seem not to have belonged unto the Thessalians; unless, perhaps, after his Victory, Perseus did greater acts than we find recorded, and got some part of Thessaly.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to give a precise account; for that the Histories of them are greatly defective. One may think it strange, that the Bœotians, whom a Roman Embassador could terrifie, and bring altogether to his own will, should not be afraid of a Roman Army, then on foot in Greece, and a Navy on their Coast. But more strange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the Art of Martius, were more true to Rome, than other petty Towns, which by that same distraction of the Bœotians, became within themselves more absolute, than formerly they had been. The causes hereof were to have been sought among the changes happening in their variable factions: whereof the knowledge is now lost. Some of them rebelled, and were throughly punished by Lucretius the Roman Admiral: who got so much by spoiling them, that he would have brought others to rebell in like sort, if by extream oppression he could have driven them so far. Neither was Licinius the Consul undiligent in the same kind. What his doings were, after such time as he was at leisure from Perseus, I find no where mentioned. Only this is said in general; That in the War which he made, he cruelly and covetously demeaned himself.

After the same fashion dealt they, that commanded in the year following; Hostilius the Consul, and Hortensius the Admiral, or Prætor of the Fleet. Hostilius shewed more of his industry, in picking quarrels with the Confederates of Rome, than in prosecuting the War against the Macedonian. For concerning the Roman War upon his Kingdom, after that the Consul had sought passage in vain over certain Mountains, Perseus seemed, in a manner, free from it. He was troubled indeed on that side which looked towards Illyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Consul sent thither with an Army of four Thousand, and who, by Levies made upon the Confederates, doubled this his Army. But Claudius thinking to have taken Uscana, a border Town of Illyria, by Treason, came thither in such careless order, that the Inhabitants which had made shew of Treason, with purpose only to train him into danger; sallied forth upon him, overthrew him, and chased him so far, that hardly he escaped with the fourth part of his company. Yet this Town of Uscana, shortly after became Roman: which howsoever it happened, Perseus very soon recovered it, and many other places therewithall: Cotys a Thracian King, securing him on the one side of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epirot, revolted from the Romans, on the other. Perseus likewise made a painful Journey into Ætolia; where he was promised to be admitted into Stratus, that was the strongest City in that Region. Of this hope though he were disappointed by those of the Romans faction, yet in his return home, he took in Aperantia; and shortly after heard good news, that Ap. Claudius was again throughly beaten by Clevas, one of his Lieutenants. Such success had the Macedonian War under Hostilius. The same Consul offended much the Greeks, by the strict inquisition which his Embassadors made into mens affection towards Rome. For these Embassadors travelling thorow all the Cities of Peloponnesus, gave out speeches tending to shew, That they liked no better of those who sought not by might and main to advance their business, than of those which were of the Macedonian Faction. Their meaning was, to have accused by name, in the Parliament of Achaia, Lycortas that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the steps of Philopœmen; and together with him, his Son Polybius; who soon after was General of the Achæan Horse; but more notable by that excellent History which he wrote, than by his great employments, which he well and honourably discharged. The sum of the accusation should have been; That these were not hearty Friends unto the Romans, but such as abstained from raising troubles, more for lack of opportunity, than for any love to the common quiet. But since no colour of truth could be found, that might give countenance to such a tale; it was thought better, for the present, to let it alone, and give gentle words, as if all were well. In like manner dealt they among the Ætolians: They demanded Hostages; and found some in the Councel that approved the motion: as also among the Acarnanians, there were that intreated to have Roman Garrisons bestowed in their Towns. But neither the one nor the other of these propositions took effect. They of the Roman Faction, accused not only such as were inclinable to the Macedonian, but also the good Patriots; making it no less than a matter of Treason, to be a Grecian in Greece. On the contrary side, there wanted not some, who roundly told these pick-thanks of their base flattery, rating them openly, in such sort, that one of them hardly escaped being stoned, even in the presence of the Embassadors. Thus was all full of accusations, and excuses: among which the Embassadors carried themselves, as men that could believe none ill: though it were well enough known what they thought. The best was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and published to this effect: That it should be free for all men, to refuse obedience to any Roman Magistrate, imposing any burden for the present War, unless it were such, as the Senate had likewise thought meet. Of this Decree the whole Country was glad: for it was, or seemed, a good remedy of many inconveniencies. But they that standing on priviledges hereof, refused to fulfill every commandment, were numbred among the Patriots; which in the end of this War proved little better, if not worse, than to have been Traitors. The Senate was driven to set down this order, by reason of many and vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magistrates, and especially by the Admirals, Lucretius and Hortensius. Lucretius was condemned in a great sum of Money, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans, in that they loved not to have their Subjects oppreſſed. Hortenſius being ſtill in Office, had warning to amend.

Among the great number of Embaſſages that came to Rome about this time, either to ſeek redreſs of injuries, or to offer their ſervices: it is note-worthy, that from Alabanda, a Town of the leſſer Aſia, there was preſented unto the Senate, and well accepted, a moſt baſe piece of flattery. Theſe Alabanders brought three hundred Horſemens Targets, and a Crown of Gold, to beſtow upon Jupiter in the Capitol. But having a deſire to gratifie the Romans with ſome exquiſite token of their dutiful obedience, wherein they would be ſingular, and being not able to reach unto any great performance: they built a Temple unto the Town Rome, and appointed anniverſary Games to be celebrated among them, in honour of that goddeſs. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Antigonus, Ptolomy, and the like vain men, that would be thought gods; or at the ſhameful flattery of ſuch as beſtowed upon men, and not the moſt virtuous of men, divine honours; when he ſees a Town of Houſes, wherein powerful men dwell, worſhipped as a Goddeſs; and receiving (without ſcorn of the Givers, or ſhame of the Preſent) the title of Deity, at ſuch a raſcal City as Alabanda?

SECT. VII.

Q. Martius the Roman Conſul, with extream difficulty and danger, enters into Tempe. The cowardize of Perſeus in abandoning Tempe. The Town of Dium quitted by Martius; repaired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill ſucceſs. Their affairs in hard eſtate. Martius a cunning and a bad man. Polybius ſent Embaſſador to Martius from the Achæans. Polybius his honeſt wiſdom beneficial to the Achæans. King Eumenes grows averſe from the Romans. Perſeus negotiates with Antiochus and Eumenes. His falſe dealing with Gentius King of Illyria; whom he draws into the Roman War. He ſends Embaſſadors to the Rhodians; who vainly take upon them to be Arbitrators between him and the Romans. Perſeus loſeth a mighty ſuccour of the Baſtarnæ, by his wretched parſimony.

After two years of the Macedonian war, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the War began; which had been thought likely to reform all thoſe Countreys, and bring them to what paſs the Romans deſired; as it did in the end. Perſeus had hitherto the better, and was ſtronger now, than when he lived in Peace. He had enlarged his Borders on the Illyrian ſide, his friends, in all parts of Greece, took courage daily; and his reputation grew ſuch, as cauſed thoſe that were before wholly Roman, to ſuſpect what the iſſue of the War might prove, and thereupon to become wiſe for themſelves. Contrariwiſe, Licinius, and Hoſtilius the Conſuls, had one after the other ſpent their time in vain, ſeeking way into Macedon; and defaced the glorious enterprize of Conqueſt, by many loſſes received. The Roman Admirals had ſo demeaned themſelves, that many Towns, even of the beſt affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the fear was great on the Roman ſide; and the Army much leſſened, not only by caſualties of War, but by the facility of the Tribunes or Colonels, or elſe of the Conſul himſelf (for they laid the blame one upon the other) in licenſing the Souldiers to depart. Quintius Martius the new Conſul, who ſucceeded unto Hoſtilius, was to amend all this: which nevertheleſs was more than he knew how to do; though he brought with him a ſtrong ſupply of men. He began hotly to ſet the War on the Foot, which a long time had ſlept. And he began the right way: not ſeeking to force the Straights that were ſurely Guarded, but taking pains to climb the Mountains which were thought able to forbid all paſſage over them, without help or need of any cuſtody. The King heard of his approach; and being uncertain what way he meant to take, diſtributed his own forces, to the defence of all places which might give entrance, or permit aſcent. But the Conſul proceeded in his Journey: with hope, either not to be diſcovered by the Enemy, or to break through all oppoſition, or at leaſtwiſe, to fight on as convenient ground, as they ſhould have that lay to ſtop him; and at length, if all failed, to make a ſafe retreat. He ſent before him four thouſand of his moſt expedite Foot, to diſcover the ways. Two days was this company troubled, in overcoming the difficulty of no more than fifteen miles: after which they had ſight of the Enemy, that lay to deny their paſſage. They occupied therefore a ſafe piece of ground; and ſent back word to the Conſul, where they were; intreating him to haſten unto them: which he did. The Macedonians where not a whit diſmayed at his arrival; but met him, and fought with him, two or three days together; each returning to their own Camp at night, with little loſs on either ſide. This bickering was on the narrow ridge of a Mountain, which gave ſcarcely room unto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed: all the reſt were beholders. In this caſe it was impoſſible to get forwards: yet a ſhame to return. Wherefore Martius took the only courſe remaining: and indeed the beſt: Part of his men he left with Popilius, to attend upon the Macedonians: whilſt he, with the reſt, fetcht a compaſs about, and ſought out ways that never had been trodden. Herein he found extream difficulty: which notwithſtanding, he overcame. Beſides the troubles commonly incident to ſuch Journeys, through places unfit for habitation: he was compelled by labour of hand; to make paths where none were; yea, where Nature might ſeem to have intended, that none ſhould be. So ſteep he found the deſcent of the Mountains, in this way which he took: that of ſeven miles, which they travelled the firſt day, his men were compelled, for the more part to rowll themſelves down; as not daring to truſt their feet. Neither was this the worſt. For they met with Rocks, that ſtood one over another, ſo upright: and cumberſome to get down: that their Elephants were afraid of that giddy project, and caſting their Governours, made a terrible noiſe, which affrighted the Horſes, and bred great confuſion. Having therefore gone, or wallowed, four miles of this grievous Journey; there was nothing more deſired by the Souldiers, than that they might be ſuffered to creep back again, the ſame way which they had come. But ſhift was made to let down the Elephants, by a kind of Bridges, like unto falling draw-bridges: whereof the one end was joyned to the end of the Cliff; the other ſuſtained by two long Poſts, faſtened in the ground below. Upon theſe two Poſts, or Poles, (which indeed, not being very ſtrong, ſince it was intended that they ſhould be either cut or broken) were faſtened two rafters, anſwerable in length to the diſtance, between the higher and the lower fall: ſo as the end of one Bridge might reach to the beginning of another. Theſe were covered with Planks and Turfe; that they might ſeem continent with the ground: ſo to make the Beaſts adventurous to go upon them. If there were a plain of any good extent from the foot of a Rock, to the next down-fall; then might the Bridge be ſhorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretty way, upon one of theſe; the Poſts upholding the frame were cut aſunder; thereby cauſing him to ſink down unto the next Bridge; whence he was conveyed in like manner, to the third, and onward ſtill to the very bottom. Thus went they down ſliding, ſome on their Feet, others on their Buttocks, till they came to an even Valley. By this it appears, how throughly provided the Romans uſe to be in their Journeys, of things needful in all occaſions; as alſo what ineſtimable pains they took in this deſcent, about the conveyance of themſelves and all their Carriages down the Mountains. The next day they reſted; ſtaying for Popilius and his Company, who hardly, or perhaps never, ſhould have overtaken them, if the Enemy had followed, and ſet upon him from aloft. The third and fourth days journeys were like unto the firſt: ſave that cuſtom, and the nearneſs to their ways end without meeting Enemy, cauſed them the better to endure the labour.

Perſeus could not be ignorant of the Romans coming towards him: ſince they fought with his men upon the paſſage, three days together; he lying ſo nigh, that he might well-near have heard the noiſe. Yet was he ſo poſſeſſed with fear; that he neither ſtirred to help his own men, or to hinder the Conſul, nor made any proviſion for that which might fall out; but as one void of councel, ſate hearkening after the event. Four only paſſages there were, leading into Tempe: the firſt by Connus; which the Romans were unable to force: the ſecond and third were the ſame which Martius had attempted in vain, and another like unto it; the laſt, by the City of Dium out of Macedon. All theſe were ſufficiently guarded: and whoſoever would ſeek any other way, muſt be fain to take ſuch pains as Martius had undergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer than any of the reſt: whereof only the King had benefit: for that his Enemies could not get thither, ſave through the Valley it ſelf, into which they muſt firſt pierce another way. Dium ſtood upon the huge Mountain Olympus, about a mile from the Sea: of which mile, the River Helicon becoming there a Lake, and called Baphyras, took up the one half, the reſt being ſuch as might eaſily have been fortified. Beſides all theſe, there was in the midſt of Tempe, a paſſage which ten men might eaſily keep: where the ſpurs of the Mountains, reaching far into the Valley; drew near to the very Banks of Peneus, a goodly and deep River which ran through it. Wherefore nothing had been more eaſie, than to make the Conſul repent him of his troubleſome Journey: if Perſeus could have ſeen his own advantages. For the Roman Army was not only in ill caſe to fight, after the vexation of that miſerable travel: but muſt needs have either periſhed for want of Victuals, or been inforced to return the ſame way that he came, if the King had made good the ſtraight of Dium. To have returned and climbed up with their Elephants and Carriages, againſt thoſe Rocks, from which, with extream labour, they could hardly get down, it ſeems a matter of impoſſibility: eſpecially conſidering how the Enemy from above their heads, would have beaten upon them; being now aware of the path which they had taken, though he knew it not when they ſtole away from him. It may therefore be thought ſtrange that the Romans did not rather take their Journey into Macedon, from the ſide of Illyria, whence that Kingdom had often been invaded, as lying open on that part: than put themſelves to the trouble of breaking into Tempe, whence, after that they were arrived, there was no means to eſcape, without forcing one of thoſe paſſages, which they deſpaired to win. But the Cowardize of Perſeus did commend the counſel by them followed, as wiſe. For he no ſooner heard that the Enemy was come over the Mountains into Tempe, than he fared like one out of his Wits; ſaying, That he was vanquiſhed, and had loſt all, without battle. Herewithall he began to take out of Dium, what he could carry away in haſte; and ſtraightways abandoned the Town. In the ſame vehemency of amazement, he ſent a ſtraight command to Theſſalonica, that the Arſenal there ſhould be ſet on fire; and to Pella, that his Treaſures there ſhould be caſt into the Sea: as if the Romans were like preſently to be Maſters of theſe two Cities. Niceas, who was appointed to drown the Treaſure, performed it as haſtily as well he could: though ſoon after, his Maſter grew ſorry for the loſs; and it was all, in a manner, recovered by Divers from under the Water. But Andronicus, who had charge to ſet fire on the Kings Arſenal, deferred the execution, foreſeeing that repentance might follow: and ſo he prevented the damage. Whether Niceas, for his abſolute and blind obedience, or Andronicus, for his careful providence, merited the greater commendation, or more eaſie pardon; it reſted in the King to interpret. The reward of his Service was this, Perſeus growing aſhamed of his mad Cowardize, that appeared in this haſty direction: cauſed them both to be ſlain. Alſo thoſe poor men, which had fetcht his Treaſure out of the Sea by their Diving, were payed their wages after the ſame ſort: that ſo there might be no witneſs of the Kings baſe folly. Such end muſt they fear, who are privy to diſhonourable actions of great Princes. If Perſeus would have gone ſurely to work, for the hiding of his fault; then muſt he ſo royally have behaved himſelf, that no man might believe him to be the Author of any unworthy act or councel. But his virtue was of no ſuch capacity. He thought it enough to lay the blame upon others. And therefore, having called Hippias away (the Captain which had ſtopped the Conſul on the top of the Mountain) and Aſclepiodatus, from defence of the paſſages, whereto they were by him appointed: he rated them openly; ſaying, That they had betrayed unto the Enemy the Gates and Bars of Macedon. Of this reproach, if they would diſcharge themſelves, by laying it upon him, to whom of right it belonged, then might they have ſped as did Niceas and Andronicus.

The Conſul Martius had great cauſe to rejoyce, for for that the King had ſo haſtily relinquiſhed his poſſeſſion of Tempe, and all the paſſages leading thereinto: ſince the Roman Army, this notwithſtanding, was hardly able to ſubſiſt for want of Victuals. He took Dium without reſiſtance, and thence went forward into Macedon: wherein having Travelled about a days Journey, and gotten one Town that yielded, he was compelled by meer lack of Food for his men, to return back towards Theſſaly. His Fleet came to him, in this time of neceſſity, well appointed to have holpen him in the War: but having left behind, at Magneſia, the Ships of Burthen, which carryed the Proviſions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had been careful to occupy the Caſtles about Tempe, which were forſaken by the Macedonians: for by thoſe ways only might Corn be brought to the Army. To meet the ſooner with this Corn, which was moſt deſirouſly expected, he forſook Dium, and went to Phila; by which fooliſh Journey (if not worſe than fooliſh) he loſt more, than a little the longer faſting had been worth. It is probable that his Carts, withall, or the moſt of his ſtore, were loſt among the Mountains: for otherwiſe it had been madneſs to put himſelf on ſuch an enterpriſe, ſo ſlenderly provided, as that without enforcement, or ſight of the Enemy, he ſhould be fain to quit it. Howſoever it was: men thought him a Coward, or at leaſt a bad man of War; ſince he thus recoyled and gave off, when it moſt behooved him to have proſecuted the action.

By underſtanding the folly, or Cowardize of Martius; the King recollected himſelf, underſtood his own errour; ſought to hide it by ſuch poor means as have been ſhewed, and laboured to make what amends he could, He quickly repoſſeſſed the Town of Dium, which he haſtily repaired, finding it diſ-mantled by the Romans. This done, he encamped ſtrongly by the River of Enipeus: meaning there to ſtop the Enemies proceeding all that Summer. Leſs diligence, more timely uſed, would have been enough, not only to have delivered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of Peace, but to have given him ſuch a noble Victory, as might cauſe the Romans to ſeek a good end of the War upon fair conditions, and not to begin again in haſte. Yet this recovery and fortification of Dium, was to the Conſul an exceeding hinderance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the Conqueſt in hand, in all the continuance of his Only the Town of Heraclea, ſtanding on the River of Peneus, five mile from Dium, was taken by force, or rather by a trick of climbing upon mens heads, ſomewhat after the manner of our tumblers. But it made ſuch defence as it could, and was not given up for fear. After this, Martius did ſet a bold face towards Dium; as if he would have taken it again, and have driven the King further off: though his intent or hope was nothing like ſo great: his chief care, being to provide for his wintering. He ſent the Admiral to make attempt upon the Sea-Towns, Theſſalonica, Caſſandrea, Demetrias, and others. All theſe were aſſayed: but in vain. The Fields about Theſſalonica were waſted; and ſome Companies, that ſundry times adventured forth of the Town, were ſtill put to the worſe. As for the Town it ſelf; there was danger in coming near it, either by Land or Sea; by reaſon of the Engines, which ſhot from the Walls, and reached unto the Fleet. Wherefore the Admiral ſetting Sail from thence, ran along by Ænia, and Antigonea, (landing near to each of them; and both doing and receiving hurt) until he came to Pallene in the Territory of Caſſandrea. There King Eumenes joyned with him, bringing twenty Ships of War: and five other were ſent thither from King Pruſias. With this acceſs of ſtrength, the Admiral was bold to try his fortune at Caſſandrea: which was bad. There was a new Ditch lately caſt by Perſeus, before the Town: which, while the Romans were filling up, queſtion was made, What became of the earth taken thence, for that it lay not upon the bank? By this occaſion, it was learned, that there were Arches in the Town-wall filled up with that earth, and covered with one ſingle row of Brick. Hence the Admiral gathered hope of making way into the Town, by ſapping the Walls. To this work he appointed ſuch as he thought meeteſt: giving an alarm to the other ſide of the Town, thereby to ſhadow his attempt. The breach was ſoon made. But whilſt the Romans were ſhouting for joy, and ordering themſelves for the aſſault: the Captains within the Town perceived what was done; and ſallying forth unexpected, gave a fierce charge on the Companies that were between the Ditch and the Wall; of whom they ſlew about ſix hundred, and ſuffered few to eſcape unwounded. This diſaſter, and the want of good ſucceſs on that part of the Town which King Eumenes aſſailed (a ſupply in the mean while entring the Town by Sea) cauſed the Siege to break up. Lorone was the next place which the Admiral thought meet to attempt: and thence likewiſe he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias: whereinto Euphranor, a Macedonian Captain, was gotten before his coming, with ſuch Forces, as were not only ſufficient to have defended the Town, if the Admiral had laid Siege to it, but to keep the Land about it from ſpoil; or, at leaſt (as they did) to make the Enemy pay dear for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his Journey to Demetrias, by Melibœa; whither the Conſul (that he might not be quite without work) had ſent his Lieutenant to beſiege it: and by the terrour of his appearing ſuddenly over their heads, cauſed the beſiegers to diſlodge in all haſte, ſetting their Camp on fire.

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, ſo far was their ability ſhort of their Enterpriſes; ever ſince their Conſul (whether daſtardly, or careleſly) moſt unlike a good Commander, had let go his hold of Macedon, by forſaking Dium: yea, it is to be ſuſpected, that ſome greater harm befell them, or, at leaſt, that they were in ſome greater danger, than is expreſſed in the broken remaining Hiſtory of this War. For Martius perſwaded the Rhodians by Ageſipolis their Embaſſador, who came to him at Heraclea about other buſineſs of leſs importance, That they ſhould do well to interpoſe themſelves as Mediators, and ſeek to finiſh the War. Now, although Polybius do moſt probably conjecture, that this was rather a malicious device of Martius, craftily ſeeking to bring the Rhodians in danger (as anon it fell out) by their oppoſing the reſolution of the Senate; than that it proceeded from any true fear in him, either of Perſeus, or of Antiochus, who had then an Army on foot: yet ſince he made ſhew of fear, it is like withall, that ſomewhat had happened, which might make his fear ſeem not counterfeit. And ſo were the Rhodians moved to think of him; not Polyb. Leg. 80.

not only for that the extraordinary courteſie, both of him and the Admiral, towards their Embaſſadour, coming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cauſe it; but much more, for that ſhortly after the Embaſſadors of Perſeus, and of Gentius the Illyrian, did ſet out their buſineſs at Rhodes, not more with the ſtrength of a good Fleet, which the Macedonians had gotten, than with the honour of ſome Victory, wherein he had lately ſlain great numbers of the Roman Horſe. Thus much we find intimated; though the time, place, or other circumſtances of the Fight, be not ſpecified. And hereto may be referred, the report of thoſe that were ſent from Rome to view the Eſtate of Martius his Army. For they found the Conſul wanting meat; the Admiral wanting men; and, for thoſe few that he had, wanting both money and clothes: and App. Claudius the Prætor, who lay on the frontier of Illyria, ſo unable to invade Macedon, that contrariwiſe, he was in extream danger; ſo as either he muſt quickly be ſent for thence, or a new Army be ſent thither to him. Wherefore it may ſeem, that ſome blow had been taken on the Illyrian ſide, which made all to halt; or at leaſt that the Romans, with greater loſs than is before ſpoken of, had been driven from ſome of the Towns which they beſieged.

Polyb. Leg. 87.

Now, although it were ſo, that Martius, in very few of his actions, behaved himſelf like a man of War: yet in exerciſe of Cunning, which one hath moſt aptly termed, A crooked or ſiniſter kind of wiſdom, he dealt as a Crafts-maſter, with a reſtleſs working diligence. This indeed neither proved his ſufficiency, nor commended his honeſty; ſince thereby he effected nothing to his own benefit; and nevertheleſs out of envy, vain-glory, or ſuch delight as weak and buſie-headed men take, in creating explicable troubles, he directly made oppoſition to the good of his Country. At ſuch time as Perſeus, by the ſucceſs of his doings againſt Hoſtilius, had gotten much reputation, and was thought likely to invade Theſſaly. Archo, Lycortas, and other good Patriots among the Achæans, judged it expedient for their Nations to help the Romans, as in a time of adverſity, whom in proſperity they loved not to flatter. Wherefore Archo propoſed a Decree, which paſſed: That the Achæans ſhould ſend their whole power into Theſſaly, and participate with the Romans in all dangers. So the Army was levied: and Polybius, with others, ſent Embaſſadors unto Martius, to certifie him thereof, and know his pleaſure. Polybius found the Conſul buſie in finding paſſage thorow Tempe into Macedon. He went along with the Army, and awaited the Conſuls leiſure, till they came to Heraclea; where, finding the time convenient, he preſented the Decree, and offered the ſervice of his Nation, wherein ſoever it ſhould be commanded. Martius took this very kindly; but ſaid, That he needed now no manner of help. Forthwith Polybius diſpatched home his companions, to ſignifie thus much: tarrying himſelf behind in the Camp. After a while, word was brought to Martius, that App. Claudius deſired, or rather imperiouſly required, of the Achæans, five Thouſand men, to be ſent him into Epirus. It was manifeſt, that Appius had need of theſe men; and that if he were ſtrong in Field, he might do notable ſervice, by diſtracting the Forces of Perſeus. But the Labirinthian head of Martius, could not allow of ſuch plain reaſon. He called unto him Polybius, to whom he declared, That Appius had no need of ſuch aid, and therefore willed him to return home, and in any wiſe take order that the men might not be ſent, nor the Achæans be put to ſuch needleſs charges. Away went Polybius; muſing, and unable to reſolve, whether it were for love to the Achæans, that the Conſul was ſo earneſt in this buſineſs; or rather for envy, and to hinder Ap. Claudius from doing any thing, ſince himſelf could do nothing. But when Polybius was to deliver his opinion in the Councel touching this matter; then found he a new doubt, that more nearly concerned his own ſelf, and thoſe of his party. For as he was ſure to incur the great indignation of the Conſul, if he ſhould neglect what was given him in charge; ſo was it manifeſt on the other ſide, that the words by Martius uttered to him in private, would prove no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they ſhould refuſe to help Claudius, alledging that he had no need: In this caſe therefore, he had recourſe unto the Decree of the Senate: which exempted men from neceſſity of doing what the Roman Commanders ſhould require, unleſs, by ſpecial order from the Senate, the ſame were likewiſe appointed. So for lack of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred unto the advice of the Conſul: by whom it was ſure to be made fruſtrate. Hereby the Achæans were ſavers, of more than an hundred and twenty Talents: though Polybius himſelf ran into danger of Appius his diſpleaſure; and for ſuch honeſt dealing in his Countries behalf, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long years impriſonment.

Whether it were by the like policy of Martius, that King Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late, to ſtand in fear leſt the fire, which he himſelf had helped to kindle, would ſhortly take hold on his own Lodging; or whether the regard of money were able to overſway all other paſſions; it is hard to determine: ſince they that had better means to know the truth, have not preciſely affirmed any certainty. One report is, That Eumenes did not ſo much as give any help to Martius: but coming to have joyned with him, in ſuch friendly manner as he did with the former Conſuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in ſuch anger, that he refuſed to leave behind him certain Horſe of the Gallo-Greeks, being requeſted to have done it. If this were true, and that his Brother Attalus tarrying behind with the Conſul, did the Romans good ſervice: then is the reaſon apparent, of the hatred, born afterward by the Senate to Eumenes, and the love to Attalus. But it is more generally received; that Eumenes gave a willing ear to Perſeus his deſire of accord, for meer deſire of gain. And it might well be, that covetouſneſs drew him on, in the courſe, whereinto indignation firſt led him. Howſoever it befell; Perſeus cauſed Eumenes to be ſounded, and found him ſo tractable, that he was bold to ſolicite him by an Embaſſage. The tenour of his Advertiſements, both to Eumenes and Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect love between a King and a free City: that the Romans had quarrel alike to all Kings, though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and uſed the help of one againſt another; that Philip was oppreſſed by them, with the help of Attalus; Antiochus, with the help of Philip and Eumenes; and now Perſeus aſſailed with help of Eumenes and Pruſias. Herewith he willed Eumenes menes to consider, that when Macedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Asia, which lay next at hand; yea, that already they began to think better of Prusias, than of him. In like sort he admonished Antiochus, not to look for any good conclusion of his War with the Egyptian, so long as the Romans could make him give over, by denouncing their will and pleasure. Finally, he requested both of them, either to compell the Romans to surcease from their War upon Macedon; or else to hold them as common enemies unto all Kings. Antiochus lay far out of the Romans way: and therefore was little troubled with such remonstrances. Eumenes was more nearly touch't; and as he felt part of this to be true, so had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should give answer, he began to offer a bargain of Peace for mony. He thought the Romans to be no less weary, than Perseus was afraid. Wherefore he promised for his own part, That if he might have fifteen hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand from this War, then would he remain a Neuter therein: and that for some greater quantity of mony (how much I find not) he would also bring the Romans to condescend unto Peace: and for assurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to give Hostages: Perseus liked well to receive the Hostages, but not to lay out the mony, especially before-hand, as was required. He would fain have Peace with Rome, and not with Eumenes only. For procuring of this, he promised to be at any reasonable cost; but he would lay down the mony in the Temple at Samothrace: whence it should be delivered unto Eumenes, after that the Peace was fully concluded and ratified. The Isle of Samothrace was Perseus his own: and therefore Eumenes thought the mony no nearer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Besides, his labour deserved somewhat, howsoever the business might happen to succeed: so that needs he would have part of his wages in prest. Thus the two Kings did no more than lose time; and Eumenes grew suspected of the Romans, as a Traitor.

After the same manner dealt Perseus with King Gentius the Illyrian. He had attempted this Illyrian before; who dealt plainly, and said, That without mony he could not stir. Hereunto Perseus loved not to hearken; thinking, that his Treasures would serve at the last cast, to deliver him from all his fears. But when the Romans had gotten within Tempe, then did his fear urge him to prodigality; so as he agreed to pay three hundred Talents which Gentius demanded for a recompence. So the bargain was soon made, and pledges on both sides delivered for performance. This was openly done by Perseus, to the end that all his Army might have comfort, by such access of strength to their party. Presently upon the bargain made, Embassadors were sent to Rhodes, from both Perseus and Gentius: who desired the Rhodians, to take upon them as Arbitrators between Perseus and the Romans, and to bring the War to an end. The Rhodians thinking that Martius the Consul was no less desirous of Peace than the Macedonian, arrogantly promised, that they, by their authority, would make Peace; wishing the Kings to shew themselves conformable. But the Roman Senate, hearing proud words to the same effect, from the Rhodian Embassadors, gave an answer as disdainful, angry, and menacing, as they could devise: so as this vain glory of the Rhodians was thoroughly chastised; and more throughly should have been, if their submission had not been as humble, as their folly was proud. Such use of Gentius his friendship, made Perseus, without laying out one Ounce of Silver. Now fain he would have hastened this young and rash Illyrian to enter with all speed into the War: but then must the mony be hastened away. Pantauchus the Macedonian Embassador, who remained with Gentius, exhorted him daily to begin the War by Land and Sea, whilst the Romans were unprovided. But finding what it was that made all to stay; he sent word to Perseus. Hereupon ten Talents were sent to Pantauchus: who delivered it to the young King, as Earnest of that which followed. More followed it indeed; and sealed up with the seal of the Illyrians, but carried by Macedonians, and not too fast. Before this mony came into Illyria, Gentius had laid hands upon two Roman Embassadors, and cast them into Prison. Which Perseus no sooner heard, than he re-called his Treasure-bearers, and sent them with their load to Pella; for that now the Illyrian was of necessity to make War with the Romans, whether he were hired thereto or not.

There came about the same time through Illyria, to the aid of Perseus, under one Clondicus, a petty King, ten thousand Horse, and ten thousand Foot of the Gauls, which were (as Plutarch hath it) the Bastarnæ. These had before-hand made their bargain, and were to receive present pay at the first. At their entry into the Kingdom, Perseus sent one to them; desiring their Captains to come visit him, whom he promised to gratifie with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the first question that their General asked, was, whether the King had sent mony to give their Souldiers their pay in hand, according to his bargain? Hereto the messenger had not what to answer. Why then (said Clondicus) tell thy Master, that the Gauls will not stir one foot further, until they have Gold, as was agreed, and Hostages. Perseus hereupon took counsel: if to utter his own opinion before men so wise that they would not contradict him, were to take counsel. He made an invective against the incivility and avarice of the Bastarnæ: who came with such numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdom. Five thousand Horse of them he said would be as many as he should need to use; and not so many, that he should need to fear them. It had been well done, if any of his Counsellors would have told him, That there wanted not employment for the whole Army of them, since without any danger to the Kingdom, they might be let out, by the way of Perrhæbia, into Thessaly: where, wasting the Country, and filling themselves with spoil, they should make the Romans glad to forsake Tempe, even for hunger and all manner of want; therein doing the King notable service, whether they won any Victory or not. This, and a great deal more, might have been alledged, if any man had dared to give advice freely. In conclusion, Antigonus, the same messenger that had been with them before, was sent again, to let them know the King's mind. He did his errand: upon which followed a great murmur of those many Thousands that had been drawn so far to no purpose. But Clondicus asked him now again, Whether he had brought the mony along with him to pay those five Thousand, whom the King would entertain. Hereto when it was perceived that Antigonus could make no better answer, than shifting ting excuſes, the Baſtarnæ returned preſently towards Danubius, waſting the Neighbour-parts of Thrace; yet ſuffering this crafty meſſenger to eſcape unhurt: which was more than he could well have expected.

Thus dealt Perſeus, like a careful Treaſurer, and one that would preſerve his mony for the Romans, without diminiſhing the ſum. But of this painful Office he was very ſoon diſcharged by L. Æmylius Paulus the new Conſul: who in fifteen days after his ſetting forth from Italy, brought the Kingdom of Macedon to that end, for which God had appointed over it a King ſo fooliſh and ſo cowardly.

SECT. VIII.

Of L. Æmylius Paulus the Conſul. His Journey. He forceth Perſeus to diſcamp, He will not hazard Battle with any diſadvantage. Of an Eclipſe of the Moon. Æmylius his ſuperſitition. The Battle of Pydna. Perſeus his flight. He forſakes his Kingdom: which haſtily yields to Æmylius. Perſeus at Samothrace. He yields himſelf to the Roman Admiral, and is ſent priſoner to Æmylius.

BY the War of Macedon, the Romans hitherto had gotten much diſhonour. Which, though it were not accompanied with any danger, yet the indignity ſo moved them, that either * they decreed that Province to L. Æmylius Paulus, without putting it, as was otherwiſe their manner, to the chance of Lot, between him and his fellow-Conſul; or at leaſt were gladder that the Lot had caſt it upon him, than ſo worthy a man was advanced to the dignity of a ſecond Conſulſhip. He refuſed to propound unto the Senate any thing that concerned his Province; until by Embaſſadors, thither ſent to view the Eſtate of the War, it was perfectly underſtood, in what condition both the Roman Forces, and the Macedonian, at the preſent remained. This being throughly known to be ſuch, as hath been already told, the Senate appointed a ſtrong ſupply, not only to the Conſul, but unto the Navy, and likewiſe to the Army that lay between Illyria and Epirus; from which App. Claudius was removed, and L. Anicius ſent thither in his place. Æmylius, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the cuſtom, ſpake with much gravity and authority. He requeſted thoſe that thought themſelves wiſe enough to manage this War, either to accompany him into Macedon, and there aſſiſt him with their advice; or elſe to govern their tongues at home, and not take upon them to give directions by hearſay, and cenſure by idle reports: for he told them plainly, that he would frame his doings to occaſions; not to the expectation of the multitude. The like ſpeech of his Father L. Æmylius, who died valiantly in the battle of Cannæ, might well be living in ſome of their memories; which was enough to make them conform themſelves the more gladly unto the inſtructions given by a wiſe and reſolute Conſul.

* Plut. in vit. Æmyl.

All his buſineſs within the City being diſpatched, Æmylius was honourably attended at his ſetting forth on his Journey, with an eſpecial hope of men, that he ſhould finiſh it ſo ſoon and happily, was more than could have been hoped or imagined. He came to Brunduſium: whence, when the wind came fair, he ſet Sail at break of day, and arrived ſafely at the Iſle of Corcyra before night. Thence he paſſed to Delphi: where having done ſacrifice to Apollo, after the fifth day he ſet forwards to the Camp, and was there in five days more. So are there but five of the fifteen days remaining, in which he finiſhed the War.

Perſeus lay ſtrongly encamped at Dium: having ſpared no labour of Men and of Women to fortifie the Banks of Enipeus, where it was fordable in dry weather: ſo as there was little hope or none, to force him; and conſequently, as little poſſibility to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconvenience troubling the Romans, and much diſabling them to make attempt upon Dium, was lack of freſh Water. For there were ten miles between Dium and Tempe; all the way lying between the Sea ſhore, and the foot of Olympus, without any Brook or Spring breaking forth on that ſide. But Æmylius found preſent remedy for this, by digging Wells on the Shore; where he found ſweet Springs: as commonly there is no Shore that wants them, though they riſe not above the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Martius from taking up his Lodging any nearer to the Enemy, than the Town of Heraclea, on the River of Peneus; where he had watering at pleaſure, but could perform no ſervice of any worth. Yet when the Roman Camp had ſuch means to lye cloſe to the Macedonian, as it preſently did, the paſſage onward being defended as hath been ſhewed, ſeemed no leſs difficult than before. Wherefore it was neceſſary to ſearch another way: which by enquiry was ſoon found out. There was a narrow paſſage over Olympus, leading into Perrhæbia; hard of aſcent, but ſlenderly guarded, and therefore promiſing a fair Journey. Martius either had not been informed hereof, or durſt not attempt it; or perhaps could not get his Souldiers to make the adventure; they fearing leſt it would prove ſuch a piece of work as had been their march over Oſſa into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater induſtry, courage, and ability to command. He had reformed, even at his firſt coming, many diſorders in the Roman Camp: teaching the Souldiers among other good Leſſons, to be obedient and ready in execution; without troubling themſelves, as had been their manner, to examine the doings and purpoſes of their General. And now he appointed about five Thouſand men to this enterpriſe; whereof he committed the charge unto Scipio Æmylianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his own Sons by nature; but adopted, the one of them, by a Son of Scipio the African; the other, by one of the Fabii. Scipio took with him ſome light-armed Thracians and Cretians; but his main ſtrength was of Legionaries. For the Kings Guard, upon the Mountain, conſiſted in a manner, wholly of Archers and Slingers; who though, at ſome diſtance they might do notable ſervice againſt thoſe that ſhould climb up unto them; yet when the darkneſs took away their aim, they were like to make a bad nights work, being to deal with thoſe that were armed to fight at hand. To conceal the buſineſs about which they went, Scipio and Fabius took a wrong way towards the Fleet; where Victuals were provided for their Journey: it being noiſed, that they were to run along the Coaſts of Macedon by Sea, and waſte the Country. All the way they were were passing the Mountains (which was about three days) the Consul made shew of a meaning to set upon Perseus where he lay, rather to divert the Kings attention from that which was his main Enterprise, than upon any hope to do good, in seeking to get over Enipeus. The channel of Enipeus, which received in Winter time a great fall of waters from the Mountains, was exceeding deep and broad; and the ground of it was such, as though at the present it lay well-near all dry, yet it served not for those that were weightily armed to fight upon. Wherefore Æmylius employed none save his Velites; of whom the Kings light Armature had advantage at far distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Towers which Perseus had raised on his own bank, did also beat upon the Romans, and gave them to understand, that their labour was in vain. Yet Æmylius persisted as he had begun: and recontinued his assault, such as it could be, the second day. This might have served to teach the Macedonians, that some greater work was in hand: since otherwise a good Captain, as Æmylius was known to be, would not have troubled himself with making such bravado's, that were somewhat costly. But Perseus lookt only unto that which was before his eyes: until his men, that came running fearfully down the Mountain, brought word into the Camp, that the Romans were following at their backs. Then was all full of tumult, and the King himself no less (if not more) amazed than any of the rest. Order was forthwith given to dislodge: or rather without order, in all tumultuous haste, the Camp was broken up, and a speedy retreat made to Pydna. Whether it were so, that they which had the custody of the passage were taken sleeping, or whether they were beaten by plain force, Scipio and Fabius had very good success in their Journey. It may well be, that they slept until the Romans came somewhat near to them; and then taking alarm, when their Arrows and Slings could do little service, were beaten at handy-strokes: so as the different relations that are cited by Plutarch out of Polybius, and an Epistle of Scipio, may each of them have been true. Thus was an open way cleared into Macedon: which had been effected by Martius in the year foregoing; but was closed up again through his not prosecuting so rich opportunity.

Perseus was in an extream doubt what course to take, after this unhappy beginning. Some gave advice to man his Towns, and so to linger out the War: having been taught by the last years example, how resolute the People were in making defence. But far worse counsel prevailed: as generally it doth in turbulent and fearful deliberation. The King resolved to put all at once to hazzard of battle: fearing belike to put himself into any one Town, lest that should be first of all besieged; and he therein (as cowardly natures always are jealous) not over-carefully relieved. This was even that same that Æmylius, or any invader, should have desired. So a place was chosen near unto Pydna, that served well for the Phalanx, and had likewise on the sides of it some pieces of higher ground, fit for the Archers and light Armature. There he abode the coming of the Enemy; who stayed not long behind him. As soon as the Romans had sight of the Kings Army; which with greater fear than discretion, had hasted away from them, forsaking the Camp that was so notably well fortified: they desired nothing more, than to give Battle immediately: doubting lest otherwise the King should change his mind, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Consul; praying him not to lose occasion by delay. But Æmylius told him, that he spake like a young man; and therefore willed him to have patience. The Romans were tyred with their Journey; had no Camp wherein to rest themselves; nor any thing there, save only the bare ground whereon they trod. For these, and the like respects, the Consul made a stand: and shewing himself unto the Macedonian, who did the like, in order of Battle, gave charge to have the Camp measured out and entrenched behind the Army; whereinto, at good leisure, he fell back, without any manner of trouble. After a nights rest, it was hoped both by the Romans and the Macedonians, that the matter should be determined; each part thinking their own General to blame, for that they had not fought the same day. As for the King, he excused himself by the backwardness of the Enemy, who advanced no further; but kept upon ground serving ill for the Phalanx: as on the other side, the Consul had the reasons before shewed, which he communicated to those about him the next day.

That evening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpitius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former year been Prætor, foretold unto the Consul, and (with his good liking) unto the Army, an Eclipse of the Moon, which was to be the same night: willing the Souldiers not to be troubled therewith, for that is was natural, and might be known long before it was seen. It was the manner of the Romans, in such Eclipses, to beat Pans of Brass, and Basons, as we do in following a swarm of Bees; thinking that thereby they did the Moon great ease, and helped her in her labour. But this prognostication of Sulpitius converted their superstition into admiration of his deep skill, when they saw it verified. Contrariwise, the Macedonians howled and made a great noise, as long as the Eclipse lasted: rather perhaps because it was their fashion, than for that they were terrified therewith, as with a prodegy betokening their loss: since their desire to fight was no whit lessoned by it. I will not here stand to dispute, Whether such Eclipses do signifie, or cause any alteration in civil affairs, and matters that have small dependance on natural complexion: for the argument is too large. More worthy of observation it is, how superstition captivates the wisdom of the wisest, where the help of true Religion is wanting. Æmylius, though he were sufficiently instructed concerning this defect of the Moon, that it was no supernatural thing, nor above the reach of humane understanding, so as he should need to trouble himself with any devout regard thereof: yet could he not refrain from doing his duty to this Moon, and congratulating with sacrifice her delivery, as soon as she shone out bright again: for which he is commended even by Plutarch, a sage Philosopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpitius perhaps did not assist him in this fooliſh devotion, yet it is like, that he, being a Senator, and one of the Councel for War, was partaker the next morning in a sacrifice done to Hercules; which was no less fooliſh. For a great part of the day was vainly consumed, e're Hercules could be pleased with any sacrifice, and vouchsafe to shew tokens of good luck in the entrails of the Beasts. At length, in the belly of the one and twentieth sacrifice, was found a promise of Victory to Æmylius: but with condition, That he should not give the onset. Hercules was a Greek, and partial, as nearer in alliance to the Macedonian than to the Roman. Wherefore it had been better to call upon the new goddeſs, lately Canonized at Alabanda; or upon Romulus, founder of their City, on whom the Romans had beſtowed his Deity; or (if a God of elder date were more authentical) upon Mars the Father of Romulus, to whom belonged the guidance of Military affairs; and who therefore would have limited his favour, with no injunctions contrary to the rules of War.

Now concerning the Battle; Æmylius was throughly perſwaded, that the King meant to abide it: for that otherwiſe he would not have ſtayed at Pydna, when as, a little before, his leiſure ſerved to retire whither he liſted, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Conſul thought that he might wait upon advantage, without making any great haſte. Neither was it to be neglected, that the morning Sun was full in the Romans faces: which would be much to their hinderance all the fore-noon. Since therefore Perſeus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Æmylius ſent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder, there was no likelihood of fighting that day. But about ten of the Clock in the morning, a ſmall occaſion brought to paſs that, which whereto neither of the Generals had over earneſt deſire.

A Horſe brake looſe at watering, which two or three of the Roman Souldiers followed into the River, wading after him up to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further bank: whence a couple of Thracians ran into the Water, to draw this Horſe over to their own ſide. Theſe fell to blows, as in a private quarrel; and one of the Thracians was ſlain. His Countrimen ſeeing this, haſted to revenge their fellows death, and followed thoſe that had ſlain him over the River. Hereupon company came in, to help on each part, until the number grew ſuch, as made it paſt a fray, and cauſed both the Armies to be careful of the event. In fine, each of the Generals placed his men in order of battle, accordingly as the manner of his Country, and the Arms wherewith they ſerved, did require. The ground was a flat Level, ſave that on the ſides a few Hillocks were raiſed here and there; whereof each part might take what advantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better Souldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Conſul encouraged their men with lively words: which the preſent condition could bountifully afford. But the King, having finiſhed his Oration, and ſent on his men, withdrew himſelf into Pydna: there to do ſacrifice, as he pretended, unto Hercules. It is the leſs marvel, that he durſt adventure battle, ſince he had bethought himſelf of ſuch a ſtratagem, whereby to ſave his own perſon. As for Hercules, he liked not the ſacrifice of a Coward; whoſe unſeaſonable devotion could be no better then Hypocriſie. For he that will pray for a good Harveſt, ought alſo Plough, Sow, and Weed his Ground. When therefore the King returned to the battle, he found it no better than loſt: and he in looking to his own ſaftey, cauſed it to be loſt altogetherr by beginning the flight.

The acts of this day, ſuch as we find recorded are, That the Roman Elephants could do no manner of good: That the Macedonian Phalanx did ſo ſtoutly preſs onwards, and beat off all which came before it, as Æmylius was thereat much aſtoniſhed, that the Peligni ruſhing deſperately on the Phalanx, were overborn; many of them ſlain, and the Squadrons following them ſo diſcouraged herewith, as they retired apace towards an Hill. Theſe were the things that fell out averſe to the Romans; and which the Conſul beholding, is ſaid to have rent his Coat-Armour for grief. If the King with all his power of Horſe, had in like manner done his devoyre, the Victory might have been his own. That which turned the fortune of the battle, was the ſame which doubtleſs the Conſul expected, even from the beginning: the difficulty, or almoſt the impoſſibility of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whilſt ſome of the Romans ſmall Battalions preſſed hard upon one part of it, and others recoyled from ia; it was neceſſary (if the Macedonians would follow upon thoſe which were put to the worſe) that ſome Files having open way before them, ſhould advance themſelves beyond the reſt that were held at a ſtand. This coming ſo to paſs, admoniſhed the Conſul what was to be done. The long Pikes of the Macedonians were of little uſe, when they were charged in flank by the Roman Targettiers; according to the direction given by Æmylius, when he ſaw the front of the Enemies great battle become unequal, and the ranks in ſome places open, by reaſon of the unequal reſiſtance which they found. Thus was the uſe of the Phalanx proved unavailable againſt many ſmall Squadrons, as it had been formerly in the battle of Cynoſcephalæ: yea this form of Embattailing was found unſerviceable againſt the other, by reaſon, that being not every where alike diſtreſſed, it would break of it ſelf; though here were little ſuch inconvenience of Ground, as had been at Cynoſcephalæ.

Perſeus, when he ſaw his battle begin to rout, turned his Bridle preſently, and ran amain towards Pella. All his Horſe eſcaped, in a manner untouched, and a great number followed him; the little harm which they had taken, witneſſing the little good ſervice which they had done. As for the poor Foot, they were left to the mercy of the Enemy: who ſlew above twenty Thouſand of them; though having little cauſe to be furious, as having loſt in that Battle, only ſome fourſcore, or ſixſcore men at the moſt. Some of the Foot, eſcaping from the execution, overtook the King and his Company in a Wood, where they fell to railing at the Horſe-men, calling them Cowards, Traitors, and ſuch other names, till at length they fell to blows. The King was in doubt leſt they had ill meaning to himſelf: and therefore turned out of the common way, being followed by ſuch as thought it good. The reſt of the company diſperſed themſelves: every one as his own occaſions guided him. Of thoſe that kept along with their King, the number began within a while to leſſen. For he fell to deviſing upon whom he might lay the blame of that days misfortune, which was moſt due to himſelf: thereby cauſing thoſe that knew his nature, to ſhrink away from him, how they could. At his coming to Pella, he found his Pages and Houſhold-ſervants, ready to attend him, as they had been wont. But of his great men that had eſcaped from the Battle, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholly time, there were two of his Treaſurers that had the boldneſs to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their unſeaſonable admonitions, he ſtabbed them both to death. After this, none whom he ſent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore ſtanding in fear, leſt they that refuſed to come at his call, would ſhortly dare ſome greater miſchief, he ſtole out of Pella by night. Of his Friends he had with him only Evander (who had been employed to kill Eumenes at Delphi) and two other. There followed him likewiſe about 500 Cretians, more for love of his mony than of him. To theſe he gave of his Plate, as much as was worth about fifty Talents, though ſhortly he couſened them of ſome part thereof; making ſhew as if he would have redeemed it, but never paying the mony. The third day after the Battle he came to Amphipolis, where he exhorted the Townſ-men to fidelity with Tears: and his own ſpeech being hindered by Tears, he appointed Evander to ſpeak what himſelf would have uttered. But the Amphilopitans made it their chief care to look well to themſelves. Upon the firſt fame of the overthrow, they had emptied their Town of two thouſand Thracians that lay there in Garriſon: ſending them forth under colour of a gainful employment, and ſhutting the Gates after them. And now to be rid of the King, they plainly bad Evander to be gone. The King hearing this, had no mind to tarry: but Embarking himſelf and the Treaſure which he had there, in certain Veſſels that he found in the River Strymon; paſſed over the Iſle of Samothrace: where he hoped to live ſafe, by priviledges of the Religious Sanctuary therein.

Theſe miſerable ſhifts of the King make it the leſs doubtful, how all the Kingdom fell into the power of Æmylius, within ſo few days after his Victory. Pydna, which was neareſt at hand, was the laſt that yielded. About ſix Thouſand of the Souldiers, that were of ſundry Nations, fled out of the Battle into that Town; and prepared for defence: the confuſed rabble of ſo many ſtrangers hindering all deliberation and conſent. Hippius, who had kept the paſſage over Oſſa againſt Martius, with Pantaucus, who had been ſent Embaſſador to Gentius the Illyrian, were the firſt that came in: yielding themſelves, and the Town of Berea, whither they had retired out of the Battle. With the like meſſage came others from Theſſalonica, from Pella, and from all the Towns of Macedon, within two days: the loſs of the head bereaving the whole body of all ſenſe and ſtrength. Neither did they of Pydna ſtand out any longer, when they knew that the King had forſaken his Country: but opened their Gates upon ſuch terms, that the ſack of it was granted to the Roman Army. Æmylius ſent abroad into the Country, ſuch as he thought meeteſt, to take charge of other Cities: he himſelf marching towards Pella. He found in Pella no more than three hundred Talents: the ſame, whereof Perſeus had lately defrauded the Illyrian. But within a very little while he ſhall have more.

It was ſoon underſtood, that Perſeus had taken Sanctuary in the Temple at Samothrace: his own Letters to the Conſul confirming the report. He ſent theſe Letters by perſons of ſuch mean condition, that his caſe was pitied, for that he wanted the ſervice of better men. The ſcope of this writing was, to deſire favour: which, though he begged in terms ill beſeeming a King, yet ſince the inſcription of his Epiſtle was, King Perſeus to the Conſul Paulus; the Conſul, who had taken from him his Kingdom, and would not allow him to retain the Title, refuſed to make any anſwer thereunto. So there came other Letters, as humble as could be expected: whereby he craved and obtained, that ſome might be ſent to confer with him about matters of his preſent eſtate. Nevertheleſs, in this Conference, he was marvellouſly earneſt, that he might be allowed ſtill to retain the name of King. And to this end it was, perhaps, that he had ſo carefully preſerved his Treaſure, unto the very laſt: flattering himſelf with ſuch vain hopes as theſe: That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuary, nor yet neglect thoſe great riches in his poſſeſſion; but compound with him for mony, letting him have his deſire to live at eaſe, and to be called King. Yea, it ſeems that he had indeed, even from the beginning, a deſire to live in this Iſle of Samothrace: both for that in one of his Conſultations about the War, he was dehorted by his Friends, from ſeeking to exchange his Kingdom of Macedon, for * ſuch a paltry Iſland; and for Lib. l. 42. that he offered to lay up the mony which Eumenes demanded, in the holy Temple that was there. But he finds it otherwiſe. They urge him to give place unto neceſſity, and, without more ado, to yield to the diſcretion and mercy of the people of Rome. This is ſo far againſt his mind, that the Conference breaks off without effect. Preſently there arrives at Samothrace, Cn. Octavius the Roman Admiral with his Fleet: who aſſayes, as well by terrible Threats, as by fair Language, to draw the King out of his lurking hole; wherein for fear of Impriſonment, he had now already Impriſoned himſelf. When all would not ſerve, a queſtion was moved to the Samothracians; How they durſt pollute their Temple, by receiving into it one that had violated the like holy priviledge of Sanctuary, by attempting the murder of King Eumenes at Delphi? This went to the quick. The Samothracians, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and ſent word to the King, that Evander, who lives with him in the Temple, is accuſed of an impious fact, committed at Delphi, whereof unleſs he can clear himſelf in judgement, he muſt not be ſuffered to prophane that holy place, by his abiding in it. The reverence born to his Majeſty, now paſt, makes them forbear to ſay, that Perſeus himſelf is charged with the ſame crime. But what will this avail, when the Miniſter of the fact being brought into Judgment, ſhall (as is to be feared) appeach the Author? Perſeus therefore willeth Evander to have conſideration of the little favour that can be expected at the Romans hand; who are like to be preſidents and overſeers of this judgement: ſo as it were better to dye valiantly, ſince none other hope remains, than to make good an ill cauſe; where, though he had a good plea, yet it could not help him. Of this motion Evander ſeems to like well: and either kills himſelf, or hoping to eſcape thence, by deferring the time as it were to get poyſon wherewith to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandment. The death of this man, who had ſtuck to Perſeus in all times of need, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to forſake him: ſo as none are left with him, ſave his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be ſuſpected, that they which leave him upon this occaſion, will tell perilous tales, and ſay, That the King hath loſt the priviledge of this holy Sanctuary, by murdering Evander therein. Or if the Romans will affirm ſo much, who ſhall dare to gainſay them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formality, and even that alſo liable to diſpute, which preſerves him from captivity, he purpoſeth to make an escape, and fly, with his Treasures, unto Cotys his good friend, into Thrace. Oroandes, a Cretian, lay at Samothrace with one Ship; who easily was perswaded to waft the King thence. With all secrecy the Kings mony, as much as could be so conveyed, was carryed aboord by night; and the King himself; with his Wife and *Children (if rather it were not true, that he had with him only Philip his elder Son, being his Brother by nature) with much ado got out at a Window by a Rope, and over a Mud-wall. At his coming to the Sea-side, he found no Oroandes there: the Cretian had played a Cretian trick, and was gone with the mony to his own home. So it began to wax clear day, whilst Perseus was searching all along the Shore: who had stayed so long about this, that he might fear to be intercepted e're he could recover the Temple. He ran therefore amain towards his Lodging: and thinking it not safe to enter it the common way, lest he should be taken, he hid himself in an obscure Corner. His Pages missing him, ran up and down making inquiry; till Octavius made Proclamation, That all the Kings Pages, and Macedonians whatsoever, abiding with their Master in Samothrace, should have their lives and liberty, with all to them belonging, which they had either in that Isle, or at home in Macedon, conditionally, That they should presently yield themselves to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewise Ion a Thessalian, to whom the King had given the custody of his Children, delivered them up to Octavius. Lastly, Perseus himself, with his Son Philip, accusing the gods of Samothrace, that had no better protected him, rendred himself, and made the Roman Victory compleat. If he had not trusted in those gods of Samothrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Macedon, without other hope of living, than of reigning therein; he might well have brought this War to an happier end. Now, by dividing his cogitations, and pursuing at once, those contrary hopes of saving his Kingdom by Arms, and himself by flight, he is become a spectacle of misery, and one among the number of those Princes, that have been wretched by their own default. He was presently sent away to Æmylius; before whom he fell to the ground so basely, that he seemed thereby to dishonour the Victory over himself, as gotten upon one of abject quality, and therefore the less to be esteemed. Æmylius used to him the language of a gentle Victor: blaming him, though mildly, for having, with so hostile a mind, made War upon the Romans. Hereto good answer might have been returned by one of better Spirit. As for Perseus, he answered all with a fearful silence. He was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Consul termed it) almost assurance; for that such was the mercy of the People at Rome. After these good words, being invited to the Consuls Table, and respectively entreated, he was committed prisoner to Q. Ælius.

Plutarch. in vit. Æmyl. Liv. lib. 45 Liv. l. 42.

Such end had this Macedonian War, after four years continuance: and such end therewithall had the Kingdom of Macedon; the glory whereof, that had sometime filled all parts of the World then known, was now translated unto Rome.

SECT. IX.

Gentius King of the Illyrians taken by the Romans.

ABout the same time, and with like celerity, Anicius the Romans Prætor, who succeeded unto App. Claudius, had the like success against King Gentius the Illyrian. Gentius had an Army of fifteen Thousand; with which he was at Lissus, ready to assist King Perseus as soon as the mony should come, whereof he had received only ten Talents. But Anicius arrested him on the way, fought with him, overcame him, and drave him into Scorda. This Town was very defensible by nature, besides the help of Fortification; and strongly manned with all the force of Illyria; which, assisted with the Kings presence, made it seem unpossible to be won, in any, not a very long time. Yet Anicius was confident in his late Victory; and therefore presented his Army before the Walls, making countenance to give an assault. The Illyrians, that might easily have defended themselves within the Town, would needs issue forth and fight. They were, it seems, rather passionate than couragious: for they were beaten; and thereupon forthwith began amazed to treat about yielding. The King sent Embassadors; by whom, at first, he desired Truce for three days, that he might deliberate concerning his Estate. It ill became him, who had laid violent hands on the Roman Embassadors, to have recourse to such mediation. But he thought his own fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was no greater harm done by him, than the casting of those Embassadors into prison, where they were all alive. Having obtained three days respite, he passed up a River, within half a mile of the Roman Camp, into the Lake of Scrdà, as it were to consult the more privately; though indeed, to hearken whether the report were true, that his Brother Caravantius was coming to his rescue. Finding that no such help was toward, it is wonder, that he was so foolish as to return into Scorda. He sent messengers craving access unto the Prætor; before whom, having lamented his folly past (which, excepting the dishonesty, was not so great as his folly present) he fell down humbly, and yielded himself to discretion. All the Towns of his Kingdom, together with his Wife, Children, Brother, Friends, were presently given up. So this War ended in thirty days: the people of Rome not knowing that it was begun, until Perpenna, one of the Embassadors that had been imprisoned, brought word from Anicius how all had passed.

* Called now Scutari.

SECT. X.

How the Romans behaved themselves in Greece and Macedon, after their Victory over Perseus.

NOw began the Romans to swell with the pride of their fortune; and to look Tyrannically upon those that had been unmannerly toward them before, whilst the War with Perseus seemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadors were still at Rome, when the tydings of these Victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good good to call them into the Senate, and bid them do their errand again. This they performed with a bad grace; saying, That they were sent from Rhodes to make an overture of Peace; forasmuch as it was thought, that this War was no less grievous to the Romans themselves, than to the Macedonians and many others: but that now they were very glad, and in behalf of the Romans did congratulate with the Senate and People of Rome, that it was ended much more happily than had been expected. Hereto the Senate made answer, That the Rhodians had sent this Embassage to Rome, not for love of Rome, but in favour of the Macedonian; whose partizans they were, and should so be taken. By these threats, and the desire of some (covetous of the charge) to have War proclaimed against Rhodes; the Embassadors were so affrighted, that in mourning Apparel, as humble Suppliants, they went about the City, beseeching all men, especially the great Ones, to pardon their indiscretion, and not to prosecute them with vengeance, for some foolish words. This danger of War from Rome being known at Rhodes, all that had been any whit averse from the Romans in the late War of Macedon, were either taken and condemned, or sent Prisoners to Rome; excepting some that slew themselves for fear, whose goods also were Confiscated. Yet this procured little grace; and less would have done, if old M. Cato, a man by nature vehement, had not uttered a mild sentence, and advertised the Senate, That in decreeing War against Rhodes, they should much dishonour themselves, and make it thought, that * rather the wealth of that City, which they were greedy to ransack, than any just cause, had moved them thereto. This consideration, together with their good deserts in the Wars of Philip and Antiochus, helped well the Rhodians: among whom, none of any mark remained alive, save those that had been of the Roman Faction. All which notwithstanding, many years passed, e're by importunate suit, they could be admitted into the society of the Romans: a favour which till now they had not esteemed; but thought themselves better without it, as equal Friends.

Cæsar. in orat. apud Sallust. de conjurat. Catilinæ.

With the like, or greater severity, did the Romans make themselves terrible in all parts of Greece. Æmylius himself made progress thorow the Country; visiting all the famous places therein, as for his pleasure: yet not forgetting to make them understand what power he had over them. More than five hundred of the chief Citizens in Demetrias, were slain at one time by those of the Roman Faction, and with help of the Roman Souldiers. Others fled, or were banished, and their Goods Confiscated. Of which things, when complaint was made to the Consul, the redress was such, as requited not the pains of supplication. His friends, that is to say, those which betrayed unto the Romans the liberty of their Country, he feasted like a King, with excessive chear; yet so, that he had all things very cheap in his Camp: an easie matter, since no man durst be backward in sending provisions, nor set on them the due price. Embassadors were likewise sent from Rome, some, to give order for settling the Estate of Macedon towards which they had more particular instruction from the Senate, than was usual in such case; and some, to visit the affairs of Greece. The Kingdom of Macedon was set at liberty by Æmylius, and the Embassadors, his Assistants, who had order therefore from the Senate. But this liberty was such as the Romans used to bestow. The best part of it was, That the Tribute which had been payed unto the Kings, was lessened by half. As for the rest, the Country was divided into four parts, and they forbidden Commerce one with the other. All the Nobility were sent Captive into Italy, with their Wives and Children, as many as were above fifteen years old. The ancient Laws of the Country were abrogated: and new given by Æmylius. Such mischief the Senate thought it better to do, at the first alteration of things in this Province, and in the time of Conquest, then otherwise to leave any inconvenience that should be worse in the future. But concerning the Greeks, that were not Subjects to Rome, the things done to them could deserve no better name than meer Tyranny: yea, and shameless perjury; were it not so, that the familiar custom, among Princes and great Estates, of violating Leagues, doth make the Oaths of confœderation seem of no validity. The Embassadors that were sent to visit the Greeks, called before them all such men of note, from every quarter, as had any way discovered an unserviceable disposition towards the Romans. These they sent to Rome; where they were made sure enough. Some of these had sent Letters to Perseus, which fell at length into the Romans hands: and in that respect, though they were not Subjects; yet wanted there not colour, for using them as Traitors, or at least as Enemies. But since only two men were beheaded, for having been openly on the Macedonian side: and since it is confessed, that the good Patriots were no less afflicted in this inquisition, than they that had sold themselves to the King: this manner of proceeding was inexcusable Tyranny. With the Achæans these Embassadors were to deal more formally; not so much because that Common-wealth was strong; (though this were to be regarded by them, having no Commission to make or denounce War) and like to prove untractable, if manifest wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of sign, by Letters, or otherwise, whereby any one of the Achæans could be suspiciously charged to have held correspondence with the Macedonian. It was also so, that neither Callicrates, nor any of his Adherents, had been employed by the Nation, in doing or suffering their service to the Romans; but only such as were the best Patriots. Yet would not therefore the Embassadors neglect to use the benefit of the time: wherein, since all men trembled for fear of Rome, the season served fitly to rank the Achæans with the rest. And hereto Callicrates was very urgent: fearing, and procuring them to fear in behalf of him and his friends, that if some sharp order were not now taken, he and his fellows should be made to pay for their mischievous devices e're long time passed. So the Embassadors came among the Achæans: where one of them, in open Assembly of the Nation, spake, as Callicrates had before instructed him. He said, That some of the chief among them, had with mony and other means befriended Perseus. This being so, he desired that all such men might be condemned; whom, after sentence given, he would name unto them. After sentence given (cryed out the whole Assembly) what Justice were this? Name them first, and let them answer; which if they cannot well do, we will soon condemn them: Then said the Roman boldly, That all their Prætors, as many as had led their Armies, were guilty of this crime. If this were true, said Xenon, a temperate man, and confident in his innocence, than should

I like-

I likewiſe have been friend to Perſeus: whereof, if any man accuſe me, I ſhall throughly anſwer him, either here preſently, or before the Senate at Rome. Upon theſe words of Xenon, the Embaſſador laid hold and ſaid, That even ſo it were the beſt way, for him and the reſt to purge themſelves before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not until he had cited above a Thouſand; willing them to appear and anſwer before the Senate. This might even be termed the Captivity of Greece; wherein ſo many of the honeſteſt and worthieſt men were carried from home, for none other cauſe, than their love unto their Country; to be puniſhed according to the will of thoſe, who could not endure, that virtue, and regard of the publick liberty, ſhould dwell together in any of the Greeks. At their coming to Rome, they were all caſt into Priſon, as men already condemned by the Achæans. Many Embaſſages were ſent from Achaia, (where it is to be wondred, that any ſuch honeſt care of theſe innocent men could be remaining: ſince honeſty had been thus puniſhed as a Vice, in ſo many of the worthieſt among them) to inform the Senate, that theſe men were neither condemned by the Achæans, nor yet held to be offenders. But inſtead of better anſwer, it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Country, that theſe men ſhould return into Achaia. Neither could any ſolicitation of the Achæans, who never ceaſed to importune the Senate for their liberty, prevail at all; until after ſeventeen years, fewer than thirty of them were inlarged, of whom that wiſe and virtuous man Polybius the great Hiſtorian, was one. All the reſt were either dead in priſon, or, having made offer to eſcape, whether upon the way before they came to Rome, or whether out of Jayle, after that they were committed thereto, ſuffered death as Malefactors.

This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done upon the Epirots. For the Senate being deſirous to preſerve the Macedonian Treaſure whole; yet withall, to gratifie the Souldiers, gave order, that the whole Country of Epirus ſhould be put to ſack. This was a barbarous and horrible cruelty; as alſo it was performed by Æmylius with miſchievous ſubtilty. Having taken leave of the Greeks, and of the Macedonians, with bidding them well to uſe the liberty beſtowed upon them by the people of Rome; he ſent unto the Epirots for ten of the principal men out of every City. Theſe he commanded to deliver up all the Gold and Silver which they had; and ſent along with them, into every of their Towns, what companies of men he thought convenient, as it were to fetch the mony. But he gave ſecret inſtructions to the Captains, that upon a certain day by him appointed, they ſhould fall to ſack, every one the Town whereinto he was ſent. Thus in one day were threeſcore and ten Cities, all confederate with the Roman Souldiers; and beſides other acts of Hoſtility in a time of Peace, a hundred and fifty Thouſand of that Nation made Slaves. It may be granted, that ſome of the Epirots deſerved puniſhment, as having favoured Perſeus. But ſince they among this people, that were thought guilty of this offence; yea, or but coldly affected to the Romans, had been already ſent into Italy, there to receive their due; and ſince this Nation, in general, was not only at the preſent in good obedience, but had even in this War done good ſervice againſt the Romans; I hold this act ſo wicked, that I ſhould not believe it, had any one Writer delivered the contrary. But the truth being manifeſt by conſent of all, it is the leſs marvellous that God was pleaſed to make Æmylius Childleſs, even in the Glory of his Triumph, how great ſoever otherwiſe his virtues were.

In ſuch manner dealt the Romans, after their Victory with the Greeks and Macedonians. How terrible they were to other Kingdoms abroad, it will appear by the efficacy of an Embaſſage ſent from them to Antiochus; whereof, before we ſpeak, we muſt ſay ſomewhat of Antiochus his foregoers, of himſelf, and of his affairs about which theſe Embaſſadors came.

SECT. XI.

The War of Antiochus upon Egypt brought to end by the Roman Embaſſadors.

ANtiochus the Great, after his Peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the ſhort time following of his Reign and Life. He died the ſix and thirtieth year after he had worn a Crown, and in the ſeventeenth or eighteenth of Ptolomy Epiphanes; while he attempted to rob the Temple of Bell, or according to Juſtine) of Jupiter. He left behind three Sons, Seleucus Philopator, Antiochus Epiphanes, Demetrius Soter; and one Daughter, Cleopatra, whom he had given in marriage to Ptolomy Epiphanes King of Egypt. Seleucus, the fourth of that name, and the eldeſt of Antiochus his Sons; reigned in Syria twelve years, according to Euſebius, Appian, and Sulpitius: though Joſephus give him but ſeven years. A Prince, who, as he was ſlothful by nature, ſo the great loſs which his Father Antiochus had received, took from him the means of managing of any great affair. Of him, about three hundred years before his birth, Daniel gave this Judgement, Et ſtabit in loco ejus viliſſimus & indignus decore regio. And in his place (ſpeaking of Antiochus, the Father of this man) ſhall ſtart up a vile perſon, unworthy the honour of a King. Under this Seleucus, thoſe things were done which are ſpoken of Onias the high Prieſt, in theſe words, and others to the ſame effect: What time as the holy City was inhabited with all Peace, becauſe of the godlineſs of Onias the Prieſt, it came to paſs, that even the King did honour the place, and garniſhed the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the ſecond of Maccabees, of Simon, of Benjamin, who by Appollonius betrayed the Treaſure of the Temple: and of Heliodorus ſent by the King to ſeize them; of his miraculous ſtriking by God, and his recovery at the prayers of Onias, of the Kings death, and of his ſucceſſor Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore from the reign of this King, that the Books of the Maccabees take beginning. Which Books ſeem not to be delivered by one and the ſame hand. For the firſt Book, although it touch upon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing elſe of his Story; nor of the acts of his Succeſſors, till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Brother and Succeſſor of this Seleucus, from whom downward to the death of Simon Maccabæus (who died in the hundred threeſcore and ſeventeen year of the Greeks in Syria) that firſt Book treateth. The Author of the ſecond Book, although he take the Story ſomewhat further off, by way of a Proeme, yet he endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth year of the Grecian Reign, and with the death of Nicanor, slain by Judas: remembring in the fourth Chapter the practice of Jason the Brother of Onias; who, after the death of Seleucus, prevailed with Antiochus Epiphanes, his successor, for the Priesthood. It is also held by Jansenius, and other grave Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arius King of the Spartans sent Embassadors to the Jews, as to their Brothers and Kinsmen. Which intelligence between them and the Greeks, Jonathan the Brother and Successor of Judas, remembreth in the Preamble of that Epistle, which he himself directed to the people of Sparta by Numenius and Antipater his Embassadors, whom he employed at the same time to the Senate of Rome; repeating also the former Letters word by word, which Arius had sent to Onias the high Priest, whereto Josephus adds, that the name of the Lacedæmonian Embassador was Demoteles, and that the Letters had a square Volume, and were sealed with an Eagle holding a Dragon in her Claws.

Super Eccl. c. 5.

Now to this Seleucus, the fourth of that name, succeeded Antiochus Epiphanes, in the hundred and seven and thirtieth year of the Greeks in Syria. He was the second Son of the Great Antiochus: and he obtained his Kingdom by procuring the death of the King his Brother; which also he usurped from his Brothers Son.

Ptolomy Philometor, his Nephew by his Sister Cleopatra, being then very young, had been about seven years King of Egypt.

Ptolomy Epiphanes, the Father of this King Philometor, had reigned in Egypt four and twenty year, in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of Macedon, and the Great Antiochus, had agreed to divide his Kingdom between them, whilst he was a Child. But they found such other business e're long with the Romans as made them give over their unjust purpose; especially Antiochus, who gave with his Daughter in marriage, unto this Ptolomy, the Provinces of Cœlosyria, Phœnice, and Judæa, which he had won by his Victory over Scopas, that was General of the Egyptian Forces in those parts. Nevertheless, Ptolomy adhered to the Romans: whereby he lived in the greater security. He left behind his two Sons, this Ptolomy Philometor, and Ptolomy Physcon; with a Daughter Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her Brethren, and after his death to the younger, by whom she was cast off, and her Daughter taken in her stead. Such were the marriages of these Egyptian Kings.

Ptolomy Philometor, so called (that is, the Lover of his Mother) by a bitter nick-name, because he slew her, fell into hatred with his Subjects, and was like to be chased out of his Kingdom, his younger Brother being set up against him. Physcon having a strong party, got possession of Alexandria; and Philometor held himself in Memphis, craving succour of King Antiochus his Uncle. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who under colour to take upon him the protection of the young Prince, sought by all means possible to possess himself of that Kingdom. He sent Apollonius the Son of Mnestheus Embassador into Egypt, and under colour to assist the Kings Coronation, he gave him instructions to perswade the Governours of the young King Philometor, to deliver the King his Nephew, with the principal places of that Kingdom, into his hands; pretending an extraordinary care and desire of his Nephews safety and well doing. And the better to answer all arguments to the contrary, he prepared a forcible Army to attend him. Thus came he along the Coast of Syria to Joppe, and from thence on the sudden he turned himself towards Jerusalem; where, by Jason the Priest, (a Chaplain fit for such a Patron) he was with all pomp and solemnity received into the City. For though lately, in the time of Seleucus, the Brother and Predecessor of Epiphanes, that impious Traitor Simon of the Tribe of Benjamin, Ruler of the Temple, when he would have delivered the Treasures thereof to Apollonius, Governour of Cœlisoria and Phœnicia, was disappointed of his wicked purpose by miracle from Heaven; the said Apollonius being strucken by the Angel of God, and recovering again at the prayer of Onias: yet sufficed not this example to terrifie others from the like ungodly practices. Presently upon the death of Seleucus, this Jason, the Brother of Onias, seeking to supplant his Brother, and to obtain the Priesthood for himself, offered unto the King three hundred and threescore Talents of silver, with other rents and sums of mony. So he got his desire, though he not long enjoyed it.

This naughty dealing of Jason, and his being over-reached by another in the same kind, calls to mind a by-word taken up among the Achæans, when as that mischievous Callicrates, who had been too hard for all worthy and virtuous men, was beaten at his own weapon, by one of his own condition. It was thus:

One Fire than other burns more forcibly,
One Wolf than other Wolves does bite more sore,
One Hawk than other Hawks more swift does fly:
So one most mischievous of men before,
Callicrates, false knave as knave might be,
Met with Menalcidas more false than he.

And even thus it fell out with Jason: who within three years after was betrayed, and overbidden by Menelaus the Brother of Simon, that for three hundred Talents more obtained the Priesthood for himself: Jason thereupon being forced to fly from Jerusalem, and to hide himself among the Ammonites.

From Jerusalem, Antiochus marched into Phœnicia, to augment the numbers of his men of War, and to prepare a Fleet for his expedition into Egypt; with which, and with a mighty Army of Land-forces, He went about to reign over Egypt, that he might have the dominion of two Realms, and entred Egypt with a mighty company; with Chariots and Elephants, with Horsemen, and with a great Navy, and moved War against Ptolemæus King of Egypt; but Ptolemæus was afraid of him, and fled, and many were wounded to death. He won many strong Cities, and took away the spoils of the Land of Egypt. Thus was fulfilled the Prophecy of Daniel: He shall enter into the quiet and plentiful Provinces, and he shall do that which his Fathers have not done, nor his Fathers Father. Never indeed had any of the Kings of Syria so great a Victory over the Egyptians, nor took from them so great riches. For he gave a notable overthrow to the Captains of Ptolomy, between Pelusium, and the Hill Cassius, after which he entred and sackt the greatest and richest of all the Cities of Egypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that Antiochus had smitten Egypt, he turned again, and went up towards Israel and Jerusalem with a mighty people, and entred proudly into the Sanctuary, and took away the Golden Altar, Altar, and the Candleſtick for the light, and all the inſtruments thereof, and the table of the Shew-bread, and the pouring Veſſels, and the Bells, and the Golden Baſons, and the Vail, and the Crowns, and the Golden Apparel. He took alſo the Silver, and the Gold, and the precious Jewels, and the ſecret Treaſures: and when he had taken away all, he departed into his own Land, after he had murdered many men.

Lib. 6. It was about the beginning of the Macedonian War, that Antiochus took in hand this Egyptian buſineſs. At what time he firſt laid claim to Cœloſyria, juſtifying his title by * the ſame allegations  Cap. 5. ſect. 2.* which his Father had made; and ſtiffly averting, that this Province had not been conſigned over to the Egyptian, or given in dowry with Cleopatra. Eaſie it was to approve his right unto that which he had already gotten, when he was in a fair way to get all Egypt: The Achæans, Rhodians, Athe- Polyb Leg. 81, 82, &c. nians, and other of the Greeks, preſſed him, by ſeveral Embaſſages, to ſome good concluſion. But his anſwer was, that if the Alexandrians could be contented to receive their King his Nephew Philometor, the elder Brother of the Ptolomies, then ſhould the War be preſently at an end; otherwiſe not. Yet when he ſaw that it was an hard piece of work to take Alexandria by force: he thought it better to let the two Brothers conſume themſelves with inteſtine War, than by the terrour of his Arms, threatning deſtruction unto both of them, to put into them any deſire of coming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his Forces for the preſent; leaving the Ptolomies in very weak eſtate, the younger almoſt ruinated by his invaſion, the elder hated and forſaken by his people.

But how weak ſoever theſe Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to be ſo ſtrong, that Antiochus might leave them to the proſecution thereof; and follow, at good leiſure, his other buſineſs at Jeruſalem, or elſewhere. So after the ſack of Jeruſalem, he reſted him a while at Antioch, and then made a journey into Cilicia, to ſuppreſs the Rebellion of the Thracians, and others in thoſe parts, who had been given, as it were, by way of dowry, to a Concubine of the Kings, called Antiochis. For Governour of Syria in his abſence, he left one Andronichus, a man of great authority about him. In the mean while, Menelaus, the Brother of Simon, the ſame who had thruſt Jaſon out of the Prieſthood, and promiſed the King three hundred Talents for an In-come; committing the charge of the Prieſthood to his Brother Lyſimachus, ſtole certain Veſſels of Gold out of the Temple: whereof he preſented a part to Andronichus the Kings Lieutenant, and ſold the reſt at Tyre, and other Cities adjoyning. This he did, as it ſeemeth to advance the payment of the three hundred Talents promiſed; the ſame being now by Soſtratus eagerly demanded. Hereof when Onias the Prieſt (formerly diſpoſſeſſed by Jaſon) had certain knowledge, being moved with zeal, and deteſting the ſacriledge of Menelaus, he reproved him for it; and fearing his revenge, he withdrew himſelf into a Sanctuary at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight, adjoyning as a ſuburb to Antioch. In compaſs it had about ten miles: wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Grove, ſweet Springs, banquetting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a manner, abuſed to luſt, and other ſuch voluptuouſneſs. Whether it were well done of Onias to commit himſelf to the protection of Apollo and Diana, or to claim priviledge from the Holineſs of a ground conſecrated to any of the Heathen Gods, I will not ſtand to diſcourſe. Only I ſay for mine own opinion, that the inconvenience is far leſs, to hold this Book as Apocryphal, than to judge this fearful ſhift which Onias (though a virtuous man) made for his life, either commendable or allowable, as the Book ſeems to do. As for this refuge, it could not ſave the life of the poor old man: for Menelaus taking Andronichus apart, prayed him to ſlay Onias. So when he came to Onias, he counſelled him craftily, giving him his right hand with an Oath, 2 Mac. 2. 4. and perſwaded him to come out of the Sanctuary; ſo he ſlew him incontinently, without any regard of righteouſneſs. Hereof when complaint was made to Antiochus after his return out of Cilicia, He took away Andronichus his garment of purple, and rent his clothes, and commanded him to be led throughout 2 Mac. 4. the City; and in the ſame place where he had com- 38. mitted the wickedneſs againſt Onias, he was ſlain as a murderer. In taking revenge of this innocent mans death, I ſhould have thought that this wicked King had once in his life time done Juſtice. But preſently after this, at the ſuit of one Ptolomy, a Traitor to Ptolomy Philometor, he condemned innocent men to death, who juſtly complained againſt Menelaus, and his Brother Lyſimachus, for a ſecond robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the Veſſels of Gold remaining. Hereby it is manifeſt, that he was guided by his own outragious will, and not by any regard of Juſtice: ſince he revenged the death of Onias, he ſlew thoſe that were in the ſame cauſe with Onias; Who, had they told their Verſe 47. cauſe yea, before the Scythians, they ſhould have been heard as innocent. By reaſon of ſuch his unſteadineſs, this King was commonly termed Epimanes, that is, Mad, inſtead of Epiphanes, which ſignifieth Noble, or Illuſtrious.

After this, Antiochus made preparation for a 2 Mac. 5. 1. ſecond Voyage into Egypt, and then were there ſeen throughout all the City of Jeruſalem, forty days long, Horſemen running in the Air with Robes of Gold, and as Bands of Spear-men, and as Troops of Horſemen ſet in array, encountring and courſing one againſt another. Of theſe prodigious ſigns, or rather forewarnings of God, all Hiſtories have delivered us, ſome more, ſome leſs. Before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem by Veſpatian, a Star in the form of a Sword appeared in the Heavens directly over the City, after which there followed a ſlaughter like unto this of Epiphanes, though far greater. In Plin. lib. 2. cap. 57. the Cymbrian Wars, Pliny tells us, that the Armies were ſeen fighting in the Air from the morning till the evening.

In the time of Pope John the eleventh, a fountain poured out blood inſtead of Water, in or near the City of Genoa; ſoon after which the City was taken by the Saracens, with great ſlaughter. Of Mercur. Vipere de Prodig. l. 8 theſe and the like prodigious ſigns, Vipera hath col- Vipira de priſco & ſacro inſti- lected many, and very remarkable. But this one tuto. ſeemeth to me moſt memorable, becauſe the moſt notorious. All men know, that in the Emperour Nero, the off-ſpring of the Cæſars, as well natural as adopted, took end; whereof this notable ſign gave warning.

When Livia was firſt married to Auguſtus, an Suet. Galba Eagle let fall into her Arms a white Hen, holding a Lawrel branch in her mouth. Livie cauſed this Hen to be carefully nouriſhed, and the Lawrel branch to be planted: of the Hen came a fair increaſe of white Poultry; and from the little branch there ſprang up in time a Grove of Lawrel; ſo that afterwards, in all Triumphs, the Conquerours did uſe to carry in their hands a branch of Bayes taken out of this Grove; and after the Triumphs ended, ended, to ſet it again in the ſame ground: which Branches were obſerved, when they happened to wither, to foreſhew the death of thoſe perſons who carried them in Triumph. And in the laſt year of Nero, all the broods of the white Hens died, and the whole Grove of Bayes withered at once. Moreover, the heads of all the Cæſars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Auguſtus his hand, were ſtricken down with lightning. That the Jews did not think ſuch ſtrange ſigns to be unworthy of regard; it appears by their calling upon God, and praying, that theſe tokens might turn to good.

Now, as the firſt voyage of Antiochus into Egypt, was occaſioned by diſcord of the two Brethren therein Reigning; ſo was this ſecond Expedition cauſed by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolomy being left in Memphis, not ſtrong enough to force his Brother, who had defended Alexandria againſt all the power of their Uncle; thought it the beſt way to ſeek entrance into that royal City, rather by perſwaſion, than by Arms. Phyſcon had not yet forgotten the terrour of the former ſiege: the Alexandrines, though they loved not Philometor, yet loved they worſe to live in ſcarcity of Victuals (which was already great among them, and like to grow extream) ſince nothing was brought in from the Country; and the Friends of the younger Brother ſaw no likelihood of good iſſue to be hoped for without reconciliation. Theſe good helps, and above all theſe, the loving diſpoſition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexandria, encouraged Philometor in his purpoſe. But that which made him earneſtly deſirous to accompliſh it, was the fear wherein he ſtood of his Uncle. For though Antiochus was gone out of Egypt with his Army; yet had he left behind him a ſtrong Garriſon in Peluſium: retaining that City, which was the Key of Egypt, to his own uſe. This conſideration wrought alſo with Phyſcon, and with thoſe that were about him; ſo as by the vehement mediation of Cleopatra their Siſter, the two Brethren made an end of all quarrels.

When the news of this accord was brought to Antiochus, he was greatly enraged, for notwithſtanding that he had pretended no other thing than the eſtabliſhment of the King Philometor his Nephew, and a meaning to ſubject his younger Brother unto him, which he gave in anſwer to all Embaſſadors, yet he now prepared to make a ſharp War upon them both. And to this end he preſently furniſhed and ſent out his Navy towards Cyprus, and drew his Land Army into Cœloſyria, ready to enter Egypt the Spring following. When he was on his way as far as Rhinocorura, he met with Embaſſadors ſent from Ptolomy. Their errand was partly to yield thanks to Antiochus for the eſtabliſhing of Philometor in his Kingdom, partly to beſeech him, That he would rather be pleaſed to ſignifie what he required to have done in Egypt, which ſhould be performed, than to enter it as an Enemy with ſo puiſſant an Army. But Antiochus returned this ſhort anſwer, That he would neither call back his Fleet, nor withdraw his Army, upon any other condition; than that Ptolomy ſhould ſurrender into his hands, together with the City of Peluſium, the whole Territory thereto belonging: and that he ſhould alſo abandon and leave unto him the Iſle of Cyprus, with all the right that he had unto either of them, for ever. For anſwer unto theſe demands, he ſet down a day certain, and a ſhort one. Which being come and paſt, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleet entred Nilus, and recovered as well thoſe places which appertained to Ptolomy in Arabia, as in Egypt it ſelf; for Memphis, and all about it, received Antiochus, being unable to reſiſt him. The King having now no ſtop in his way to Alexandria, paſſed on thitherwards by eaſie journeys.

Of all theſe troubles paſt, as well as of the preſent danger wherein Egypt ſtood, the Romans had notice long ago. But they ſound, or were contented to find, little reaſon for them to intermeddle therein. For it was a Civil War: and wherein Antiochus ſeemed to take part with the juſter cauſe. Yet they gave ſignification, that it would be much diſpleaſing unto them, to have the Kingdom of Egypt taken from the rightful owners. More they could not, or would not do; being troubled with Perſeus; and therefore loth to provoke Antiochus too far. Nevertheleſs, the Egyptian Kings being reconciled and ſtanding joyntly in need of help againſt their Uncle, who prepared and made open War againſt them both: it was to be expected, that not only the Romans, but many of the Greeks, as being thereto obliged by notable benefits, ſhould arm in defence of their Kingdom. Rome had been ſuſtained with food from Egypt, in the War of Hannibal; when Italy, lying waſte, had neither Corn nor Mony wherewith to buy ſufficient ſtore. By help of the Egyptians had Aratus laid the foundation of that greatneſs, whereto the Achæans attained. And by the like help had Rhodes been defended againſt Demetrius Poliorcetes. Neither were theſe friendly turns which that bountiful houſe of the Ptolomyes had done for ſundry people abroad; ill followed, or ſeconded, by others as bad in requital: but with continuance of ſuitable benificence, from time to time increaſed. Wherefore the two Brothers ſent abroad confidently for aid; eſpecially to the Rhodians and Achæans, who ſeemed moſt able to give it effectually. To the Romans, Phyſcon and Cleopatra had ſent, a year ſince: but their Embaſſadors lay ſtill in Rome. Of the Achæans they deſired in particular, that Lycortas the brave Warriour might be ſent unto them, as General of all the Auxiliaries, and his Son Polybius General of the Horſe. Hereunto the Achæans readily condeſcended: and would immediately have made performance, if Calicrates had not interpoſed his miſchievous Art. He, wherby ſeeking occaſion to vaunt his obſequiouſneſs to the Romans, or much rather envying thoſe Noble Captains, whoſe ſervice the Kings deſired; withſtood the common voice: which was, That their Nation ſhould, not with ſuch ſmall numbers as were requeſted, but with all their power, be aiding unto the Ptolomies. For it was not now (he ſaid) convenient time to entangle themſelves in any ſuch buſineſs, as might make them leſs able to yield unto the Romans what help ſoever ſhould be required in the Macedonian War. And in this ſentence, he, with thoſe of his faction, obſtinately perſiſted; terrifying others with big words, as it were in behalf of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that Martius the late Conſul had ſignified unto him, that the Romans were paſt all need of help: adding further, that a thouſand Foot, and two hundred Horſe, might well be ſpared to the aid of their Benefactors, the Egyptian Kings, without diſabling their Nation to perform any ſervice to the Romans; foraſmuch as the Achæans could without trouble, raiſe thirty or forty thouſand Souldiers. All this notwithſtanding, the reſolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken by the violence of Calicrates. For when it was thought that the Decree ſhould have paſſed; he brought into the Theatre where the Aſſembly was held, a Meſſenger with Letters from Martius: whereby the Achæans were deſired to conform themſelves to the Roman Senate; and to labour, as the Senate had done, by ſending Embaſſadors to ſet Egypt in peace. This was an advice againſt all reaſon. For the Senate had indeed ſent Embaſſadors to make peace: but as in a time of greater buſineſs elſewhere, with ſuch milde words, that nothing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely that the Achæans ſhould do any good in the ſame kind. Yet Polybius and his friends durſt not gain-ſay the Roman Counſel; which had the force of an Injunction. So the Kings were left in much diſtreſs; diſappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perſeus overcome; and then might the Embaſſadors, ſent from the Roman Senate, perform as much as any Army could have done.

Audience had been lately given by the Senate, unto thoſe Embaſſadors of Phyſcon and Cleopatra: which having ſtayed more than a whole year in the City, brought nothing of their buſineſs to effect until now. The Embaſſadors delivered their meſſage in the name of thoſe that had ſent them: though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philometor, no leſs than his Brother and Siſter.

In this Embaſſage of Ptolomy, now requeſting help from Rome, appeared a notable change of his fortune, from ſuch as it had been before three or four years laſt paſt. For in the beginning of theſe his troubles, which began with the Macedonian War; either he, or Eulæus, or Lenæus (upon whom the blame was afterwards laid) which had the government of him, thought his affairs in ſuch good eſtate, that not only he determined to ſet upon Antiochus for Cæloſyria, but would have interpoſed himſelf between the Romans and Perſeus, as a competent Arbitrator; though it fell out well, that his Embaſſador was by a Friend perſwaded to forget that point of his errand. From theſe high thoughts he fell on the ſudden, by the rebellion of his Brother and Subjects, to live under protection of the ſame Antiochus. And now at ſuch time as by attonement with his Brother and Subjects, he might have ſeemed to ſtand in no need of ſuch protection, he hath remaining none other help whereby to ſave both his Kingdom and Life, than what can be obtained by their interceſſion which were employed againſt him. This miſerable condition of him, his Brother and Siſter, ſhewed it ſelf, even in the habit of thoſe Embaſſadors. They were poorly clad; the hair of their heads and beards overgrown, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their hands branches of Olive. Thus they entred into the Senate, and there fell, groveling and proſtrate upon the Floor. Their Garments were not ſo mean and mournful, nor their looks and countenances ſo ſad and dejected, but that their ſpeech was than either of the other far more lamentable. For, having told in what danger their King and Country ſtood; they made a pitiful and grievous complaint unto the Senate, beſeeching them to have compaſſion of their Eſtate, and of their Princes, who had always remained friendly and faithful to the Romans. They ſaid that the people of Rome had ſo much heretofore favoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of ſuch account and authority, with all other Kings and Nations; as, if they pleaſed but to ſend their Embaſſadors, and let Antiochus know that the Senate was offended with his undertaking upon the King their Confederate; then would he preſently raiſe his ſiege from before Alexandria, and withdraw his Army out of Egypt into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time, or uſed any delay; then ſhould Ptolomy and Cleopatra be ſhortly driven out of their Realms, and make repair to Rome, with ſhameful diſhonour to the Senate and People thereof, in that, in the extream dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouchſafed to relieve them.

The Lords of the Senate moved with compaſſion, ſent incontinently C. Popilius Lenus, C. Decimius, and A. Hoſtilius, as Embaſſadors to determine and end the War between thoſe Kings. In commiſſion they had firſt to find King Ptolomy, and then Antiochus, and to let them both underſtand, that, unleſs they ſurceaſed, and gave over Arms, they would take that King no more for a friend to the Senate and People of Rome, whom they found obſtinate, or uſing delay. So theſe Romans, together with the Alexandrine Embaſſadors, took their leave, and went onward their way within three days after.

Whilſt Popilius and his fellows were on their way toward Egypt, Antiochus had tranſported his Army over Luſini, ſome forty miles from Alexandria. So near was he to the end of his Journey, when the Roman Embaſſadors met him. After greetings and ſalutations at their firſt encounter, Antiochus offered his right hand to Popilius: but Popilius filled it with a Roll of Paper; willing him to read thoſe Mandates of the Senate before he did any thing elſe. Antiochus did ſo; and having a little while conſidered of the buſineſs, he told Popilius, That he would adviſe with his friends, and then give the Embaſſadors their anſwer. But Popilius, according to his ordinary blunt manner of ſpeech, which he had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rod which he held in his hand, willing him to make him ſuch an anſwer as he might report to the Senate, before he moved out of that Circle. The King aſtoniſhed at this ſo rude and violent a Commandment, after he had ſtayed and pauſed a while, I will be content (quoth he) to do whatſoever the Senate ſhall ordain. Then Popilius gave unto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Ally of the Romans.

Thus Antiochus departed out of Egypt, without any good iſſue of his coſtly Expedition; even in ſuch manner as Daniel had propheſied long before: yea, fulfilling every particular circumſtance, both of returning, and of doing miſchief to Jeruſalem after his return; like as if theſe things had rather been Hiſtorified than foretold by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embaſſadors, they ſtayed a while, and ſettled the Kingdom of Ægypt, leaving it unto the elder Brother, and appointed the younger to reign over Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus; which they left, as it had been, in the power of the Egyptian, having firſt ſent away Antiochus's Fleet, which had already given an overthrow to the Egyptian Ships. Dan. 11. 29, 30, &c.

SECT.

SECT: XII.

How the Romans were dreadful to all Kings. Their demeanour towards Eumenes, Prusias, Masanissa, and Coyts. The end of Perseus and his Children. The instability of Kingly Estates. The Triumphs of Paulus, Anicius, and Octavius. With the Conclusion of the Work.

BY this peremptory demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Message, and by the ready obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; we may perceive how terrible the Romans were grown, through their Conquest of Macedon. The same Popilius had been well contented, a year before this, to lay aside the roughness of his natural condition, and to give good language to the Achæans and Ætolians, when he went Embassador to those people of Greece, that were of far less power than King Antiochus. Likewise, Antiochus had with good words, and no more than good words, dismissed other Embassadors which came from Rome, in such sort, as they complained not, much less used any menacing terms, though he performed nothing of their request. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

Eumenes sent to Rome his Brother Attalus, to gratulate the Victory over Perseus, and to crave help or countenance of the Senate against the Gallo-Greeks, which molested him. Very welcome was Attalus, and lovingly entertained by most of the Senators: who bad him be confident, and request of the Senate his Brothers Kingdom for himself; for it should surely be given him. These hopeful promises tickled Attalus with such ambition, that he either approved, or seemed to approve the motion. But his honest nature was soon reclaimed by the faithful councel of Stratius a Physitian; whom Eumenes had sent to Rome of purpose to keep his Brother upright. So, when he came into the Senate, he delivered the errand about which he had been sent, recounting his own services done to
* Liv. l. 45. the Romans in the late War, * wherewithall, he forgat not to make of his Brother as good mention as he could: and finally, requested, That the Towns of Ænus and Maronea might be bestowed
Pol. Leg. 95 upon himself. * By his omitting to sue for his Brothers Kingdom, the Senate conceived opinion, that he meant to crave another day of audience for that business alone. Wherefore to make him understand how gracious he was, they not only granted all his desire; but in the presents which they gave unto him (as was their custom to Embassadors that came with an acceptable message) they Polyb. ibid. used singular magnificence. Nevertheless Attalus took no notice of their meaning, but went his way, contented with what they had already granted. This did so highly displease the Senate, that whilst he was yet in Italy, they gave order for the liberty of Ænus and Maronea: thereby making uneffectual their promise; which otherwise they could not, without shame, revoke. And as for the Gallo-Greeks, which were about to invade the Kingdom of Pergamus; they sent Embassadors to them, with such instructions, as rather encouraged than hindred them in their purpose. The displeasure of the Senate being so manifest; Eumenes thought it worthy of his labour to make another Voyage to Rome. He might well blame the folly of his second Voyage thither, for this necessity of the third: since, by his malice to Perseus, he had laid open unto these ambitious Potentates the way to his own doors. No sooner was he come into Italy, than the Senate was ready to send him going. It was not thought expedient to use him as an Enemy, that came to visit them in love: neither could they, in so doing, have avoided the note of singular inconstancy: and to entertain him as a Friend, was more than their hatred for his ingratitude, as they deemed it, would permit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no King should be suffered to come to Rome; and by virtue thereof sent him home, without expence of much farther complement.

Prusias King of Bythinia had been at Rome somewhat before; where he was welcomed after a better fashion. He had learned to behave himself as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or desire. For, entring into the Senate, he lay down and kissed the threshold, calling the Fathers his gods and saviours; as also he used to wear a Cap, after the manner of Slaves newly manumissed, professing himself an enfranchised Bondman of the people of Rome. He was indeed naturally a slave, and one that by such abject flattery kept himself safe, though doing otherwise greater mischief than any wherewith Perseus had been charged. His errand was, besides matter of complement, to commend unto the Senate the care of his Son Nicomedes, whom he brought with him to Rome, there to receive education. Further petition he made, to have some Towns added to his Kingdom: whereto, because the grant would have been unjust, he received a cold answer. But concerning the Wardship of his Son, it was undertaken by the Senate: which, vaunting of the pleasure lately done to Egypt, in freeing it from Antiochus, willed him thereby to consider, what effectual protection the Romans gave unto the children of Kings, that were to their Patronage commended.

But above all other Kings, Masanissa held his credit with the Romans good. His quarrels were endless with the Carthaginians: which made the friendship of the Romans to him the more assured. In all Controversies they gave judgement on his side: and whereas he had invaded the Country of Emporia, holding the Lands, but unable to win the Towns; the Romans (though at first they could find no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this oppression) compelled finally the Carthaginians both to let go all their hold, and to pay five hundred Talents to the Numidian, for having hindred him of his due so long. Now indeed had Rome good leisure to devise upon the ruine of Carthage: after which, the race of Masanissa himself was shortly by them rooted up. But hereof the old King never dreamed. He sent to Rome one of his Sons, to congratulate the Victory over Perseus; and offered to come thither himself, there to sacrifice for joy unto Jupiter in the Capitol. His good will was lovingly accepted; his Son rewarded, and he entreated to stay at home.

Coyts the Thracian sent Embassadors to excuse himself touching the aid by him given to Perseus, for that the Macedonian had him bound by Hostages; and to intreat, That his Son, which was taken with the Children of Perseus, might be set at liberty for convenient ransome. His excuse was not taken; since he had voluntarily obliged himself to Perseus, by giving Hostages without necessity: Yet was his Son given back to him ransomefree; with admonition to carry himself better toward the Romans in time following. His Kingdom lay between Macedon, and ſome barbarous Nations; in which reſpect, it was good to hold him in fair terms.

As for thoſe unhappy Kings, Perſeus and Gentius, they were led thorow Rome, with their Children and Friends, in the Triumphs of Æmylius and Anicius. Perſeus had often made ſuit to Æmylius, that he might not be put to ſuch diſgrace: but he ſtill received one ſcornful anſwer, That it lay in his own power to prevent it; whereby was meant, that he might kill himſelf. And ſurely, had he not hoped for greater mercy than he found, he would rather have ſought his death in Macedon, than to have been beholding to the courteſie of his inſolent Enemies for a wretched life. The iſſue of the Roman clemency, whereof Æmylius had given him hope, was no better than this: After that, he, and his fellow-King, had been led in Chains thorow the Streets, before the Chariots of their Triumphing Victors, that were committed to priſon, wherein they remained without hope of releaſe. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot up towards the Capitol, there to do ſacrifice, he ſhould command the Captives to be had away to priſon, and there put to death: ſo as the honour of the Vanquiſher, and miſery of thoſe that were overcome, might be both together at the utmoſt. This laſt ſentence of death was remitted unto Perſeus: yet ſo, that he had little joy of his life; but either famiſhed himſelf, or (for it is diverſly reported) was kept watching perforce by thoſe that had him in cuſtody; and ſo dyed for want of ſleep. Of his Sons, two dyed; it is uncertain how. The youngeſt called Alexander (only in name like unto the Great, though deſtined ſometimes perhaps by his Father, unto the fortunes of the Great) became a Joyner, or Turner; or, at his beſt preferment, a Scribe under the Roman Officers. In ſuch poverty ended the Royal houſe of Macedon: and it ended on the ſudden; though ſome eightſcore years after the death of that Monarch, unto whoſe ambition this whole Earth ſeemed too narrow.

If Perſeus had known it before, that his own Son ſhould one day be compelled to earn his living by handy-work, in a painful Occupation; it is like, that he would not as in a wantonneſs of Soveraignty have commanded thoſe poor men to be ſlain, which had recovered his Treaſures out of the Sea, by their skill in the feat of diving. He would rather have been very gentle, and would have conſidered, that the greateſt oppreſſors, and the moſt under-trodden wretches, are all ſubject unto the one high Power, governing all alike with abſolute command. But ſuch is our unhappineſs; inſtead of that bleſſed Counſel, Do as you would be done unto, a ſentence teaching all moderation, and pointing out the way to felicity; we entertain that arrogant thought, I will be like to the moſt High: that is, I will do what ſhall pleaſe my ſelf. One hath ſaid truly, Juven. ſat. 10.

——vv—— Et qui nolunt occidere quenquam
Poſſe volunt.——

Even they that have no murdrous will,
Would have it in their power to kill.

All, or the moſt, have a vain deſire of ability to do evil without controll: which is a dangerous temptation unto the performance. God, who beſt can judge what is expedient, hath granted ſuch power to very few: among whom alſo, very few there are, that uſe not this to their own hurt. For who ſees not that a Prince, by racking his Soveraign Authority to the utmoſt extent, enableth (beſides the danger to his own perſon) ſome one of his own Sons or Nephews to root up all his progeny? Shall not many excellent Princes, notwithſtanding their brotherhood, or other nearneſs in blood, be driven to flatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot that governs one, the moſt unworthy of his whole houſe, yet reigning over all? The untimely death of many Princes which could not humble themſelves to ſuch flattery; and the common practice of the Turkiſh Emperors to murder all their Brethren, without expecting till they offended; are two good proofs hereof. Hereunto may be added, that the Heir of the ſame Roger Mortimer, who murdered moſt traiterouſly, and barbarouſly, King Edward the ſecond; was, by reaſon of a marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, Heir apparent to the Crown of England: which, had he obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the race of his mortal enemy, to exerciſe the ſame upon the Line of that unhappy King. Such examples of the inſtability whereto all mortal affairs are ſubject; as they teach moderation, and admoniſh the tranſitory gods of Kingdoms, not to authorize by wicked precedents, the evil that may fall on their own poſterity: ſo do they neceſſarily make us underſtand, how happy that Country is, which hath obtained a King able to conceive and teach, That God is the ſoreſt and ſharpeſt Schoolmaſter that can be deviſed, for ſuch Kings, as think this world ordained for them, without controllment to turn it upſide-down at their pleaſure.*

* The true Law of free Monarchies.

Now concerning the Triumph of L. Æmylius Paulus, it was in all points like that of T. Quintius Flaminius: though far more glorious, in regard of the Kings own perſon, that was led along therein, as part of his own ſpoils; and in regard likewiſe both of the Conqueſt, and of the Booty. So great was the quantity of Gold and Silver carried by Paulus into the Roman Treaſury, that from thenceforth, until the Civil Wars which followed upon the death of Julius Cæſar, the Eſtate had no need to burthen it ſelf with any Tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to have been hindred by the Souldiers; who grudged at their General, for not having dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate over-ruled the people and Souldiers herein, and brought them to reaſon by ſevere exhortation. Thus Paulus enjoyed as much honour of this Victory as men could give. Nevertheleſs, it pleaſed God to take away from him his two remaining Sons, that were not given in Adoption: of which, the one dyed five days before the Triumph, the other three days after it. This loſs he bore wiſely: and told the people, That he hoped to ſee the Common-wealth flouriſh in a continuance of proſperity; ſince the joy of his Victory was requited with his own private calamity, inſtead of the publick.

Chap. 3. ſect. 4.

About the ſame time, Octavius the Admiral, who had brought Perſeus out of Samothrace: and Anicius the Prætor, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Gentius priſoner; made their ſeveral Triumphs. The glory of which magnificent ſpectacles, together with the confluence of Embaſſages from all parts, and Kings, either viſiting the Imperial City, or offering to viſit her, and do their duties in perſon; were enow to ſay unto Rome, Sume Superbiam, Take upon the Majeſty that thy deſerts have purchaſed.

BY

BY this which we have already ſet down, is ſeen the beginning and end of the three firſt Monarchies of the World; whereof the Founders and Erecters thought, that they could never have ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was alſo at this time almoſt at the higheſt. We have left it flouriſhing in the middle of the Field; having rooted up, or cut down, all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the World. But after ſome continuance, it ſhall begin to loſe the beauty it had; the ſtorms of ambition ſhall beat her great boughs and branches one againſt another; her Leaves ſhall fall off, her Limbs wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the Field, and cut her down.

Now theſe great Kings, and conquering Nations, have been the ſubject of thoſe ancient Hiſtories, which have been preſerved, and yet remain among us; and withall of ſo many tragical Poets, as in the perſons of powerful Princes and other mighty men have complained againſt Infidelity, Time, Deſtiny, and moſt of all againſt the Variable ſucceſs of worldly things, and Inſtability of Fortune. To theſe undertakings, theſe great Lords of the World have been ſtirred up, rather by the deſire of Fame, which ploweth up the Air, and ſoweth in the Wind; than by the affection of bearing rule, which draweth after it ſo much vexation, and ſo many cares. And that this is true, the good advice of Cineas to Pyrrhus proves. And certainly, as Fame hath often been dangerous to the living, ſo it is to the dead of no uſe at all; becauſe ſeparate from knowledge. Which, were it otherwiſe, and the extream ill bargain of buying this laſting diſcourſe, underſtood by them which are diſſolved; they themſelves would then rather have then wiſhed, to have ſtoln out of the world without noiſe, than to be put in mind, that they have purchaſed the report of their actions in the World, by rapine, oppreſſion, and cruelty: by giving in ſpoil the innocent and labouring ſoul to the idle and inſolent; and by having emptied the Cities of the World of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them again with ſo many and ſo variable ſorts of ſorrows.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germans, which had neither greatneſs nor continuance) there hath been no State fearful in the Eaſt, but that of the Turk: nor in the Weſt any Prince that hath ſpread his wings far over his Neſt, but the Spaniard; who ſince the time that Ferdinand expelled the Moors out of Granado, have made many attempts to make themſelves Maſters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the Treaſures of both Indies, and by the many Kingdoms which they poſſeſs in Europe, they are at this day the moſt powerful. But as the Turk is now counterpoiſed by the Perſian, ſo inſtead of ſo many Millions as have been ſpent by the Engliſh, French, and Netherlands in a defenſive War, and in diverſions againſt them, it is eaſie to demonſtrate, that with the charge of two hundred thouſand pound continued but for two years, or three at the moſt, they may not only be perſwaded to live in peace, but all their ſwelling and overflowing Streams may be brought back into their natural channels and old banks. Theſe two Nations, I ſay, are at this day the moſt eminent, and to be regarded; the one ſeeking to root out the Chriſtian Religion altogether, the other the Truth and ſincere Profeſſion thereof; the one to joyn all Europe to Aſia, the other the reſt of all Europe to Spain.

For the reſt, if we ſeek a reaſon of the ſucceſſion and continuance of this boundleſs ambition in mortal men, we may add to that which hath been already ſaid; That the Kings and Princes of the World have always laid before them the actions, but not the ends of thoſe great Ones which preceded them. They are always tranſported with the glory of the one, but they never mind the miſery of the other, till they find the experience in themſelves. They neglect the advice of God, while they enjoy life, or hope of it; but they follow the councel of death, upon the firſt approach. It is he that puts into man all the wiſdom of the World, without ſpeaking a word; which God, with all the words of his Law, promiſes, or threats, doth infuſe. Death, which hateth and deſtroyeth man, is believed; God, which hath made him, and loves him, is always deferred. I have conſidered (ſaith Solomon) all the works that are under the Sun, and behold, all is vanity and vexation of ſpirit: but who believes it till Death tells it us? It was Death, which opening the Conſcience of Charles the fifth, made him enjoyn his Son Philip to reſtore Navarre; and King Francis the firſt of France, to command that juſtice ſhould be done upon the Murderers of the Proteſtants in Merindol and Cabrieres, which till then he neglected. It is therefore death alone that can ſuddenly make man to know himſelf. He tells the proud and inſolent, That they are but abjects, and humbles them at the inſtant; makes them cry, complain, and repent; yea, even to hate their forepaſſed happineſs. He takes account of the rich, and proves him a beggar; a naked beggar, which hath intereſt in nothing, but in the gravel that fills his mouth. He holds a Glaſs before the eyes of the moſt beautiful, and makes them ſee therein their deformity and rottenneſs; and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, juſt, and mighty Death! whom none could adviſe, thou haſt perſwaded; what none have dared, thou haſt done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only haſt caſt out of the world and deſpiſed: thou haſt drawn together all the far ſtretched greatneſs, all the pride, cruelty, and ambition of man, and covered it all over with theſe two narrow words, Hic jacet.

Laſtly, whereas this Book, by the title it hath, calls it ſelf, The firſt part of the General Hiſtory of the World, implying a ſecond and third Volume; which I alſo intended, and have hewn out; beſides many other diſcouragements, perſwading my ſilence; it hath pleaſed God to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed, whoſe unſpeakable and never enough lamented loſs hath taught me to ſay with Job, Verſa eſt in luctum Cithara mea, & Organum meum in vocem flentium.

FINIS.

To the READER.

THe uſe of Chronological Tables is needful to all Hiſtories, that reach to any length of time; and moſt of all, to thoſe that are moſt general: ſince they cannot, like Annals, yearly ſet down all occurrences not coherent. This here followeth, may ſerve as an Index to the preſent part of this work, pointing unto the ſeveral matters, that having fallen out at one time, are far diſjoyned in the relation. Certainly it is not perfect, neither do I think that any can be. For howſoever the years of the firſt Patriarchs may ſeem to have been well-near compleat, yet in the reigns of the Kings of Juda and Iſrael, we find many fractions, and the laſt year, or years of one King reckoned alſo as the foremoſt of another. The ſame is moſt likely to have fallen out in many other, though not ſo preciſely recorded. Hereto may be added the divers and imperfect forms of the years, which were in uſe among ſundry Nations, cauſing the * Summer months, in proceſs of ſome ages, to fall into the winter, and ſo breeding extream confuſion in the reckoning of their times. Neither is it a ſmall part of trouble, to chooſe out of ſo many, and ſo utterly diſagreeing computations, as have already gotten Authority, what may probably be held for truth. All this, and a great deal more, is to be alledged, in excuſe of ſuch errours, as a more intentive and perfect Calculator ſhall happen to find herein. It may ſerve to free the Book, and likewiſe the Reader (if but of mean judgement) from any notorious Anachroniciſm; which ought to ſuffice. The book indeed will need it, even in that regard; not only from ſome errours of the Preſs, in the numbrings of years, but for ſome haſty miſ-reckonings of mine own, which I deſire to have hereby reformed, in hope that the Printing of this Table ſhall not want careful diligence. The Reader, if he be not offended with the reſt, ſhall find reaſon to be pleaſed with this, as tending wholly to his own eaſe.

* See lib. 2 cap. 3. ſect. 6.

The titles over the Columns, have reference to that which follows under them, as will readily be Conceived. Where two titles, or more, are over the head, as [Rome / Nabonaſſer] there do the numbers underneath proportionably anſwer, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example, The walls of Jeruſalem were finiſhed in the 319 Year from the building of Rome, and in the 314 from Nabonaſſer. In like manner it is to be underſtood, That Jehoſaphat began his reign in the 3774 of the Julian Æra, in the 3092 of the World, and in the 99 year of the Temple. This needs not more illuſtration, nor indeed ſo much, to thoſe that are acquainted with works of this kind. To avoid prolixity, I have forborn to inſert thoſe years, which I find not ſigned with ſome regardable accident, as with the birth or death of ſome Patriarch; the beginning of ſome Kings reign; ſome change of Government; ſome battle fought, or the like. So of the 13 years wherein Sylvius Capetus reigned over the Latines, I note only the firſt; that is, omitting all between the 4 of Jehoſaphat, wherein Capetus began, unto the 17 wherein Sylvius Aventinus ſucceeded, and wherein Jehoram firſt reigned with Jehoſaphat his Father. For I thought it vain to have filled up a Page with 12 lines of idle ciphers, numbring forth, 2, 3, 4, 5. and ſo ſtill onwards, till I had come to the firſt of Aventinus, and the 17 of Jehoſaphat. In ſetting down the Kings, there is noted over the head of every one, what place he held in order of ſucceſſion: as whether he were the firſt, ſecond, fifth, ſeventh, or ſo forth, in rank of thoſe that reigned in his Country, without notable interruption: Before the name, is the firſt year of his reign; at the end or foot of the name (as the ſpace gives leave) is the whole number of years in which he reigned; in the ſpaces following underneath, are thoſe years of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of ſome other King, or with the year of any remarkable accident. Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings name; there it is to be underſtood, that the ſame year belonged not only to the King then beginning, but unto ſome one or more of his foregoers: as the firſt year of Jehoram King of Iſrael, was the ſame with the ſecond of his Brother Ahaziah, and the 22 of his Father Ahab. So where two or three names are found in one ſpace, as in the 3077 year of the World, Zimri, Tibni, and Omri; it is meant, that every one of them reigned in ſome part of the ſame year, which is reckoned the ſecond of Ela, and the firſt of Omri. Particularly, under the reigns of the Egyptian Kings, are ſet down the years of thoſe Dynaſties, which it was thought meet to inſert; as likewiſe otherwhiles, the day, the month, upon which Nabonaſſar's year began, which how it varied from other years, may be found in the place laſt above cited.

Concerning the Æra, or account of years, from Iphitus, who began the Olympidas, from Rome

Rome built, from Nabonaſſar, and the like; as much as was thought convenient hath been ſaid, where due place was, in the book it ſelf: ſo as it remaineth only to note, that under the title of Olympiads, is ſet down, firſt the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the year of that Olympiad; as that Cyrus began his reign in Perſia, in the 55 Olympiad, and the firſt year thereof.

Now, for that the years of the world, of the Olympiads, of Rome, of Nabonaſſar, and other, had not beginning in one month, but ſome of them in March, ſome in April, ſome about Midſummer, and ſome at other times: the better to expreſs their ſeveral beginnings, ſome painful Chronologers have divided them proportionably in their ſeveral Columns, oppoſing part of the one year to part of the other: not (as I have here done) cutting all overthwart with one ſtraight line, as if all had begun and ended at one time. But this labour have I ſpared, as more troubleſome than uſeful, ſince the more part would not have apprehended the meaning, and ſince the learned might well be without it. It will be only needful to obſerve, that howſoever the Æra of the Olympiads be 24 years elder than that of Rome, and 29 than that of Nabonaſſar, yet the reign of ſome King may have begun at ſuch a time of the year as did not ſute with this difference. But hereof I take little regard. The more curious will eaſily find my meaning: the vulgar will not find the difficulty. One familiar example will explain all. Queen Elizabeth began her reign the 17 of November, in the year of our Lord 1558. She was crowned, held a Parliament, brake it up, threw down Images, and reformed many things in Religion, all in her firſt year, yet not all in that year 1558. but the greater part in the year following, whether we begin with the firſt of January, or with the 25 of March. The like may be otherwhiles found in this Table, but ſo, as the difference is never of a whole year.

The Julian Period, which I have placed as the greater number, over the years of the World, was delivered by that honourable and excellently learned Joſeph Scaliger: being accommodated to the Julian years, now in uſe among us. It conſiſteth of 7980 years, which reſult from the multiplication of 19, 28, and 15, that is, of the Cycle of the Moon, the Cycle of the Sun, and the years of an Indiction. Being divided by any of theſe, it leaves the number of the preſent year, or if no fraction remain, it ſhews the laſt year of that Cycle to be current. For example, in the 4498 of this Period, when was fought the great battle of Cannæ, the Prime or golden number was 14, the Cycle of the Sun. 18, and conſequently the Dominical Letter F. as may be found by dividing the ſame number of the Julian Period 4498, by 19 for the Prime, by 28 for the Cycle of the Sun. This Julian Period, after the preſent accompt, always exceeds the year of the World by 682. Beſides the former uſes, and other thence redounding, it is a better Character of a year, than any other Æra (as, From the beginning of the World, From the Flood, From Troy taken, or the like) which are of more uncertain poſition. More I ſhall not need to write, as touching the uſe or explication of theſe Tables. Neither was thus much requiſite to ſuch as are converſant in works of this kind: it ſufficeth if hereby all be made plain enough to the vulgar.
